Harper's weekly.
[New York : Harper's Magazine Co., etc.]

http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148

HathiTrust

www.hathitrust.org

Public Domain, Google-digitized
http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

We have determined this work to be in the public domain, meaning that it is not subject to copyright. Users are free to copy, use, and redistribute the work in part or in whole. It is possible that current copyright holders, heirs or the estate of the authors of individual portions of the work, such as illustrations or photographs, assert copyrights over these portions. Depending on the nature of subsequent use that is made, additional rights may need to be obtained independently of anything we can address. The digital images and OCR of this work were produced by Google, Inc. (indicated by a watermark on each page in the PageTurner). Google requests that the images and OCR not be re-hosted, redistributed or used commercially. The images are provided for educational, scholarly, non-commercial purposes.

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google
Original from PENNSTATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

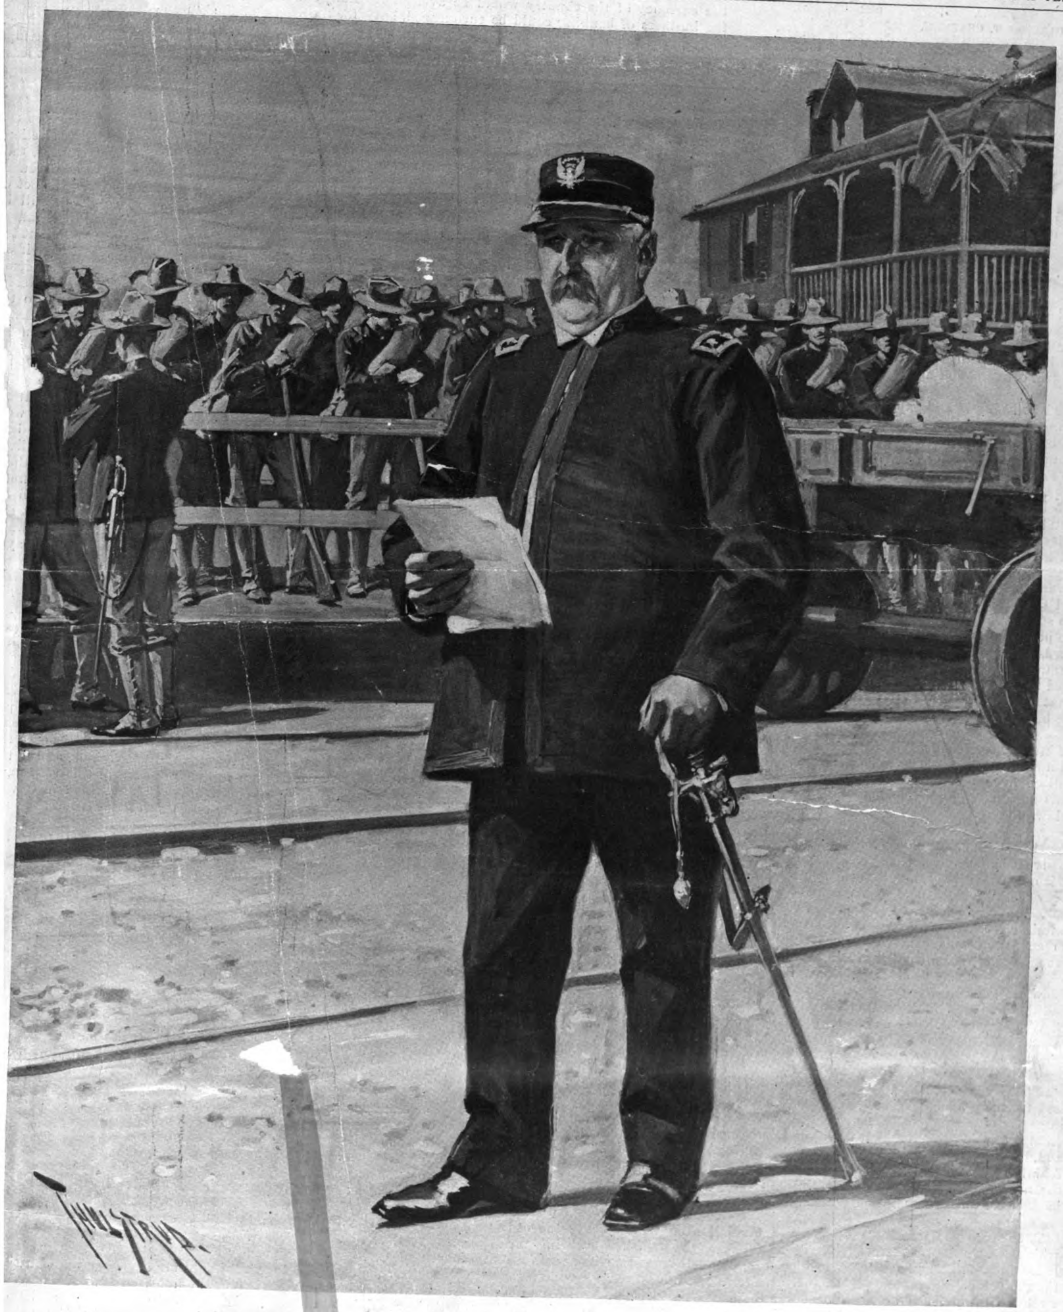
Original from
PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

COLLEGE LIBRARY
Pa. State College
27794



NEW SERIAL STORY BY FRANK R. STOCKTON BEGINS THIS WEEK.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2167.
Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

MAJOR-GENERAL WILLIAM R. SHAFTER, U.S.V.,

COMMANDING 5TH ARMY CORPS, DIRECTING EMBARKATION OF TROOPS AT PORT TAMPA.—DRAWN BY T. DE THULSTRUP FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Library

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, JULY 2, 1898

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

This Paper will be the best Pictorial History of the War with Spain, as it was of the War of 1861. Its Special Artists and Correspondents will follow the Army and Navy, and notable Events in Washington and elsewhere will be accurately portrayed.

| ARTISTS. | CORRESPONDENTS. |
|---|---|
| CARLTON T. CHAPMAN. | JOHN FOX, JR. |
| RUFUS F. ZOGBAUM. | FRANK D. MILLET. |
| FREDERIC REMINGTON. | JOHN F. BASS. |
| T. DE THULSTRUP | O. K. DAVIS. |
| W. A. ROGERS | HAROLD MARTIN, |
| CLYDE D. V. HUNT. | AND OTHERS. |

MR. FOX and MR. REMINGTON are now with General SHAFTER'S Army, Messrs. MILLET, BASS, and DAVIS are on their way to the Philippines, MR. HUNT is with the Cubans, and MR. MARTIN at St. Thomas.

AS some of the daily newspapers have said, there is no obligation in international law resting on the Spanish authorities to exchange HOBSON and his men for prisoners held by us. But there is an obligation in the code of ethics which governs the conduct of gentlemen, resulting from the promise made by Admiral CERVERA that he would arrange for their exchange as soon as possible. It is getting to be more and more certain that there is nothing in "Spanish honor" except a subject for boastful conversation among Spaniards.

IT is to be hoped and expected that the House of Representatives will pass the currency bill which has been reported by the Banking and Currency Committee, and which has been recommended by 140 Republicans. There are 203 Republican members of the House, and counting the remaining 63 as being opposed to the bill, there ought to be 39 sound-money Democrats who would make a majority for it in case of a full House. The bill does not go very far, but it takes some very important steps in the right direction, and especially it looks towards the retirement of government paper money and the substitution of banks for the Treasury as the source of demand notes. It also provides for the protection of the gold in the Treasury, and, in a word, starts the country off in the right direction towards a currency system of which we will not need to be ashamed, and which will not be a constant source of danger to the Treasury gold and to the business interests of the country.

THE navy personnel bill still remains to be acted upon, but there seems to be little doubt that it will go through before the session comes to an end. This or something much better should have become a law long ago. Promotion in the army and the navy should not be stagnant either in peace or war, but should flow along with sufficient rapidity to give to both services young commanding officers. It is not invidious to note that the admirals of the navy are taking no part whatever in the present war. Captain SAMPSON is an acting admiral, and Admiral DEWEY has been promoted to that rank on account of his achievement at Manila. All the men who are on the list of admirals are in the background, although it is only just to say that there are good and energetic men among them, and that one man on the retired list, Admiral JOHN G. WALKER, is probably as good a man for command rank to-day as there is in any navy in the world. But, as a rule, our commanding officers are all too old, and when the war broke out there was hardly a captain in our service who should not, for his proper training, have been commanding squadrons long ago. The present bill will not do much in this direction, but it will do something, and, like the currency bill, it is a good beginning. At all events, it will enable the department to rid the navy of some useless lumber, through retirements, and that is something.

THERE are some features of the war tax bill which Mr. THOMAS SHEARMAN has discussed in a letter to a daily newspaper, and they are worth thoughtful consideration, for they illustrate the wretchedly unscientific character of our methods of taxation. We have returned to the direct taxes of the last war. Mr. SHEARMAN says that about thirty branches of manufacturing were killed at that time by such taxes. This statement is absolutely true, and is based upon the thorough and able investigation and report made by DAVID A. WELLS when he was connected with the Treasury Department. Some day, perhaps, our Congressmen and State legislators will realize that production and enterprise ought not to be taxed. Another tax imposed by Congress creates an additional difficulty in the way of the effort to reform our currency system. It is thoroughly well understood that the real evil from which remote agricultural communities suffer is the lack of banking facilities. In the farming communities of the more thickly populated Middle West, where small banks abound, the unsound-money cause cut a very slight figure in 1896. Its main strength was manifested in the more remote regions where banks are unknown. It has been generally believed by experts that the threatened danger to the currency of the country would be averted if the business of banking could be encouraged, but now, on the verge of a Congressional election, Congress passes a law taxing bank checks and discouraging banking. Thus, on further examination of the bill, and more careful consideration of its provisions, we find some evils that ought to have been avoided, but which are doubtless inevitable on account of the peculiar habit of thought which almost all of our law-makers have fallen into concerning the whole question of taxation.

THE referendum vote on Australian federation has resulted thus far in the adoption of the constitution by three out of the four colonies that have voted. Victoria, Tasmania, and South Australia ratify the scheme; New South Wales, though giving a majority in its favor, failed in the number of votes required by the conditions of the referendum. The vote stood over 70,000 for, and 65,000 against; but 80,000 was the limit to be reached. Western Australia does not vote until about the end of the year, and Queensland has not as yet made any provision for applying the referendum. The adoption of the constitution by any three of the colonies insures the establishment of federation so far as the three are concerned. With New South Wales left out the start will be somewhat discouraging; but, as far as that colony is concerned, the issue will be simplified by the knowledge that only 10,000 votes will need to be won over. Mr. REID and some factious labor-leaders are believed to be responsible for the adverse stand temporarily taken by New South Wales. On the whole, results are encouraging. The federation of that continent is bound to come in the near future. It is instructive to recall the parallels between the centralizing and sectional forces at work in our own constitution-building of over a century ago and those which are now noticeable in Australia. The conditions precedent were of course different, as our own federation came into being under the stress of the war of independence, while the calm of unforced development has been the lot of Australia. But as it took a long time for the framers of our Constitution to agree upon a system, and as the difficulty of its ratification by the States was even greater, so in Australia there has been a similar experience. The local and parochial spirit has antagonized the feeling for nationalism; the paltry acts of the demagogue have been set against the constructive statesman. For twelve years discussion was carried on before a constitution was agreed upon, and there are yet three colonies which have to be educated to its acceptance, not counting New Zealand, which has refused to join the rest. It has been a slow process, but the forces which make for its success are natural and inevitable.

APPARENTLY Governor BLACK and Senator PLATT are really out with one another. This indicates not only that PLATT has ceased to be the government of New York, but that BLACK is a better politician than he is, and much more capable of reading the signs of the times. It was reasonably certain, three months after Governor BLACK'S election, that the people were disgusted with the Republican government, which was then PLATT, and that the Democrats, if the next election had taken place then, would have been able to elect even EDWARD MURPHY as Governor of the State, or, indeed, any man whom they might select. Politics were in a state that is usual in this country at this time. It was not a question as to how bad the "outs" were, but as to how bad the "ins" were, the "ins" being the only politicians who could be punished by being turned out. At that time there were evidences of a contract between CROKER and PLATT, by which the two were to rule the State and the city for their own profit. The inevitable result of this would naturally be the defeat of the Republican party at the next election. Governor BLACK saw this more clearly than PLATT, and has somewhat violently broken up the partnership and relieved himself of the odium association. It is true that he has shown to be very far from an ideal character, and be a very old man before he lives down the tation that he acquired by the appointm "LOU" PAYN as the head of the Insuran partment. The condition of politics in the of New York just now is curious. In the lican party we have BLACK representing the effective opposition to PLATT and his machin in the Democratic party we have HILL as the vigorous opponent of Tammany. Whether is to capture the Republican convention remains to be seen. As to HILL, he is sho some of his old-time political skill, and "am Hall is very much alarmed lest it sho'd already, and in the absence of CROKER at lish races, lost its chance of controlling State convention. Perhaps it does not arg for the virtue of the State of New York that two represent the virtuous element in its but their antagonism to bosses, and their to stand for decent public sentiment, show that there is something in virtue.

SEIZURE BY RESOLUTION.

IT is probable that the issue of the coming elec for Congress is to be imperialism—that is, all domestic questions are at least to be o by the overshadowing and engrossing st territorial expansion. Such a campaign interesting, and it will certainly excite th nations of the voters. That it is probable country is at the parting of the ways is from the enormous majority by which the of Representatives passed the NEWLANDS tion "for annexing the Hawaiian Island United States," the vote being 209 to 91, the tive vote being mainly Republican and th tive mainly Democratic, although the that the cleavage on this issue goes thro parties may possibly be sustained by the three Republicans voted against the re Speaker REED, who was ill at home, send that he also would have voted no if he present, while 27 Democrats, Populists, an ites voted for it. It is reasonably certain fore, that there is great danger that the is to enter upon a colonial policy—that is judgment, it is to abandon the independent tude which it has generally maintained tow the rest of the world, and is to adopt what ma briefly characterized as a simian policy or a icy imitative of that which has created European frontiers in Africa and Asia has loaded the workers and producers with the burdens of militarism.

As to what we may be about to do in Hawaii thing so monstrous has been proposed to a try since BUCHANAN, SOULÉ, and MASON is aed famous Ostend manifesto concerning C Ev American who believes in the funda d I ciple of his government, that gove e by the consent of the governed, wi e t if we are to have colonial possessions, o r the European military powers in this ct, new policy could not be inaugurated a w way than by the adoption of the NEW NDS r lution.

What is the character of this effort acr the territorial possessions of the Unite Po As formulated in this resolution it i rigar pure and simple, and thus far in i history United States Supreme Court has no found Congress has the power to seize the t tory distant peoples. We propose to take the sla simply because we want them, by means a j resolution. Chief-Justice MARSHALL held that power of Congress to acquire territory was from the power to make war and the power to treaties. These powers being conferred by the C stitution, there are implied the power t take curity for the future from the country with wh we may be at war, and the power to receive sessions from the country with which we b ar But it will be difficult to find in the Constitutio grant of power to Congress to seize with its le lative grasp a foreign people's domain. We not at war with Hawaii, and therefore we can take the territory as security from a hostile pow It is true that we might take the islands by tre and this would be the proper Constitutional meth but the annexationists cannot secure the necess number of votes in the Senate for the ratifica of the treaty which is pending. In other wo if Congress should strictly obey the Constitu annexation could not take place. Therefore annexationists resort to a short-cut, and they pose to turn their backs upon the Constitution, they disregard the facts that this question of quiring Hawaii has never yet been presented

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the people of the [illegible]s for their votes, and that not a party pla[illegible] the last Presidential campaign suggested the annexation of the islands. At that time, only two years ago, it was admitted by the political managers of both parties that annexation would not be a winning issue. So keenly was this realized that the treaty, still before the Senate, lost so much of the support which it at first commanded that Senator DAVIS has practically abandoned it. In a word, this effort is, as we have said, to take a snap-judgment against the people, and it is probably resorted to because the politicians are now, as they were two years ago, afraid to put the question to the test of a popular vote.

The NEWLANDS resolution is, moreover, a legislative assault upon Hawaii, and is contrary to the essential character of our own government. If our republic means anything, it is that the people of every country have the right to govern themselves. They have the right to determine the form of government under which they will live. We have insisted upon this right for ourselves; we have fought for it, and we have won it. Under what system of logic, then, can we reach the conclusion that we may deny to the Hawaiians what we have asserted for ourselves, under the general principle that every people in the world have the right "to assume, among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them?" We have set up our own government for our own affairs, and we have neither had the intention to govern others, nor have the machinery to carry such an intention into effect. Our government has been self-government in good faith; but in the NEWLANDS resolution it is proposed that we shall annex another people's country, and that, until Congress shall provide another government, the President, whose powers over his own countrymen are limited by the Constitution and by statutes, shall exercise absolute despotic powers over the inhabitants of Hawaii. Strange as this may seem to those who think that we have a republican form of government, and that it stands for the right of the people to govern themselves, this despotism is proposed by Congress in the NEWLANDS resolution in the following words: "Until Congress shall provide for the government of such islands all the civil, judicial, and military powers exercised by the officers of the existing government in said islands shall be vested in such person or persons, and shall be exercised in such manner, as the President of the United States shall direct; and the President shall have power to remove such officers, and fill the vacancies so occasioned. Congress, in other words, enacts that the lands of the Hawaiians shall belong to this country, and that the President shall have the power to remove the officers of the Hawaiian government, and, for a time at least, to exercise despotic powers over the people. Was there ever such a perversion of the principle on which the republic was founded?

The excuse for this proposed democratic excursion into absolutism is that the government of Hawaii consented to it. But neither have the people of Hawaii consented to the pretended cession, which has really never been made, nor have the people of this country consented to accept it. In the first place, the government of Hawaii is a self-constituted power. It does not represent the free and expressed will of the people of the islands. So fearful were the men who seized upon the powers that is the Constitution, which is wholly the work of themselves and their friends, they inserted the savage provision that SANDFORD B. DOLE should be the first President of the republic, and they provided that his successor should not be chosen until 1900. We have no criticism to make on this oligarchy. We are willing to admit that its government of the islands has been and will be better for the people than that of the monarchy was; that, in brief, it is the best possible form of government for the islands, and very much better than could be that of a distant and despotic American President or Congress. But when it comes to the question of annexation, this republic is bound, we think, to refuse a country offered to us by an oligarchy which not only does not represent the people, but which is acting, or attempting to act, against the expressed will of the people. There are in Hawaii 31,019 natives, 24,407 Japanese, and 21,616 Chinese, and most of these are opposed to the rule of the 3086 Americans and to their effort to transfer them to this country. Believe and say what we will against black and brown and yellow men, it has never before been contended that it is in accordance with the spirit of our institutions to seize their lands and to put them under the rule of our President or our Congress.

POEM.

BY E. S. MARTIN.

Read before the Harvard Phi Beta Kappa at Cambridge, June 30, 1898.

WHEN forth the shepherd boy in Elah's vale
To meet Goliath fared, no coat of mail
Nor sword nor spear he took, nor anything
Except one little penny-dreadful sling.
His pebble sped; the big Philistine's fall
Gave humble means a license once for all,
And helps your bard a warrant to construe
To launch light verse at learned men like you.

. . . . . .

Masters of erudition, chosen sirs
Whose knowledge close with all that's known concurs,
Who taste all fruits on wisdom's tree that grow—
After all's said, what do we need to know?
Knowledge is power. What knowledge? Power for what?
To do, or not to do? To have, or not?
Shall learning make our hearts or pockets stout?
Bring things, or teach us how to go without?
Prompt us to spare, or qualify to spend?
Is it a means, or shall it be an end?

All day the Hindoo sits and contemplates
His navel. Earth spins onward while he waits.
No loss of time his brooding hope concerns;
His concentrated thought serves all his turns—
His food, the least that soul and body joins;
His raiment, but the clout about his loins.
To think is all he asks; indeed, it's more—
He only seeks to keep an open door
Whereinto may perhaps in time be turned
A consciousness transcending all things learned.
Heedless of force, oblivious to fact,
Broken of every wish or power to act,
Under his bo-tree, rapt, behold him sit,
A patient mark for wisdom's darts to hit.

In violent, prodigious contrast, view
Our devotee who lives to put things through!
Intense in aim, tremendous in attempt,
He dares such feats as genies might have dreamt.
Prompt from a bed too briefly kept he springs
To giant struggles with material things.
He wrests from earth her treasuries and her fruits,
Stays time, and grubs up distance by the roots.
Titanic in his hands' resourceful play,
He fits to needs a thousand leagues away
Supplies extorted by his conjuring brain
From mine and factory, forest, sea, and plain.
As nature's secrets, yielded one by one
To searching science, meet the revealing sun,
His hail exultant glorifies the hour
That still extends the boundaries of his power.
To have, to hold, to shift, to give and take,
And from each transfer still a profit make—
That is his life: we watch him and admire,
Yet envy not his toil nor grudge his hire.

To each his task: our civilization's need
Includes things as diverse as love and greed,
As brooding thought and bustling energy,
As abstract truth and prompt utility.
His right to earth is best who best can use it;
His birthright man must justify or lose it.
This we should learn, then, and to this end strive,
Living to keep continuously alive,
And daily meet the debt we owe the day—
That irksome wholesome debt to make it pay.
Call us utilitarian those who will,
A warrant for our Yankee impulse still Stands in the immemorial decree
That linked with labor human life shall be.
For liberty and progress hand in hand
With pushing thrift have gone in many a land,
And mastery of earth and nature brings
The key to endless stores of precious things.
Full purses foster art; letters have flourished
In times when even poets were well nourished.
Wealth earned, not filched, power not usurped, but based
On freemen's choice, are mighty tools that, placed
In fitting hands, spread civilization's sway,
And speed the dawning of millennium's day.

Be honor, then, to him who makes the field
To wiser tillage fuller harvests yield;
Who harnesses the lightning, and constrains
Indocile steel to save the fingers' pains;
Who teaches us new wants, and, turn about,
Supplies these things we cannot do without,
And makes us hope, so much do wares abound,
There'll some time be enough to go around.
To those devoted souls be honor too
Who steadfastly the quest for truth pursue;
Who, rifling history's treasure-house, forecast
The future's hopes and perils from the past;
Who seek creation's darkest depths to plumb.
What man has been, and is, and may become,
Whence brought, and by what trail, and whither bound.
Asking, they wrest its secrets from the ground.
The depths of earth and sea, the celestial vault,
They dredge and sift and span in an assault
So fierce and steady that the hosts of night
Fall ever back before its fervent might,
And Sol each morning rises with a shout,
Surprised at what those fellows have found out.

But honor more be his whose instincts own
The truth, "Man cannot live by bread alone";
Who sees in righteousness, far more than wealth,
The prime essential to a nation's health;
Whom neither ease nor quest, sublime or base,
Makes inconsiderate of his brother's case;
Whose effort is, come plenty or come dearth,
God's will to learn, and see it done on earth.
A lack of sturdy men whose aims are high
No surging tide of plenty can supply.
Doomed is the state, whatever its avails,
Where probity falls down and conscience fails.
Not gold nor iron, grain nor ships nor coal,
Can make a nation great that lacks a soul.
This above all, then, brethren, we should know,
How by our growth to make our country grow
In that true glory whose foundations lie
In justice, freedom, and integrity—
Our country whose we are, and in whose fate
Our stake is so immeasurably great,
Whose honor ours involves, her fame our fame,
Her misdirection our remorse and shame.
Manila's guns, reverberating still,
Witness how well her sons can do her will.
Beleaguered Cuba's marching hosts attest
How swells the love of freedom in her breast.
Whate'er befall, God grant her flag may fly
In sign of righteousness and liberty,
Ne'er at ambition's beck to be unfurled
In triumph o'er the weaklings of the world,
Ne'er borne in battle save in mercy's cause
To spread the realm of peace and honest laws!
May Heaven, who gave us strength, give wisdom too,
Our duty teach us, and what not to do;
And so on force may moderation wait—
So match our men of war, our chiefs of state,
That the chief fame our victories shall produce
May be the high renown of victory's use;
So be our arms, our flag, our future blest—
God save the Great Republic of the West!

DIARY OF THE WAR.

Saturday, June 18.—A report that the insurgents of the Philippines have determined to form a republic is much commented upon at Washington, London, and Madrid. It is not regarded as probable that the inhabitants of the various islands forming the archipelago, who differ widely in race, language, religion, and customs, can establish a stable native government; but the suggestion is made that this intention or disposition of the insurgents to act independently may give rise to new complications. At Old Cavité, on June 12, the insurgents proclaimed a provisional government. The islands were declared independent of Spanish authority. Aguinaldo was elected President.

Sunday, June 19.—A despatch from Hong-kong states that the steamer Yuen Sang, which arrived at that port to-day, sighted the American transport City of Peking on June 15. The latter vessel, having on board the First Regiment of California volunteers, was then only one day's sail from Manila.

From Guantanamo and Santiago de Cuba the news received shows steady improvement in the situation of our marines up to the end of the week. The camp has been strengthened with more trenches. The Spanish attacks have been less vigorous. One hundred more Cubans have arrived. Camp McCalla, now called "Fort" McCalla, is healthy. The support of our vessels continues to be most effective, the Texas, Oregon, Marblehead, St. Paul, Dolphin, and Suwanee shelling the forts and town, and using their guns to prevent the enemy from massing at any point on or near the outer bay—which may therefore be regarded as now practically in our possession. West of Santiago five hundred Cubans, encamped near the shore, are in regular communication with Admiral Sampson's fleet. Supplies of arms, ammunition, and medicine have been sent to the Cuban allies from time to time.

Consul Sprague cabled from Gibraltar to the State Department that Camara's war-ships (the "Cadiz Reserve Squadron") were at Cartagena.

A manifesto in favor of peace, issued by a number of influential associations in Catalonia, the industrial province of Spain, includes the following statements: "It would be better to consent to amputation [loss of colonies] than to continue a war that must be fertile in disasters.... Peace alone can prevent the utter annihilation of the Spanish nation."

Monday, June 20.—The following despatch was received at Washington from Commodore Watson, commanding the vessels blockading the northern coast of Cuba: "Captain-General states Spanish government refuses to exchange prisoners." This message relates to the negotiations for the exchange of Lieutenant Hobson and his companions who fell into the hands of the Spaniards after sinking the Merrimac. After their capture they were imprisoned in Morro Castle, at the entrance of Santiago Harbor, and were kept there (a despatch to the Herald from the British consul at Santiago, Mr. F. W. Ramsden, says) while lodgings for them were being prepared in the barracks, which are in the city. Accordingly they were locked in the Morro during the bombardment by our fleet on June 6. On June 7 they were moved to the barracks.

The President's nominations of Adelbert Ames, of Massachusetts, and Joseph W. Plume, of New Jersey, to be Brigadier-Generals, were taken to the Senate.

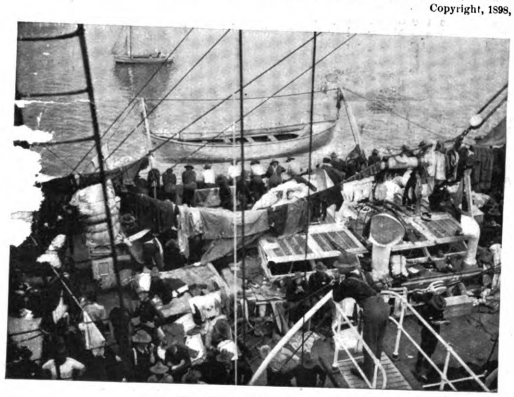
It is reported, viâ Hong-kong, that General Aguinaldo, the insurgent leader in the Philippines, has informed United States Consul Williams of the formation of a provisional government, merely for cohesive purposes, and has notified him of the desire of the insurgents that the Philippine Islands become an American colony.

The transports carrying the first division of the army of invasion, commanded by General Shafter, arrived off Santiago de Cuba at noon to-day. Ranged in a line that stretched out over eight miles, with the battle-ship Indiana on the extreme right, and the other men-of-war on guard, the entire fleet advanced from the southeast, wheeling into single file to pass the flag-ship with salutes, and then withdrawing to a distance of twelve to fifteen miles from Sampson's squadron, where it was hove to by advice of the Admiral. General Shafter went forward on the Seguranca to a conference on the flag-ship. Admiral Sampson returning with him later to the Seguranca, the transport proceeded westward almost immediately to Aserradero, which lies on the coast about twenty-five miles from the city of Santiago, or about eighteen from the mouth of the harbor. At Aserradero General Calixto García, with about four thousand Cuban soldiers, had arrived—not "coincidentally," as some despatches state, but in accordance with an agreement entered into with our government, and plans for co-operation discussed when Lieutenant Rowan visited the old General at Bayamo, May 1, as related on another page of this issue of the WEEKLY. Accordingly General Shafter, Admiral Sampson, and General García held a long conference "under the palm leaf roof of an open hut" at Aserradero in the afternoon. The two American commanders returned to the fleet in the evening.

(Continued on page 652)

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

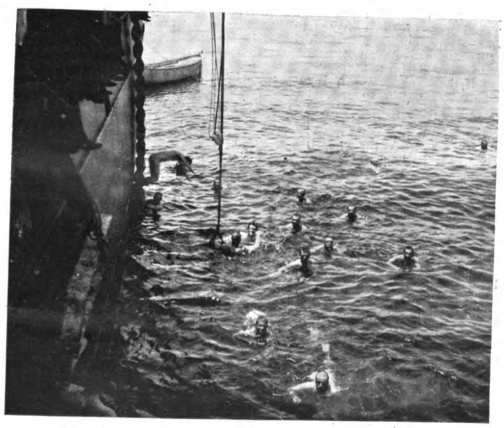
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



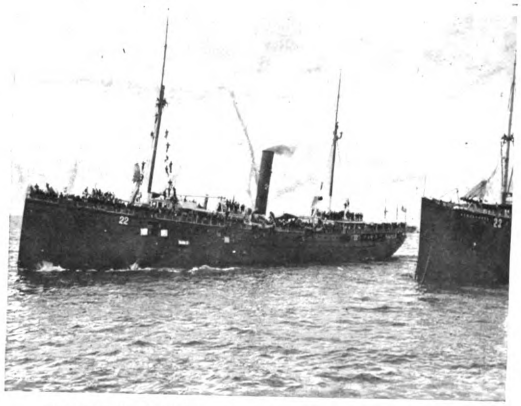
BUYING WAR [illegible] SUB-TREASURY, NEW Y[illegible]—DRAWN B[illegible] ROGERS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

PRESIDENT McKINLEY AND HIS CABINET, IN THE CABINET-ROOM, EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON.



Copyright, 1898, by Frances B. Johnston.



ON THE DECK OF A TROOP-SHIP.

MEN OF THE 71ST NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS CHEERING TROOPS ON ANOTHER TRANSPORT.

THE MORNING BATH—SOLDIERS SWIMMING BY THE SIDE OF A TROOP-SHIP.

THE "RIO GRANDE," WITH GENERAL SUMNER AND STAFF AND 8TH AND 6TH U. S. CAVALRY.

OFF FOR CUBA WITH GENERAL SHAFTER'S TROOPS—LIFE ON THE TRANSPORTS.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JAMES BURTON, SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHER FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH THE EXPEDITION.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

THE unfavorable impression formed by Mr. R. H. Davis of Mr. Poultney Bigelow's reports of the recent condition of things at Tampa is not shared by all observers. A Florida correspondent, who writes under date of June 8, says of Mr. Bigelow:

Every word he has said is true, and he has by no means told the whole story. His letter in HARPER'S WEEKLY is mild compared with the statement made to me by an officer just returned from Tampa.... When the time comes to preach a sermon on the remedy, the text must be, "A permanent tenure of staff positions is fatal to military efficiency." That is the source of all our woes.

In a letter dated June 9, from Cambridge, England, Dr. Merrill E. Gates resigned the presidency of Amherst College. He points out that the financial condition of the college has greatly improved during the eight years of his presidency; that the number of students is greater, the equipment better, and that the prospects of the institution are very bright. His own health, he says, has improved since he went abroad, but he asks to be relieved of the burden which he has borne for eight years, and desires that his resignation may take effect at the close of his year's leave of absence, now in progress.

Dr. Gates's letter is dignified, and without suggestion of complaint. No doubt his resignation is wise, and as much for his own interest as for that of Amherst College. It remains for the future to determine whether some other gentleman will be able to govern Amherst more to the satisfaction of the governed than Dr. Gates has done. To go to Amherst he resigned the presidency of Rutgers College and declined the presidency of Oberlin College. His resignation in a measure leaves Amherst on trial. It will be necessary for her to demonstrate now that she is not an aggregation of warring elements which no college president can reconcile.

There is a rumor that Dr. E. Benjamin Andrews is likely to resign the presidency of Brown University in order to become superintendent of the public schools of Chicago. If that should happen, there will be another New England college presidency to fill. As an educator Dr. Andrews has been decidedly successful. In Chicago he would find a great and important field of professional labor, as well as probably an atmosphere somewhat more congenial than that of Providence to a statesman of his fiscal and political preferences.

In the Columbia University Bulletin Mr. H. G. Paine has something interesting to tell about distinguished sons of Columbia who matriculated but did not stay to finish their course. Chief among them was Alexander Hamilton, who left King's College in 1776 to be a captain of artillery in the Continental army. In more recent years the list includes a score of captains of the civil war, among them General John Watts de Peyster, General Henry M. Judah, Colonel Augustus Van Horn Ellis (killed at Gettysburg), and Lieutenant-Colonel Richard T. Auchmuty, who founded the New York Trade-School. Captain Mahan was a Columbia man for a year, and left the class of '58 to enter the Naval Academy. Captain Charles King, too, began at Columbia, but veered off to West Point, where he was graduated in 1865. Another author, John Fox, Jr., was a member of the Columbia class of '89. Other names which are in Columbia's books, though not in her catalogue of alumni, are those of Judge George C. Barrett, '55, Abram J. Dittenhoefer, '55, Bishop John Hobart Brown, '52 (of Fond du Lac), Lockwood de Forest, '72 (artist), John Johnson, '79 (artist), William O. Partridge, '85 (sculptor), Professor George Benton Newcomb, '56, Worthington C. Ford, '79, William H. Vanderbilt, '41, John A. Stewart, '42, and Frederick Newbold Lawrence, '54.

Four officers of the college (including Mr. McKinley's Assistant Secretary of State) are doing work for the government in connection with the present war, and this year's class poet had to get leave of absence from the naval reserves to read his poem on class day.

The picture of Major-General Lee and his staff which appears in this issue of the WEEKLY was taken at Camp Cuba Libre, at Jacksonville. General Lee commands the Seventh Corps of our volunteer army, one division of which, the Second, was at Jacksonville when the picture was taken. The other two divisions were expected there, and may have joined the Second before now. The Second Division includes three brigades of three regiments each, hailing from Illinois (2), New Jersey, North Carolina, Iowa (2), Wisconsin, and Virginia (2), and numbering in all about ten thousand men. The corps has its Hospital Corps; under Lieutenant-Colonel Maus, Chief Surgeon, which divides into three division hospitals, and employs about one thousand men, besides several hundred mules, horses, ambulances, and the like.

Camp Cuba Libre (so named by General Lee) is about a mile from the centre of Jacksonville, is well shaded, and gets some of the salt breezes from the ocean, twenty miles away. It is reported that the Northern and Western soldiers there have been agreeably disappointed in the summer climate of Florida. They expected to find it seething hot all the time, whereas, so far, the heat has rarely been extreme, even at mid-day, and there have been cooling showers, and the nights have been usually comfortable. Among the troops gathered from many different States in such a camp as Cuba Libre are all sorts and conditions of men, accustomed to very different work and standards of living, and doubtless qualified to profit by the new ideas which their novel war experiences and associations will bring them.

Among the officers of General Lee's staff are Lieutenant-Colonel Maus, Chief Surgeon, Lieutenant-Colonel Wood, Chief Commissary, Major von Schroeder, Chief Quartermaster, and Major Livermore, Chief Engineer, all of whom are officers of the regular army. Lieutenant-Colonel Curtis Guild, Jr., Inspector-General, is the publisher of the Boston Commercial Bulletin, and has had military experience in the National Guard of Massachusetts. Major Russell B. Harrison, Assistant Inspector-General, has had twelve years' experience in the National Guard of three States. Major Hobart, Assistant Adjutant-General, is a nephew of the Vice-President. Lieutenant Sartoris is a grandson of General Grant. Lieutenant Carbonell is a Cuban, who speaks Spanish fluently. He is the officer who lately married Miss Evangelina Cisneros. Major Gary Evans, lately appointed Assistant Inspector-General, was formerly Governor of South Carolina. Neither he nor Colonel Maus appears in the picture.

An incident of Commencement at Cornell, to which the WEEKLY's attention has been directed, was the gift to the university of a portrait of the late Professor Herbert Tuttle, the historian of Prussia. It hangs in the university library, in the seminary room for European history, where Professor Tuttle did his most satisfying work as a teacher. The portrait was painted by Professor Tuttle's widow, who has given it to the university. It is highly praised, both as a painting and as a likeness.

OFF FOR MANILA—A GROUP OF OFFICERS ON THE DECK OF THE TRANSPORT "CHINA."

The Merchants' Association expects its out-of-town members to visit New York in September, and has arranged with the railroads to bring them from points as far west as Chicago and St. Louis and take them home again for a fare and one-third. The association has 27,000 out-of-town members, and enough of them will come here in September to make it seem at times as if the city's summer exiles had begun to return.

The George Washington Memorial Association (of women), which lately held its semi-annual convention at Cambridge Springs in Pennsylvania, is the invention of Mrs. Ellen M. Richardson, of Boston, and has for its purpose the establishment at Washington of a national university, chiefly, it would seem, for postgraduate study. George Washington left a bequest of $25,000 for a school for higher education, but the money was lost. This memorial association proposes to carry out his purpose — or something as nearly like it as contemporary demands call for — and its immediate desire is to get together $250,000 to build in Washington an administration building wherein the new university may find its first home. There is a committee of one hundred (men), of the executive committee of which Chief-Justice Fuller is chairman, which has been organized to promote the same intention. Next year comes the hundredth anniversary of Washington's death, and it is hoped that by that time the work will be provided for.

A friend of the WEEKLY writes that most people know the marks of military rank in the army, but that the marks of naval rank are not so well known, and may be worth stating for the public benefit.

BRIG.-GEN. FRANCIS V. GREENE ON THE BRIDGE OF THE TRANSPORT "CHINA."

The marks are the same now in both branches of the service. The eagle on the shoulder-strap means colonel in the army or captain in the navy; the silver leaf means lieutenant-colonel in the army or commander in the navy; the gold leaf means major in the army or lieutenant-commander in the navy; two silver bars mean captain in the army or lieutenant in the navy; one silver bar means first lieutenant in the army or lieutenant (junior grade) in the navy; second lieutenant in the army corresponds to ensign in the navy, and both wear the plain shoulder-strap. The special badge of the navy is the anchor on the coat collar.

In the higher grades, commodore, rear-admiral, and vice-admiral correspond respectively to brigadier-general, major-general, and lieutenant-general, and are respectively indicated by one star, two stars, and three stars.

The Bangkok (Siam) Times of April 7 pays a profuse and eloquent tribute to the "splendid abilities" and general efficiency and devotion of the Hon. John Barrett, the late American minister to Siam, as shown in his management of the general affairs of his legation, and in particular of the Cheek case, which through his efforts was brought, after years of dispute, to arbitration, and settled in favor of the estate of the plaintiff. It was the suit of an American citizen, deceased, against the government of Siam. Nearly the whole number of the Times is given up to praises of Mr. Barrett, who at the date of issue was about leaving for Hong-kong to meet his successor. He certainly went out in a blaze of glory, and must have reached Hong-kong about the time that Admiral Dewey left there for Manila.

A reader of the WEEKLY who was in Havana in 1889 tells of being an amused spectator at the morning inspections of the Havana Volunteers. He says: "The first morning, I noticed that after the officers had inspected the front rank of one company and had gone on to the next, a good many of the men who had first been inspected changed places with their mates in the rear rank, and were inspected again on the return of the officers by the rear. I found this shifting of places happened every morning, and the conclusion was unavoidable that the most presentable Volunteers always lined up first in the front rank, and then swapped places with companions of the rear who were less fit to bear scrutiny."

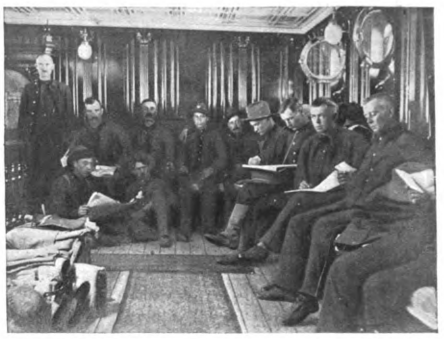
There is a prospect, it seems, that Princeton graduates may have something to say about the management of Princeton University. They have wanted a voice in university affairs these many years, and at Commencement this year it was announced that the Board of Trustees had voted to empower them to choose a council of fifteen, which should be authorized to make suggestions to the trustees, and should serve as a medium of communication between the authorities of the institution and the alumni. It is not evident as yet that the council is to have any actual authority; but even if that is so, it will still be useful, since it gives the graduates a chance for the expression of their sentiments, and the sentiments of the graduates, officially expressed, must have great weight in the management of almost any institution that is merely educational, and not penal or corrective. The new Princeton council will, apparently, be something like the Harvard Board of Overseers, a body whereof the legal power is supposed to be very limited, though its influence is amply sufficient to justify its existence.

The late Colonel Rufus King Case, U.S.A., chief clerk of the Quartermaster's Department of the East, seems to have lost his life as clearly in the service of the country as though he had fallen in battle. He died, it appears, from pneumonia, a result really of many weeks of overwork. What the stress of labor in the Quartermaster's Department of our army must have been during the last three months is easily conceived by any imaginative person. In this instance it has brought a fatal result.

Colonel Case, who was fifty-eight years old, was a veteran of the civil war, and had been for over thirty years in the Quartermaster's Department.

Unusual things continue to happen to Sir Henry Irving. Three years ago he was knighted; the other day Cambridge University (England) made him an LL.D. He

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



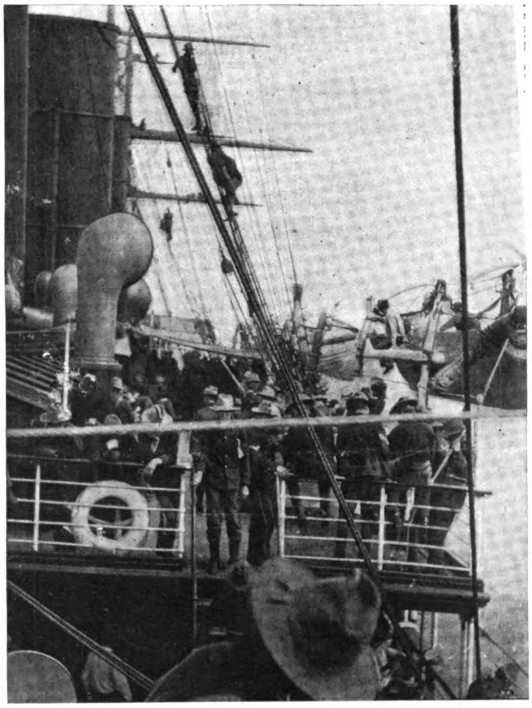
had been appointed Rede lecturer to the university, and the degree was conferred upon him after his first lecture. This new honor, like his knighthood, is pointed to as a mark of recognition of the place that the stage has lately won in English life. Perhaps so; but an equally reasonable opinion seems to be that it is a recognition of the unusual quality of Sir Henry's mind. A good actor might be made a Jubilee knight because he was a good actor and deserved promotion, but that would hardly warrant making him an LL.D. Sir Henry's intellectuality, his accomplishments, and his ability to say things out of his own head which it is profitable to hear, are warrant enough for his doctorate.

The University of Rochester has announced its willingness to admit woman to all its privileges, but says she must bring with her a dowry. The new policy will be put into effect, say the trustees in their resolution, "when the women of Rochester shall raise the necessary funds for the use of the university, estimated at $100,000." The women of Rochester who want coeducation in their local college have taken note of the trustees' condition, and propose to satisfy it. Whether this is a good time to raise money or not doubtless depends largely on what the money is for. It is a good enough time to raise funds for Red Cross Relief, and it has lately been demonstrated that there is plenty of money available to buy government bonds, but some givers may feel that it will be time enough after the war to provide for more higher education for women. Nevertheless, the women of Rochester propose to find out forthwith whether money can be raised in war-times for anything but soldiering or not.

public-houses to be closed all day on Sundays; that she is insufficiently strict in her demands against selling intoxicants to minors; that she does not favor prohibition; and that she receives revenue from two or three beer-houses on her own estates.

It is explained that she allowed wine to appear on her table so long as her son continued to live with her, because he wished it, and that the beer-houses on her estates hold underground leases which she cannot control. But it is also explained that she does not consider drinking to be sinful in itself, that she does not believe in making tectotalers by act of Parliament, and that she does not believe it would be just to close all public-houses all day on Sunday while clubs are left open. This last expedient, she thinks, would be class legislation.

These latter explanations explain too much. They demonstrate that Lady Henry's convictions vary in important particulars from those of the majority of the members of the W. C. T. U. in this country, and that she will not be a suitable person to be president of an organization which includes the American W. C. T. U. until the rank and file of the American society are able to amend their views. Lady Henry's opinions, as they are explained, seem very sensible. It seems a pity that the Temperance Union in America is so far from sharing them.



THE LAST LETTERS FROM HOME.

Bishop Huntington's address at the opening of the Central New York Diocesan Convention (Episcopal) on June 14 contains one short paragraph about the war, observing that, in so far as its motive is humane, it presents a spectacle of national altruism wellnigh unprecedented in history. The Bishop says:

> Nobody but fools can expect it to be ended till the Spanish despotism is broken. Nobody but fiends can wish it to be prolonged. Nobody but atheists can doubt that it will be overruled by Almighty God. Nobody but traitors can refuse to share patriotically in its sacrifices.

These, on the whole, are comforting sentiments, especially the one which counts so confidently on an overruling Providence. We seem to have good reason to think that, in so far as fighting goes, we can manage the Spaniard without special direction, for that seems a job for which orders have already been issued and arrangements made. But what is to follow is very hard guessing, and there must be a great many thousand Americans whose meditations are such that their peace of mind may be promoted by the venerable bishop's confidence that the Lord's hand will appear in the settlement.

E. S. MARTIN.

OFF FOR MANILA—ON BOARD THE TRANSPORT "CHINA"—THE LAST VIEW OF HOME.

Mr. D. L. Moody, the evangelist, has not found the times unpropitious for raising educational funds. A few weeks ago he sent out notice that his schools at Northfield needed money, and his circular was hardly distributed before he received $100,000 from a single supporter, whose name has been withheld.

Whether the Seventh Regiment of New York gets into the national service or not, it ought to feel that its position has been improved. The reason given for not yielding to its desire to be included in the last lot of troops furnished by the State of New York to the national government was that it was needed at home, and should not be sent out of a State with an Atlantic coast line and with great cities to be protected, both from possible invasion and from internal disorder. New York has sent out so large a proportion of her home grown and home-trained soldiers that her desire to retain some of the most efficient of those that are left is reasonable, and must be easily understood by any thinking person. However reluctant the Seventh may be to stay at home, it is a compliment to it this time not to be sent away.

There is a party in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union which does not consider Lady Henry Somerset a suitable person for president of the organization. At present she is its vice-president at large, and, since Miss Willard's death, has been the acting president. To defeat her election as president next fall a documentary campaign has been begun, wherein it is pointed out that Lady Henry, though personally an abstainer, until the beginning of the present year allowed wine to appear on her table; that she does not consider it necessary for all persons to become abstainers; that she does not wish all drinking-places to be closed; that she does not wish the bars of

OFF FOR MANILA.

WRITTEN ON BOARD THE FLAG-SHIP "CHINA" IN SAN FRANCISCO BAY. SENT BACK BY PILOT-BOAT. June 14.

MARKET STREET is packed with pushing, eager spectators. 'Way up above the people, on the sky-pointing Call Building, a little cannon pounds its monotonous salute to the troops who are marching down from Camp Merritt to embark on their long journey to the Philippines. On opposite corners of the street two noisy bands, proudly testifying to the patriotism of advertising agents, drown each other in a hurly-burly of chaotic dissonance. The street cars, blocked, begin to stretch out in a broken line of yellow, green, and red. Now the crowd opens in the middle of the street and crushes back to the sidewalks. With guidon flying, the Utah Light Battery comes swinging around the corner, in the lead. The people cheer, and push out again close to the marching line. A tall girl flaps a highly scented handkerchief close to the soldiers' faces in odoriferous farewell.

The boys have already marched some miles under the hot sun; their brown manly faces are streaked with dirt. They are heavily loaded with knapsacks and ammunition, and over the shoulder is strapped in hot bulk the blue-gray blanket. Some men have engaged the willing services of the street arabs to carry extra rifles, bags, and other impedimenta. These small citizens, proud to help the nation's warriors, stretch their short legs in a vain endeavor to keep step. The spectators press so closely about the marching troops that one soldier shouts out, "Give us more air!"

About the docks those who cannot get inside stand around envying the more fortunate personal friends of the soldiers who are allowed to pass inside of the cordon. The regiments are stretched along the dock, seated on their unrolled blankets, while good angels from the Red Cross, with bright-colored dress and dishevelled hair, hurry about, pitcher and basket in hand, administering to the soldiers' wants. There is a decided smell of bread and butter about the place. Friends squat around the volunteers in groups. The good-looking soldier has a girl on each side, and is weighted down with flowers and good things.

All day the ships are loading. Cannon swing in the air, bump against the ship's side, and finally land on the deck. At last every man is on board, and amidst great shouting and blowing of whistles the boats move into the bay and anchor.

The night is very warm, and every one is uncomfortable, but happy in the thought that he is among those chosen to start. The men have not been assigned to their bunks yet, and they are packed about like sardines on the deck. A concert is organized, and all join boisterously in the chorus. At last taps are sounded and lights are out, and the men try to find a soft place on the smooth boards. On the deck above, the officers pace up and down, smoking and telling yarns, while the ship swings lazily in the tide.

June 15.

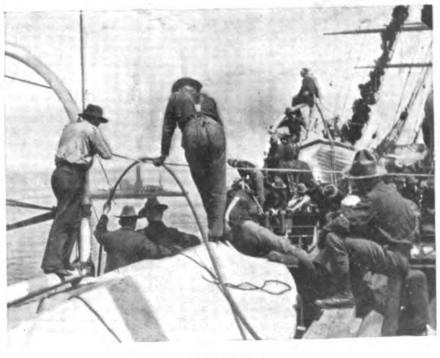
Next morning. The ships woke up with the first gray of dawning. "Jimmy Green" drinks his coffee and chews his hardtack. The sun comes up, and soon the decks are sweltering hot, with no wind blowing. The soldier throws off his coat, and seeks every convenient shelter to write his farewell letter home.



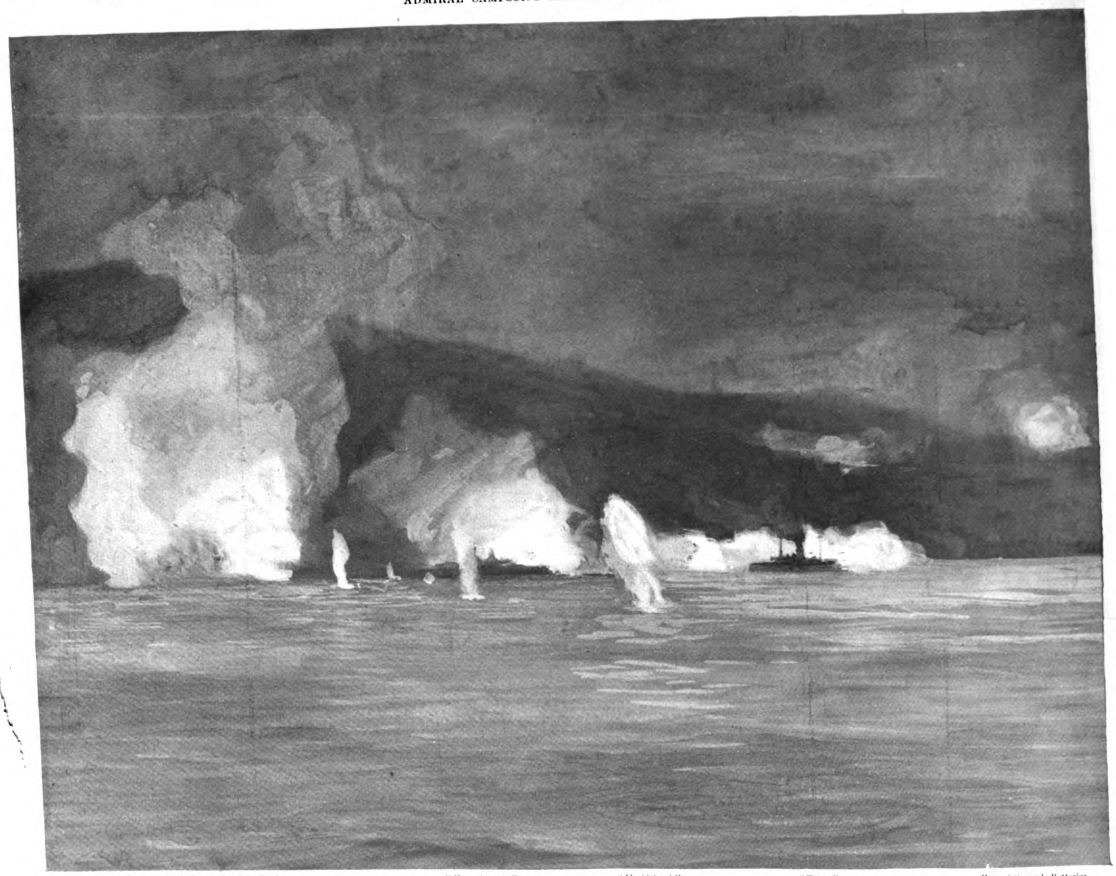
At noon a great tugboat comes puffing up alongside, bringing a crowd of enthusiastic Red Cross girls waving flags and throwing flowers. The quizzical old captain at my side whispers in my ear, "The women are having the time of their life, but they have done lots of good."

The soldiers run up in the rigging and crowd to the edge of the boat as the tug bumps up against our side. The girls throw flowers and packages of good things among us. Other tugs and pleasure-boats come out and surround us, until we are the centre of a little fleet. On board the various boats the bands play the "Star-spangled Banner" and "Marching Through Georgia." The excitement grows, and amid waving flags the crowd on board the Red Cross tug break out into old familiar airs. The high voices of the women float over to us in soft melancholy good-by. It is a sight not to be forgotten.

We are to stop at Honolulu, where we will stay some days, awaiting orders which are to come to us from the Belgic, sailing from San Francisco on Saturday, the 18th. There is no cable to Honolulu. Rumor has it that our delay there means that we will be expected to take possession of Hawaii in the name of Uncle Sam. If we see the annexation de facto it will be a glorious sight.

Brigadier-General Greene comes on board with his orders. The ship shouts him an enthusiastic welcome. The signal is given, and at last we start, the China leading, followed by the Zelandia, Senator, and Colon. I count fifty excursion-boats, all blowing whistles and flying flags. Crowds line the docks, and the forts give us the brigadier salute. We are off for Manila.

JOHN F. BASS.

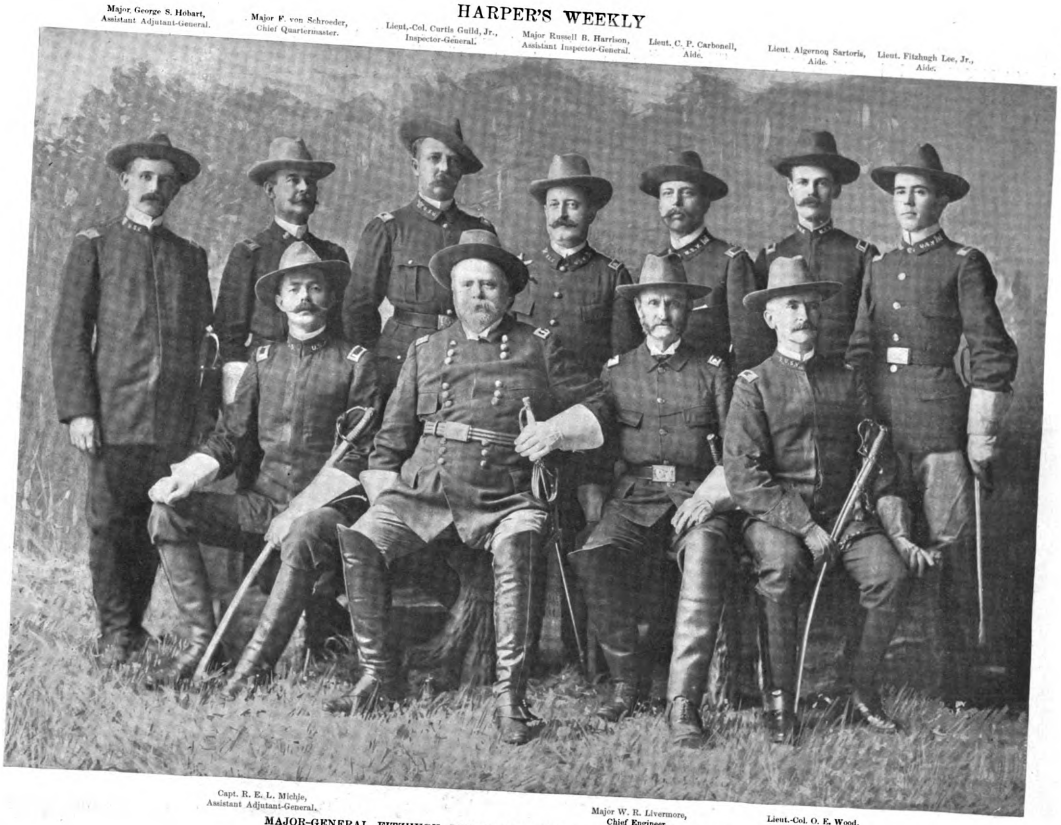


GOOD BY!

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"Iowa." "Dolphin" inshore, firing. "Oregon," listed to Starboard, firing Starboard Guns. "Yankee" firing Broadsides.

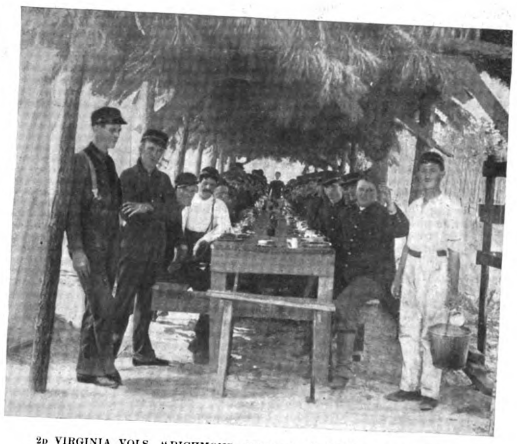
ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S EASTERN DIVISION.



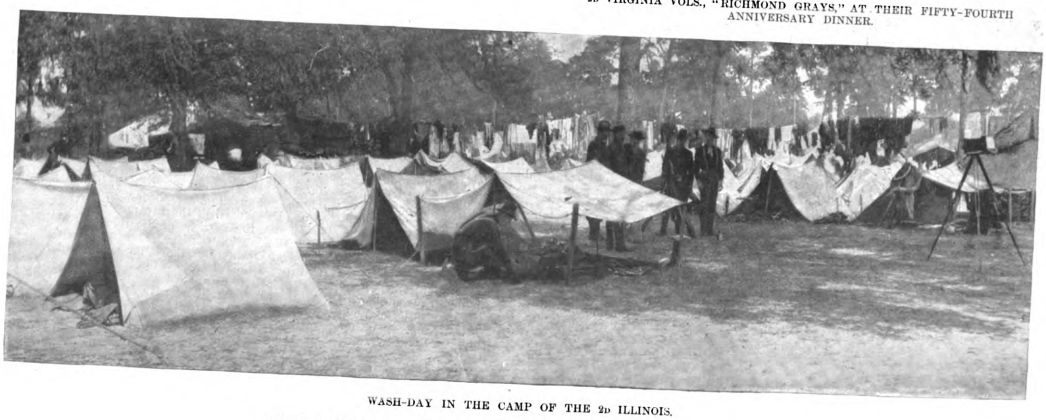
"Brooklyn" completely enveloped in Smoke. "Massachusetts." "Marblehead." "Texas." Fire of Spanish Batteries.

COMMODORE SCHLEY'S DIVISION FIRING AT A DISTANCE OF 2800 YARDS—RAIN AND MIST OBSCURING EVERYTHING.

BOMBARDMENT OF SANTIAGO DE CUBA, 7.45 TO 10.30 A.M., MONDAY, JUNE 6, 1898.
DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



MAJOR-GENERAL FITZHUGH LEE, COMMANDING 7TH ARMY CORPS, AND STAFF.
From a Photograph, Copyright, 1898, by O. P. Havens.

CLEANING UP AFTER DRILL.

2D VIRGINIA VOLS., "RICHMOND GRAYS," AT THEIR FIFTY-FOURTH ANNIVERSARY DINNER.

WASH-DAY IN THE CAMP OF THE 2D ILLINOIS.

WITH THE VOLUNTEER TROOPS AT JACKSONVILLE, FLORIDA.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A YANKEE IN SPAIN.

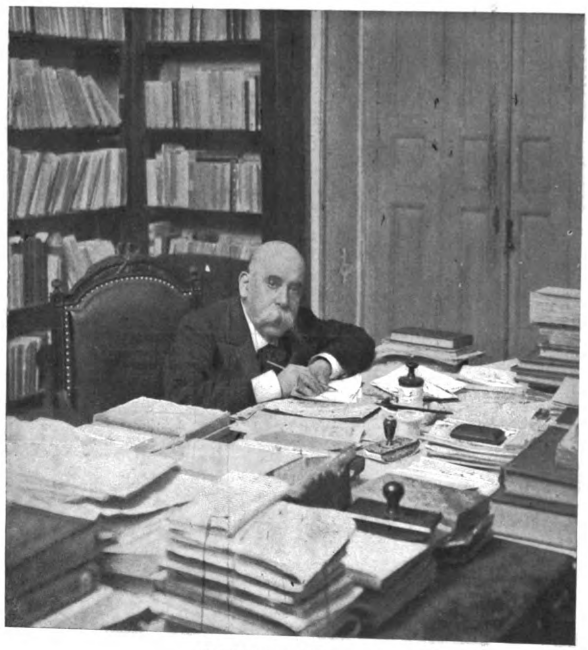
VIII.—EMILIO CASTELAR, THE UNCROWNED KING.

BY POULTNEY BIGELOW.

THE most interesting, perhaps the most important, man in Madrid is Emilio Castelar, the statesman who liberated the slaves of Porto Rico, who conducted the delicate negotiations growing out of the Virginius filibustering expedition of 1873, and who, as President of the Republic in Spain, commanded at once the respect of friendly nations and the enthusiastic support of Liberals at home.



Mr. Castelar to-day unites about his table all that is most interesting in the Spanish capital, excepting the immediate court circle, which of course could not openly appear to countenance an avowed republican. It is worth noting in parenthesis that socially Spain enjoys more political liberty than Germany, in the sense that a man in Madrid who avows sentiments in opposition to the government does not on that account necessarily fall under a boycott so severe as to forbid all people loyal to the government from frequenting his house. I have in mind several instances of notable Germans who, in consequence of voting against a measure of the government, have been wholly ostracized by not merely the court, but by the army, the officials, the learned professions, and even the members of the diplomatic corps in Berlin.

It is safe to say that if Castelar were a German he would in Berlin be forced to live as much out of the world as if he had been smitten with the plague.

His house is on the beautiful Avenue Serrano, in the upper part of the town, near to the French Embassy and the present residence of General Woodford. I first had the pleasure of meeting this grand old republican through the mediation of a common friend and member of the Cobden Club. I was shown into an antechamber so filled with treasures of curious and beautiful bric-à-brac that I was lost in pleasant admiration while the maid carried my card to her busy master.

Soon he appeared—a sight I shall not readily forget: a frank, strong face, with brilliant penetrating eyes that seemed always dancing with a disposition to smile. His nose is such as I usually find on strong men—not so large as the striking one of Paul Kruger, but reminding me somewhat of that on the great Baron Stein. Anywhere on a public thoroughfare I should have stopped to look twice at Castelar, for his very carriage suggests an uncrowned king. He has been a Cromwell of Spain—for a brief period, it is true, but still a period long enough to stamp his name in history as the first to make his country great without cruelty and strong without the destruction of personal liberty.

It is now thirty-four years ago that Castelar thundered against the abuses of the monarchy in his famous paper called The Democracy. He was then but thirty-two years of age, having been born in 1832. His devotion to popular rights cost him dearly, for the government punished him by turning him out of a professorship he then held at the Madrid University. Undeterred by this, the young politician seized the first opportunity that offered itself for proving the sincerity of his republican principles, and in 1866 he was condemned to death for having taken part in fights on the barricades against the government. Fortunately for us, he escaped across the frontier in time. The fear of death has no place in Castelar's philosophy, and when therefore such a man openly preaches the doctrines of the Cobden Club, "Peace, good-will, free trade among nations," no one can accuse him of shirking war from fear of shouldering a musket.

CASTELAR IN HIS STUDY.

Mr. Castelar, when I first met him last year, regarded a war between the United States and Spain as an absurdity—a monstrosity. The very idea he scouted as unworthy the serious thought of educated people. He deplored at that time the Jingo spirit that was being cultivated by a certain section of the Spanish press, but assured me that the great bulk of the educated people wanted peace, and home-rule for Cuba.

Castelar's drawing-room is, if possible, more richly furnished than the one into which I was at first ushered. Here are precious paintings by old masters, vases, bits of armor, carvings, tapestries from the far East, as well as Europe; not a single thing that does not indicate selection by a connoisseur with ample means to gratify his tastes. Of course his study was the most interesting room in the house to me, and he took me in to see the pile of manuscript with which he is at present occupied. The walls of his work-room are lined with books from floor to ceiling—not the books of a mere collector, but the working library of a political student. The great and crowning work of Mr. Castelar's life promises to be the universal history on which he is at present occupied, and which bids fair to fill many volumes, and an indefinite number of years.

Mr. Castelar is a bachelor. He does not smoke or gamble, or indulge in those many so-called recreations which ultimately disturb the balance between our physical and intellectual forces—a balance necessary to the exercise of sound judgment. He has therefore a beautiful harmony of faculties, which manifests itself in his oratory, his splendid mastery of composition, his choice of ornaments, and, most strikingly of all, in his preparation of a dinner.

When he asked me to dine with him, he most kindly asked after my tastes in matters culinary, to which I answered that, as a stranger in Spain, the most interesting food to me would naturally be that which had a peculiarly national character. And what a dinner that was, to be sure! There were two cabinet ministers present, and half a dozen other friends connected with public life. My host no doubt wished me to see that people of all parties could unite at his board, and that an American even then was well received if he came on an errand of peace.

It was hard to talk politics at such a meal. Every dish was strange and delicious; every wine was of the choicest, and selected with especial reference to the food that was to form its companion piece. Our learned host could give historical and botanical foot-notes to every dish. I have known but one such masterful epicure in my life—the late Charles A. Dana, who was at the same time, like Mr. Castelar, an artist in a large variety of directions.

When I again saw Mr. Castelar, after an interval of twelve months, the political horizon had blackened considerably. The kindly statesman welcomed me cordially as ever, and reasserted his horror of war, and belief in a more Christian solution of the difficulties. At the same time he was less of an optimist than when I had seen him last, and was particularly bitter at the unscrupulous correspondents of American papers who had pretended to interview him and had put words into his mouth which were fabrications, and wholly at variance with his views. He now had no relations with any members of the American Legation, in spite of the high regard he was prepared to entertain personally for General Woodford. He had been in the past so frequently betrayed by men who pretended to be friends that now he preferred to wait in silence until he could see clearly ahead either peace or war. A great change had come over Mr. Castelar, which his intimates attributed to ill health, and also largely to the Jingoism in the United States, which deeply undermined his proverbial enthusiasm for the great republic.

I subsequently asked Mr. Woodford about his relations with Mr. Castelar, and got practically a confirmation of what I had already heard—that the Jingoes had in both countries done so much mischief that social intercourse between so excellent an American as General Woodford and so eminent a Spanish republican as Mr. Castelar had in this year 1898 become impossible.

SAN FRANCISCO.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

June 13, 1898.

General Merritt thinks that he is likely to have less trouble in the Philippines with the Spaniards than with the insurgents. Once give the latter power, and allow them to take Manila, their attitude is likely to change. Their chiefs, although at present only too willing to take our help and submit to our wishes, may be pushed by awakening ambition to turn the forces now organizing for the attack on Manila against us. This view of the case seems thoroughly sound. The devil is sick, the devil an American would be; the devil is well, the devil an American can be. The civilized world ought to realize by this time that insular insurgents are a very troublesome lot. The combined statesmanship of Europe has so far found it impossible to give the Cretan patriots a satisfactory form of government. It is to be hoped, however, that, unhampered by foreign diplomacy, we will do better in Cuba and the Philippines.

The policy we adopt towards the insurgents in the Philippines will depend in a great measure on what we intend to do with the islands, and the present uncertainty of our government on this question will place General Merritt in a very difficult position. The rebel leaders will want to know what is to become of them; and when they see that no decision has been reached, they will make up their minds to have a voice in the matter. After making use of the insurgents' help to fight our battles, it would hardly be fair to turn them over to Spain to be shot as rebels, or to submit to Spanish colonial tyranny. On the other hand, if we decide not to keep the islands, what can we do with them? Are the people sufficiently enlightened to govern themselves? Absolutely in the dark in regard to the enormous disadvantages of foreign colonies, popular opinion here is strongly in favor of keeping the islands. It is perhaps suggestive of the tendencies in the direction of annexation that officers leaving for the Philippines are preparing to stay away two years.

In view of the increasing strength of the insurgents, General Merritt is very impatient at the enforced delay in the transportation of his forces. So strong is the general's feeling in this matter, and so sure is he that it is a mistake to allow the insurgents to get a thoroughly organized fighting force, that General Greene, who is to command the second expedition, starting next Tuesday, expects to take the field immediately on arriving. He will have with him over 2500 men—the Tenth Pennsylvania Volunteers, two battalions of the Eighteenth and Twenty-third United States Regulars, the First Colorado Volunteers, the Utah Light Battery, and detachments of Company A of the Engineer Corps.

To-day your correspondent went over the transports, which are nearly ready to start, and found them excellently arranged. Whatever adverse criticism may with justice be made of the management of the home camp, the organization of the expedition itself deserves the highest praise. All the bunks and mattresses are new, and, although of necessity the berths are close together, they are so arranged that the soldiers will get fresh air—a very important item on a long voyage in tropical seas. There are new kitchens, and stalls for cattle to supply fresh meat to the troops throughout the journey. In fact, the ships have been remodelled to suit the emergency, and the work has been carefully done.

Many of the men were down looking over their new home. They seemed well pleased; but they are so eager to get away that I doubt if they would have complained had they been stalled in a cattle-boat. The Utah battery were on the dock shipping their guns. They are nearly all men over six feet high. Indeed, I have not seen in any European army such a lot of tall men as those making up General Merritt's small army. They would have delighted the heart of Frederick the Great.

"Jimmy Green," if one may so dub the American private, is a tall, thin-faced, long-legged fellow, with gray eyes and a long reach. In his leisure moments he is apt to chew tobacco. He is pleasant with strangers, but not confidential. It is only after he knows you pretty well that he will tell you "all about it"; giving his opinion with measured impartiality. He never bubbles over, and looks and acts as if he would make a cool fighter.

Certain interesting facts come to light from the stories told by Captain Loud and his companions about the battle of Manila. When the American fleet first arrived off the Philippines they were sighted by the telegraph station at Point Balinao, and the news was sent to Manila. The Spaniards, therefore, were informed that the American fleet was at hand, and yet no measures were taken to protect the entrance of Manila Bay. The forts on each side of the channel were on rocky elevations, so that their modern guns would command the deck of any man-of-war attempting to enter the strait by daylight. The only opportunity was to go through during the night, and even this would have been next to impossible without the loss of one or more ships had the Spaniards been vigilant. This negligence of the Spaniards contributed greatly to our success. Admiral Dewey must have known that he was running great risks when he made up his mind to sail past these forts, torpedoes or no torpedoes, come what would. No one seems to know whether any torpedoes had been placed at the entrance of the bay or in front of Cavité. At any rate, they did no damage to our fleet, and it is doubtful if any were exploded.

The commander of the forts at the entrance of the bay subsequently surrendered, saying that all his garrison had run away. It is not known whether these were native or Spanish troops.

After the serious fighting at Cavité began the Spaniards fought bravely, without producing any result. Our ships were repeatedly struck, but the shells were solid armor-piercing shells, used under the mistaken idea that our ships were heavily armored.

When Admiral Dewey withdrew after three hours' fighting it was not simply for breakfast, but because the extreme nervous strain of fighting a modern iron-clad made it imperative to give the men a rest. It is a well-known fact in modern navies that no crew can be expected to do good work in a serious fight for longer than three or four hours without a rest. The first attack was made on the fleet, the second on the forts at Cavité.

The Spanish Governor-General had issued his well-known blood-curdling proposition, in which he threatened to shoot any Spanish officer who surrendered his position. Frightened at the prospect of what awaited them in Manila, the garrison of the forts at Cavité attempted, after the battle, to give themselves up as prisoners to Admiral Dewey, but the latter would not receive them, and forced them to return to Manila.

People here are at a loss where to get reliable news. All the papers are filled with false reports, which they do not even take the trouble to contradict. Truth finds no shelter in the rain of meaningless adjectives which drown the daily press. The possibilities of exaggeration have surely been reached, and one wonders what is left to be said, by way of description, if a really great battle should take place.

John F. Bass.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL ROWAN'S EXPLOIT.

THE AMERICAN DELEGATE'S VISIT TO GARCÍA.

I.

WHEN every day brings important news of our war, it would seem to be inviting contradiction and opposition for one to pick out a single item and to say, "This is the most important of all." But as to the most important item of news in the week ending June 18 there should be no dispute. During that week our little force of six hundred marines was making the most gallant efforts to maintain from day to day the position it had taken up at Camp McCalla, on the eastern shore of Guantanamo Bay. At first the position appeared to be untenable. The Spaniards, in greatly superior numbers, surrounded the camp, and carried on a species of guerilla warfare, incessant, harassing to the last degree, as familiar to them as it was strange and exhausting to our men. The difficulties of a summer campaign in Cuba, with all the beating of thickets for a concealed enemy that it involves, was thus realized at the very outset. The peril was of the gravest nature; men less determined or less bravely led would have been withdrawn, and the Spaniards would have received all the encouragement that an initial success can bring. At this critical time a number of Cuban insurgents, as was stated in the "Diary of the War" in the last issue of the WEEKLY, rendered valuable assistance. It is not necessary to believe that the better fighting on Tuesday and the succeeding days was due to their co-operation, or to the suggestions they were able to offer, with their knowledge of the difficult country and the peculiar methods of the enemy. But the facts that stand out quite plainly are, first, that they fought cleverly and fiercely beside our men; second, that the enemy was driven from cover with considerable loss; third, that the position of our marines became tolerably secure. On Thursday our force was further strengthened by the arrival of a number of insurgents led by General Perez, who, we are told, has a larger body of men in the neighborhood, ready to be of service as occasion shall arise. On Friday, June 17, supplies of medicine, arms, and ammunition were taken on the Dolphin to Sigua, midway between Santiago de Cuba and Guantanamo, and delivered to General Castillo, who has about three hundred insurgents armed with Lee-Metford rifles at that point. Perez and Castillo are, it will of course be understood, subordinates of General Calixto García, the white-haired Cuban leader, whose strong and rather handsome face, with the peculiar mark in the forehead (a bullet wound self-inflicted years ago, when the cause he has always fought for seemed lost), is so familiar to readers of American illustrated periodicals. General García is commander-in-chief of the Cuban forces in the entire eastern half of the island—that is, wherever they may be gathered in little bands, from the Jucaro-Moron Trocha to Cape Maysi. With the body of insurgents under his immediate control, in the neighborhood of Bayamo, he is now endeavoring to stop the Spanish troops from Havana and other western points on their way to Santiago and Guantanamo.

What has now been said may serve to show why especial importance is attached to reports that the Cubans are proving themselves valuable allies in Santiago Province. But the full significance of the news lies in the fact that, through this activity of his officers, García is proving his disposition to carry out the spirit and letter of his agreement made with our government on May 1, when he was visited by Lieutenant Rowan.

LIEUTENANT ROWAN'S ROUTE ACROSS CUBA.
Dotted Line is the Boundary between Santiago de Cuba and Puerto Principe.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL ANDREW S. ROWAN, U.S. VOLS.
Photograph by Davis & Sanford.

II.

Andrew Summers Rowan, Lieutenant in the Nineteenth United States Infantry, left Washington April 9 on a secret mission to General García. He took the Atlas Line steamship Adirondack to Kingston, Jamaica, and there awaited instructions by cable. After completing arrangements for the trip, to which end he placed himself unreservedly in the hands of agents of the Cuban Junta in Jamaica, he got his orders and left Kingston on April 23—the day, it will be remembered, on which President McKinley signed the proclamation calling for 125,000 volunteers, and two days before the formal declaration of war.

Leaving Kingston at two o'clock, Rowan crossed the island in a northwesterly direction to St. Anns, where he got a little sailing-boat, whose captain he calls a pirate (and heartily admires—that is evident). Then one hundred miles from St. Anns to the coast-line of Santiago Province, near that jutting point where the Sierra Maestra lifts its peaks out of the sea—one of them, a bit nearer Santiago, to a height of eight thousand four hundred feet, while another, by Portillo, is a mate for any mountain we have between the Mississippi and the Atlantic. Rowan's "pirate" knew of the movements of the Spanish patrol boats along that majestic shore as though he himself controlled them. He would not land "el delegado Americano" immediately, but waited until the coast was clear. Then, running in by a place called Gran Rincon, west of Portillo, he successfully discharged his duty to the Junta and to his passenger. The latter found himself on shore in the care of other friends of free Cuba.

From the coast the first day's march took Rowan's party well into the mountains. There the next day was passed in collecting provisions for the trip to Calixto García's camp, and in securing information, too, as to the general's whereabouts—for they supposed he was still moving from place to place, in the manner of insurgents.

"We did not know where he was. We got our knowledge as we went," Rowan says.

On the 28th of April the Spaniards abandoned Bayamo. García entered and established himself comfortably in that famous old town. A day earlier (April 27) Rowan's party set out across the Sierra Maestra; on the 28th, pressing on towards the northeast, they got among the foot-hills; the last day of the month found them nearing the goal, but marching along a trail so rough that they were glad to camp on the river Buey, "to swim, and sleep in hammocks."

(On the other side of the world Dewey's fleet entered Manila Bay that night.)

Only about twenty miles further to Bayamo; and so, at noon on "Manila day," May 1, Rowan and his companions reached the outskirts of Bayamo. They saw the people who had been exiled from the city, three years before, rushing in to claim their own again, now that the insurgents were established there. Bayamo had formerly about thirty thousand inhabitants; now perhaps two thousand. It is easy to realize the full force of Rowan's statement, in regard to this remnant, that the present inhabitants are "all insurgents at heart."

The Spanish forts, when he arrived, were smouldering ruins, the life of the city beginning again, under changed conditions. In the Bayamo River, a third of a mile wide here, women were standing in the shallows to wash their clothing on the bowlders.

The horses of the party were tied opposite a Cuban flag that distinguished García's headquarters. Rowan was received in an agreeable office, where he

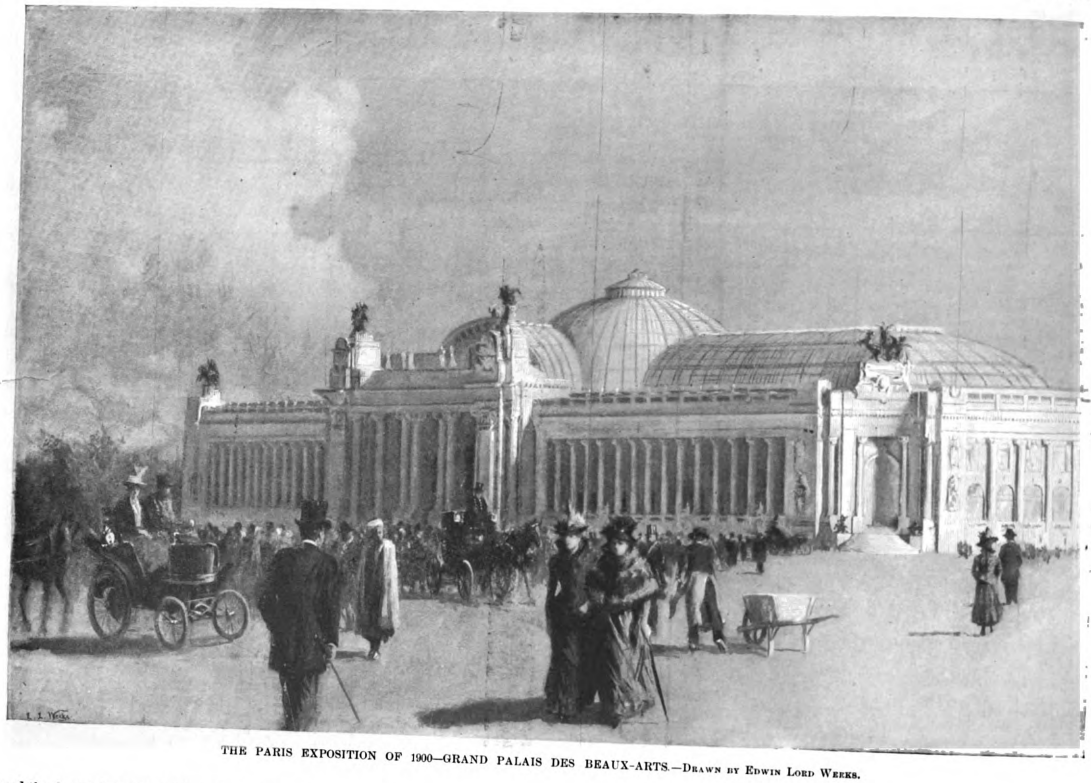
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google



"Castine." "New York."

DESPATCHES FOR THE ADMIRAL.

Drawn while on the Flag-Ship by Rufus Fairchild Zogbaum, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly."

Original from PENN STATE

THE PARIS EXPOSITION OF 1900—GRAND PALAIS DES BEAUX-ARTS.—Drawn by Edwin Lord Weeks.

delivered the despatches that had been intrusted to him. It is a pleasure to be able to add that he was promptly invited to breakfast with the general, in this especially wasted and harried portion of poor Cuba. There was a "long talk," says Rowan, "and despatches passed between us. At five o'clock he announced that he had his despatches all ready, and asked me if I could start north, as he wished to get his replies to the United States government as soon as possible. He detailed Callazo, Colonel Hernandez, and Dr. Bieta, an expert on the diseases of that section, to accompany me."

With these companions Rowan started away that evening, crossing Bayamo River, and camping near the Cauto River before midnight. At sunrise the next morning they took up the march again, crossed the Cauto (the largest river of Cuba) at Cauto el Paso, and then made their way through tropical jungle and over meadow-land, until, at Las Arenas, they went into camp for the night. Near Arenas is a fortification constructed during the ten years' war. Next morning they started at sunrise, and reached Victoria de las Tunas, outside of which ruined town they met a force of Cubans, four or five hundred men, encamped near a place called Piedras. Rowan inspected the fortifications, and studied the plan of the siege by which García captured the town in August, 1897, and on passing through this singularly misnamed Victoria de las Tunas, discovered that not a single building was habitable now—"the whole thing razed to the ground"; and this he speaks of as a striking illustration of the insurgent plan, which is to destroy the towns. The Spanish plan is not less definite—to destroy the country!

A long ride—about fifty-one miles, according to Callazo's computations—brought Rowan and his party to a hill called Damanuecos, at the foot of which they camped. And now, being within striking distance of the north coast, they devoted a day to preparations for the voyage, making sails out of the canopies of their hammocks, etc. Climbing to the top of the peak early the following day, they were rewarded with a beautiful view, not the least characteristic feature in the landscape being an enormous palm forest stretching northward. For hours their course lay through this stately growth—through brush, where the poisonous guao-tree gave lasting proof of its presence; then a fortress with walls of coral rock was passed; and finally they came to the coast and to the salinas (salt-works). The work of collecting the sea-water in kettles and evaporating it to obtain a supply of salt for the Cuban forces is carried on by offenders in the army; and a very good form of punishment it is.

Breakers outside the capes were thundering in a way that seemed decidedly unpleasant when one listened to them, with the little boat much too small to hold all the party in full view. Even when the weather grew calm enough for embarking, it was necessary to send Dr. Bieta and others back to General García, while only six embarked,—Lieutenant Rowan, General Callazo, Hernandez, his chief of staff, and three sailors. After passing out and laying the course due north (this brings us now to May 5) they met Admiral Sampson's fleet on its way to Porto Rico. By a piece of good luck the party in the little life-boat overhauled a sponging-steamer with a crew of thirteen negroes, who carried them into Nassau. There the American consul made arrangements for sending Rowan by the schooner Fearless to Key West, at which place he arrived four days later.

III.

While crossing the island from south to north our lieutenant (or, to give him the title to which he has been advanced, lieutenant-colonel) felt as safe, he says, as though he had been going up town from Franklin Square to his hotel. Unfortunately we cannot place this sense of security to the credit of the harmless natives, for these were few and far between in the portion of Cuba that he visited. In fact, that whole district in western Santiago which on the latest map appears to be peppered with towns, is really to-day almost a wilderness. The names that make such a showing may designate a single plantation; perhaps a deserted farmstead or a ruin.

The impression he received of García and his men was distinctly favorable. He speaks of García as a man of honor, who will keep his agreement made with this government to the extent of his ability, and it is plain that his ability to render valuable assistance in our campaign is not accurately measured by any one of the various estimates of the number of men, trained and inured to Cuban warfare, that he commands.

Marrion Wilcox.

OUR BATTLE-CRY.

Not for Revenge—albeit Spain
Destroyed the Maine—
Not for her islands, near or far,
Wage we this war.
Nor solely for poor Cuba's need
Do our sons bleed;
But to solve questions which were gray
Ere to the day
She opened her sad eyes! For we,
Who scarce yet see
Wisely to rule ourselves, are set
Where ways have met,
To lead the waiting nations on!
Not for our own
Land now are battle-flags unfurled,
But for the World.

Henrietta R. Eliot.

THE PARIS EXPOSITION OF 1900.

BY EDWIN LORD WEEKS.

Few events of late years have moved the Parisian public, the public of fêtes and exhibitions, of the Concours Hippique and the Vernissage, more than the long-threatened and as often deferred demolition of the Palais d'Industrie. It was not alone the art world, but the world of fashion and of high bohemia, and of many other coteries which touch their borders, that looked forward to the dawn of the Vernissage, that annual fête which was the beginning of a career to so many, or the resurrection of long-buried and half-forgotten reputations, and which was quite as often the occasion of bitter disappointment and chagrin to others whose sun had not yet risen or had irrevocably set. Those who are familiar only with the varnishing-days or private views of other art centres can hardly realize the pomp and circumstance of this event in Paris, where, in spite of the never-failing regularity of its recurrence and the deadly similarity of one Vernissage to another, it has become as much of a national institution as the Fourteenth of July or the Grand Prix. Whoever has lived through a long succession of them, although they all have a tendency to recede and merge one into the other as the years go by, will not easily forget how much the weather had to do with his or her impressions on the fateful day, when driven down or across the Champs Élysées to the crowded portal; for if the morning dawned cold and gray or stormy, the pictures looked their very worst under the bleak unsparing light, the spring toilets and the marvellous creations of modistes were hidden under furs and wraps, and those who had engaged tables in the open air at Le Doyen's for lunch were fain to envy the more prudent who had secured places at the buffet in the Sculpture Court, where, although they were compelled to fight for each dish, and the distracted waiters were often intercepted and robbed by hungry privateers from other tables, they were at least sheltered from the inclemency of the weather. With all its imperfections and shortcomings, what could have been more impressive than the vastness of the great court, where the white sculpture gleamed among palm fronds lifted high above the insolent competition of violet and orange and scarlet hats and sleeves and flowers, and the fresh tints of living faces? For no one but a novice or an æsthetic enthusiast could fix his attention on painted canvas or graven image when seen across a foreground like a restless kaleidoscope of life and color, where æsthetic clowns in eccentric costumes had their brief hour of success, as well as the reigning beauties of either world, and other celebrities of the day, who all held court at the Vernissage of the old Salon. These and many other memories—reminiscences of the grand pageants of the last exposition, and of the gala-days of the Concours Hippique—clustered about the Palais d'Industrie; and when it was realized that the neighboring "Garden of Paris" was also doomed to destruction, and its chestnut bowers uprooted, not even the promise of a more sumptuous and enduring palace of art—not only one, but two of them—and a spectacular bridge besides, added to the prospect of a still more seductive Garden of Eden in some vague "elsewhere," could console the æsthetic and the more frivolous coteries of Paris for their present deprivations. The gradual dismantling and destruction of the vast extent of glass roof as it went on during the bleak winter months were not a cheerful sight, and people were fain to hurry past or to look the other way. Now all that remains is the great entrance arch, boarded up to its apex, where so many joyous crowds have gathered, and a small section of the adjoining walls.

For months past the entire enclosure, reaching from the solitary portal on the Champs Élysées down to the Seine, has been surrounded by a high board wall, tinted pale green, and panelled off by arches of trellis-work, which is far from unsightly when half hidden by flickering tree shadows. Behind this barrier all the work on the new palaces, and the broad avenue which will separate them, has been going on, and at the present moment the stone columns of the greater edifice have begun to overtop the wall. But the whole enclosed space is still a wilderness of stone, like a vast quarry interspersed with shanties, and bisected by the tracks of a light railway, along which the material is carried. The forlorn remnant of the old palace, which, like the curtain of a theatre, masks the scene of action, together with its flanking walls, will disappear at once when the new spectacle is ready for the impatient public. A new avenue will extend from the Champs Élysées, but not quite at right angles with it, between the two new palaces, terminating at the magnificent bridge Alexander III., the corner-stone of which was laid by the Russian Emperor during his visit to Paris, and which will connect this section with the Esplanade des Invalides—in short, an entire new quarter is now under construction. The Grand Palais des Beaux-Arts will take up nearly all the

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

right side of the avenue, from one end nearly to the other. Three different architects—M. Deglane, M. Thomas, and M. Louvet—have each been commissioned to design a wing of the building, all working under the general direction of M. Girault. In the portion designed by M. Thomas, the rear of the edifice, which will be in a measure complete in itself, with a grand entrance on the Avenue d'Antin, the individual talent of the architect will be allowed full play, although his conception, like those of his confrères, must harmonize with the general plan. He has been for many years the official architect of the Palais d'Industrie, and it is said that a certain likeness to the old landmark will be perpetuated in this part of the new building, which will be known as the Palais Thomas. The central porch, facing the Avenue d'Antin, will resemble in some measure, although on a smaller scale, the principal entrance of the Palais d'Industrie. As on the front of the palace facing the new avenue, arcades of twin Ionic columns will extend on either side the entrance, and this rear portion will reach from the Quai de la Conférence to the prolongation of the Rue Jean Goujon. Above the central portal the sky-line is broken by the central dome, and the ranges of twin columns on each side will support the projection of the roof, which will form a broad strip of "bandeau"—to use the technical term employed here—thus giving a logical reason for the presence of the colonnade. This upper bandeau will be surmounted by a light balustrade, and the somewhat level outline will be relieved by a series of sculptural vases placed at intervals, which, together with the occasional statues or bronze groups, will sufficiently vary its monotony. Upon entering the building from the Avenue d'Antin, we shall find ourselves in a vast elliptical hall, beneath the flattened dome seen from without, and this spacious rotunda will, it is expected, be flooded with light, as one great object of the director-in-chief has been to get as much sunshine as possible into the building, and to allow as many openings as are consistent with its architectural beauty when viewed from the outside. The decorations of this inner court will be sober and subdued in color, after the style of those in the amphitheatre of the Sorbonne, as it is felt that too violent oppositions of color might have a crude effect when seen under such intense light. This entrance hall will be surrounded by stairways giving access to the two long exhibition galleries on either side. The interior of the Palais Thomas will be decorated in the style which prevailed in France at the end of the last century, which is now considered simpler and in better taste than the style which immediately preceded it. At each end of the Palais Thomas there will be a low entrance under the basement, by which horses and other animals to be exhibited in the different competitions may enter, and the stables placed on the ground-floor will be so contrived as to be perfectly free from dampness; a thick platform or construction of cement will be laid under the flooring; for, as heretofore, the Concours Hippique and the cattle shows will take place immediately before the Salon. All the exterior decoration of this rear portion of the edifice will be quiet and sober in general effect, in order that it may not compete in magnificence with the principal façade opening on the new avenue.

The great square portico of the grand entrance, deeply recessed behind its Ionic columns, will open into a hall of vast dimensions, extending from the inner arch of the entrance back to the division fronting on the Avenue d'Antin (or Palais Thomas), reaching upward to the summit of the broad central dome. This will be one of the most striking features of the edifice, and, it is hoped, will be decorated in a style worthy of its noble proportions. A broad gallery ten metres in width will surround this space, which may be utilized as a "promenoir" or for special exhibitions when needed, or, again, for tribunes or boxes during the Concours Hippique and on similar occasions. A monumental stairway, of exceptional size and sumptuously decorated, will lead to a great tribune or balcony which will command a view of the whole interior, and this stairway, it is expected, will be one of the chief points of interest. As in the old Palais d'Industrie, a long gallery will unite exteriorly the whole series of exhibition-rooms, so that one may walk from one end of the series to the other without entering the rooms. The chief feature in that portion of the building designed by M. Louvet will be the great hall where the opening ceremony of the exposition of 1900 will take place, and which will be used for the reception of sovereigns, the distribution of recompenses, and on other state occasions. After the close of the exposition it will be utilized for festivals and concerts. It would be impossible at present to give any further or more authentic details in regard to the interior decorations of the edifice, as nothing definite beyond their general character has yet been decided. The frieze of this "modern Parthenon" is to be a work of art of the most modern character, and the motive is to be the "History of Art through all the Ages," after the cartoon of M. Joseph Blanc, of the Institute. The material will be a new kind of "ceramic," known as "grès cérame," to be cast at the national manufactory of Sèvres, under the direction of M. Baumgart.

An oversight frequently committed by architects is to design a building without taking into consideration the site it will occupy and its relation to surrounding buildings or other objects, which may modify its effect in some measure. It is believed, however, that the group of buildings forming the new quarter, as it is now called, has been so thoroughly studied that there can be no doubt as to the ultimate harmony of the whole conception.

The smaller palace of fine arts, known as the Palais Girault, after the name of its architect, will face the larger one across the avenue, but will be so different in its style and character as to suggest no comparison with it. The central dome, surmounted by a bronze figure, will be higher in proportion than that of the greater edifice; the pavilions at either end of the principal façade will be terminated by semicircular bays, which will harmonize in form with the two circular pavilions on the rear elevation; and the front on the avenue will present a row of single columns on each side of the entrance porch which, almost or quite in contact with the wall, offer only the suggestion of a colonnade. Although the ground plan of this edifice is an irregular polygon, thus presenting greater difficulties in obtaining an agreeable result, it is said that M. Girault's design—which obtained the first prize at the Concours—has scarcely been modified, even in its slightest details, contrary to the general rule in regard to public monuments.

Less majestic and imposing than the greater palace across the avenue, it will form a valuable pendant by reason of its somewhat gayer and lighter aspect. On entering the central portal by a series of twenty steps, we come at once into a spacious vestibule, circular in form, and immediately under the dome. On either hand extend two long exhibition-halls, lighted by windows placed between the exterior columns, and by occasional sky-lights.

An inner series of galleries will be lighted only from above, while the centre of the building will be treated as a garden, bordered by a semicircular colonnade which will do duty as a covered promenade. It the Palais Girault shall be dedicated, du exposition, to retrospective art, while its will be reserved for art in its more moder

Careful attention has been paid to the galleries, by the architect, who has visit museums and galleries of Europe, and the treasures of art which will be gathe seen under the most favorable condition tended that this building shall contain m by modern artists which are annually municipal council, and which, for want have often been stored in unsuitable pla to deteriorate.

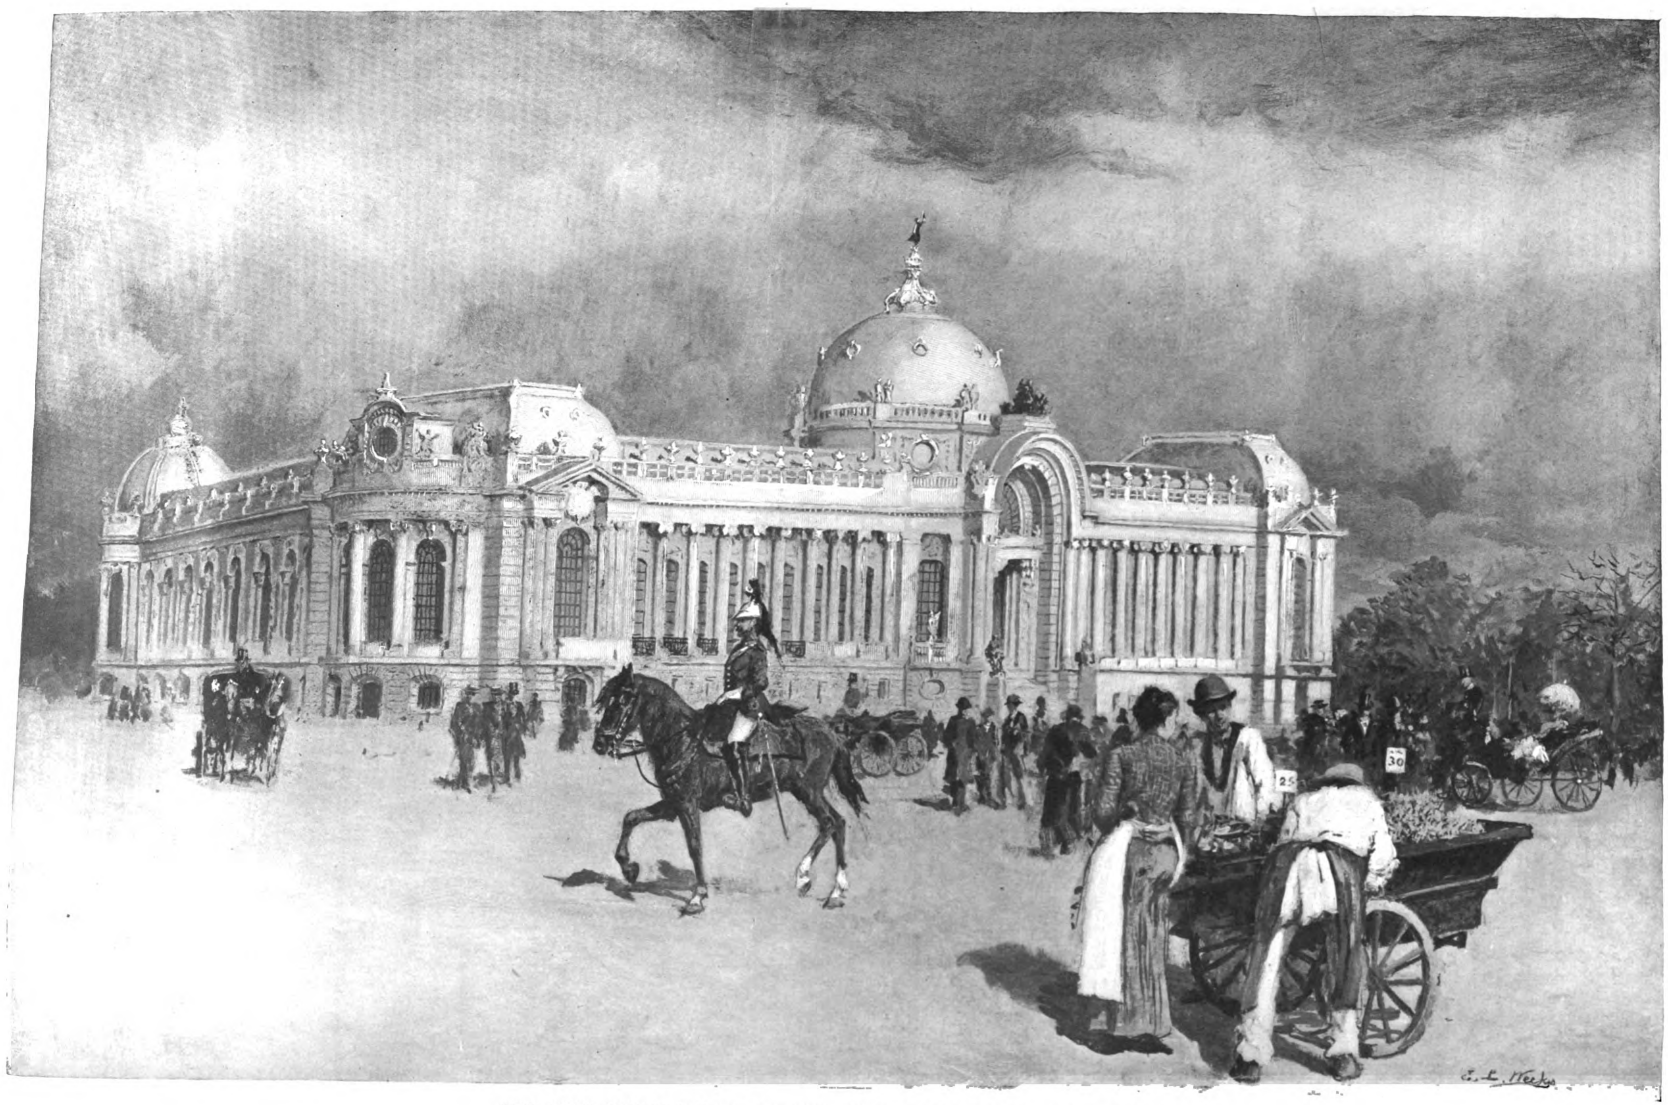
The bridge which is to unite the ne the old, and connect the avenue with the Invalides, will traverse the Seine at a s a single arch, and is to be a little ove metres in length by forty in width. Th Resal and M. Alby, whose task it has be the technical and scientific part of the worked in concert with the architects, M nard and Cousin, who have been occupied decorative and architectural features of t and who have labored to harmonize the ge judicious use of stone and bronze, with the bining grace and beauty with its strength.

During the early stages of the work crow gaze down at the mysterious rows of caisson which resembled nothing so much as iron b on end. Inside these chambers, which affo nication with the tunnel beneath the river constructing the foundations was carried tem, new here, was first employed in the and is therefore more familiar at home than have since been removed, as the sub-fluvia enterprise is now nearly completed.

The four tall monuments, or "pylones," each side of the entrances at either end of th add much to its originality as a landmark. T be seventeen metres in height, or twenty-two bronze groups representing the Arts, Science and Industry placed on their summits. Su shafts, or semipyramidal obelisks of stone, br and tall clusters of lamps wrought in m grouped near their bases. A double line of or lanterns will be carried across the bridge verity of its lines will be further modified sculpture placed in the middle, or highest curve, and by the light balustrades. It wa necessary to treat the steel frame-work of th such a way as to soften, as far as possible, it rigid lines, and these decorative accessories to fulfil this mission.

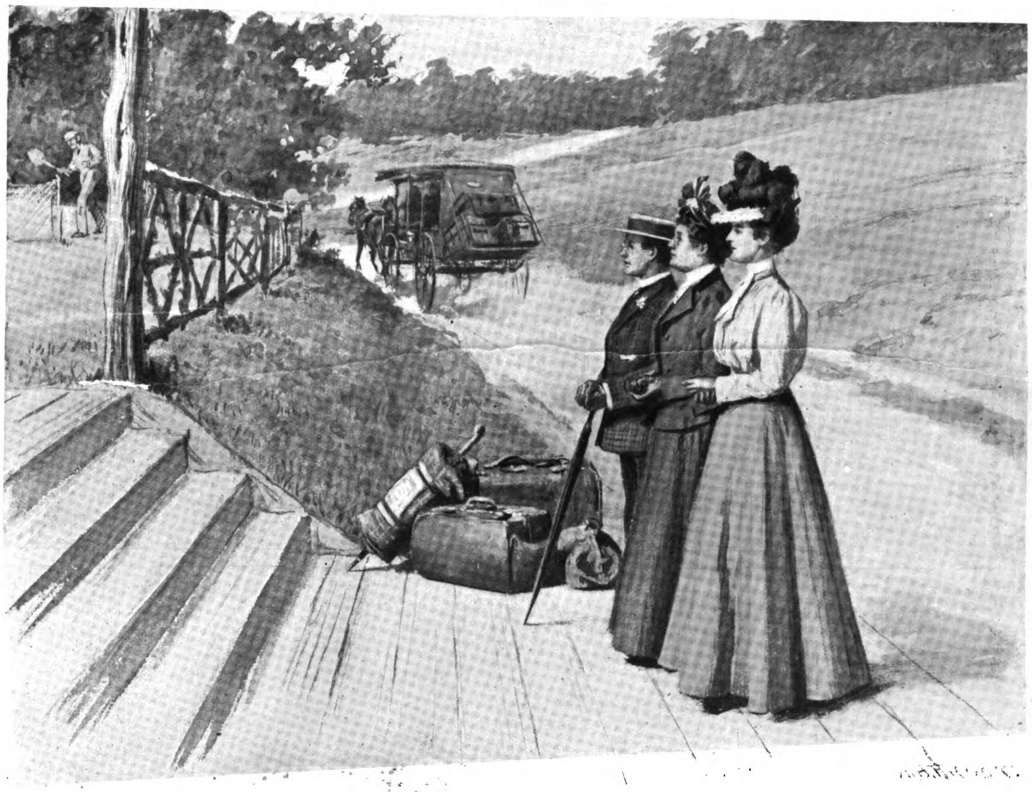
However much the disappearance of the d'Industrie, with all its associations, may b there can be little doubt that the new grou ments, when completed, will more than com its loss.

The two stately palaces are intended not for tion only, but to stand for all time—the bri between them, the bridge flanked by its tower ments with their triumphal bronze groups, and dome of the Invalides, and, indeed, the whole yond the Esplanade, which has never before value as an architectural feature of the city, will close in the distance, will together constit unsurpassed in Paris, and perhaps in all Euro



THE PARIS EXPOSITION OF 1900—BRIDGE ALEXANDER III.—DRAWN BY EDWIN LORD WEEKS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

THE PARIS EXPOSITION OF 1900—THE SMALLER PALAIS DES BEAUX ARTS
DRAWN BY EDWIN LORD WEEKS —[SEE PAGE 646.]

Original from PENN STATE

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS.

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "THE GREAT STONE OF SARDIS," ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY A. B. FROST.

I.—THE DAWN OF A WEDDING-JOURNEY.

MR. and Mrs. Hector Archibald were prosperous and happy dwellers in a suburb of one of our large towns. Fortune had favored them in many ways—in health and in a good average happiness. They had reached early middle age, and their daughter Kate, their only child, had grown up to be a beautiful and good young woman, and was on the point of marrying a young lawyer—Rodney Bringhurst by name—in every way worthy of her.

Hector Archibald was a little man, with small bright eyes, and hair slightly touched with gray and very much inclined to curl. His disposition was lively. He had a strong liking for cheerful occurrences, and was always willing to do his part in the bringing about of such events. Novelty had a charm for him. He was not bound by precedence and tradition, and if he had found himself at a dinner which began with coffee and ended with oysters on the half-shell, he would have given the unusual meal a most animated consideration, although he might have utterly withheld any subsequent approbation. As a general thing, he revolved in an orbit where one might always be able to find him, were the proper calculations made. But if any one drew a tangent for him, and its direction seemed suitable and interesting, he was perfectly willing to fly off upon it.

The disposition of Mrs. Hector Archibald was different. She was born to be guided by customs, fashions, and forms. She believed it was the duty of a married woman to make her home happy, and she did it. But she also believed that in the best domestic circles there were rules and usages for domestic happiness which would apply to every domestic condition and contingency. It frequently troubled her, however, to find that certain customs, forms, or usages of domestic society had changed, and being of a conservative turn of mind, it was difficult for her to adapt herself to these changes. But, thoroughly loyal to the idea that what was done by people she loved and people she respected ought also to be done by her, she earnestly strove to fit herself to new conditions, especially when she saw that by not doing so she would be out of touch with her family and her friends.

Now of course the wedding of their daughter was the only thing in the world that seemed of real importance to Mr. and Mrs. Archibald, and for this all preparations and plans had been agreed upon and made with great good-will and harmony, excepting one thing, and that was the wedding-trip. Strange to say, the young people did not wish to take a wedding-trip. They believed that this old-fashioned custom was unnecessary, troublesome, commonplace, and stupid. In the gardens and grounds of the Archibald mansion, and in the beautiful surrounding country, they had loved each other as lovers, and among these scenes they wished to begin to love each other as a married couple. Why should such distasteful and unpleasant ingredients as railroad cars, steamboats, and hotels be dashed into the pleasing mixture of their new lives? It had been arranged that for a year or two, at least, they should live in Kate's dear old home, and why should they not immediately begin that life there?

Mr. Archibald did not favor this plan, and his wife was strongly opposed to it. A wedding without a wedding-trip ought not to be thought of.

"During the honey-moon a young couple should live for each other, with each other, apart from the rest of the world. It is a beautiful custom, which should not be rudely trampled upon," said Mrs. Archibald.

As Mrs. Archibald cherished a belief that she ought to conform her ideas to the domestic customs of the day, her daughter Kate cherished the belief that the domestic customs of the day ought to conform themselves to her ideas.

"Of course we should like to be alone in the honey-moon," she exclaimed. "We don't object to that; and if there must be a wedding-journey, you and father can take it and we will stay here. Here are servants, books, things to eat, and everything our hearts can desire, and here we would really feel as if we were beginning life as man and wife. As for you two, you both need a vacation, and nothing could be more perfectly appropriate and more delightful to everybody than that you should take our wedding-trip. We don't want it; we will make it a present to you. Go, take it and be happy, and leave us here to be happy. People have done this sort of thing before, so that it is not absolutely wild and unheard of."

Mr. Archibald welcomed this plan with open arms, and hugged it and his daughter to his breast. It suited him admirably, and he declared that all business and engagements of every kind should be set aside, and that he would be ready to start on the wedding-journey with Mrs. Archibald the moment the ceremony should be completed.

"You will wait until the reception is over, father?" said Kate, laughing.

"Yes," said he, "I will wait for that."

But this novel proposition sent a chill through every fibre of Mrs. Archibald's physical organism. At first she did not exactly comprehend it, but when she did, the chills increased. When she had recovered herself a little she began to make objections. This was easy enough, for they crowded into her mind like sheep into a pen; but every objection, as she brought it forth, was ruthlessly set aside or crushed to earth by her daughter or her husband, assisted by her expectant son-in-law, of whom she declared she never would have believed such a thing had she been told it.

The discussion ended, of course, by Mrs. Archibald agreeing to go on this absurd wedding-journey. But the good lady's mental troubles were not over when she had given her consent. As this scheme had been devised by those dearest to her on earth, and as it was certain, these dearest persons assured her, to meet with the approbation of all people of advanced thought—at least of those whose thought had advanced far enough to make it worthy of consideration—she felt that in taking part in this scheme she ought to do it honestly and with her whole heart; and at her time of life, to act as a proxy for a young bride by taking a wedding-journey in that young bride's place was a very difficult thing for Mrs. Archibald to do honestly and with her whole heart. But she would try to do it. Whatever else happened, her family must be kept happy, and it should never be said of her that she hung like a millstone around the combined neck of that family when it was unitedly climbing toward altitudes of felicity, which, although she was not able to discern them, must exist, since that fact had been so earnestly insisted upon by Mr. Archibald, Kate, and Rodney Bringhurst.

Thus was this exceptional hymeneal performance decided upon. At eleven o'clock on Wednesday, the 6th of June, the marriage service was performed. At noon the guests sat down to breakfast, and at two o'clock that afternoon Mr. and Mrs. Hector Archibald departed on the wedding-trip, leaving behind Mr. and Mrs. Bringhurst at home with each other, and "not at home" to the world.

II.—ENTER MARGERY.

AT four o'clock on the afternoon of June 6 Mr. and Mrs. Hector Archibald arrived at a family hotel in the capital of their State. Where they should go from there had not been decided upon. Nothing in regard to their wedding-journey had been decided upon except that they were to return to their home on the 6th of July of that year, and not before. It would have been impossible, with their minds filled with bridal arrangements, for them to make plans for their journey. But at this first stopping-place, where they were free from all responsibility and interruptions, they could, at their leisure, decide where they should go, how they should go, and what they should do when they got there.

After the unrest and turmoil of their own home during the past few weeks, the quiet and repose of this city hotel were delightful. That evening they went to the theatre, and after the performance they had a little supper at a restaurant.

"People may not think we are a newly married pair,"

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

said Mr. Archibald, as he poured out a glass of wine for his wife, "but it is not impossible that they may see we know how to enjoy ourselves quite as much as if we were."

The next morning Mr. Archibald procured a number of railroad maps, time-tables, circulars of steamboat excursions, advertisements of mountain retreats and seaside resorts, and he and his wife sat down to study these, and to decide upon a destination and a route. After an hour or two of indeterminate examination Mr. Archibald declared himself a little tired, and proposed that they should take a recess from their labors and go and call upon their old friends the Stanley Dearborns.

"People on wedding-tours do not make calls," said Mrs. Archibald.

"That may be true," said her husband, "in ordinary cases; and although I do not care to announce to everybody the peculiarities of the expedition which we have undertaken, I do not mind in the least telling the Stanley Dearborns all about it. Stanley himself would not appreciate it; he would consider it absurd; but then he is not at home at this time of day, and Mrs. Dearborn is just the woman to enjoy a reform movement of this sort. Besides, she is full of ideas about everything, and she may propose some good place for us to go to."

Mrs. Dearborn was at home, and very glad to see the Archibalds. She was a woman whose soul was in touch with the higher education of women—with female suffrage, the emancipation of the enslaved mind wherever it might be found, and of progress generally. She was a member of many societies, belonged to committees without end, wrote reports and minutes by day and by night, and was one of that ever-increasing class of good people who continually walk forward in order that their weight may help the world to turn over.

In spite of her principles and the advanced position of her thought, Mrs. Dearborn actually leaned back in her chair and laughed heartily when she learned what sort of a journey the Archibalds were taking. In this merriment Mr. Archibald joined with great glee.

"Ever since I left home," he said, "I have wanted to have a chance for a good laugh at this trip of ours. It is the most delightful joke I have ever known."

Mrs. Archibald could not help smiling, but her brow was clouded. "If this expedition is merely a joke," she said, "I do not think we should have undertaken it; but if it is an earnest assertion of our belief that there should be a change in the customs of society, then I think we should take it seriously, and I see nothing to laugh at."

"My dear Harriet," said Mrs. Dearborn, "we can be good and glad at the same time; and that is what I am, I am sure. What you are doing is the initiation of one of the most worthy reforms of the day, and if it should have an effect in breaking up that wretched custom of the bridal tramp, which is considered so necessary in this country, society should rise up and call you blessed. But it is funny, for all that. I am sure that the woman who dared to go without crinoline was very funny, and when I heard of a hospital for cats I could not help laughing; but I believed in it, and worked for it. And now where are you going?"

"That is what we want to talk to you about," said Mr. Archibald; and for half an hour they talked about it.

At the end of that time it was decided that the mountains were better than the sea or than a quiet lowland nook; and Mrs. Dearborn strongly recommended Sadler's, where she and her husband had spent a part of a summer a few years before.

"We camped out," said she, "and had a fine time. You can camp out at Sadler's more easily and satisfactorily than anywhere else in the world."

Camping suited Mr. Archibald admirably, and, to his surprise, his wife said she might like it very well.

"If people are going to laugh at us," she said, "when they find out we are on a wedding-journey—and they will be sure to find it out in some way or other—I think the fewer people we mingle with the better. I do not think I shall like camping altogether, but I know it is healthful, and I suppose I ought to get used to it. It would be dreadfully lonely for just Mr. Archibald and me, but I suppose we can take some one with us to guide and cook."

"My dear Harriet," said Mrs. Dearborn, "if you are at Sadler's, you can go into any sort of camp you please. I will tell you all about Sadler's. Sadler is a man of progress. His hotel or inn is on the very edge of the forest country, and away from all the centres of resort. He calls his place the terminal link of public travel in that direction. When you leave him you travel privately in any way you like. He has established what he has named a bureau of camping, and he furnishes his patrons with any sort of a camp they may desire. If the party is few in number and of a timid disposition, they can have a camp within shouting distance of his house. If they are brave and adventurous, he will send them out into the depths of the forest. If they like water, he locates them by the shores of a lake. If climbing is their passion, he puts them at the foot of a mountain. Those who want to hunt can do so, and those who dislike fire-arms are placed in a camp where the popping of guns is never heard. He provides tents, guides, provisions, and even dangers and sensations."

"Safety is what I want," interrupted Mrs. Archibald.

"And that he furnishes," said the other, "for those who desire it."

"Sadler is the man for me!" cried Mr. Archibald. "We will go to him, look over his list of camps, and select one to suit us."

"By-the-way," said Mrs. Dearborn, "a thought has struck me. How would you like to take Margery with you?"

"Margery!" exclaimed Mr. Archibald. "That delightful little girl whom I taught to ride a tricycle when you were visiting us? I would like it ever so much."

It struck Mrs. Archibald that people on bridal trips did not generally take children or young girls with them, but it also struck her that if they were going into camp it might be pleasant and in many ways advantageous to her to have some one of her own sex with her; but she had no time to formulate these advantages in her mind before Mrs. Dearborn explained herself in full.

"Since Mr. Dearborn and I came home from Sadler's," she said, "Margery has been perfectly wild to go there, and as soon as the leaves began to bud in the squares she began to talk about it. We saw no possible chance of her going there, for her father is too busy to leave home for any length of time this season, and I cannot go to the mountains this year, for I must visit my sister, who is not well, and there are three summer conventions that I am obliged to attend. But if you could take her with you, I do not believe she would trouble you in the least, and you would give her the greatest of pleasures; and, to speak practically, which I think we always ought to do, it would not be a bad thing on the score of economy, for things are always proportionately cheaper for three people in a camp than for two."

A great many advantages of female companionship now began to creep into Mrs. Archibald's mind: if her husband should take it into his head to go out and hunt at night by the light of a torch; if there should be thunderstorms, and he away with the guide; if he should want to go off and talk to Indians or trappers, and he always did want to go off and talk to people of every class—it would be very pleasant to have even Margery Dearborn with her. So she consented with great good-will to her friend's proposition, and Mrs. Dearborn was much pleased and thankful.

"Margery is a true creature of impulse," she said; "that is really her predominating characteristic, and she will want to bound to the ceiling when she hears she is to go to Sadler's. She is not at home now, but she will be in very soon. You must take luncheon with us."

About a quarter of an hour after that Margery Dearborn came home. She was very glad indeed to see the Archibalds, whom she remembered as the kindest of people; and when she heard they were going to take her to Sadler's, she gave a scream of delight and threw herself upon Mrs. Archibald's neck.

"You are an angel," she cried, "an angel of blessedness, my dear Aunt Harriet! Don't you remember, I used to call you that? Won't you let me call you so still?" And without waiting for an answer, she rushed to Mr. Archibald, with outstretched hands. "Dear Uncle Archibald, you are just as good as ever, I see. You know, I wouldn't call you Uncle Hector, because hectoring meant scolding, which never had anything to do with you. Sadler's! Oh, when do we start?"

"To-morrow is Saturday," replied Mr. Archibald, "and we must get together some things we will need for camp life, and we can start on Monday."

When the visitors were left to themselves for a few moments, Mr. Archibald said to his wife: "Harriet, I am astounded. This girl who used to ride bareback and jump over fences is a young lady now, and a handsome one, too. She is quite a different person from the girl I agreed to take with us."

"Mr. Archibald," said his wife, "you never can remember that in this world people of all ages grow older. She was fourteen when she was visiting us, and that was four years ago, so of course she is a young lady."

"No," he answered, "I don't feel that I am growing any older, and I don't see that you are, and so I totally forget that proclivity in other people. But what do you think now? Can we take this young woman with us to camp? Won't she be a dreadful drag?"

"My dear," said Mrs. Archibald, "I much prefer the young lady to the girl. I don't want to be the only woman in camp, and the nearer the other woman is to my age the better."

"All right," said Mr. Archibald; "if you are satisfied, I am, and if she will agree to it, we will add our ages for the time being and divide by three, and then we will all stand on a level."

III.—SADLER'S.

It was in the afternoon of Monday, the 11th of June, when Mr. and Mrs. Archibald, accompanied by Miss Margery Dearborn, arrived at Sadler's, and with feelings of relief alighted from the cramped stage-coach which had brought them eight miles from the railroad station.

"Can this be Sadler's?" said Mr. Archibald, in a tone of surprise.

"Of course it must be," said his wife, "since they brought us here."

"It certainly is the place," said Margery, "for there is the name over that door."

"How do you feel about it?" said Mr. Archibald to his wife.

"I feel very well about it," said she. "Why shouldn't I?"

"How do you feel about it?" he asked of the younger lady.

"Well," she answered, "I don't exactly understand it. I had visions of forests and wilds and tumbling mountain streams and a general air of primevalism, and I am surprised to see this fine hotel with piazzas, and croquet-grounds, and tennis-courts, and gravelled walks, and babies in their carriages, and elderly ladies carrying sunshades."

"But it seems to me that there is a forest behind it," said Mr. Archibald.

"Yes," replied Margery, a little dolefully, "it has that to back it up."

"Don't let us stand here at the bottom of the steps talking," said Mrs. Archibald. "I must say I am very agreeably surprised."

In the wide hall which ran through the middle of the hotel, and not far from the clerk's desk, there sat a large handsome man, a little past middle age, who, in a hearty voice, greeted the visitors as they entered, but without rising from his chair. This was Peter Sadler, the owner of the hotel, the legal owner of a great deal of the neighboring country, and the actual ruler of more of said country than could be easily marked out upon a map or stated in surveyors' terms.

In fact, Peter Sadler was king of that portion of the vast district of mountain and forest which could be reached in a day's journey in any direction. If he had wished to extend his domain to points at a greater distance than this he would have done so, but so far he was satisfied with the rights he had asserted. He ruled supreme in that region because he had lived longer in the vicinity than any other white man, because he had a powerful will which did not brook opposition, and because there was no one to oppose him.

On the arable land which lay outside of the forest, and which really belonged to him, there were the houses of the men who farmed his fields, and on the outskirts of the woods were scattered here and there the cabins of the hunters and guides he employed, and these men knew no law but his will. Of course the laws of the State covered the district, but such promulgation and enforcement of these as he might consider necessary were generally left to Peter Sadler, and as to his own laws, he was always there to see that these were observed.

His guests submitted themselves to his will, or they left his hotel very soon. To people of discernment and judgment it was not difficult to submit to the will of this full-bearded, broad-chested man, who knew so much better than they did what they ought to do if they wanted to get all the good out of Sadler's which they were capable of assimilating.

This man, who sat all day in a big rolling-chair, and who knew everything that was going on in the hotel, the farm, and the forest about him, had been a hunter and a guide in his youth, an Indian-fighter in later years, and when he had been wounded in both legs, so that it was impossible for him ever to walk again, he came back to the scenes of his youth and established an inn for sportsmen—a poor little house at first, which grew and grew and grew, until it was the large well-kept hotel so widely known by his name.

After dinner, at which meal they were waited upon by women, and not by men in evening dress as Margery had begun to fear, Mr. Archibald sought Peter Sadler and made known to him the surprise of his party at finding themselves in this fine hotel.

"What did you expect?" asked Peter, eying him from head to foot.

"From what we had heard," replied the other, "we supposed we should find some sort of a preparatory camping-ground in the woods, from which we could go out and have a camp of our own."

"That's just what you have found," said Sadler. "In this house you prepare to camp, if you need preparation. If any man, woman, or child comes here and wants to go out to camp, and I see that they are sickly or weak or in any way not fit to live in the woods, I don't let them go one step until they are fit for it. The air and the food and the water they get here will make them fit, if anything will do it, and if these three things don't set them up they simply have to go back where they came from. They can't go into camp from this house. But if they fancy this hotel—and there isn't any reason why anybody shouldn't fancy it—they can stay here as long as they like, and I'll take care of them. Now, sir, if you want to go into camp, the first thing for you to do is to bring your family here and let me take a look at them. I've seen them, of course, but I haven't made up my mind yet whether they are the right sort for camp life. As for you, I think you will do. There isn't much of you, but you look tough."

Mr. Archibald laughed. "That's good rough talk," he said, "and smacks more of camp life than anything I have noticed here. I will go and bring my wife and Miss Dearborn."

"There is another reason why I want to see them," said the bluff Peter; "as you are bent on camping, you'll like to choose a camp, and when anything of that kind is on hand I want to talk to the whole party. I don't care to settle the business with one of them, and then have him come back and say that what has been agreed upon don't suit the others. I want a full meeting or no session."

When Mr. Archibald returned with his wife and Margery he found Peter Sadler had rolled his chair up to a large circular table at the back of the hall, on which was spread a map of the forest. He greeted the ladies in a loud voice and with a cheery smile.

"And so you want to go camping, do you?" said he. "Sit down and let us talk it over. I think the young lady is all right. She looks spry enough, and I expect she could eat pine cones like a squirrel if she were hungry and had nothing else. As for you, madam, you don't appear as if anything in particular was the matter with you, and I should think you could stand a Number Three camp well enough, and be all the better for a week or two of it."

"What is a Number Three camp?" asked Margery, before the astonished Mrs. Archibald could speak.

"Well," said Sadler, "it is a camp with a good deal of comfort in it. Our Number One camps are pretty rough. They are for hunters and scientific people. We give them game enough in season, and some bare places where they can make fires and stretch a bit of canvas. That is all they want, to have a truly good time. That is the best camp of all, I think. Number Two camps are generally for fishermen. They always want a chance for pretty good living when they are out in the woods. They stay in camp in the evenings, and like to sit around and have a good time. Number Threes are the best camps we put families into, so you see, madam, I'm rating you pretty high. There's always a log cabin in these camps, with cots and straw mattresses and plenty of traps for cooking. And, more than that, there is a chance for people who don't tramp or fish to do things, such as walking or boating, according to circumstances. There's one of our camps has a croquet-ground."

"Oh, we don't want that!" cried Margery; "it would simply ruin every illusion that is left to me."

"Glad to hear that," said Peter. "If you want to play croquet, stay at the hotel; that's what I say. Now, then, here are the camps, and there's plenty of them to choose from. You've come in a good time, for the season isn't fairly begun yet. Next month every camp will be full, with the hotel crowded with people waiting for their turns."

"What we want," said Margery, rising and looking over the map, "is the wildest Number Three you have."

"Oh, ho!" said Peter. "Not so fast, miss; perhaps we'll wait and see what this lady has to say first. If I'm not mistaken, madam, I think you're inclined the other way, and I don't put people into camps that they will be wanting to leave after the first rainy day. Now let me show you what I've got. Here is one, four hours' walk, horses for women, with a rocky stream through the middle of it!"

"That is grand!" cried Margery. "And really in the woods?"

"Now let me do the talking," said Peter. "They are all in the woods; we don't make camps in pasture-fields. Even the Number Sevens, where the meals are sent to the campers from the hotel and they have bath-tubs, are in the woods. Now here is another one, about three miles west from the one I just showed you, but the same distance from here. This, you see, is on the shore of a

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google se, with fishing, boating, and bathing if ou can stand cold water."

"Glorious!" cried Margery. "That is exctly what we want. A lake will be simply avenly!"

"Everything seems to suit you, miss," id Peter, "just as soon as you hear of it. it suppose we consider more of them beore you choose. Some two miles north of re, in the thickest of the forest, in a clearg that I had made, there is a small camp at strikes the fancy of some people. There a little stream there, and it's got fish in it o, and it runs through one corner of the g cabin, so there are seven or eight feet the stream inside the house; and on rainy ys you can sit there and fish; and some ople like to go to sleep with the running ter gurgling close to them where they n hear it when they are in bed. Then ere's an owl to this camp. The men heard m there when they were making the clearg, and he's never left the spot. Some peoe who have been out there said they never lt as much away from the world as they d listening to that little stream gurgling d that owl hooting."

"I believe," exclaimed Margery, "that in place like that I could write poetry!"

"It would give me the rheumatism and e blues," said Mrs. Archibald, upon which ter Sadler exclaimed:

"That settles that. Now then, here is other."

Several other camps were considered, but was the general conclusion that the one the lake was the most desirable. It had good cabin with three rooms, with plenty open space near by for the tents of the ides; there was a boat which belonged to e camp, and in every way it seemed so itable that Mr. Archibald secured it. He ought the price was rather high, but as it cluded guides, provisions, fishing-tackle, d in fact everything needed, he considered at although it might cost as much as dgings in a city hotel, they would get ore good out of it.

"Has this camp any name?" asked the thusiastic Margery, in the course of the nference.

"That's about your twenty-seventh quesn, miss," said Peter, "but it's one I can swer. Yes, it's got a name. It's called amp Rob."

"Oh!" ejaculated Margery, in a disappinted tone. "What a name!"

"Yes," said Peter, "it isn't much of a me. The first people who went out there med it that, and it stuck to it, and it's all s got. Camps are like horses—we've got tell them apart, and so we give them mes, and that's Camp Rob."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

A PAINTER OF SYMBOLISM.

It seems strange to associate the work and rsonality of the late Sir Edward Coley urne-Jones with the busy, practical nineenth century, to which he seemed foreign every way. His compositions, his technque, and the life of the man himself were r removed from the times in which he ved, while his thoughts, inspirations, and ethods were quite apart from those which tuated his contemporaries. He was somew a survival, or perhaps a resurrection, of a bygone age, and he belonged back four hundred years. Not that Burne-Jones was behind his times, or that his work was lacking. On the contrary, he was in the front rank of his profession; he stood the test of the most severe criticism; he lived to down opposition to his work, and he died appreciated as few of his countrymen have been; and throughout his career, even when the general public had little comprehension of his aims and ambitions, he never for a moment lacked for practical approbation, holding always a faithful clientèle which secured his work not only willingly, but gratefully, at large prices.

As if further to accentuate the incongruity of this fifteenth-century dreamer appearing in nineteenth-century times, Burne-Jones was born in 1833, in Birmingham—most mercantile, busiest, and most modern of all English cities. Destined for the Church, he found himself reading theology at Exeter College in 1856, when Rossetti, Morris, and Princeps were painting the Arthurian frescoes on the walls of the Oxford Union debating-room. He had previously worked at sketching, and in his odd moments had found time to give artistic expression to a mind that was teeming with poetic thoughts. He was attracted by the personality and the painting of Rossetti, and to him he submitted his work. The latter approving, Burne-Jones then and there gave up his university course, and henceforth devoted himself to art. He was practically self-taught, though his intimacy with Rossetti resulted in his receiving many criticisms. In connection with other pictorial work, he began almost at once making designs for stained glass, and here his feeling for beauty, symbolism, and the intellectual rendering of legend, religious subject, and poetry found sympathetic outlet, and ever since these have been the themes that have actuated his labors.

He found himself at once in sympathy with the primitive Italians, and he was drawn most of all to Botticelli, who, though he never copied, was his evident inspiration. The types of femininity, the draperies, and the general sentiment of the works of the great Florentine attracted him and held him fascinated. But his men and women were his own, after all. The arrangements were original, and the color, less alluring, it must be admitted, was personal, and, in a way, all

(Continued on page 652.)

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

DON'T BE CARELESS.

IN these days of nurse-maids the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is a great safeguard to the health of the little ones. It will not easily spoil, being perfectly sterilized in its manufacture.—[Adv.]

HORSE owners are reminded that the PUTNAM NAIL will hold the shoe. They never split or sliver in driving. Write PUTNAM NAIL CO., Neponset, Boston, Mass., for circular.—[Adv.]

A hop-skip-and-jump feeling, the sort that always follows a course of treatment where ABBOTT'S—The ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA BITTERS—is the prescription. —[Adv.]

DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS are the most efficacious stimulant to excite the appetite.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Every American soldier and every American sailor should carry the best American watch.

The original American watch was a Waltham watch. Waltham watches are now, as they always have been, the best American watches.

Copyright protected by Lyman D. Morse.

The Improved
BOSTON GARTER
adds neatness and comfort to the wearing of
LOW SHOES
Keeps the Stocking Free from Wrinkles
DOES NOT BIND
THE Velvet Grip CUSHION BUTTON CLASP
Lies Flat to the leg and cannot unfasten accidentally
SOLD EVERYWHERE
Sample Pair by Mail } Silk. 50c Cotton, 25c.
GEORGE FROST CO. BOSTON, MASS.

A Leather Lesson

Thick leather isn't always durable. Thin leather isn't always comfortable. Oily leather isn't always waterproof. Dear leather isn't always best. Low price leather isn't always cheap. Vici Kid is always reliable. This is the reason it is fast superseding all other leathers. Vici Kid is the only leather that repels the cold, yet absorbs no heat. It is the only leather free from oil, yet impervious to water. It is the only leather soft enough for comfort, strong enough for any kind of wear.

VICI KID

makes the most beautiful shoes for women, the most comfortable shoes for men, the most durable shoes for children (all colors). The genuine never varies in quality, no matter where you get it. Genuine Vici Kid is made only by R. H. Foerderer. To insure getting it and not an imitation, ask your dealer for Foerderer's Vici Kid. Vici Leather Dressing makes all shoes look better and wear better.

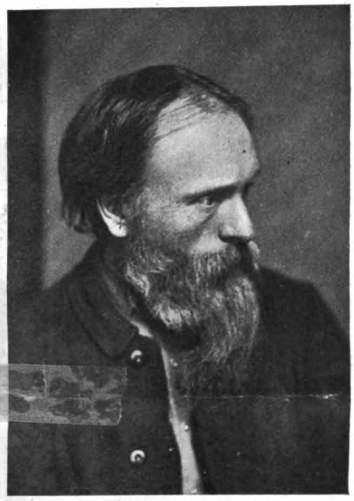
Ask your dealer for it. A book about buying, wearing and caring for shoes mailed free.

ROBERT H. FOERDERER, Philadelphia.



Your Salary
depends on your value. Technical knowledge will greatly increase your value. Study at home. Success guaranteed. Best text books free.
STENOGRAPHY
Bridge Steam, Electrical or Civil Engineering; Mathematics; Chemistry; Mining; Architectural or Mechanical Drawing; Surveying; Plumbing; Architecture; Metal Pattern Drafting; Prospecting; Book-keeping; English Branches
TAUGHT BY MAIL
Circular free. State subject you wish to study. Estab. 1891. 45,000 students and graduates. The International Correspondence Schools, Box 1159 Scranton, Pa.
$2.00 a Month

HARPER'S CATALOGUE,
A descriptive list of over 3000 volumes, will be sent to any address on receipt of Ten Cents in stamps.

He is a Public Benefactor Who provides the people With a pure stimulant.
OLD DEARBORN RYE
Bottled in bond, supplies this long-felt want. Sold by all leading dealers. Prescribed by all leading physicians. Write for circular and prices.
W. P. Squibb & Co., Lawrenceburgh, Dearborn County, Ind., Distillers

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.
Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar sounding name of a cheap grade. Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SIR EDWARD COLEY BURNE-JONES.

(Continued from page 651.)

were filtered through the sturdier temperament of the Anglo-Saxon. Elected to the Royal Academy, he later resigned because he deplored the unfairness that excluded many capable men from membership, and for years he held aloof from exhibitions, reappearing only when Sir Coutts Lindsay opened the famous Grosvenor Gallery. His work at once provoked criticism, favorable and otherwise, and the public came in droves to see it. There came to be a Burne-Jones vogue, his disciples came in for sarcasm, and the pictures for ridicule. Mr. Gilbert's lines in "Patience,"

A greenery, yallery, Grosvenor Gallery, foot-in-the-grave young man, were on everybody's tongue.

But he survived the ridicule, and he became the most appreciated English artist of his time. Only within a few weeks "The Mirror of Venus," an important example of his work, sold at public auction in London for $27,850, a substantial evidence of his popularity. The Queen made him a baronet in 1894, and for years he was associated with the house of William Morris, the decorator and printer, making illustrations for some of the books that came from the Kelmscott Press. In France he was thoroughly appreciated, and many of the symbolist painters there have adopted his ideas, though his technique was less appealing to the Frenchmen. He lived quietly and unostentatiously in West Kensington in a house once occupied by Samuel Richardson, and he painted with little regard for aught save his art. Living, he embodied within his art the charms of scholarship, temperament, and poetry; dying, he has left behind many beautiful and intellectually wrought canvases that add lustre and renown to the nineteenth-century output of English art.

ARTHUR HOEBER.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

(Continued from page 635.)

Direct cable communication has been established between the United States and Guantanamo Bay, where our marines and war-ships are now in control of land and water.

Wednesday, June 22.—Two memorable despatches, sent from Playa del Este, the new station on the Cuban coast, midway between Santiago and Guantanamo, reached Washington. The first, addressed to the Secretary of War, was received this afternoon. It reads:

OFF BAIQUIRI, CUBA, June 22.

Landing at Baiquiri this afternoon successful. Very little, if any resistance.

SHAFTER.

The second, to the Secretary of the Navy, came in the evening, and is as follows:

PLAYA DEL ESTE, June 22, 1898—6.50 P. M.

Landing army progressing favorably at Baiquiri. There was very little resistance. The New Orleans, Detroit, Castine, Wasp, and Suwanee shelled vicinity before landing. Made a demonstration at Cabañas to engage attention of the enemy. The Texas engaged west battery for some hours. She had one man killed. Ten submarine mines have been recovered from the channel of Guantanamo. Communication by telegraph has been established at Guantanamo.

SAMPSON.

Baiquiri is an anchorage sixteen miles in a direct line from the city of Santiago de Cuba.

A full report from the surgeon who, as medical officer attached to the Solace, with Admiral Sampson's fleet, speaks with authority of the nature of the wounds received in the four days' fight between our marines at Camp McCalla and the Spaniards, has been forwarded to Surgeon-General Van Reypen of the navy. This report includes a definite statement that the corpses were not mutilated. Severe wounds made by Mauser rifle-balls were supposed to have had another cause; and this misjudgment found its way both into reports from Camp McCalla and into Admiral Sampson's despatch—as recorded in the "Diary" last week.

General Duffield and four battalions of his brigade left Camp Alger for Santiago de Cuba. The forwarding of re-enforcements to Shafter has begun.

Thursday, June 23.—The Monitor Monadnock and the collier Nero sailed for Manila to re-enforce Dewey.

Re-enforcement for Augustin is also well under way, if reliance may be placed upon despatches from Madrid, London, Algiers, and Gibraltar—all of which assert that Admiral Camara's squadron (transports carrying troops, convoyed by war-ships) is proceeding eastward towards Suez. In the Chamber of Deputies at Madrid, Prime-Minister Sagasta declared to-day that this squadron was bound for the Philippines. Our State Department has been informed that the squadron was sighted off the island of Pantellaria.

(Continued on page 654.)

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Campers and Yachtsmen

can have home comforts by providing themselves with our "PERFECTION" AIR MATTRESSES and CUSHIONS. Waterproof—Light—Convenient. Made in any shape or size desired.

Illustrated catalogue sent free on application.

MECHANICAL FABRIC CO., Rubber Goods Department. PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Gales' CYCLES

Strictly up to date. Every practical modern idea used in its construction.

Narrow Tread. Large Tubing. Large Balls and Bearings.

Detachable cranks, patent barrel hubs, requiring but one oiling a season; ball holders in all bearings that are absolutely dust proof. Adjustable handle bars; guaranteed in every particular by an old house of established reputation.

PRICE $50.

GOTHAMS, $25. DUANES, $35.

Schoverling, Daly & Gales,

320 BROADWAY, N. Y.

What Is It?

Why, the most delicious and exquisite

Natural Champagne

Fermented in the bottle. Excels in health-giving properties. Ask your dealer for it, or address

The New Hammondsport Wine Co.,
Hammondsport, N. Y.

To more thoroughly introduce our productions, we will deliver at any point in the United States east of the Rocky Mountains having an express office, one assorted case containing twelve bottles as follows: One pint each of Golden Age, Beef Iron and Wine, and Cognac Process Brandy, and nine quart bottles of assorted Still Wines, making 1 doz. varieties, on receipt of address accompanied with $6.00.

The College Boat Race of '98

THE RESULT REVIEWED BY

WALTER CAMP

IN THE CURRENT ISSUE OF

COLLIER'S WEEKLY

Other articles to follow: The College Man in War.—Track Athletics of '98.—The College Baseball Season of '98.

At all News-stands. Price 10 cents.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE

Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent

To the Army and Navy

AND ALL WHOM IT MAY CONCERN

AN EXTRACT.—"The first night I had slept a little from sheer exhaustion. "This next was terrible. I vomited incessantly; I was chilled to the bone, and could "not warm myself. I suffered horrible pains in the head and throughout my whole "body. Next day, of course, I was a wreck. They told me I had been delirious half "the night. I remember nothing of the day; but next night I got a couple of hours' "sleep, and was rather better in consequence. But vomiting went on steadily, and "the fourth night I was again delirious. The next day I was as bad as ever; but, "thanks to a good dose of Beecham's Pills, I had an excellent night, and I truly be-"lieve that they saved my life. I knew well where I picked up this fever—in the "marshes of Mwenzo, and near Kituta—and the killing thing was being unable to "stop to cure it; the ten days on the lake especially, often without food for twenty-"four hours, nearly finished me. I felt certain at the time that I was done for; and I "very nearly was."

FROM "THREE YEARS IN SAVAGE AFRICA," by LIONEL DECLE (Methuen & Co.). Mr. Lionel Decle covered a distance of over 7000 miles at one stretch, between Cape Town on the South and Mombassa on the East Coast of Africa. It is worth noting that this "unique journey" would probably have been cut short, and, to quote the introduction by Mr. H. M STANLEY, M.P., "its vivid record" would never have been penned ha not Mr. Lionel Decle provided himself with a supply of Beecham's Pills.

Every soldier and marine ordered for Cuba or the Philippines shou include Beecham's Pills in his outfit. No stronger testimony t the value of these pills in a tropical, fever-breeding climate coul possibly be given than that of Mr. Decle above quoted. . . . Beecham's Pills do wonderful service in all Bilious and Nervous Di orders, such as weak stomach, impaired digestion, torpid liver, sic headache, etc. . . . . .

Beecham's Pills are painless and effectual. They are daintily made and covered with a taste soluble coating. "Worth a guinea a box."—Price only 25 cents. For sale by all druggist mailed on receipt of 25 cts. in stamps by B. F. Allen Co., 365 Canal Street, New York.

Eau de Cologne No. 4711

The most pungent, exhilarating and refreshing Perfume. Used by persons of refinement. Imported into America for three-quarters of a Century. Be sure to get "No. 4711," which is the standard in all civilized countries.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AT NEW LONDON AGAIN.

WITH A GLIMPSE INTO THE FUTURE OF COLLEGE BOATING.

BY JOHN CORBIN.

FEW boat-races have owed less to fortune than that of 1898 at New London. Since the last race, at Poughkeepsie, we had discovered that, however gallant the navies of our colleges, our fighting navy is capable of putting up contests which are no less sportsmanlike and are much more engrossing. The statement causes a shock to university pride, but it is well to come out with it honestly. Even in the obsolete whaling-town at the mouth of the American Thames the effects of warfare were manifest. The harbor, it seems, is thoroughly mined, and there was an official whose duty it was to anchor collegiate yachts beyond the sphere of the explosives. The nutmeg towns-people whispered that he got fifty dollars a day for the job; and he was a greater man in consequence than the chairman of the New London Board of Trade, though not as great as the hotel-keepers who charged ten dollars a day for rooms. Because of these mines, and because of the state of war that occasioned them, the fleet of yachts was a mere handful, and grave fears were expressed for the success of the day. We had counted without our hosts. Three great universities, fountains of eternal youths, poured their streams into that quiet corner of Connecticut. The oldest living graduate, bathing in those streams, would have felt the weight of responsibility slipping from his shoulders. To be on the scene of so many conflicts, in the pleasant old town at the mouth of our Thames, after years of exile at Poughkeepsie, was like an excursion to the land of one's youth. Be it known that the "Pequot Sewer" is still the cup that cheers. At least, the undergraduates cheered. And when at midnight the graduates conveyed their years and dignity to those same old Pequot bedrooms, the cheering kept on and banished sleep, or made it tardy in coming. That was not the worst of it. Morning had scarcely dawned when the eternal youths bubbled forth with vigor unimpaired. A pair of blinds was banged open, and the graduates were aroused by a raucous cry of "Wake up, fellows, wake up! Here's a bright new day that hasn't been touched yet!"

It was a bright new day, but its promise was false. A wreck on the railroad delayed the special trains from New York, and, to say nothing of the agony of belated graduates from New York, the event proved an irremediable blow to the industrious reporter who had already despatched a "picturesque story" of their arrival on time. The lateness of the trains delayed the race until a thunder-storm arrived; and—to say nothing of a drenched observation train, the tragedy of ruined costumes, and the fidgeting of anxious oarsmen—the industrious reporter on the press-boat was unable to get ashore to arrest his picturesque story of a fair day and the crews well off. At seven o'clock, when the conditions were perfect except for a spatter of rain, the race could not be rowed because the buoys marking the course had been blown over, and darkness fell before they could be righted. For the first time in the memory of the oldest living graduate, the race was postponed a day.

Yet the fountain of eternal youths bubbled on. Their gayety was caught up even by the brand-new waiters at the brand-new Mohican Hotel. "Two table-d'hôte diners for t'ree dollairs," they repeated glibly to every new diner; "and you can have all you get, eef you can eat eet." This was of course a badly twisted version of the gibe of some eternal youth, for the main question was whether you could get it. At least, the few who were able to get it seemed able to eat it. That night at the Crocker House bar the eternal youths became a torrent. The Yale men in the Connecticut Naval Reserve brought on a party of their comrades from New Haven, and the fighting navy cheered the navy of peace. There were also what on a first glance you would have thought the crew of a New London whaler—sou'-westers and tarpaulings scattered everywhere. A second glance revealed duck trousers beneath the tarpauling greatcoat, or a straw hat with brilliant hat-band above it, and between the sou'wester jacket and hat a pair of academic eye-glasses and a cigarette. The drenched masses from the observation train, after exhausting the umbrellas of the town, had sacked the shops of the nautical outfitters on Bank Street. The mingling of college yells was as bewildering as the mingling of costumes. A cheer that began as a good straight frog chorus from New Haven would end up with a long C-o-r-n-e-l-l; and three long Harvards would end with a mighty Y-a-l-e. A solitary Princeton man, who gave a tiger for old Nassau all by himself in a corner, was soon surrounded by a throng of diverse partisans, who mixed a Princeton cheer with Cornell, Yale, and Harvard. Finally a Yale football guard, in a spasm of magnanimity, commanded "Nine long Harvards, with nothing t'hell at the end but Harvard." That finished things for the ancient graduates, and they slunk away from the students that cheered, with a very sober realization of their antiquity. They had suspected all along that New London was a better place to go to than Poughkeepsie, but they had not really known it until they saw how those eternal youths touched a new day in all the old resorts, in spite of its false promise of brightness.

The story of the race is sufficiently plain in the official times:

| | Cornell. | Yale. | Harvard. |
|---|---|---|---|
| One-half mile | 2.43 | 2.44 | 2.48 |
| One mile | 5.39 | 5.45 | 5.54 |
| One and one-half miles | 8.41 | 8.45 | 9.01 |
| Two miles | 11.37 | 11.45 | 12.02 |
| Two and one-half miles | 14.43 | 14.55 | 15.15 |
| Three miles | 17.43 | 17.59 | 18.23 |
| Three and one-half miles | 20.32 | 20.42 | 21.12 |
| Four miles | 23.48 | 24.02 | 24.35 |

Harvard was behind at the start, and in spite of one or two attempts to rally, gradually lost ground. Her position, so far as the stream is concerned, was the best of the three; but it was obvious from the press-boat that she was handicapped by the wind and water, both of which she felt most severely, especially in the third mile. The eight stopped rowing before the finish, some ten lengths behind Yale, and drifted over the line. The position of the crew at the finish is a fair index of its performance. The course rowed was a series of arabesques, and the coxswain lost badly at the stakes marking the turns. The oarsmanship was by no means finished, and the rowing lacked power. Of course there are explanations. Kernan, at No. 2, had been substituted in the last fortnight of practice, and never really got together with the rest. And the material, though carefully sifted from the class crews, was far beneath the average of previous years. Before the race Mr. Lehmann told me that all the men in the boat, except Perkins, who was too heavy, were ideal bow oars. After the race I think he might have omitted the "ideal."

The work of the Yale crew would, in any previous year at New London, have been called superb. The only thing the matter with it was that it was matched against rowing in which the most expert critic could scarcely find a fault. Its position between Harvard and Cornell was the second choice, so far as the stream was concerned, and the heavy wind and rough water were fitted to a crew averaging 170 pounds, and were precisely what Yale men had been hoping for. It rowed the stroke it had been taught, rowed it well, and with the courage in adversity which has always characterized Yale teams; and the strength and physical condition of the crew were such that, with the exception of bow, whose head dropped for a moment on his oar after the finish, none of the men showed signs of distress. If they were inferior to Cornell in oarsmanship, the difference was perceptible, for the most part, only to old oarsmen. The leading crews rowed thirty-two strokes to the minute—and Harvard too, for that matter—except on a spurt, when the stroke went up a peg or two. As Yale and Cornell rowed almost equally well, the difference between the two crews was probably in the power that went into each stroke. It was merely a matter of vitality. The Yale men, five of whom were from the Freshmen crew of last season, averaged nineteen and five-eighths years old—two years less than Cornell. They had not the same nervous energy to put into the stroke, and they were not so well able to stand the strain of the race. The defect is one that time may remedy, and all the best men in the boat have a year or two more to row, whereas four of the Cornell men are to graduate this year, and three of them next.

The Cornell crew had third choice of positions, and was forced to begin the race in shallow water. According to an interview published in a New York newspaper, the crew considered that this cost it the equivalent of several boat-lengths. Yet from the press-boat it was manifest that in both wind and water it had a great advantage, and in view of the fact that the men averaged nine and a half pounds less than Yale, this advantage must have made considerable difference. The Harvard crew, which was of about the same weight as Cornell, must have suffered far more from the weather conditions than it gained from its first choice of course. Yet no permutation of positions could have affected the order in which the crews finished, or detracted from the splendid achievement of the Cornell crew. Old oarsmen from Yale and from Harvard spoke with unqualified praise, and an old Oxford oarsmen told me that, so far as he could see, there was no single fault to find. Both in form and in dash the race was such as can be rowed only by men who have pulled together two and three years, who are at one with their coach, and who are inspired by loyalty and by love of their alma mater. There is no reason why such a crew, properly acclimatized, should not bring home the Grand Challenge Cup from Henley.

A notable feature of this very notable race is the fact that to accommodate three crews the old straightaway course was abandoned for a wider course which follows the bending of the ship channel. The straightaway course was narrow even for two crews, and in the very ancient days when Harvard used to get the lion's share of victory the Yale crew attributed defeat to the fact that it had been forced to row in the eel-grass of the shallows. On such occasions the leader of the Harvard Glee Club used to ask his men why the Harvard crew never got into the eel-grass, and they answered, in chorus, "There's only room for one!"—a refrain which was used with equal success to explain why the New Haven girls had only one foot in the grave. Those were rude times, unchivalrous and ungallant. It was to be hoped that the broad new course would obliterate the memory of them; but I tremble to think what might happen if an ambitious crew were beaten in the western path.

Perhaps the most interesting development of the season's rowing was with regard to the stroke. In times past the newspapers have been filled with criticisms and comparisons of various styles, crammed full of technical terms and considerations that filled a reader's soul with admiration. A few days of reporting at New London made me suspect that the sagacious critics had really done little more than rehash a mess of ill-assorted phrases, which it does credit to any man's intelligence not to understand. In the present season, at any rate, such discussions have little or no value. Mr. Cook, the Yale coach, told me that all three crews were rowing the same stroke. There had been a great deal of talk, he said, about an American stroke and an English stroke, and Cornell's victory last year was hailed as a product of home industry; but, in point of fact, the Cornell stroke differed only in minor details from the traditional Yale stroke, which was a close adaptation of the stroke Mr. Cook had observed, in the late seventies, during a study of English boating. The main differences between the English stroke and that rowed by Cornell and Yale were due to the different rigging of American shells—seats that all slide above the keelson instead of alternately on the opposite side of the boat from the outriggers, and swivel oarlocks instead of stationary thole pins. This stroke Cornell had learned at Henley and from watching the Yale crews. Mr. Cook was at one time inclined toward the traditional Courtney stroke, with its rapid leg-drive and absence of body-swing; but he soon returned to his first love. It is to be noted that in proportion as Mr. Courtney slowed down his time and lengthened the swing, the record time of his crews improved. Mr. Courtney stated to me that, so far as he had been able, he had kept this year's crew to the last year's stroke, and he makes no claim of originating its essential principles. Mr. Lehmann said that there were really only two ways to row, a good way and a bad way, and that the crews at New London were all rowing the good way. In a word, the intercourse between America and England during the last twenty-odd years has convinced our leading oarsmen that the principles of the English stroke are the correct ones, and they are agreed that it is best to stick to the English principles as far as the rigging of our boats will allow. The question of rigging, finally, I referred to Mr. Chase Mellen, who rowed four years on the excellent Brasenose crew at Oxford, and has since rowed, coached, and observed a decade or more in America. In his opinion, the differences in rigging were immaterial, so long as a crew kept to the long leg-drive and the long body-swing. The English stroke, whether adopted as at Harvard or adapted as at Cornell and Yale, is now generally approved, and is not likely soon to be forgotten. Certain variations, it is true, were to be observed in the Cornell boat. The men swung farther back than last year, and their recover began with more of a jerk than is usual in England, but I could not find that any one qualified to judge thought these features more than variations depending on the individuality of the coach. Mr. Courtney told me that he had not been aware of the fact that the stroke had varied from its last year's form until the fact was pointed out by returning graduates.

With the happy establishment of a uniform style at New London, there bid fair to be radical changes in the personnel of the coaches, at least at Yale and Harvard. During Mr. Cook's long and very successful leadership a school of young oarsmen has grown up that is more closely in sympathy with present undergraduate aims and intentions. For some years past there has been an effort to give these men a controlling voice in crew management. This year, I understand, the movement is reaching a head, and it is not unlikely that next spring will see a new man in charge of the crew. As far as I could make out, the choice is likely to lie between Mr. Alfred Cowles, of Chicago, and Dr. J. A. Hartwell, of New York. Dr. Hartwell is widely known as a football-player and a crew captain, and is, besides, a scholar of mark. If he undertakes the coaching, as Yale men think the more likely, the crew will have a man of strong personal popularity and strong power of leadership; and there is every reason to think that he will preserve all that is best in Yale rowing traditions.

At Harvard it is understood that Mr. Lehmann will not return. During his stay of two years, however, he has taught or has been the means of teaching scores of oarsmen the principles of good rowing, and there should be a number of men capable of carrying on his task. Mr. J. J. Storrow, captain of the winning crew of '85, has been his constant aide, and is not unlikely to be given command next year. It seems probable that he will be assisted by Mr. E. C. Storrow, '89, who had charge of this year's Freshman crew, and succeeded so well that his men, in spite of a recent fit of tonsillitis that visited the entire crew, came in only half a length behind the Yale, and well ahead of the Cornell Freshmen. In the past the vice of Harvard oarsmanship has been the absence of a settled style. An old oar who had rowed excellently in four defeated crews lately told me that he had learned four different strokes. Now that there is but one style at New London, and that a good one, a similar lack of consistency would be little short of maniacal. Whether Harvard accepts Lehmann's lieutenants, and whether she adheres to the English rigging, are matters of indifference compared with the fact that a stroke has been established which there is every reason to stick to. In spite of two years of sore defeat, Harvard men have seldom had more reason to hope the crews in the future will give a good account of the university.

The plans of Cornell for another year are in doubt only as regards the question of whether she will compete at New London. From her own point of view there are excellent reasons why she should not. In order to compete with Yale and Harvard at their natural and traditional meeting-place, she has to make a tedious and expensive journey—a journey which in time and in money is prohibitive to a vast majority of undergraduates. Then, too, in order to meet neighboring universities, that in other sports than rowing and in geographical position are her natural rivals, she has to row two hard races under the most trying circumstances. It is not strange that she should have been the champion of an American Henley at Poughkeepsie or at Saratoga; and the objection raised against the western course at New London has a smack of the old preference for a meeting in New York State.

That Yale and Harvard will consent to row again at Poughkeepsie or at Saratoga seems far from likely. The journey is almost as trying as that from Ithaca to New London, and the place lacks all the charm of tradition and atmosphere that cluster about the historic course. If the oarsmen I talked with at the recent race are at all representative of the feeling of their universities, the question of breaking with Cornell is merely a question of expediency. Each college seemed actually more eager that Cornell should be beaten than that its own boat should win. Apparently it was thought that a victory would make it easier to say good-by to the third crew.

The propriety of this feeling is open to question. The point at stake is not whether Cornell is a worthy opponent—of that there has been no doubt for years. It is whether the triple arrangement at New London is for the best interests of sportsmanship at Yale, Harvard, and Cornell. If it is not, and the best sense of all three universities seems to be that it is not, it is far better for Yale and Harvard to end relationships, now that Cornell has reached a top notch in her fortunes, than to take advantage of the failure of an off year. It seems more manly to say, You have shown yourself better in every race, and we covet the glory of a possible victory, but we have found that we care more about each other, and wish to

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google eliminate every element that detracts from the spirit of our natural and traditional rivalry.

The experience of the past decade has shown that no one college is physically able to give its best dates to the worthiest opponents in all contests, and at the same time meet its traditional and natural rivals on even terms. For half a dozen years past the wisest advisers at both Yale and Harvard have favored a dual league. The trend of athletic development of late has made the dual league a virtual fact. Next fall, for the first time, Harvard is to be given the advantage over Princeton in the football dates, and it is possible that the athletic team will withdraw from the inter-collegiate games. It is not to be assumed that the parties to a dual league are to hold aloof from other colleges. The case is rather that games with other colleges are to be regarded as incidental and in a measure preparatory to the final game. A college will play all comers, so far as it is possible to do so without endangering the contest with a natural rival. In the same way, Oxford and Cambridge have always met all possible teams in cricket and the two games of football—many of them teams of distinct superiority—and have yet made such matches tributary to the inter-'varsity match.

This tendency toward concentrating athletic interests is by no means incompatible with the adoption of the Henley idea. At Poughkeepsie or Saratoga the thing that makes Henley Henley is physically impossible for most of the colleges that are expected to compete there. From Yale or Harvard the journey is expensive in both time and money; and once there, it is necessary to stay or to go back for good. In England it is possible to run up daily from London or Oxford, and, at a pinch, from Cambridge, and yet see all the races. For three or four pounds an English undergraduate can be at all three days of Henley and share all its pleasures. The first requisite for a regatta like Henley is that it shall draw its support from a small area. At Harvard and at Yale a movement is afoot that seems likely to end in augmenting the programme of races at New London, so that there will be several races a day during several days. At both colleges the class crews are becoming more and more prominent, and at both there are boat clubs that are putting forth lay crews of increasing excellence. Under Mr. Lehmann's influence the Weld Boat Club of Harvard has become very active, and has won notable races against outside boat clubs. A few years more of development and a slight rearrangement of fixtures will give scope to a number of interesting races at New London appealing to the colleges, schools, and clubs of New England. A similar regatta might be held in any other geographical section of the country—for instance, at Poughkeepsie, Saratoga, Detroit, or on the Mississippi.

Any one who is inclined to commiserate with Mr. Lehmann on the result of his mission would do well to consider what he has accomplished for Harvard, and through Harvard for American boating, along the lines of general development. He found a university that had passed only a step beyond the conditions that have dominated boating in all American universities. The aquatic interest existed for the purpose of getting out winning crews; all races were aimed solely at this result, and the so-called sport of boating was about as much fun as galley slavery. Taking advantage of the Weld Boat Club and the class races, he broadened and developed boating as a sport, and by doing so established a school for the teaching of the true principles of rowing. In a paper printed a few months ago in these pages I described the long and delightful course of the Oxonian who makes his way to a 'varsity boat, and pointed out how perfectly the system was adapted to maintaining and perfecting oarsmanship. Such a system Mr. Lehmann has started at Harvard. Its full development cannot be reached until the social life of the place is divided into definite units, as in the English colleges, but it is a long stride in advance that the notion of it has become fixed. It will be interesting to watch the development of the ideas he has bequeathed to us. It should be the duty of some graduate, not too old, to burst open his blinds on the morning of the next boat-race, and wake up the undergraduates with the tidings that a bright new day has dawned at New London that has not yet been touched.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

(Continued from page 652.)

Friday, June 24.—The Cortes was dissolved by decree of the Queen-Regent. Martial law was proclaimed in Madrid. It is asserted that the Sagasta cabinet will resign to make way for a new government which will not be so positively committed to the policy of continuing the war.

"In pushing out to occupy a good position near Sevilla to wait and intrench until supplies and artillery could be landed, the Fourteenth [should read First] and Tenth Cavalry and Wood's regiment had a skirmish. The enemy was driven from his position, and General Wheeler reports he now occupies the ground." . . . . "Further news from General Wheeler places our loss in this morning's firing at about ten killed and forty wounded." . . . . "The Spaniards occupied a very strong and intrenched position on a high hill. The firing lasted about an hour, and the enemy was driven from his position, which is now occupied by our troops, about a mile and a half from Sevilla. The enemy has retired toward Santiago de Cuba." General Shafter's despatches to the War Department, from which the foregoing sentences are taken, refer to an engagement that will always be remembered, not only as the first serious action after the landing of our army of invasion, but also because our dismounted cavalry, in a most difficult position and after severe losses, gave proof of superb fighting quality by their determined and ultimately victorious advance. Briefly told, the story is that the enemy, having withdrawn from the immediate neighborhood of Baiquiri when our forces landed there, retreated towards Santiago; but at a point near Sevilla, which lies southeast of Santiago, two thousand Spaniards took up a strong position to bar the way. When news of this stand was brought by our scouts, General Young's brigade marched directly to the attack, while the dismounted "Rough Riders," under Colonel Wood and Lieutenant-Colonel Roosevelt, took another route to the same point. The latter walked into an ambush in a narrow trail that led upward between hill-sides covered with brush. This brush, jungle, chaparral—whatever word seems densest—hid the enemy. From three sides at once a heavy fire at short range was opened upon our men. Sergeant Hamilton Fish was the first American soldier to fall; soon afterward Captain A. K. Capron was mortally wounded. A perfect list of our losses cannot be made at this time, and the number of men slain in this encounter on the Spanish side is not known. Fierce and yet accurate firing by this extraordinary regiment of cowboys and clubmen, dead-shots in the main, directed by a colonel who at that particular moment could suggest, "Don't swear, or you'll catch no fish," proved to be at least sufficient to hold their terribly exposed position until reenforcements came up; then a dash carried hills, thickets, and an iron building in which the Spaniards had fortified themselves. And so General Shafter, from headquarters on the Segurança, is able to say in his despatch that "General Wheeler [who commands on shore] reports he now occupies the ground."

A DIGEST OF THE WAR REVENUE BILL.

The Act "To provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," makes the following provisions:

The tax on beer manufactured or sold or stored in warehouses, or removed for consumption or sale, within the United States, is increased from one dollar to two dollars on every barrel containing not more than thirty-one gallons, and at a like rate for fractional parts of a barrel.

A discount of 7½ per cent. is to be allowed by collectors to brewers on sales of stamps.

SPECIAL TAXES.

| | |
|---|---|
| Bankers: with capital not exceeding $25,000 | $ 50.00 |
| Same: with capital above $25,000, for each additional $1000 | 2.00 |
| (Note.—Saving-banks with no capital stock are exempted.) | |
| Brokers | 50.00 |
| Pawnbrokers | 20.00 |
| Commercial brokers | 20.00 |
| Custom-house brokers | 10.00 |
| Proprietors of places of amusement in places of more than 25,000 population | 100.00 |
| Circuses | 100.00 |
| Proprietors or agents of all other shows | 10.00 |
| (Note.—Tax must be paid once in every State or Territory where exhibitions are held.) | |
| Bowling-alleys and billiard-rooms—each alley or table | 5.00 |
| Tobacco, Cigars, Cigarettes, and Snuff. | |
| All tobacco and snuff, per pound | .12 |
| Cigars and cigarettes weighing more than three pounds per thousand, per 1000 | 3.60 |
| Cigars weighing not more than three pounds per thousand, per 1000 | 1.00 |
| Cigarettes weighing not more than three pounds per thousand, per 1000 | 1.50 |
| Dealers in leaf tobacco and tobacco: annual sales not exceeding 50,000 lbs. | 6.00 |
| Same: annual sales exceeding 50,000 and not more than 100,000 lbs. | 12.00 |
| Same: annual sales exceeding 100,000 lbs. | 24.00 |
| Manufacturers of tobacco: annual sales not exceeding 50,000 lbs. | 6.00 |
| Same: annual sales exceeding 50,000 and not exceeding 100,000 lbs. | 12.00 |
| Same: annual sales exceeding 100,000 lbs. | 24.00 |
| Manufacturers of cigars: annual sales not exceeding 100,000 cigars | 6.00 |
| Same: annual sales exceeding 100,000 but not 200,000 cigars | 12.00 |
| Same: annual sales exceeding 200,000 cigars | 24.00 |

(Note.—Any person liable to these taxes who shall not have paid them shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall pay a fine of not more than $500, or be imprisoned not more than six months, or both, at the discretion of the court.)

ADHESIVE STAMPS.

After the 1st of July, 1898, there shall be paid the following stamp taxes. The penalty for not paying them shall be a fine of not more than $100, and the unstamped instruments shall not be competent evidence in any court. Proper provisions are made against forgery and evasion of the law, while a penalty is provided for non-cancellation of the stamps. Public bonds, debentures, and certificates of indebtedness are exempted from the payment of the tax.

This exemption includes stocks and bonds issued by co-operative building and loan associations, capital stock not exceeding $10,000, and building and loan associations making loans only to their members.

Foreign bonds are required to pay the same taxes as domestic bonds when sold in the United States.

SCHEDULE A.

| | |
|---|---|
| Bonds, debentures, or certificates of indebtedness issued after the first day of July, 1898, by any association, company, or corporation, on each $100 of face value or fraction thereof | .05 |
| And on each original issue of certificates of stock, on each $100 of face value, or fraction thereof | .05 |
| On all sales, or agreements to sell, or memoranda of sales, or deliveries or transfers of shares or certificates of stock, on each $100 or fraction thereof | .02 |
| On each sale, agreement of sale, or agreement to sell any products or merchandise at any exchange or board of trade, or other similar place, either for present or future delivery, for each $100 in value of said sale, or agreement of sale, or agreement to sell | .01 |
| And for each additional $100, or fractional part thereof in excess of $100 | .01 |
| On checks, drafts, or certificates of deposit not drawing interest, or order for the payment of any sum of money drawn upon or issued by any bank, trust company, or any person or persons, companies, or corporations, at sight or on demand | .02 |
| Inland bills of exchange, drafts, or certificates of deposit drawing interest, or order for the payment of any sum of money otherwise than at sight or on demand, or any promissory note, except bank-notes issued for circulation, and for each renewal of the same, for a sum not exceeding $100 | .02 |
| And for each additional $100, or fractional part thereof in excess of $100 | .02 |
| (Note.—This applies to domestic money-orders issued by the United States.) | |
| Foreign bills of exchange and letters of credit, including orders issued by express or other companies, drawn in but payable out of the United States, not exceeding $100 | .04 |
| And for each $100, or fractional part thereof in excess of $100 | .04 |
| If drawn in sets of two or more, for every bill of each set not exceeding $100 | .02 |
| And for each $100, or fractional part thereof in excess of $100 | .02 |
| Bills of lading or receipts, other than charter party, for merchandise to be exported from the United States to any foreign port | .10 |
| Common carriers must issue bills of lading for goods shipped to the consignor or his agent, and on the original and each duplicate of these | .01 |
| (Note.—But one bill of lading shall be required on bundles or packages of newspapers when enclosed in one general bundle at the time of shipment. Failure to issue these bills of lading entails a penalty of $50 on carrier for each offence.) | |
| Telephone messages for which a charge of fifteen cents or more is imposed | .1 |
| Telegraphic despatches | .1 |
| (Note.—Tax on telephone and telegraphic messages is not to be levied on messages dealing with the business of the telephone or telegraph company or railroad company sending them.) | |
| Indemnity bonds | |
| Certificates of profits, or any certificate or memorandum showing an interest in the property or accumulations of any association, and all transfers thereof, on each $100 of value or fractional part thereof | |
| Certificates of damage issued by port-wardens, etc. | |
| Certificates of any legal description not otherwise specified | |
| Charter party, vessel not exceeding 300 tons | 3. |
| Same, vessel exceeding 300 and not exceeding 600 tons | 5. |
| Same, vessel exceeding 600 tons | 10. |
| Broker's contract or memorandum of sale | |
| Conveyances of real estate, consideration value exceeding $100 and less than $500 | |
| For each additional $500 or fractional part thereof | |
| Custom-house entry of goods, not exceeding $100 in value | |
| Same, exceeding $100 and not exceeding $500 | |
| Same, exceeding $500 | 1. |
| Entry for withdrawal of any merchandise in custom-house bonded warehouses | |
| Life-insurance policies: each $100 or fractional part thereof of amount insured | |
| Provided, that on insurance policies issued on the industrial or weekly payment plan, of the amount of the first weekly premium | .40 per ce |
| (Note.—Provisions do not apply to fraternal or beneficiary societies or orders, or farmers' purely local co-operative companies or associations, or employés' relief associations, operated on the lodge system, local co-operation plan, organized and conducted solely by the members thereof for the benefit of themselves, and not for profit.) | |
| Marine, inland, and fire insurance: on each dollar or fractional part thereof | ½ of 1 per ce |
| (Note.—Purely co-operative or mutual fire-insurance companies exempted.) | |
| Casualty, fidelity, and guaranty insurance: upon premium charged on each dollar or fractional part thereof | ½ of 1 per ce |
| Leases, not exceeding one year | |
| Same, exceeding one year but not three | |
| Same, exceeding three years | 1. |
| Custom-house manifests of entry or clearance, tonnage of vessel not exceeding 300 tons | 1. |
| Same, exceeding 300 and not exceeding 600 tons | 3. |
| Same, exceeding 600 tons | 5. |
| Real estate and personal mortgages or pledges for securing payment of any definite or certain sum, also conveyances in trust intended only as security, exceeding $1000 and not exceeding $1500 | |
| For each $500 or fractional part thereof in excess of $1500 | |
| Passage tickets to foreign ports, costing not exceeding $30 | 1. |
| Same, costing more than $30 and not exceeding $60 | 3. |
| Same, costing more than $60 | 5. |
| Power of attorney for voting at elections of incorporated companies, other than religious, charitable, or literary societies, or public cemeteries | |
| Power to sell or rent real estate, to sell or transfer stock, bonds, scrip, or to collect dividends or interest thereon, or to perform any and all other acts not above specified | |
| Protest | |
| Warehouse receipts | |

SCHEDULE B.

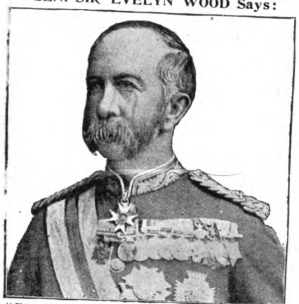
| | |
|---|---|
| Medicinal proprietary articles and preparations: each packet, box, bottle, pot, vial, or other enclosure, with its contents, selling at retail, | |
| For 5 cents | ½ of 1 ce |
| Above 5 cents and less than 10 | ¾ of 1 ce |
| " 10 cents and less than 15 | ⅞ of 1 ce |
| " 15 cents and less than 25 | ⅛ of 1 ce |
| For each additional 25 cents of the retail price or value, or fractional part thereof in excess of 25 cents | ⅛ of 1 ce |
| Druggists' prescriptions are not taxable. | |
| Perfumery and cosmetics, and other similar articles: same taxes as proprietary articles. | |
| Chewing-gum or substitutes: each box, etc., value not more than $1 at retail | |
| Above $1, for each additional dollar or fractional part thereof | |
| Sparkling or other wines bottled for sale: on each bottle containing one pint or less | |
| On each bottle containing more than one pint | |

EXCISE TAXES ON THOSE ENGAGED IN REFINING PETROLEUM AND SUGAR.

| | |
|---|---|
| On every person engaged in refining petroleum or sugar, or owning or controlling any pipe-line for transporting oil or other products, gross annual receipts exceeding $250,000, on the gross receipts of such persons, etc., exceeding $250,000 | ⅛ of 1 per ce |
| (Note.—Penalty: not less than $1000 and not exceeding $10,000 each failure or refusal to make return, and for each and every false or fraudulent return.) | |
| On every seat sold in palace or parlor cars, and every berth sold in sleeping-cars | |

LEGACIES AND DISTRIBUTIVE SHARES OF PERSONAL PROPERTY.

| | |
|---|---|
| Amount exceeding $10,000 and not exceeding $25,000, passing either by will or by law, or transferred by deed, grant, bargain, sale, or gift, to take effect after the death of the grantor or bargainor, to any person or persons, in trust or otherwise, the following taxes: | |
| Lineal issue or lineal ancestor, or brother or sister of decedent, on each and every $100 of value | 1. |
| Descendants of brothers and sisters, on every $100 | 1. |
| Brother or sister of father or mother, or descendant of brother or sister of father or mother of deceased, on every $100 | 3. |
| Brother or sister of grandfather or grandmother, or descendant of brother or sister of grandfather or grandmother, on every $100 | 4. |
| Persons in other degrees of collateral consanguinity, or a stranger in blood, on every $100 | 5. |
| On property above $25,000 and not above $100,000, the above rates to be multiplied by one and one-half. | |
| Exceeding $100,000 but not exceeding $500,000, the above rates to be multiplied by two. | |
| Exceeding $500,000, and not exceeding $1,000,000, the rates to be multiplied by two and one-half. | |
| Exceeding $1,000,000, the rates to be multiplied by three. | |
| The tax or duty shall be a lien or charge on property for twenty years, or until the same shall be within that period fully paid to and discharged by the United States. | |
| Mixed Flour.—Every person, etc., engaged in making, packing, or repacking mixed flour, per annum | 1 |
| Tea.—Duty per pound | |
| (Note.—Internal-revenue collectors are to sell stamps in quantities of not less than $100, face value, with a discount of one per cent. except as otherwise provided in this act.) | |



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NEVER HAS ANYTHING BEEN SO HIGHLY AND SO JUSTLY PRAISED AS

VIN MARIANI

MARIANI WINE, the FAMOUS TONIC for BODY, NERVES and BRAIN.

GEN. SIR EVELYN WOOD Says:

"Regarding the infantry marching in the recent manœuvres, it was the best seen during my command at Aldershot. Many officers availed themselves of the tonic and reconstituent properties of the Mariani Wine, the most certain as well as the most palatable method of inducing resistance to fatigue."
From "The London Sketch."

MAX O'RELL,
The Renowned Writer and Lecturer, Writes:

Your Vin Mariani is positively marvellous; one glass put me on my feet; one bottle made a new man of me.
Yours gratefully, MAX O'RELL.

ALL DRUGGISTS.
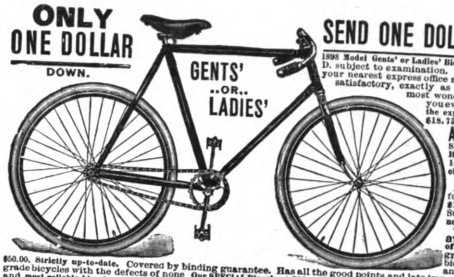
PARIS: 41 Boulevard Haussman. LONDON: 83 Mortimer Street.

MARIANI WINE is invaluable at this season of the year, when, owing to trying climatic conditions, the system is especially susceptible to attacks of debility and prostration.

VIN MARIANI (MARIANI WINE) has stood the test of thirty-five years' trial. It has written endorsements from more than 8000 American physicians, in addition to having received cordial recommendations from royalty, princes of the Church and of the State, and many notable personages.

MARIANI WINE is a tonic prepared upon careful scientific principles. It contains absolutely no injurious properties. It gives power to the brain, strength to the entire nervous system, firmness and elasticity to the muscles, and richness to the blood. It has been aptly described as a promoter of good health and longevity.



MARIANI WINE is specially indicated for General Debility, Weakness from whatever causes, Overwork, Profound Depression and Exhaustion, Throat and Lung Diseases, Consumption, Malaria and La Grippe.

MARIANI WINE is an adjuvant in convalescence and a powerful rejuvenator. For Overworked Men, Delicate Women, Sickly Children it Works Wonders. Taken with cracked ice, it relieves Summer Prostration quickly and effectually. It soothes, strengthens and sustains the system.

To those who will kindly write to MARIANI & CO., 52 West 15th Street, New York City, will be sent, free, book containing portraits with endorsements of Emperors, Empress, Princes, Cardinals, Archbishops and other interesting matter.

AVOID SUBSTITUTIONS.
MONTREAL: 28-30 Hospital Street.

---

SEND ONE DOLLAR and we will send you this OUR SPECIAL HIGH GRADE 1898 Model Gents' or Ladies' Bicycle by express C. O. D. subject to examination. You can examine it at your nearest express office and if found perfectly satisfactory, exactly as represented and the most wonderful Bicycle Bargain you ever saw or heard of, pay the express agent the balance, $18.75 and express charges.

At $19.75 We shall sell 3000 SPECIAL regular $50.00 High-Grade, strictly up-to-date, 1898 Model Bicycles in either Gents' or Ladies.'

We Have Bicycles for 1898 at $13.95, $19.75 and $22.50. Such values as were never offered before.

THIS SPECIAL WHEEL at $19.75 is a wonder of value, strictly high-grade and equal to any bicycle you can buy anywhere at $50.00 to $50.00. Strictly up-to-date. Covered by binding guarantee. Has all the good points and late improvements of all high-grade bicycles with the defects of none. Our SPECIAL Bicycle at $19.75 is made by one of the largest, oldest, best known and most reliable bicycle makers in America. The identical name bicycle as is sold everywhere under their special name and name plate at $40.00 to $50.00, never less. The name of the maker is a household word among bicycle riders. You will recognize the bicycle the moment you see it as the same high-grade bicycle sold everywhere at $40.00 and upwards. In offering 3,000 at the unheard of price of $19.75, we are pledged not to use the maker's name or name plate.

DESCRIPTION. OUR SPECIAL 1898 Bicycle now offered at $19.75 is made from the very best material throughout, only first-class mechanics are employed and the finish is such as can be found only in the highest grade wheels. FRAME is 24 inches deep, true diamond, (Ladies' is 22 inches, curve shape with two center braces) 1¼-inch highest grade imported Shelby seamless tubing. FORK CROWN, drop forged, highly polished and finished and nickel-plated. HANDLE-BARS, very latest and best wood or nickel, up or down curve or ram's horn. WHEELS, highest grade, 28-inch. SPOKES, highest-grade, 14-15 swaged. HUBS, latest large tubular, turned from bar steel. RIMS, highest grade non-warpable wood. TIRES, our own special guaranteed strictly high-grade single tube pneumatic, complete with pump and repair kit. CRANKS, highest grade forging, 6½-inch throw, highly nickel-plated. PEDALS, handsomest and best rat trap. BEARINGS, highest grade forging, ⅝-inch throw, highly nickel-finest forgings, heavily nickel-plated, detachable. SADDLE, latest large tubular, turned from bearing with ball retainers throughout. SPROCKETS, strictly high-grade, padded. Weight, 25 lbs. Fail ball complete with tool bag, pump, wrench, oiler and repair kit. Finished in the highest possible enamel in blue, black or maroon, and shipped

OUR GUARANTEE. We issue a written binding, one year guarantee, during which time if any piece or part gives out, by reason of defect in workmanship or material, WE WILL REPLACE IT FREE OF CHARGE. With care the bicycle will last 10 Years.

SEND US ONE DOLLAR State whether Ladies' or Gents', kind of handle bars and color of finish and we will send you the bicycle by express C. O. D. subject to examination, you can examine it at the express office and if you find it equal to any bicycle you can buy elsewhere for $60.00 to $50.00, and such a bargain as you never saw before, pay the express agent the balance, $18.75, and express charges. Our FREE BICYCLE CATALOGUE shows a complete line of bicycles at $13.95, $19.75, $22.50, etc. Also a full line of bicycle sundries, bicycle clothing, etc. SEND FOR IT.

AS TO OUR RELIABILITY. We refer to our customers everywhere; Metropolitan Nat'l Bank, Exchange Bank, New York; any business house or resident of Chicago. Nat'l Bank of Republic, Bank of Commerce, Chicago; German business blocks in Chicago, employ 700 people, and we guarantee to save you $20.00 to 30.00 on a high-grade bicycle. Order to-day. Don't delay. Only 3,000 to be sold at $19.75.

SEARS ROEBUCK & CO. (Inc.), Fulton, Desplaines, and Wayman Sts., CHICAGO.

---

A Summer Outing

of rest, recreation and continuous pleasure can be enjoyed at Gogebic, Waukesha, Madison, Devil's Lake, Green Lake, Lake Geneva, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Duluth, Marquette, Lake Minnetonka, Yellowstone Park, Dakota Hot Springs, Denver, Colorado Springs, Manitou, Salt Lake and in the mountains of Colorado, Utah, and California. Perfect train service ministers to your comfort.

Twentieth Century Trains,
The North-Western Limited,
ELECTRIC LIGHTED
to St. Paul, Minneapolis and Duluth.
THE COLORADO SPECIAL
ONE NIGHT TO DENVER
THE OVERLAND LIMITED
CALIFORNIA IN 3 DAYS
Ask any ticket agent for detailed information.
Chicago & North-Western Ry.
The Pioneer Line West and Northwest of Chicago.
PRINCIPAL AGENCIES:
NEW YORK, 461 Broadway. BOSTON, 268 Washington St. CHICAGO, 212 Clark St.

---

As Delightful to Drink as it's easy to make.

Fill bowl with ice, pour contents of bottle over same—it's ready for use. For a delicious Claret Cup, add one pint of good Claret to one quart of Club Punch. Fruits in season may be added. For an afternoon tea, evening party, yacht, or picnic, it makes entertaining easy. For sale by dealers. Prepared and guaranteed by

G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., Hartford, Conn.; New York; London.

---

Financial

Letters of Credit. Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

---

Travelers' Letters of Credit

Available in All Parts of the World
ISSUED BY
Guaranty Trust Co.
of New York.
NASSAU, CORNER CEDAR STREET,
LONDON OFFICE, 33 LOMBARD ST., E. C.

---

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak.

Kodak Photography Is Easy Photography

All 1898 Kodaks use our light-proof film Cartridges and can be Loaded in Daylight.

$5.00 to $35.00.

Catalogues free at agencies or by mail. EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

---

---

If Fishes Could Read

Our catalogue they wouldn't be caught. It tells everything "catching" for the modern Isaak Walton.

If not sold by your local dealer, we will mail samples of
PFLUECER'S "Luminous" Bait
for either trout, bass or muskallonge for 50 cts. in stamps. Illustrated catalogue free.
The Enterprise Mfg. Co., Akron, O.

---

THE BEST PENS ARE
ESTERBROOK & CO. PROFESSIONAL PEN
PENS
ESTERBROOK'S
LEADING NUMBERS:
048, 14, 130, 239, 313, AI, 556.
PENS IN ALL STYLES, FOR EVERY PURPOSE.
FOR SALE BY ALL STATIONERS.
The Esterbrook Steel Pen Co.
26 John St., N. Y. Works, Camden, N. J.

---

A NEW POCO.
The Folding Gem.

The neatest, smallest, most carefully built of all the low-priced cameras. A marvel of compactness weighing one pound, and only an inch and a-half thick, closed. Automatically locks itself at proper focusing distance. Closes by touching a spring.

TAKES A PICTURE 4 X 5
As perfect at edges as at centre.

COMPLETE, $7.00.
ROCHESTER CAMERA CO.
43 ELIZABETH ST., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

---

THE NAME
CRESCENT
on a bicycle is a guarantee of reliability. There is satisfaction in riding a wheel in which you have confidence. . . . .
ART CATALOGUE DESCRIBING

FREE ON APPLICATION.
Price and Quality Guaranteed.
WESTERN WHEEL WORKS
CHICAGO NEW YORK

---

Shade Won't Work-
Because it isn't mounted on
THE IMPROVED
HARTSHORN
SHADE ROLLER.
A perfect article. No tacks required. Notice name on roller when buying your shades.

---

CYCLING PLEASURE INCREASED 50% WHEN YOU PUT THE CHAIN ON NO CLEANING—DUST AND RAIN PROOF
CAN BE PUT ON YOUR WHEEL
DUST GEAR CASE CO-INDIANAPOLIS, IND

---

STUDY MEDICINE By Mail

Spare moments sufficient. Diplomas given. Suggestion, Hydropathy and Osteopathy. $2 to $10 daily at home or traveling. Either sex. Particulars free. Address. National Institute of Sciences, R. Y., 78 Masonic Temple, Chicago.

---

CHICKEN
NOVEL MEXICAN DELICACY.
Minced chicken, highly seasoned with Mexican spices, and wrapped in corn husks. Unique, delightful. At grocers, or ½ pound can mailed for 10¢ in stamps. Booklet sent on request.

TAMALE
ARMOUR PACKING CO.
DEPARTMENT H
KANSAS CITY, MO. U.S.A.

---

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

MAGAZINE, $4 00 a year. BAZAR, - - $4 00 a year.
WEEKLY, 4 00 a year. ROUND TABLE, 1 00 a year.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

AN EYE FOR THE ARTISTIC.

Royal Baking Powder for Army and Navy

There is no Baking Powder equal to the Royal in leavening strength. The slowness of the action of the Royal Baking Powder, as compared with all others, renders it particularly valuable for use in camp or at military posts. It does not deteriorate with age, and, more than any other brand, gives uniform and satisfactory results under the varying temperatures prevailing and conditions of service required for Army and Navy use.

Maintains Full Strength in All Climates.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

Athletes and Invalids alike need

Vigoral

It makes strength—nourishes and refreshes and is a foe to fatigue. A health drink made of the nutritive parts of prime beef, delicately spiced and seasoned.

Prepared in a minute, with cold or hot water.
At druggists and grocers.

Armour & Company, Chicago.

"Various Views on Vigoral" mailed free.

When the children's best clothes come from the wash with the colors faded and streaked, and with worn spots showing in places where there should be no wear, then you may know that your laundress is using something besides Ivory Soap.

You can save trouble and expense by furnishing her with Ivory Soap, and insisting that she use it and nothing else. The price of one ruined garment will buy Ivory Soap sufficient for months.

A WORD OF WARNING.—There are many white soaps, each represented to be "just as good as the 'Ivory';" they ARE NOT, but like all counterfeits, lack the peculiar and remarkable qualities of the genuine. Ask for "Ivory" Soap and insist upon getting it.

Copyright, 1898, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Ladies' Furnishings

Shirt Waists.

Piqué, Chambray, Black Lawn, Linon, Lawn Dressing-Sacques, Dimity Wrappers, Cambric Underwear, Summer-Weight Corsets.

Bathing-Suits.

Broadway & 19th st.

NEW YORK.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.
Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.
A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.
Correspondence solicited.

Summer Resorts

LELAND'S OCEAN HOUSE, NEWPORT, R. I.
Opens June 25. Write for booklet.
WARREN LELAND, Jr., Manager.

"ALL HANDS"
Pictures of Life in the United States Navy
By RUFUS FAIRCHILD ZOGBAUM.
Large 4to, Cloth, Ornamental, Colored Top, $5 00.
NEW YORK AND LONDON
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers

TRADE E&W MARK
EARL & WILSON'S
LINEN
COLLARS & CUFFS
BEST IN THE WORLD.

Those Fine English Tobaccos

Put up by W. D. & H. O. WILLS of Bristol, England, and famous the world over for their superb flavor and exquisite aroma, can be obtained for you by your dealer. If he will not get them, write to us for price-list of the well-known brands.

Capstan
Bird's Eye
Westward Ho
Three Castles
Gold Flake, etc.

J. W. SURBRUG, Sole Agent, 159 Fulton Street, NEW YORK.

The Best is the Cheapest

Rae's Olive Oil is both the best and cheapest, quality considered.

The Chemical Analysis of S. Rae & Co.'s Finest Sublime Lucca Oil, made Sept. 15th, 1896, by the Ledoux Chemical Laboratory, declares it to be "unadulterated by admixture with any other oil or other substance. It is free from rancidity and all other undesirable qualities, and it is of Superior Quality and Flavor."

S. RAE & CO., Leghorn, Italy.
Established 1836.

"AMERICA'S GREAT RESORTS," 48 pages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent stamp by GEORGE H. DANIELS, G. P. A. New York Central, New York.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

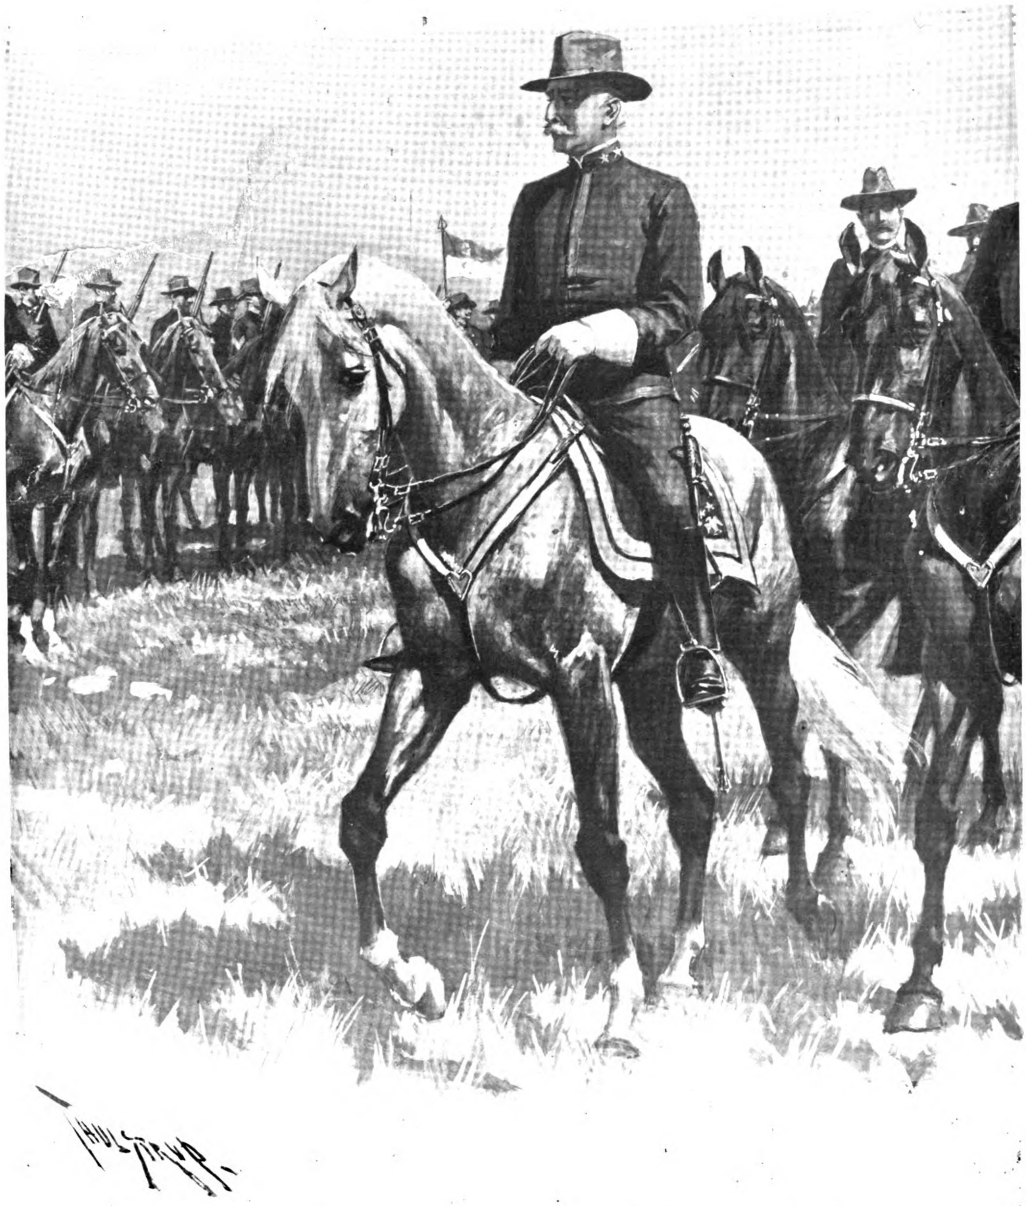
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION



VOL. XLII.—NO. 2168.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS.
All Rights Reserved.

MAJOR-GENERAL NELSON A. MILES, U. S. A., COMMANDING THE ARMY.

DRAWN BY T. DE THULSTRUP

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, JULY 9, 1898

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

This Paper will be the best Pictorial History of the War with Spain, as it was of the War of 1861. Its Special Artists and Correspondents will follow the Army and Navy, and notable Events in Washington and elsewhere will be accurately portrayed.

| ARTISTS. | CORRESPONDENTS. |
|---|---|
| CARLTON T. CHAPMAN. | JOHN FOX, JR. |
| RUFUS F. ZOGBAUM. | FRANK D. MILLET. |
| FREDERIC REMINGTON. | JOHN F. BASS. |
| T. DE THULSTRUP. | O. K. DAVIS. |
| W. A. ROGERS | HAROLD MARTIN, |
| CLYDE D. V. HUNT. | AND OTHERS. |

MR. FOX and MR. REMINGTON are now with General SHAFTER'S Army, Messrs. MILLET, BASS, and DAVIS are on their way to the Philippines, MR. HUNT is with the Cubans, and MR. MARTIN at St. Thomas.

WE are very much afraid that the action of the Senate Appropriations Committee, in refusing to insert an item appropriating $50,000 to defray the expenses of the joint commission to be appointed for the settlement of questions at issue between the United States and Canada, is significant. We believe that the people of the United States are eager to meet half-way the friendly manifestations of Great Britain towards this country, and that they favor the settlement of our issues with Canada, but we fear that pressure must once more be brought to bear upon the Senate, in order that it may not disgrace us by placing the country in the position of repelling the advances of the one power in Europe which has been our friend in our present trouble. In the mean time the British commissioners have been appointed, and they are among the most distinguished men in the empire. They are Lord-High-Chancellor HERSCHELL, Sir WILFRID LAURIER, Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT, Sir LOUIS HENRY DAVIES, and Mr. JOHN CHARLTON.

WE ought to be thankful to the violent and abusive newspapers of Germany, which have insulted us with the vehemence and the vituperations of Spaniards, for they have called forth a noble letter from Mr. CARL SCHURZ to Die Nation, of Berlin, which is another of that eminent German-American's contributions to the welfare of his adopted country. MR. SCHURZ, we have no doubt, expresses the sentiments of the Germans who are citizens of this country, and who have already rendered it most excellent service, in sounding a note of warning to the Jingoes of their native land, who apparently are under the absurd impression that the German-American is not a patriotic American. This is what Mr. SCHURZ says, however, and MR. SCHURZ knows whereof he speaks better, probably, than any other living man:

> German-Americans are proud of their new father land, and know how to appreciate its advantages and great qualities. Now that war is going on, they stand with their new country. Its friends are their friends, and its enemies their enemies.

NOTWITHSTANDING the occasional outbursts of theatrical heroics in Spain, when men of politics seek to placate the Carlists and other hotheads by declaring that Spain will fight to the death, there is evidently a movement there for peace. And this movement is strongest in that part of Spain which is most modern—that is, that part which is industrious. The Chamber of Commerce of Barcelona is in accord with the friends of peace in the same city in wishing an end to the war. Not only are many thousands of working-men out of employment on account of the suspension of industry, but commerce is paralyzed. In other words, the elements of superiority which Cataluña possesses over the rest of the Spanish peninsula are sorely wounded, and either there must be a speedy peace or the thriving people of the eastern coast must become what other Spaniards are. There is no more active enemy of war than commerce, whose peaceful ends increase the brotherhood of nations, because those ends depend upon international friendship, and are destroyed by international enmities. The industrials of the eastern provinces find strong allies in the indifference of the people of most of the other provinces, and especially in the hardships that are now beginning to be felt cruelly throughout the kingdom. War might have been prevented if Europe would have guaranteed the dynasty. This means, of course, that the politicians who compose the government, and those who composed the last government, and those who will compose the succeeding one, know that war with this country means ruin to Spain, and they are continuing it, as they entered upon it, merely through fear of a revolution at home if they do not uphold that ephemeral thing known as "Spanish honor." Therefore if the politicians can now persuade the army to do what the powers refused to do, to guaranty the Queen-Regent and her son, or the latter alone, there may be an application for peace at any time.

THERE is no desire on our part to lessen in the smallest degree the great credit that is due the volunteer soldiers, and which is always theirs whenever the country engages in war, for our citizens make good soldiers quickly. Crying injustice, however, is done to the regular army by the press and the war correspondents, as well as by the politicians. The country has received splendid service from the regular army in every war, and our officers who have won the greatest distinction have, in most instances, been the graduates of West Point. These instructed soldiers show their education at the very outset of the war, and while the volunteers are learning the wisdom of prudence by hard experience, the regulars are practising it. To read the accounts of the battle on the heights of Sevilla, one would think that none but the "Rough Riders" had been engaged in it, but the regulars were doing just as effective work, and doing it in a more businesslike and prudent way. We would not for a moment wish that any word which has been said in praise of the volunteers had been left unsaid, but if those who are writing of this war could only know the bitter discouragement of the regular officers, who devote their whole lives to the service of their country, due to the manner in which they are treated by the newspapers and the politicians, we think they would dwell a little more on the deeds of the regulars. It is not in human nature to remain content under such injustice as is habitually done to the regular army. We know, of course, why politicians and their favorites succeed in securing commissions for themselves and their civilian relatives and friends in preference to deserving soldiers, but why is it that the newspapers and their correspondents refuse to give credit to the regulars? It will not cause the volunteers any grief, we know, if their professional brethren receive what they earn. Why not be just to the American soldier whether he be serving the country permanently or temporarily?

THE letter which Governor BLACK has written explaining his reasons for not calling into the field the Seventh, Twenty-third, and Seventy-fourth regiments of the National Guard of this State is most excellent. It is a pity that it could not have been written before the first call was responded to, because it is absolutely true that many men went to the front under that call who should not have gone. They were influenced generally by the fear of what would be said of them by their comrades in the militia if they staid at home. Now it is true that the militia is not organized for the purpose of going to war in foreign parts, and the men who join militia regiments do not contemplate such service when they enlist. They know that they are liable for service for the Federal government within the country, and for the suppression of domestic insurrection within the State. Beyond that the terms of their service do not extend, and there was no more obligation to volunteer resting upon a militia-man, under the first or second call, than rested upon any private citizen within the required ages. Under the circumstances of the call, however, great pressure was brought to bear upon the members of the various regiments, which some of the weaker among them did not have the courage to resist. Therefore some men have gone off leaving their families unprovided for, while others have endangered their own future prosperity by throwing up business engagements which gave them their whole substance. If this were a war in which the life of the nation was involved, the question would be different; but as it is not, Governor BLACK is right in saying that he will not issue a call which may force into the service men who ought to remain at home, and who would therefore go unwillingly. Nothing more demoralizing to the service itself can be conceived than the presence of a large number of men in the ranks who ought to be at home, and who feel that they are violating personal and domestic obligations simply under the influence of a weak regard for a sentiment within their organizations which—if it really exists, which we somewhat doubt—is very unjust.

ONE of the most effective speeches against the annexation of Hawaii was made by that veteran Republican, Senator MORRILL of Vermont. It is worthy of careful study, and if the question of annexation is to come into the practical politics of the year it will doubtless be widely distributed throughout the country. Let us not make any mistake about the meaning of this movement. If we enter into it, let us enter into it with our eyes open, and with a complete understanding of all that it signifies. By annexing Hawaii we are adopting a colonial policy, and are making almost necessary, at least almost inevitable, the retention of the Philippine Islands and Puerto Rico, while our retention of Cuba will only be prevented by our solemn promise that the Cubans should establish their own government. Even that promise may not be kept, in the intensity of the feeling in favor of increasing our territory that will follow the inauguration of that policy. As Senator MORRILL points out, this will end the MONROE doctrine. We have insisted, and our insistence has been accepted by Great Britain as within the proper sphere of our action, that European governments shall not interfere with any people on this hemisphere who are governing themselves. If now we ourselves interfere with distant peoples in the Pacific, preventing them from establishing their own governments, and taking over, as we do in the NEWLANDS resolution, the full government of a foreign people, a majority of whom are unwilling to come within our jurisdiction, with what logic and with what consistency can we warn Europe from interference in the affairs of this hemisphere? If we have the right to govern other people against their will, why has not every other nation the right to exercise whatever power it may possess in that direction? Let us not imagine, either, that we are about to establish self-governing colonies after the manner of the great English colonies. We are simply contemplating the deliberate adoption of the colonial policy which was England's until we taught her to abandon it, which is that of France and Germany, and which is, moreover, that which has roused our indignation and led us into a war with Spain. Our annexationists are for governing other people, not for permitting other people to free themselves from Spanish rule to govern themselves. This colonial policy which we overthrew, and in overthrowing which we laid the foundation of the greatness of England's colonies of to-day, not only costs the governments of France and Germany immense sums of money, but leads to no amelioration of the human race, and does not even provide a home for emigrating Frenchmen or Germans. So far as Spain is concerned, the effect of this colonial policy is seen in the war which we are now waging against her. We are contemplating the taking up of this old and discredited colonial policy, not, as is pretended, for the purpose of increasing and enlarging and ennobling our national life, but for purely commercial ends—for trade, and all the corruption which is implied in the intimate association of trade and government. We do not believe for a moment that the people of this country would deliberately vote for such a policy.

AMERICAN PATRIOTISM IN WAR.

WHATEVER Spain may think as to her honor, whether it be satisfied or not, it is clear that neither in courage nor in intelligence are her navy and army capable of coping successfully with the sailors and soldiers of the United States. These have added new names to the list of our national heroes, and new glories to our constellation of victories. It has been the fashion to say that long years of peace and commercialism have sapped the spiritual virtues of our people, and that so engrossed have we been in the arts of money-making, so corrupted have we become in consequence of the partnership which interested persons have succeeded in establishing between the government and private business interests, that the war spirit and the war courage have gone out of our blood. It was the habit of the superficial diplomats which the Continental nations of Europe are accustomed to send to Washington to sneer at us, as the French have sneered at the English, as a nation of "shopkeepers," and immediately before the breaking out of the present war these gentlemen filled the drawing-rooms of the capital with the prediction that there would be no war, because the Yankees were too fond of money to fight. But the prophets of cowardice are now seeing their mistake, just as the French ought to have recognized their mistake long ago on the field of Waterloo.

The American people in arms are fighting as they have always fought, and as they will probably continue to fight whenever they make or accept war. In this war they have already given abundant evidence of a wonderful morale, a steadi-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ness of heart, a coolness of head, and, above all, of a fervid patriotism. On sea and land these men of arms of ours have gone into action with the dash, the discipline, and the cautiousness of old campaigners. Only once has there been a question raised as to the self-possession or self-restraint of any of our men who have met the enemy, and that in the battle of Sevilla Heights, where there may have been a little recklessness and a too eager push forward, not at all surprising when we consider the freshness of the command and the eagerness shown by both officers and men to fight. But, on the other hand, there was so much glory won in that hard struggle by and for those who were in it, for the American name, for all of us, that the excess of enthusiasm, if there was any, is worthy of mention only to forestall a criticism that might be invited by what would appear as too liberal praise to such minds as often miss the splendor of a perfect night in their analysis of the revelations of a spectroscope. We owe this explanation to the "Rough Riders" who fought in those fearful woods where bullets rushed from mysterious shadows, because we would not by any apparent minuteness of ignorance on our part have their demerits discussed by critics who might be silent were they warned in advance that slight spots on a glorious life are invisible not only to the generous but to the truly appreciative eye. From Manila to Guantanamo and Sevilla Heights our sailors and soldiers have done their duty in obedience to skilful and altogether worthy officers. DEWEY'S entrance into the harbor of Manila was itself one of those splendid examples of intelligent and brave temerity that mark the men capable of them as the geniuses of war. The deed of courage which was performed by HOBSON and his men is but a conspicuous example of the conduct of our sea and land forces on every occasion that has been presented to them. The cable-cutting at Cardenas and elsewhere, the reconnoissances under fire, the eagerness manifested by every one of our fighting souls—all these, physical, intellectual, and spiritual, make the sinking of the Merrimac part of a great drama which lifts up the heart and head of every American citizen.

For, believe as we may have done concerning the wisdom of the war, this eager courage to carry the flag into the heart of an enemy's country, to plant it above his sinking ships and his crumbling forts, this rush after the colors to the very death, this recklessness of life, this wonderful enthusiasm and joy in battle, are the phenomena of a deep and abiding patriotism, of a love of country as strong and as hot as that which ever possessed any people in this nineteen-century-old world. We will go further than this, for our belief is that this love of country is more generally felt, more widely distributed, here than in any other land in the modern world. The American citizen, whether he be born of English forebears or not, whether he be born here or elsewhere, is defending his own political power, is vindicating his own right to exercise political power, when he arms himself for the defence of his government. This heterogeneous race of what our delightful and courteous foes call "Yankee pigs" is not so heterogeneous when the real meaning and character of the republic are considered. We may not be men of one blood, but we are men of one mind. We may have been born under despotisms or constitutional monarchies or pretended republics, but we live in a true republic, we possess a democracy, and it is as certain as that men will continue to be governed that our democracy will remain regnant, because both those who are the offspring of the men who established it on the basis of the English democracy, and those who have come under its benignant power, who grow in grace by means of its kindly developing force, will always insist on its maintenance.

These people of different origins have a common purpose and a common destiny, and each man thinking himself worthy of the company of kings is not only more self-respectful and more self-confident than subject people, even when these have the most glorious traditions for the nourishment of their national pride, but necessarily has also more respect and love for the government of which he is part, which has been so rich in performance for him, and is so rich in promise for his descendants. This nation does not receive its character from the parents of its citizens, but from the institutions which have filled the world with the glory of English-speaking peoples; which have brought liberty into the cottage, and have applied the limitations and restraints of the golden rule to the palace; which have put the people's happiness above the prince's profit; which have established a common justice for the ruler and the ruled; and which have prospered humanity by unshackling the genius of the individual. These institutions and the aspirations that are born of them make America and Americans; and when the government, which is the creature and defender of these institutions, demands the service of its people, it addresses the patriotism of men who love it as they love themselves and their families. The old world never made a greater mistake than in supposing that the republic does not have the love of its own rulers because the grandfathers of many of the rulers were not born here. Its cynics and its false prophets are learning the truth now—learning that the patriotism of America is such that, when the direful occasion comes, the citizen becomes an energetic, courageous, and intelligent soldier, the like of whose associated qualities cannot be found in European armies. This is the great truth shown by the war as it has thus far progressed, a revelation which may work wonders in a world ready for almost any teaching of democracy. And all who love America for the virtues which are hers, and for the virtues which she breeds, will never wish her less of patriotism in war, but always more of the patriotism resting on the broad foundations of her peaceful and habitual achievements.

THE "NEW POLICY."

THOSE were weighty and well-chosen words in which Mr. CLEVELAND, in addressing a school in New Jersey, deprecated what it appears that General MERRITT was erroneously reported as calling the "new policy" of the United States. It is not against extension and annexation, it is against "foreign conquest and unnatural extension or annexation" that the ex-President protests as "dangerous perversions of our national mission." That expression may be taken to mean that we cannot safely assume control of any communities which we cannot assimilate, or of any in which we cannot discern the promise and potency at least of self-government. We have been employed in assimilating an amount of foreign immigration the like of which no other nation has undertaken to absorb in the history of the world. Our success has, upon the whole, been wonderful. If not in the first generation, then in the second, European immigration has been really assimilated into American citizenship. We have had our troubles even with this. With immigration not European we have not succeeded. Asiatic immigration we have excluded, in spite of solemn treaties. African immigration we have encouraged avowedly as that of an inferior and subject race, not meant to be assimilated, not held fit for citizenship. The negro problem is with us yet. He would be a man more bold than wise who should pretend that he even foresaw its solution. And now an increasing party is demanding that we should add to the chronic negro question a chronic Philippine question and a chronic Hawaiian question.

The increase of the German fleet in Manila Bay until it outclasses our own is an indication of the troubles which this party is inviting with European powers by taking a hand in the European game of grab. The spectacle of France cowed by its huge army into acquiescing in a perversion of justice which constitutes a national disgrace is an indication of the troubles we are preparing for ourselves at home, and the danger we are inviting for our own institutions if we prepare the huge armaments that are needed to defend distant possessions. Our best friends abroad urge us not to abandon the path which we have found to be that of peace and of unexampled prosperity for a vague dream of empire. Mr. BRYCE months ago contributed his share to that full and fair discussion of the annexation of Hawaii in consequence of which the project was beaten and abandoned. He wisely and temperately pointed out to us what grave risks we incurred, and what inadequate and trivial compensations we should receive for those risks. Only the other day JOHN MORLEY, at Leeds, expressed in earnest words the hope of our best friends in England, that we would not, by insisting upon gaining what Spain should lose, voluntarily subject ourselves to the burdens and perils of that militarism to which the nations of Europe are condemned. The men who are recognized as the representatives of the sober sense of the United States, such men as ex-President CLEVELAND in one party, and Speaker REED in the other, warn us against "unnatural" extensions to which our system of government cannot be applied. They point us to the fact that our national honor is involved, that we have solemnly pledged ourselves that this war is not to be, on our part, a war of conquest and aggrandizement, and that it would be a pitiful quibble, worthy of a Spanish theologian, to pretend that the pledge did not include the Philippines as well as the Antilles. All these things go for nothing simply because the Spanish fleet in the Pacific was destroyed in Manila Bay and not in the open sea. A Senator of the United States declares, amid applause, that, notwithstanding all these things, the American flag shall not be lowered in any place in which it has once floated "by the consent of the governed or the right of conquest," and the convention of the President's party in the President's State undertakes to make this sentiment an article of party faith.

Where have all the qualities gone upon which we have been wont to pride ourselves as Americans—good sense, good faith, love of justice, love of peace? Can a single naval victory destroy the national character of the victors? We have been for months deriding German imperialism, which is, in fact, a pinchbeck imitation "made in Germany" of the genuine British article. But it is good sense itself in comparison with American imperialism. It is true that the population of Germany cannot expand to the extent of its requirements within its own territory, and that there is a constant outflow of emigration which it may be desirable, if it be possible, to divert to German possessions, though in that Germany has as yet had no success. It is true also, that the trade of Germany even more conspicuously needs room for expansion. New fields would be opened for it by a colonial expansion upon the seventeenth-century basis of exclusive trade, which England alone has entirely abandoned, and to which Spain alone has fully adhered, with the results, in each case, that we see. But what have these considerations to do with us?

> No pent-up Utica contracts our powers,
> But the whole boundless continent is ours.

Instead of having to dispose of a surplus population, we are still the favorite field for emigrants from the overcrowded countries of Europe. Why should a nation possessing a half-filled and half-tilled continent be reaching out for colonial possessions, in imitation of an overcrowded island which must import two-thirds of its food-supply to keep alive, or of a military empire which yearly loses hundreds of thousands of its people by emigration? Why should we burden ourselves with a huge army and a tremendous navy, and not merely a consular but a proconsular system, in emulation of less favored lands? It is true that our trade would need and find new markets, if it were allowed by law to do so, and that the present war gives us an opportunity to take order that we shall be admitted to many new markets on equal terms with other nations. But to expand our trade abroad, the first step is to strike the shackles from it at home. With what face can we demand an "open door" in Asia and Polynesia while on both coasts we are slamming the doors in the face of the foreigner? What basis in reason or in righteousness is there, in a word, for the "new policy" of colonial expansion or imperialism? That is the question which it behooves every American to ask himself in view of the new adjustment of parties which is coming over the new issue. Upon the answer to it will depend the future of the republic. Such answers to it as have thus far been returned indicate that in the new political alignment most of the sober, conscientious, patriotic American citizens will be upon one side, and all the boys and all the blatherskites on the other.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

Saturday, June 25.—After yesterday's engagement at La Guasima, near Sevilla, the Spanish forces retreated towards Santiago; the "Rough Riders" and their companions of the regular cavalry (volunteers and regulars both dismounted, as already mentioned in the "Diary") rested, and buried their dead at the crest of the hill so gallantly won; Sevilla, abandoned by the enemy, was occupied by General Chaffee's command, and our outposts were still further advanced, as the following despatches show:

To General Shafter:

I have just seen two negro boys who left Santiago this morning (Saturday). They report that the soldiers and citizens are very short of food. The soldiers and officers have seized all the food in the shops. They are killing young horses for food, and in the hospitals are subsisting on bread made of rice flour. Three Spanish generals took part in the fight at Sevilla yesterday. Five wagon-loads of wounded were carried into Santiago, and many other wounded got there on horses or afoot. We can see Morro Castle and the flag very distinctly from our position. The Cubans confirm the reports as to the fine character of the fortifications around the city. Seven lines of barbed wire are stretched around the trenches. The Spaniards have recently dug deep trenches around the entire city, connecting a series of small forts.

WHEELER.

To General Shafter:

We can plainly see Santiago, less than seven miles away. The country is level for six miles this side of the city, except for hills on the south, which extend to within a mile of Santiago. These hills now appear deserted. The country is fairly open, and it will not be difficult to move troops over it. General Chaffee occupies Sevilla to-day.

(Dated Saturday evening.) YOUNG.

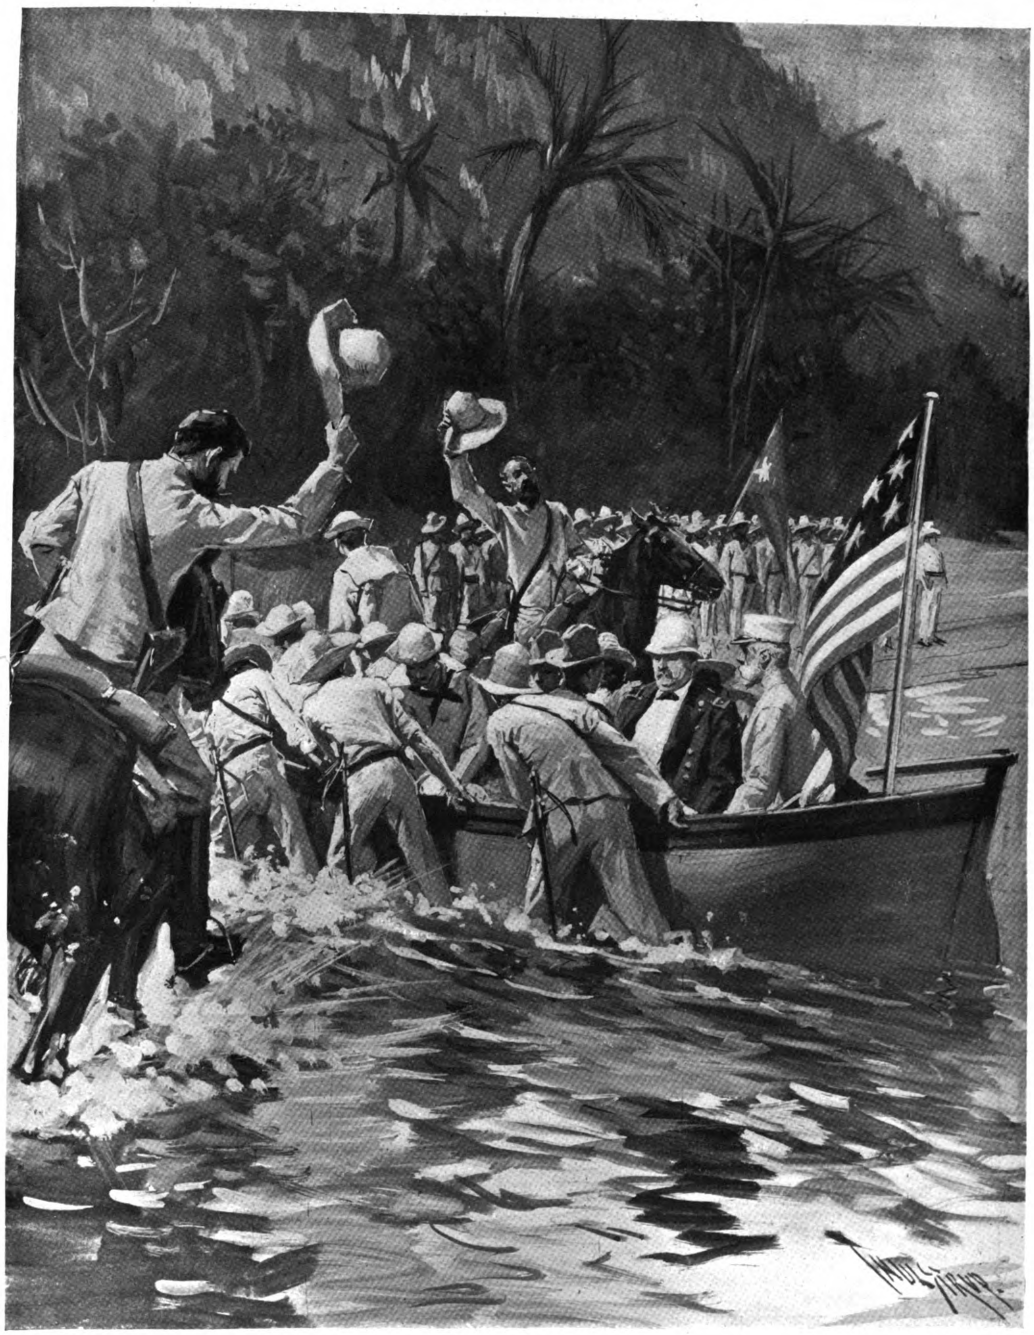
Sunday, June 26.—Beyond Sevilla, on the way to Santiago, and distant not more than four miles from that city, is San Juan. There our advance-guard, the Seventh Regular Infantry, halted this morning; and later in the day the entire First Brigade, General Wheeler commanding, came up. Still further in advance—almost within rifle-

(Continued on page 666.)

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google



THE SEAT OF WAR—BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF SANTIAGO DE CUBA AND SURROUNDING COUNTRY, NOW OCCUPIED BY THE ARMY OF INVASION UNDER GENERAL SHAFTER.

Drawn by Charles Graham.

Original from PENN STATE

DRAWN BY CHARLES GRAHAM.

GENERAL SHAFTER AND ADMIRAL SAMPSON LANDING ON THE BEACH AT ASERRADERO, JUNE 20, TO CONFER WITH GENERAL GARCÍA.—DRAWN BY T. DE THULSTRUP, FROM MATERIALS RECEIVED.

CONFERENCE AT ASERRADERO.

[The following interesting description of the meeting between the Cuban and American commanders is from a private letter by Mr. Caspar Whitney.—ED. WEEKLY.]

THE entire meeting was exceedingly interesting and picturesque in setting. We left the transport fleet off Santiago and steamed west twelve miles, where we hove to about three miles off shore; then, in three small boats, General Shafter and the important members of his staff, and Davis, Bonsal, Remington, and I, rowed to the shore, the general's boat leading, and ours next. As we approached we discovered about one hundred Cubans on the beach; and as the general's boat got into shallow water, two Cuban officers rode out on horseback to greet him, while a score of Cubans waded in, and catching hold of the general's boat, hauled it on shore. The balance of us waded up to our middle.

As we reached dry land the Cubans gathered around; some shouted "Cuba libre! Viva Americanos!" and all seemed eager to show their appreciation of our efforts in their behalf. After a short audience given to the crowds which pressed upon us, we took up our march towards García's camp. For a mile we followed a narrow winding trail, going up grade always, and at times steeply. The Cubans had fallen in behind us and acted as escort, and all along on the trail other Cubans stood here and there at present arms, or gravely saluted us as we went past.

Finally we reached the foot of a small eminence which crowned the mountains running down to the sea. From the foot to the top two lines of Cuban soldiers stretched, perhaps three hundred in all; and as we began the climb to the top, on which was García's camp, or, rather, the hut in which a rendezvous had been agreed upon, they all presented arms, and a tiny bugle gave forth a most plaintive welcome.

The conference lasted an hour or thereabouts, and during it the Cubans filed past several times, evidently in an attempt to impress us—as on the stage twenty soldiers will parade in front and pass around behind the scenes to the front again, to give the appearance of a regiment.

They were all armed with rifles, some had machetes also, and all looked well nourished. None of the soldiers had shoes, and their clothes were ragged, but certainly seventy-five per cent. of them never had worn a shoe, and never would. General García is a good-looking man of much dignity.

After the conference the Cubans formed a hollow square, and once again the plaintive squeak of the bugle heralded our approach; we passed through the square under an escort of twenty men, and all the square fell in behind us.

To-day (June 22) the troops are landing—have about all landed by now (6 P.M.). At daylight this morning we began our approach on the town (Baiquiri). The New Orleans, Detroit, Castine, and Wasp were directly in front of the harbor, and back and very near came our ship. Two miles back were the remainder of transports. About 2000 troops were got into small boats towed by launches, and when they started towards shore the gunboats opened fire—and such a fire! they simply riddled the town, setting fire to what the Spaniards had not had time to fire before running, and the marksmanship was splendid. It was great—the excitement of stealing up to shore under fire, and the prospect of a fight made the blood course. The Spaniards cut and run, and gave no fight.

Simultaneously with the bombarding at this point, other points five and eight miles west of here were shelled, and the settlements fired.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

The Prison Association of New York (135 East Fifteenth Street), through Mr. W. M. F. Round, its corresponding secretary, asks for money to buy a farm, not far from New York, on which some men who come out of prison can find a home and employment. Mr. Round says:

> It is for those whose spirits are broken by long imprisonment, who come out downcast, physical and spiritual wrecks, to be cared for till they die, or till hope revives. And during the period of shepherding they should have a place where self-respect would "come to its own again" by the ability to earn at least a part of a living by some light industry.

This work speaks for itself. The expediency of it is not less obvious than its mercifulness.

The evidence of the gallantry of the Rough Riders at La Guasima is somewhat more convincing than that of their discretion. About their gallantry there is no shadow of a doubt, and it seems to have been effective to pull the command out of an exceedingly dangerous situation with comparatively small loss.

One comfort that comes with reading of active soldiering on land in Cuba is the prospect which it encourages that better acquaintance with the Cubans as fighting-men will raise them in our estimation, increase our respect for them, and extend the belief that they and their cause were worth helping. All accounts, so far, of their work in co-operation with our men, are very creditable to them and satisfactory to us.

Here is the latest portrait of Mark Twain, reduced from a black and white sketch made in Vienna. For an American who is busy writing books Vienna must be just now a pretty good place to be in. Nothing goes in these parts except war and war news, and in London, so far as appears, fights and fighting interests engross attention almost as completely as in New York. Although Austria is the country whose government seems closest to Spain in its sympathies, we have not heard of any such discourtesies towards Americans in Vienna as have been reported from Paris. Certainly in Mr. Clemens's portrait, which was dated "May 24," there is no indication that the relationship between the Austrian Emperor and the Queen-Regent of Spain has caused him personal embarrassment or disturbed his ease of mind.

If vanity is pardonable in any species of man, it is in a soldier. A vain clergyman seems a very imperfect reflection of God's image; a vain doctor may give the impression that he is thinking of himself when he should be thinking of you; a lawyer ought to be too shrewd and worldly-wise to admit of more personal vanity than just enough to be useful in his business. But it is different with fighting-men. Why do we deck them out in gay raiment if not for looks? Why provide them with fine feathers if they are not to feel an interest in being fine birds? A reasonable degree of vanity seems almost a part of a complete soldier's necessary outfit, and if it is a blemish it is a soldierly blemish, at any rate.

True, the absence of it is not a sure sign of inefficiency. There were Grant and Lee, men judged to be successful in their calling, and yet both of them persons of incorrigible modesty. And there was Von Moltke, who, in his pictures at least, does not betray any noticeable solicitude about his looks. Doubtless soldiers may be shamefaced and yet proficient in their business, especially in the intellectual end of it, but they may also be reasonably vain without giving good reason to doubt their military capacity. War is such a painfully foolish business at the best that a little personal foolishness in its professors seems to fit into the general economy of the institution. It is the duty of soldiers, when actually working at their trade, to seem, at least, to like soldiering, and how can they do that unless they look proud of being soldiers?

Somewhat ominous is the photographic reproduction given here of the first pension check paid on account of our present war. It is for $14 40, and records the first payment made to Elsie A. Monfort, of Council Bluffs, on account of her pension of $12 a month for the death of her son, William F. Monfort, twenty-five years old, who lost his life by the sinking of the Maine. No consideration forbids us to hope that pension checks originating in casualties of the present war may continue to be rare enough to be interesting as curiosities.

Congress has passed a bill to pay $379 56 to Moses Pendergrass, of Libertyville, Missouri. The story of the reason for this liberality is pathetically interesting, and is valuable as an illustration of the sort of pickle that an honest man may get into who undertakes to do an honest job of work for Uncle Sam. In 1886 Moses Pendergrass put in a bid for the contract to carry the mail on the route from Knob Lick to Libertyville and Coffman, thirty miles a day, from July 1, 1887, for one year. He got the postmaster at Knob Lick to write the letter for him; and while Moses intended that bid should be $400, his scribe carelessly made it $4. Moses got the contract, and did not find out about the mistake until the end of the first quarter, when he got his first pay. When he found at what rate he was working he was sorely cast down, and opened communication with the Post Office Department. The department informed him that he must either carry out his contract or throw it up, and that if he threw it up his bondsmen would have to pay the government $1459 85 damages; so Moses carried out his contract, walked thirty miles every week-day for a year and carried the mail, and received for his labor $4—or, to be accurate, $6 84; for the route being extended after his bid was accepted, the pay was proportionately increased. Now, after ten years, a bill has finally been passed to pay to Moses the difference between what he earned in that unlucky year and what he received.

BRIG.-GEN. WILLIAM LUDLOW, U. S. V.

The Sun, which tells this story, says that bills have been introduced in three or four Congresses for Moses's relief, and that committees have repeatedly investigated his claim. It must have cost the government thousands of dollars in labor to pay that poor man his just dues.

Well, that is the way that governments have to do things. Isn't it appalling? Is it surprising that when a government gets into a fight it should take it some time to roll up its sleeves?

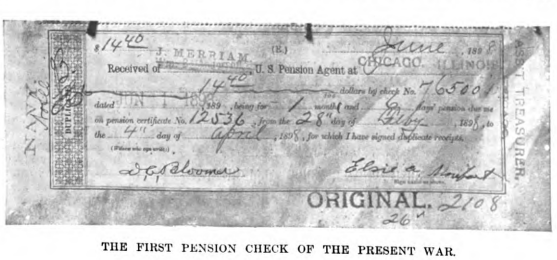
At Commencement (May 26) at Tuskegee Institute, Mississippi, this year, Principal Booker T. Washington, A.M., reported an enrolment during the year of 712 boys and 335 girls. The income of the year was $114,469, of which $52,000 was expended on the permanent plant. The pupils paid in work towards their personal expenses $52,000. The institute has many departments, in which are taught agriculture, truck-gardening, and various trades and industries, besides which it carries on the general business of education. Its deserts are widely known and appreciated. It needs an endowment of half a million dollars, and should have it. In its aims, scope, and methods it has proved itself one of the best machines that exist for promoting self-help and intelligent industry among the colored population of the South. It is starting on its eighteenth year. Its pupils last year came from twenty-four States and two foreign countries. Three thousand of its former pupils are at work.

Any one who has ever tried to get to the bottom of any piece of college vandalism will be particularly interested in the strange case of Professor George H. Stephens, late of Lafayette College, at Easton, Pennsylvania, who has confessed to various outrages committed upon that institution, including the burning of one wing of the handsome Pardee Hall. Stephens's confession is a very extraordinary and tragical story of degeneration and perverted intelligence. He was graduated with high distinction at Princeton in the class of 1891, winning the Chancellor Green fellowship in mental philosophy. The income of this fellowship maintained him for another year at Princeton, and after taking his master's degree he spent still another year in the Princeton Theological Seminary. He was called to Lafayette in 1895 to be Associate Professor of Ethics and Logic. His engagement at Lafayette was for two years. President Warfield, who seems to have taken very kindly to him at first, concluded, before the term of his engagement had expired, that he was not a satisfactory instructor, and not a person whom it was expedient to retain. On what grounds he based this opinion has not yet come out, but he told Stephens that he would not be re-engaged. Stephens objected so strongly to being dropped that President Warfield kept him on for another year. Then Stephens, finding that he was not to be retained, made an open fight in the newspapers and elsewhere against President Warfield, but the trustees of the college unanimously sustained their president, and Stephens's connection with the institution closed.

Then, it seems, having developed a violent hatred of President Warfield, he determined upon a policy of retaliation, by which he hoped to undermine the president's influence. To that end he began a series of depredations and outrages, which, he thought, being attributed to students, might indicate bad discipline, and operate in various ways to Dr. Warfield's injury. He broke into the college chapel and crippled the organ so that it wouldn't work; he cut the ivy that grew on various of the college buildings; he stole the hymns and Bibles out of the chapel and threw them into a cistern; and another time he put tar on the college benches, carpet, organ, pulpit, and Bible, causing great damage. His most serious crime, of setting fire to Pardee Hall, he has confessed in detail. One wing of the building was destroyed, but, to his disappointment, the fire was believed to have been of accidental origin. A watch was finally set in the chapel, and when Stephens came there at night with a basket of bad eggs to do more mischief, he was attacked and driven off. He dropped his eggs and a key, and the key led to his detection.

Stephens is not obviously insane, though the easiest explanation of his conduct is to say that he must be a monomaniac. Besides his intellectual ability, he had a remarkable physique and unusual strength, and might have won distinction in athletics. But athletics did not interest him. He was active in religious work, and yet it is evident that there was something about him that was noticeably wrong and that excited Dr. Warfield's distrust. His pitiful story will be long remembered in colleges, and is pretty sure to be cited by future commentators who are puzzled to account for particularly atrocious acts of college vandalism.

The sentiment in and about Harvard College against the war must be pretty strong. A class-day orator is more likely to reflect the opinions prevalent about him than to defy them, and this year's incumbent, Mr. Grilk of Davenport, Iowa, did doubtless express opinions which have been and are held by many of his mates when he found it impossible to escape the conviction that in going to war with Spain "our government acted hastily, without thought, without the dignity becoming a great republic." How his deliverances in this strain were received by his audience does not appear, but it is recorded that the brief announcement following the oration that there would be no poem read because the class poet, Mr. Scull of Boston, had gone to the war, "was all that was needed for the enthusiasm of the entire assemblage to break loose in a prolonged cheering and applause."



PRIVATE GOODE TAUMAN, U. S. MARINE CORPS.
Killed, June 11, in the Spanish Attack on Camp McCalla, Guantanamo Bay.

Mr. Scull is one of Colonel Wood's Roosevelt Rough Riders. No doubt he is a good and intrepid gentleman, but it may perhaps be doubted if he is a bolder man than Orator Grilk, who had the hardihood to tell a class-day audience in Sanders Theatre that our war can't be justified, and that our new "imperial policy" lacks commonsense. It is not necessary to share all of Mr. Grilk's views in order to recognize his self-renunciation in so shaping his remarks that even his nearest sympathizers could hardly feel like giving him more than silent support.

A great many friends and admirers of Mr. Rudolph Lehmann, the Harvard coach, have been glad to read of his engagement to marry an American lady—Miss Davis of Worcester. Mr. Lehmann has worked hard and persistently during the last two years in the interest of American sport, and has had twice to bear the disappointment of seeing his pupils badly beaten. It is pleasant to know that he had something better to take home with him than the mere memory of two defeats. It is pleasant to know also that his relations with this country are to be strengthened by a new tie. Whatever ailed his crews, he has helped us at a point where we needed help in promoting among our college athletes a better conception of the amenities and purposes of true sport.

Admiral Dewey has been made an LL.D. of Princeton, and it is currently reported (with how much truth cannot be discovered) that Constructor Hobson has been honored by the venerable and renowned Med. Fac. of Harvard College, which has conferred upon him the dis-

THE FIRST PENSION CHECK OF THE PRESENT WAR.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

tinction of honorary membership. The report is credible enough, though (such is the obscurity which veils the venerable society's operations) we may never know positively whether it is true or not.

In the WEEKLY of June 25 it was mentioned that 15 out of 121 members of the graduating class of the Sheffield Scientific School at New Haven had enlisted, making the largest number of enlistments in proportion to the size of the class at that time reported from any institution. Word has since come that the graduating class of 30 at the University of Tennessee, at Knoxville, has sent 8 men to the war (more than one-quarter of the class), and that out of 44 Seniors of the University of Maine, at Orono, 14 (nearly one-third of the class) enlisted, and were, at the time of writing, with the First Maine Regiment at Chickamauga.

These last reports will be hard to beat, though other colleges are likely to be heard from. Out of a total attendance of 300 at the University of Maine, 40 have enlisted—a proportion that recalls the days of the civil war.

The college men in the volunteer armies of whom we, in this part of the country, have heard the most, have been those who joined the regiment of "Rough Riders." There are hundreds of others who are quite as notable. A correspondent of the Church Economist, who has been at Camp Alger, and has made it his special concern to look into the state of religion in that camp, takes note of the influence of college men in various regiments, and especially in regiments in which whole companies are made up of college men, who work together for good. He tells us that Company H of the Twenty-second Kansas Regiment is entirely made up of college men, and that in that one regiment there are 354 "teachers, preachers, and active young churchmen," who have organized a Sunday-school and a Christian Endeavor society, and who keep the tone of the regiment at a high level. Another such regiment, it seems, is the 159th Indiana, where the superior character of the men in one or two companies rejoices the chaplain, and gives effect to his labors. Religion at Camp Alger seems to have risen quite above sectarian jealousies. We read of a service Episcopal in form but conducted by a Presbyterian clergyman from Indiana, and of another which was conducted by the Roman Catholic chaplain of the Seventh Illinois while the Universalist chaplain of the Sixth Massachusetts preached the sermon.

One of the notable chaplains of the volunteer army is the Rev. Thomas E. Sherman, of the Fourth Missouri, who will be remembered as the oldest son of General Sherman.

The laws of the trades unions hold, it seems, even in war-time, and to the detriment of the interests of the state. The newspapers record that on Saturday, June 25, in New York, the men engaged in installing the electrical plants on two ships chartered by the government stopped work at noon, according to union rules, notwithstanding that their refusal to go on with the work meant a delay of two days in starting the ships for Newport News.

Great interest is felt in the exploits of the dynamite-cruiser Vesuvius, which has demonstrated her ability not only to keep high explosives on her stomach in heavy weather, but to expel them shoreward at the proper time, and with due force and a fair degree of accuracy. How effective the work of the Vesuvius can be has not at this writing been clearly shown, but she has demonstrated abilities enough to secure close observation for her performances. She can certainly persuade her earthquakes to go a mile or two away before they operate, and she has made it certain that wherever one of them happens to light it is sure to be remembered. In the absence of the Holland torpedo-boat, she ranks as the leading novelty of the war.

E. S. MARTIN.

THE FOULING OF THE BEACHES.

The Editor of Harper's Weekly:

I HAVE received your letter concerning the condition of the beaches in the Rockaway district, with photographs showing actual conditions, which are substantially the same as I saw last summer at Long Beach and farther east. The illustrations are in no wise exaggerated, and they show, as nothing else could, the intolerable littering of these resorts. I am told that large numbers of persons pay from $50 to $100 per season for bath-houses, and are unable to make the least use of them for weeks together, because of these accumulations of rubbish.

The same conditions, aggravated by the presence of putrefying garbage, have been the subject of great complaint for years concerning the beaches of both Long Island and New Jersey. The first serious effort for relief was made in the summer of 1894, when it was arranged to deposit all refuse behind a bulkhead enclosing the shoal on the west side of Rikers Island in the East River. This relieved the beaches, but it made a much more grievous annoyance nearer home. All of the collections of the city were dumped there, including an average of about five hundred tons of garbage per day. This garbage, putrefying under water, sent forth such an all-pervading stench that the people of Westchester County, and as far away as Flushing on Long Island, as well as those on the Sound steamers, raised a loud cry of protest.

GENERAL VIEW OF BEACH NEAR ROCKAWAY.

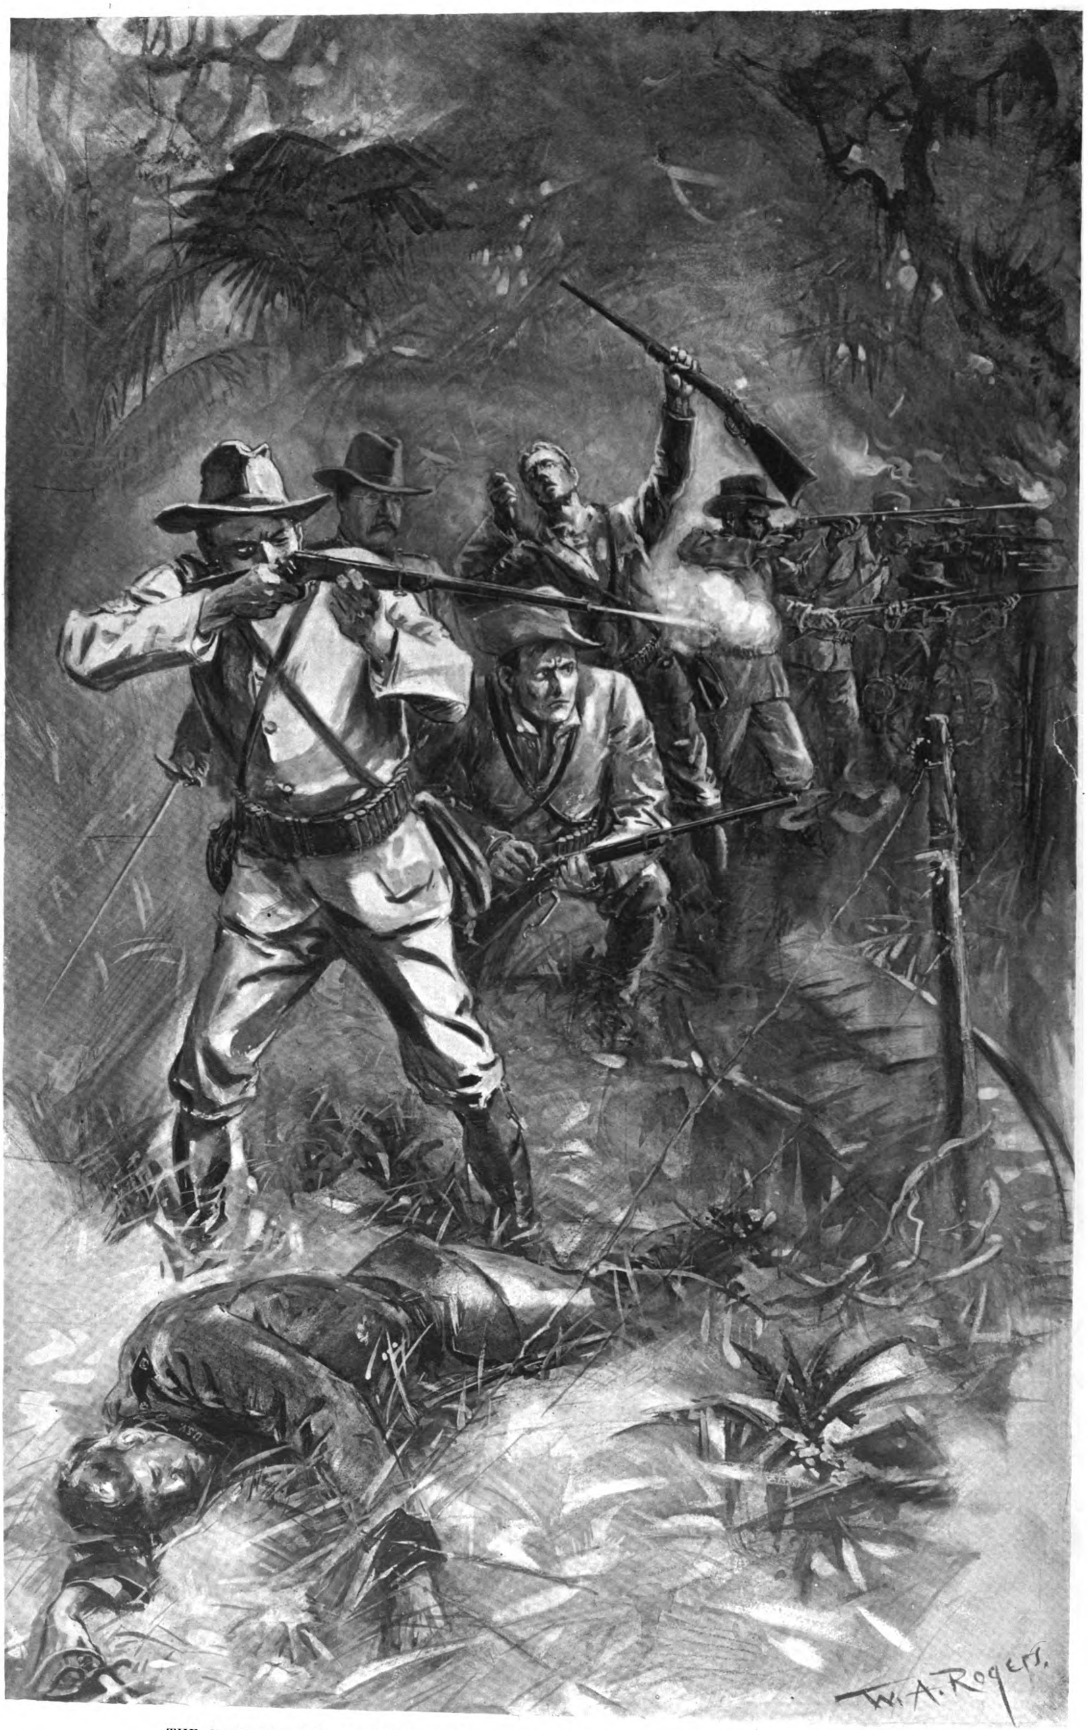
The Legislature passed a law making it a penal offence to deposit anywhere within the metropolitan area, on land or under water, any refuse containing garbage. It therefore became necessary to resort again to sea-dumping, all of the scows being, during the summer season, towed out to the light-ship, ten miles beyond Sandy Hook. This was practically as bad as the previous dumping closer inshore, for, while it led to the drifting of floating matters to more remote points, there was always a sufficient supply of the various wastes (about 2,800,000 cubic yards yearly) to defile the added miles of beach to an intolerable degree. This was the condition when I became Commissioner of Street Cleaning in January, 1895. Mayor Gilroy's commission had investigated the matter thoroughly and had thrown much light upon it, but when practical work was to be done the whole subject had to be studied anew and in detail. Considerable progress had been made when the administration of Mayor Strong ended. The first step of the process was to cause a separation of the wastes. Thus far everything from houses had been set out in the same receptacles and removed by the same carts and scows to the same point of deposit. It was found necessary to separate garbage, ashes, and paper and rubbish from one another, the ashes to be removed in the same carts with the street sweepings and dumped on the department scows; the light refuse to be collected in "P-R" carts, and culled for the sale of their valuable parts; and the garbage to be delivered to the boats of the Sanitary Utilization Company for transportation to its reduction-works at Barren Island. This separate disposal of garbage has been completed since January, 1897, and the source of offensive odors from the deposits on the beaches has been eliminated. Since the latter part of 1895 paper and refuse have been collected by themselves, but most of this material has been thus far dumped on the sea-going scows, awaiting the completion of yards for its picking over. Most of this material, such as mattresses, barrels, boxes, straw, old furniture, etc., is still borne by wind and wave to be deposited along miles of beach, to the greatest discomfort and disadvantage of those who use them or who live near them.

It would have been impossible to do away with this annoyance completely for the present summer, but the amount of refuse so deposited might have been very largely reduced, and by next spring it might have been entirely done away with.

That it has not been greatly mitigated by this time is one of the effects of Croker's debt-limit bugaboo. I had hired, and the city is now paying rent for, four yards in which to deposit the paper and rubbish of as many large districts of the city. Other yards had been negotiated for for the remaining territory.

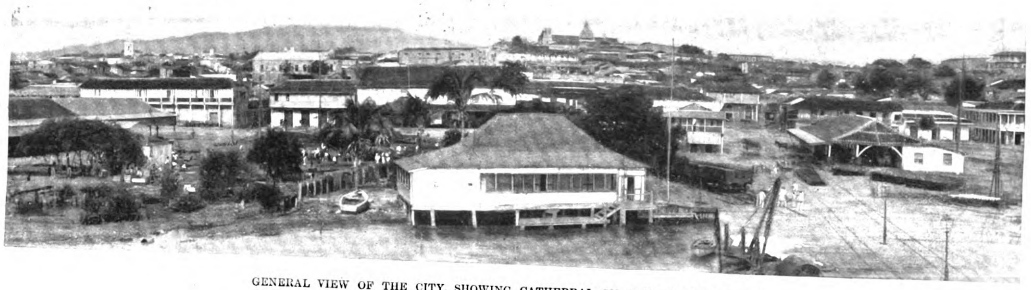
The first yard taken in hand, in East Eighteenth Street near Avenue C, was equipped with the necessary appliances, and had been in active operation since early in 1897. This yard disposes of the collections of 14 of the 150 "P-R" carts of the department. The process is as follows: The old furniture, boxes, barrels, etc., are burned in an iron-enclosed open-air fire. Wire mattresses and other worthless metals, etc., and the ashes of this fire and of the furnace are hauled to the sea-going scows. Other matters are opened out and spread on a table 50 feet long (an endless belt, four feet wide, passing over rollers). This belt passes between two rows of pickers, who select out, each his own kind, seven grades of paper, five kinds of rags, carpet, shoes, hats, rubber, cork, strings, bottles, metals, glass, etc. These are baled or otherwise prepared for market, and are stored under sheds or in bins until sold. The worthless parts of the wastes—such as dirty paper, straw, and excelsior—are burned in a separate furnace, incidentally producing the steam by which the machinery is driven. These wastes amount to about 15 per cent. of the whole. The remainder, 85 per cent., is sold by the contractor, who pays the entire cost of running the works, and pays the department something over $5000 per year for this privilege.

This is only a small experimental plant. The result with the improved plants in contemplation will be very much better; for example, the appliances contracted for in the yard in East Forty-eighth Street will have four times the capacity of this one, while they will cost only about 50 per cent. more to construct and to operate. The extension of the same system throughout the city would bring a large net income to the treasury, aside from the saving of over $30,000 per annum in the cost of sending this portion of the city's wastes out to the light-ship and on to the beaches. There is also to be considered the heavy cost to the riparian owners of clearing their beaches, and of the intolerable annoyance to which they are subjected.



All of this work was under full headway when I was removed from office. My successor, Commissioner McCartney, was fully satisfied of its importance, as well as of the importance of depositing the street sweepings and ashes at Rikers Island, and was desirous of carrying out the whole scheme; but the present remarkable administration "turned it down." It would obviously like to go back to all of the old Tammany methods and conditions, were this possible. Fortunately the garbage contract will last nearly through this term of office, and is likely to be renewed. In short, the garbage problem seems to have been solved for all time. There is, however, little reason to hope that the present fouling of the beaches will be lessened so long as Croker remains Mayor.

GEORGE E. WARING, JR.

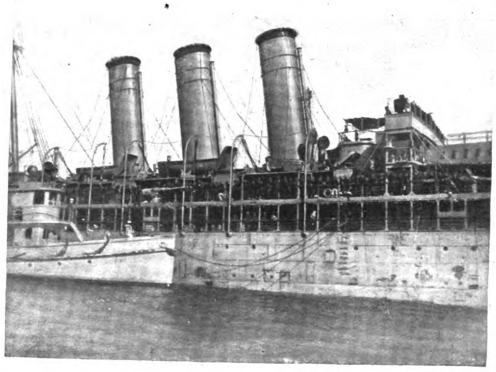


NEW YORK'S CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE ATTRACTIONS OF SUBURBAN SEASIDE RESORTS—TYPICAL GROUPS OF FLOTSAM FROM THE CITY'S DUMPING-SCOWS CAST ASHORE IN THE ROCKAWAY DISTRICT.

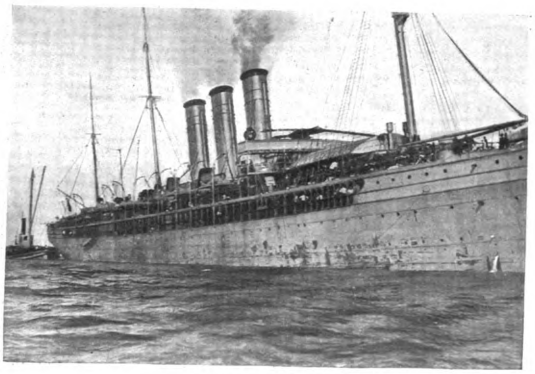
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE BATTLE OF LA GUASIMA, JUNE 24—THE HEROIC STAND OF THE ROUGH RIDERS.
Drawn by W. A. Rogers, from Descriptions received.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



GENERAL VIEW OF THE CITY, SHOWING CATHEDRAL ON THE TOP OF THE HILL.



THE CITY AND HARBOR FROM THE RESIDENCE OF THE BRITISH CONSUL.

SANTIAGO DE CUBA.

GOING ABOARD.

UNDER WAY.

DEPARTURE OF MICHIGAN TROOPS, ON AUXILIARY CRUISER "YALE," FROM HAMPTON ROADS FOR SANTIAGO, JUNE 23, 1898.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LONDON.

June 11, 1898

PARLIAMENT is again sitting, and wrangling, but nobody heeds. The riots at Belfast which have broken out this week in honor of the centenary of the Irish rebellion give point to Emerson's well-known remarks on the fluidity of politics. Just as the riots of 1886 were claimed by the one side as evidence of Ireland's unfitness for autonomy, so the bloodshed now reported as having occurred in the Orange stronghold is regarded by sanguine Nationalists as proof positive that imperial rule should cease. If Mr. Gladstone's Irish policy collapsed when he retired from public life, no certificate of death could be given to Gladstonian home-rule so long as he lived. Now that he is gone, the groups of politicians who form the Liberal party cannot indefinitely postpone a decision as to what is to be done with Ireland. Unionists whose unionism has not stifled their Liberalism, and who adhere to the body of doctrine preached by Mr. Gladstone in his prime, are watching the tactics of the Liberal leaders with eager interest. If Mr. Gladstone's death has really killed the three forms of home-rule associated with his name, the renunciation of the Irish alliance by his political successors, and the death of Liberal Unionism itself, would seem to be the natural sequel. The possibility of disbanding the Unionist party, however, is a problem now complicated by other considerations than those bearing upon Ireland. The alliance formed to defeat Mr. Gladstone continued to exist mainly to prevent the loss of markets and the disintegration of empire. The centre of political gravity is changed by Mr. Gladstone's death. Public interest has passed from domestic to foreign affairs. The mind of the man in the street is indifferent to constitutional change. He is bored with constitutional tinkerings. What the average citizen longs for is that Britain may peacefully retain and enlarge the prosperity she now enjoys, or, at the worst, triumphantly defend it

Although the tie between Mr. Dillon's party and the official Liberals is at present relaxed, there is, nevertheless, nothing to show that the Irish alliance may not be revived at any moment convenient to Liberal strategists. Nobody knows what the bickering syndicate of Liberal leaders really think about home-rule. It is improbable that any one of them sincerely believes that, where Mr. Gladstone failed, a second-rate politician will succeed. Until, therefore, a certificate of the death of home-rule be issued by responsible Liberal spokesmen, invested with plenary powers to bind the party, the Unionist alliance will be maintained intact. There is, however, another point of importance which tends to show that no material change in the existing composition of parties is immediately to be looked for. The deliberate efforts of Mr. Dillon and Mr. John Redmond, the leaders of the two Nationalist parties in Parliament, to poison the mind of America against Britain is a matter upon which the Liberal party probably has as definite an opinion as that of the followers of the government. Still, no Liberal leader—certainly not Mr. John Morley, the late Irish Secretary—has yet found it convenient to repudiate or denounce the conduct of the Irish Nationalists. If they were to do so, they would bar the door to a renewal of the entangling alliance which is the real source of the diseases of the Liberal party. Unionists, on the other hand, are unable to contemplate common action with politicians openly hostile to a friendly understanding with our American kinsmen. Among the friends of such enemies of an Anglo-American entente are to be found Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Asquith, Mr. John Morley, Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman, and Mr. Fowler. These gentlemen and their followers are suspect not only on account of the political company they have kept, but because of their silence in regard to the conduct of their Irish friends in denouncing Anglo-American friendship. Mr. Chamberlain's statement that war itself would not be too great a price to pay for an Anglo-American alliance is seriously accepted by the large majority of the English electors. The doctrine, however, is anathema maranatha to the Irish Nationalists. In this connection it is worth noting that personal dislike to Mr. Chamberlain, whose rising star begins to enlighten even the darker portions of the political firmament, constitutes the creed of as many extreme Radicals as extreme Tories.

General conviction begins to prevail that new problems and new developments will require new men to deal with them. Old shibboleths have lost their significance, and are mere tags, of which every one is weary. Enthusiasts desire to inscribe upon Mr. Gladstone's grave the words "Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform," and to adopt those words as the motto of the future Liberal party. Common-sense, however, tells the electors that peace is a matter determined more by the conduct of other nations than by their own, which has no higher interest; that retrenchment is impossible with a growing population and an era of universal armament; and that projects for constitutional reform simply nauseate the country. With a diminished export trade, and the visible menace to Anglo-Saxon freedom exhibited by certain powers, it is recognized that the policy of destructive reform, which has now lasted for nearly three parts of a century, has had its day. England is Liberal through and through, has been Liberal throughout the home-rule controversy, and became reactionary only when Liberal ministries began to confuse change with progress, and preferred the day-dreams of industrious visionaries—who chatter the dialect of reform or the idiom of local veto—to grappling with the evolution of Anglo-Saxon destiny. The present Liberal leaders have placed themselves in a cleft stick. At no distant day they will be compelled to acknowledge failure by retirement from nominal leadership which nobody acknowledges, or they will be compelled by circumstances to nail the green flag to the mast.

British reforms of the future are not to be found on the lines of constitutional change, but in the reorganization and improvement of existing institutions. As the debate last night showed, the country as a whole perceives as clearly as the Radicals that the Tory management of foreign affairs is neither businesslike nor successful. The reason is clear. The Foreign Office is a close corporation. Unlike the foreign offices of Russia, of Germany, or of France, it does not primarily exist for the nation. Downing Street is sufficient unto itself—contented in ignorance, it resents criticism, despises commerce, and is, therefore, out of touch with the business world. Great merchants tell me that neglect of British interests by the Foreign Office is organized into a system. So long as our budding diplomatists merely pass through the establishment of Mr. Scoonces, a well-known "coach," possess a minimum private income of $2000 a year, and are fairly well born, they are considered as suitable to cope with the best business men on the Continent. The interests of trade and of labor are, not unnaturally, neglected, when the chief of the Foreign Office is too preoccupied to make the acquaintance of his own subordinates, and when his immediate assistants are men who look down on trade with the same sense of compassion as that felt by the governing classes in the days when England was ostensibly governed in the interests of men of family. If anything approaching an Anglo-American alliance should ever be seriously contemplated, the democratization of the English Foreign Office is an essential preliminary. I have reason to know that these views are not confined to the opposition, or even to private members of Parliament.

Conflicting accounts reach this country on the subject of the United States army, and though the most trustworthy of these accounts do not paint the picture in couleur de rose, the inevitable effects of a long peace on military efficiency are by no means the monopoly of republics. In the forty years that elapsed between the battle of Waterloo and the fighting in the Crimea, the British army attained a maximum of inefficiency. It is only now, when the chief actors in the great drama of the struggle with Russia are dead, that the public is beginning to learn the extent of the incapacity and inefficiency of the men responsible for the equipment and training of the British army. But for the courage of the British private the Crimean campaign would have been a disastrous failure. Indeed, but for the accident of a fog on the morning of the battle of Inkerman, which enabled a handful of British troops to impress forty thousand Russian soldiers with the idea that they were more numerous and better supported than they really were, the English army would have been driven into the Black Sea, and the subsequent history of Europe altered beyond recognition. It was not until political and social influences were partly eliminated that our standing army began to prosper. Even now the efficiency of the Indian army and of the force under Sir Herbert Kitchener is attributed by capable critics to the fact that neither body of troops is under the control of the headquarters staff in London. The mismanagement, incompetence, and waste of the civilian staff of the War Office have not been materially reduced since the retirement of the Duke of Cambridge. The country does not get value for its money, while the officials interested in the maintenance of the present costly and inefficient administration naturally do their best to prevent the organization of the army passing into the hands of capable men. The influence of society is almost as paramount at the War Office as in the Department of Foreign Affairs. The task of purging the military stall in the Augean stable of maladministration is one that awaits the constructive statesman of the future. Mr. Chamberlain is the only man capable of such Herculean labor, and it is to him that the more thoughtful and energetic Tories are beginning to turn.

Mr. Chauncey Depew, who is now in Paris, is reported to have held a conversation with Monsieur Henri des Houx, in which he has expressed his views on the delicate question of an Anglo-American alliance. Mr. Depew is reported to have said that for more than a century the relations between the United States of America and the British government have been strained, and that although the States can come to an excellent understanding with England on certain clearly determined points, there is an abyss between the two countries which will prevent forever the formation of an alliance with England. "Our hearts are not drawn to that side," says Mr. Depew. Some remarkable utterances of the same speaker during the early days of the Venezuelan difficulty are not forgotten, but full allowance is made for Mr. Depew's position in the French capital, where the preparations for the United States section of the exhibition are understood to have fallen into arrears. It is only fair to Mr. Depew to say that his alleged statements are not yet corroborated.

Students of history, who hold that the friendship of France to the United States in the Revolutionary days was dictated less by love for the Americans than by hatred for England, will accept one of Mr. Depew's alleged statements as to the common aspirations of the French and American republics with a grain of salt. I have just returned from a short visit to France, where I have conversed with people of all classes. Without a single exception, the antipathy to America and the sympathy with Spain were most marked, especially among the propertied class in the country. France has invested $500,000,000 in Spain. The war, therefore, hits France almost as hardly as if she were a belligerent. For obvious reasons, the Paris shopkeepers can scarcely be taken as representative of the French nation. The burden of sustaining Spanish credit virtually falls upon French capitalists, and as Spain is bleeding to death, the task of sustaining her is becoming intolerable. There can be no true friendship between a decadent and a rising and triumphant race. That the French, notwithstanding their delightful qualities, are the decadent is a truth that any one with eyes in his head and the capacity for observation may see for himself. The ever-increasing use of alcohol in its most fiery and dangerous forms is felt by well-wishers to France to be ominous for the future of the race.

The fall of the great speculator Mr. Ernest Terah Hooley is exciting a good deal of interest. It is estimated that since March, 1896, the cash consideration received by Mr. Hooley from the companies he has floated amounted to close upon $35,000,000, and this without reckoning share holdings, some of which went to a high premium. The fact that he was on the verge of insolvency was not a secret to the initiated few. More than a month ago he accepted a judgment against him for a debt of $35,000, of which he was to pay $10,000 down, and $5000 a week for five weeks. For a reputed multi-millionaire to adopt this method of discharging a debt is tantamount to a confession of failure. Eight of Mr. Hooley's promotions have undergone a depreciation of more than $18,000,000. From the Dunlop Company alone he made a cash profit of $10,000,000. He was shrewd enough to take the public at the psychological moment, and his triumphant success proved his ruin. He never established an office in London, but conducted his business at a hotel. I am given to understand, on the highest authority, that some extremely interesting revelations may be looked for, humiliating to this country and to civilization. Mr. Gladstone was in the habit of saying that the greatest evil affecting our age was not bloated armaments, nor predatory socialism, nor bad legislation, but the growing love of money and the unconscientiousness of some rich men. The system of speculative finance which affords a man of the Hooley type opportunities for making millions out of the silly section of the public is obtaining a notoriety that is not without its menace to legitimate enterprise. The attempt of Monsieur Jaurés to bring about organic unity among the existing organizations of the socialistic party all over Europe is significant of much behind. Mr. Leiter's wheat deal helps M. Jaurés. It is much talked of among the poorer classes over here. The failure of Mr. Hooley recalls to mind his recent present of gold plate to St. Paul's Cathedral. The Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's are considered as lacking in judgment in accepting such a gift from a man who induced the public to give millions more for his various companies than they are worth. The plate in question is irreverently known as vessels of the "Hooley Communion Service."

Mr. John Morley has dealt with the Anglo-American alliance in a speech at Leeds, pitched in the same key as Sir William Harcourt's sneer at the "new Birmingham foreign policy." If he does not condemn outright Mr. Chamberlain's conception of an English-speaking alliance, he damns it with faint praise, and thus suggests to the American people a British coldness that does not exist. The form of Mr. John Morley's speech is perfect; his literary instinct safeguards him from lapsing into the slipshod style of the ordinary politician; but none the less is his meaning unintelligible, except on the theory that he reluctantly recognizes the fact that most sensible people in England and the States are bent on the establishment of closer relations—whatever he and his Irish masters may do or say. Pledged as he is to Irish autonomy, Mr. Morley is in a dilemma. Open approval of an Anglo-American alliance would place him under the ban of Mr. Dillon and Mr. Redmond, who are busily occupied in poisoning the wells of international good feeling. If, on the other hand, the late Irish Secretary were frankly to condemn Mr. Chamberlain's proposals, he would alienate that portion of the Liberal party which recognizes that home-rule was buried in Mr. Gladstone's grave. Mr. Morley is a philosopher, bookish, industrious, sedate, but he is devoid of the saving grace of humor—the salt of public life. Perspective has no more meaning to Mr. Morley than to a Chinese artist. He suffers from an obsession of the revolutionary idea of the eighteenth century. Consequently, every speech which he delivers, while admirable in form and delightful to hear or to read, is saturated with the spirit of an age as obsolete as that of Augustus. Search will be made in vain throughout all Mr. John Morley's utterances for any indication that he understands old things to have passed away, or that constructive statesmanship and the conservation of the liberties England now enjoys are the proper tasks of her rulers, present and to come.

From conversations with politicians of all shades of opinion, excepting the Irish, I gather that anxiety is felt, not least in government circles, as to the composition of the Anglo-American commission for the arrangement of the difficulties between the United States and Canada. I may perhaps record the conviction entertained here that unless the commissioners appointed on both sides are qualified by their antecedents and opinions to come to an early arrangement, a favorable issue is scarcely to be expected. The names of the American commissioners are looked for with much interest.

The Wagner cycle, which was heralded with a flourish of trumpets, is now in full swing at Covent Garden. Disciples of the master are divided as to the merits of the rendering of the "Rheingold," the "Walküre," and "Siegfried." Every one admits that under Herr Mottl the orchestration has been superb. On the other hand, the stage-management is criticised as inadequate. The abbreviation of the score is denounced as ruthless, and many of the performers are regarded as inappropriate. Many thousands of pounds have been collected by the management on the understanding that the well-known Baireuth tradition was to be followed, and that we were to have in London a cycle represented under the Wagnerian method. These proposals, however, have been seriously interfered with by the despotism of the London dinner hour. Dinner is incompatible with an unmutilated score, and as subscribers to the cycle prefer food to music, the score has been ruthlessly cut. Furthermore, it has been found difficult or impossible to engage actors competent not only to sing, but willing to act Wagnerian drama in the manner laid down by the master himself. The stage-management of "Siegfried" is denounced as inferior to the standard of a musical German provincial town. Evidence exists already of all the elements for a great musical controversy, the echo of which will doubtless reach the other side of the Atlantic.

Amid wars and rumors of wars it is pleasant to turn aside to the giant struggle for the championship in the open golf competition. This year it has been won by a professional, Harry Varden, of Scarborough, on the Prestwich Links, which are described by Mr. Horace Hutchinson in his delightful Golfing Pilgrim. Prestwich is not St. Andrews, but the course, which contains a mighty range of sand hills with the awesome name of Himalayas, is not an easy one. Over this course, Himalayas, Alps, and all, Varden played four rounds in 307 strokes, an average of four and a quarter strokes a hole, with a crowd, a close competition, and some bad weather. This achievement implies a delicacy of touch, nervous strength, and steady eye which may fairly be looked on as matchless. I believe Varden was once a Jersey caddie, a fact that should inspire the whole caddie fraternity with a desire to live up to the reputation of their great representative.

ARNOLD WHITE.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS.*

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "THE GREAT STONE OF SARDIS," ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY A. B. FROST.

IV.—A CATARACT OF INFORMATION.

PETER SADLER would have been glad to have the Archibald party stay at his hotel for a few days, and Mrs. Archibald would have been perfectly satisfied to remain there until they were ready to return to their own house, but her husband and Margery were impatient to be in the woods, and it was therefore decided to start for the camp the next day. Peter Sadler was a man of system, and his arrangements were made promptly and rapidly.

"You've got to have a guide," said he, "and another man to help him, and I think I'll give you Phil Matlack. Phil is an old hand at the business, and if you don't know what you want, he'll tell you. If you are in Phil's hands, you needn't be afraid anything will happen to you. Whatever you want, ask him for it, and ten to one he'll have it, whether it's information or fish-hooks. I tell you again, you're lucky to be here early and get the best of everything. Camp Rob with Phil Matlack will stand at a premium in three or four weeks from now."

That evening after supper Mr. Archibald lighted a cigar and went out into the grounds in front of the hotel, where he was presently joined by his wife.

"Where is Margery?" asked he.

"She is in her room," replied Mrs. Archibald, "but she called to me that she would be down directly."

In about ten minutes down came Margery and floated out upon the lawn. She was dressed in white, with flowers in her hair, and she was more charming, Mr. Archibald said, as she approached, than even the sunset sky.

"You should not speak in that way of works of nature," said his wife.

"Isn't she a work of nature?" he asked.

"Not altogether," was the wise reply. "Why did you dress yourself in that fashion?" she asked Margery. "I did not suppose you would bring such a fine gown, as we started out to go into camp. And even in this hotel a travelling suit is good enough for any one."

"Oh, I tucked this into one of my bags," replied Margery. "I always like to have something nice to fall back upon. Don't you want to take a little stroll, Aunt Harriet?"

Mr. Archibald leaned back in his garden chair and slowly puffed his cigar, and as he puffed he took his eyes from the sunset sky and watched his wife and Margery.

A little beyond them, as they walked, sat two elderly ladies on a bench, wearing shawls, and near by stood a girl in a short dress, with no hat on, and a long plait down her back. A little further on was a tennis-court, and four people, apparently young, were playing tennis. There were two men, and neither of them wore a tennis suit. One was attired as a bicyclist, and the other wore ordinary summer clothes. The young women were dressed in dark blue flannel and little round hats, which suggested to Mr. Archibald the deck of a yacht.

Near the hotel was an elderly gentleman walking up and down by himself, and on the piazza were the rest of the guests he had seen at the table—not very many, for it was early in the season.

Mr. Archibald now turned his eyes again to the sky. It was still beautiful, although its colors were fading, and after a time he looked back toward his wife. She was now talking to the two elderly ladies on the bench, and Margery was engaged in conversation with the girl with the plait down her back.

"When I finish my cigar," thought Mr. Archibald, "I will go myself and take a stroll." And it struck him that he might talk to the old gentleman, who was still walking up and down in front of the hotel. After contemplating the tops of some forest trees against the greenish-yellow of the middle sky, he turned his eyes again toward his wife, and found that the two elderly ladies had made room for her on the bench, that the tennis game had ceased, and that one of the girls in blue flannel had joined this group and was talking to Margery.

In a few moments all the ladies on the bench rose, and Mrs. Archibald and one of them walked slowly toward an opening in the woods. The other lady followed with the little girl, and Margery and the young woman in blue walked in the same direction, but not in company with the rest of the party. The two young men, with the other tennis-player between them, walked over from the tennis-court and joined the first group, and they all stopped just as they reached the woods. There they stood and began talking to each other, after which one of the young men and the young woman approached a large tree, and he poked with a stick into what was probably a hole near its roots, and Mr. Archibald supposed that the discussion concerned a snake-hole or a hornets' nest. Then Margery and the other young woman came up, and they looked at the hole. Now the whole company walked into the woods and disappeared. In about ten minutes Mr. Archibald finished his cigar and was thinking of following his wife and Margery, when the two elderly ladies and Mrs. Archibald came out into the open and walked toward the hotel. Then came the little girl, running very fast as she passed the tree with the hole near its roots. In a few minutes Mrs. Archibald stopped and looked back toward the woods; then she walked a little way in that direction, leaving her companions to go to the hotel. Now the young man in the bicycle suit emerged from the woods, with a girl in dark blue flannel on each side of him.

"Upon my word!" exclaimed Mr. Archibald, and rising to his feet, advanced toward his wife; but before he reached her, Margery emerged from the wood road, escorted by the young man in the summer suit.

"Upon my word," Mr. Archibald remarked, this time to his wife, "that ward of ours is not given to wasting time."

"It seems so, truly," said she, "and I think her mother was right when she called her a creature of impulse. Let us wait here until they come up. We must all go in; it is getting chilly."

In a few minutes Margery and the young man had reached them.

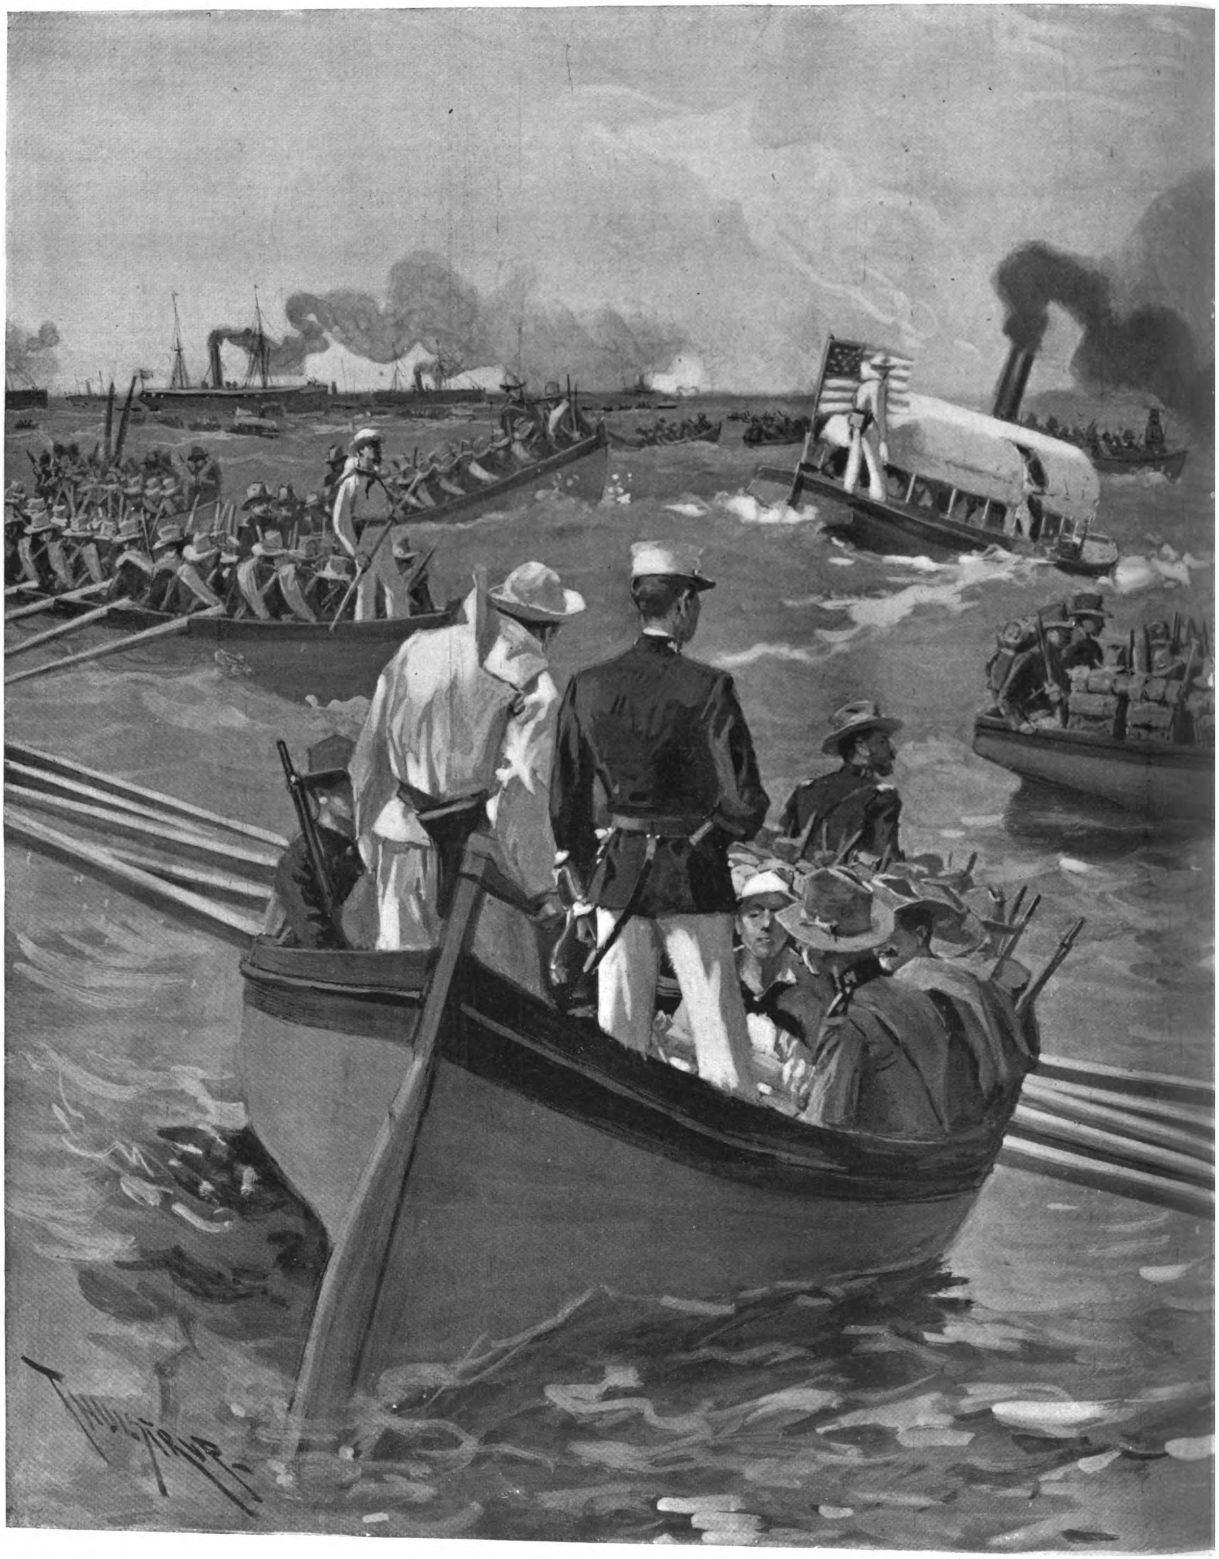
"Thank you very much," said this creature of impulse to her escort. "My uncle and aunt will take care of me now. Aunt Harriet and Uncle Archibald, this is Mr. Clyde. He saw a great snake go into a hole over there just before supper-time, and I think we ought all to be very careful how we pass that way."

"I don't think there is very much danger after nightfall," said Mr. Clyde, who was a pleasant youth with brown hair, "and to-morrow I'll see if I can't kill him. It's a bad place for a snake to have a hole just where ladies would be apt to take their walks."

"I don't think the snake will trouble us much," said Mrs. Archibald, "for we leave to-morrow. Still, it would be a good thing to kill it."

After this there were a few remarks made about snakes, and then Mr. Clyde bade them good-evening.

"How in the world, Margery," said Mrs. Archibald, "did you get acquainted so quickly with that young man—and who is he?"

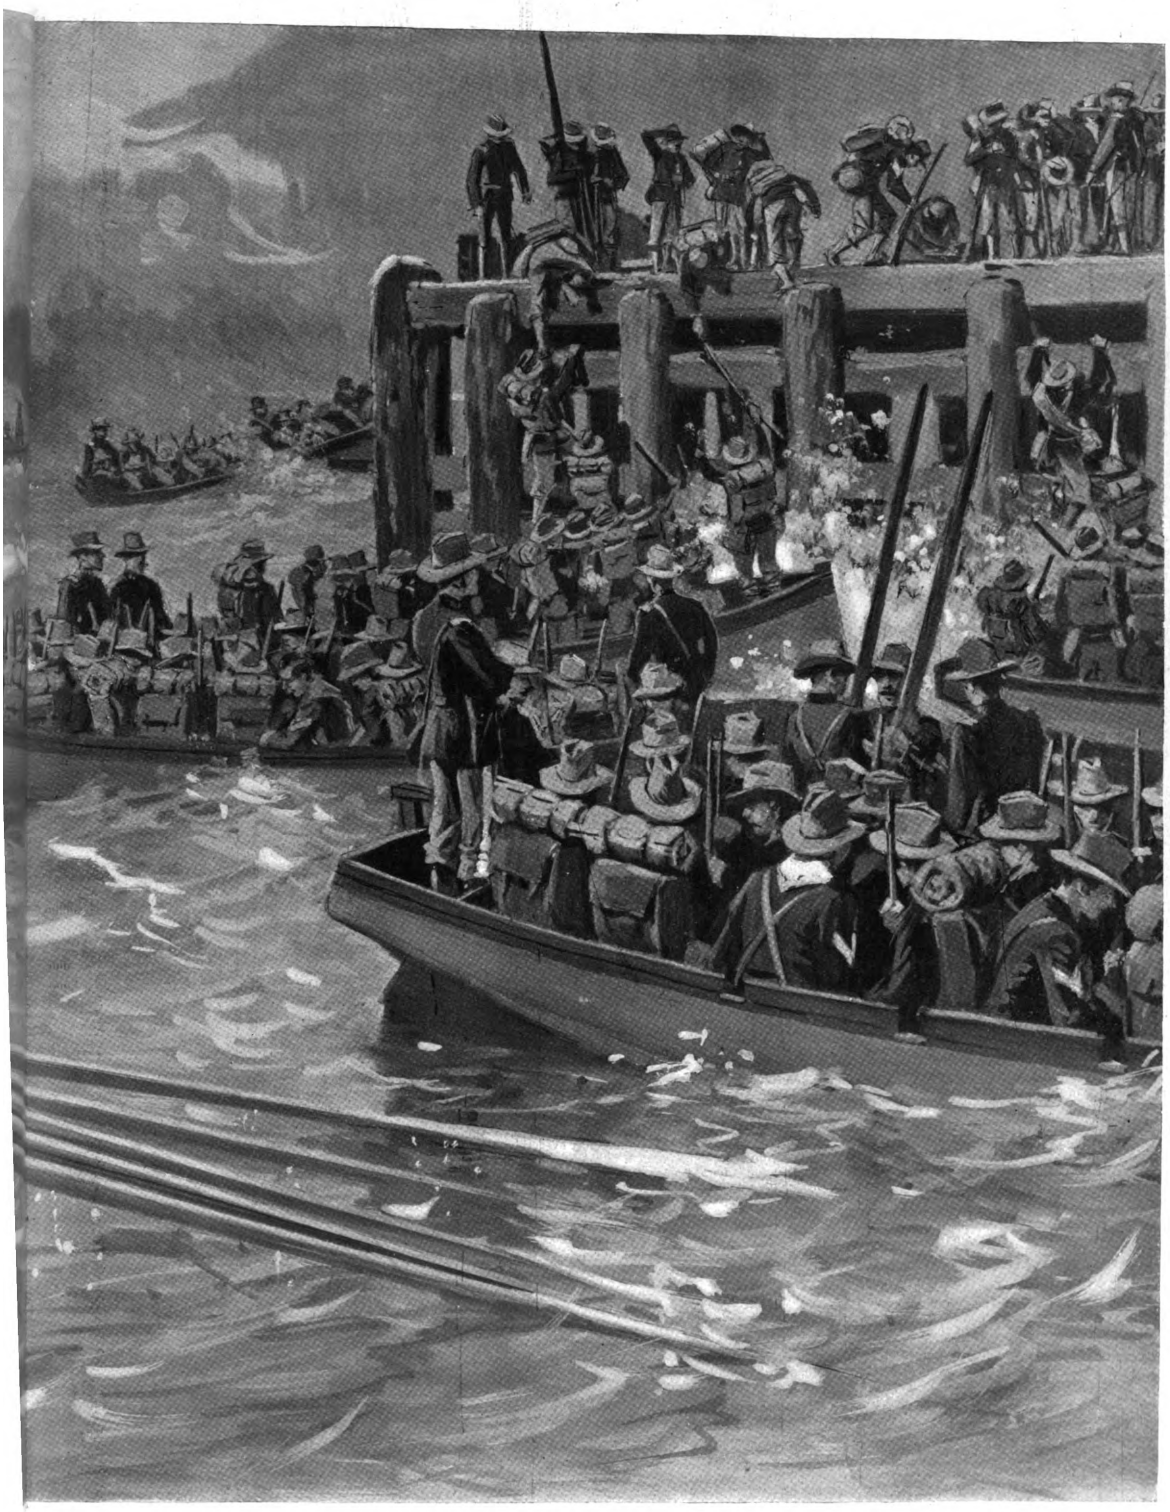


"Oh, it all happened quite naturally," said she. "As we turned to go out of the woods he was the gentleman nearest to me, and so of course he came with me. Those two girls are sisters, and their name is Dodworth. They introduced Mr. Clyde and the other gentleman, Mr. Raybold, to me. But that was after you had been talking to Mrs. Dodworth, their mother, who is Mr. Raybold's aunt. The other lady, with the shawl on, is Mrs. Henderson; and —would you believe it?—she's grandmother to that girl in the short dress! She doesn't begin to look old enough. The Dodworths don't go into camp at all, but expect to stay here for two weeks longer, and then they go to the sea-shore. Mrs. Henderson leaves day after to-morrow.

"Mr. Clyde and his friend live in Boston. They are both just beginning to practise law, though Mr. Clyde says that Mr. Raybold would rather be an actor, but his family objects. The old gentleman who is walking up and down in front of the hotel has heart-disease, some people say—but that is not certain. He staid here all last summer, and perhaps he will this year. In two weeks hardly any of the people now in this hotel will be here. One family is going into camp when the father and two sons come on to join them, and the rest are going to the sea-shore, except one lady. You may have noticed her—the one with a dark purple dress and a little purple cap. She's a school-teacher, and she will spend the rest of the summer with her sister in Pennsylvania.

"That man Phil Matlack, who is going with us to-morrow, is quite a character, and I expect I shall like him awfully. They say that about five years ago he

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2167.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE INVASION

TROOPS OF GENERAL SHAFTER'S COMMAND LANDING FROM TRANSPORTS AT

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

OF CUBA.

BAIQUIRI, NEAR SANTIAGO, JUNE 22.—DRAWN BY T. DE THULSTRUP.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

killed a man who made an attack on him in the woods, but he was never tried for it, nor was anything whatever done to him, because Mr. Sadler said he was right, and he would not have any nonsense about it. There are people about here who believe that Phil Matlack would fight a bear single-handed if it happened to be necessary. Mr. Sadler would do it himself if he could walk. Nobody knows how many men he killed when he was fighting Indians; and, would you believe it? his wife is a plain little quiet woman, who lives in some part of the hotel where nobody ever sees her, because she is rather bashful and dislikes company.

"The other person who is going with us is not very much more than a boy, though they say he is very strong and a good hunter. His name is Martin Sanders, and I forgot to say that the old gentleman with the heart-disease is named Parker.

"It's generally thought that Phil Matlack would rather have some one else than Martin Sanders to go with him, because he says Martin knows too much. The fact is that Martin is very well educated, and could have gone into some good business, but he was so fond of the woods that he gave up everything to come out here and learn guiding. You know we were told that our camp in the woods has three rooms in it? Well, it really has four, for there was an artist there last year who built a little room for a studio for rainy days. I expect Mr. Sadler forgot that, or didn't think it worth counting. There are no snakes at all where we are going to camp, but two miles farther on there are lots of them."

"Over the brink of Niagara," interjected Mr. Archibald, "they say eighteen million cubic feet of water pour every minute. Where on earth, Margery, did you fill your mind with all that information?"

"I got it from those two Dodworth girls and Mr. Clyde," said she. "Mr. Raybold told me some things, too, but mostly about his bicycle. He feels badly about it, because he brought it here, and now he finds there is no place to use it. I should think he ought to have known that the primeval forest isn't any place for a bicycle."

"Mr. Archibald," said Mrs. Archibald, when they had retired to their room, "I did not agree with you when you wished we could have started for camp to-day, but now I am quite of your mind."

Tuesday was fine, and preparations were made for the Archibald party to start for their camp after an early luncheon.

The bluff and hearty Peter took such an interest in everything that was being done for their comfort, giving special heed to all possible requirements of Mrs. Archibald, that the heart of Mr. Archibald was touched.

"I wish," said he to his good-natured host, "that you were going with us. I do not know any one I would rather camp with than you."

"If I could do it," replied Peter, "I'd like it ever so well. So far as I have been able to make you out, you are the sort of a man I'd be willing to run a camp for. What I like about you is that you haven't any mind of your own. There is nothing I hate worse than to run against a man with a mind of his own. Of course there have to be such fellows, but let them keep away from me. There is no room here for more than one mind, and I have pre-empted the whole section."

Mr. Archibald laughed. "Your opinion of me does not sound very complimentary," he said.

"It is complimentary!" roared Peter Sadler, striking the table with his fist. "Why, I tell you, sir, I couldn't say anything more commendable of you if I tried! It shows that you are a man of common-sense, and that's pretty high praise. Everything I've told you to do you've done. Everything I've proposed you've agreed to. You see for yourself that I know what is better for you and your party than you do, and you stand up like a man and say so. Yes, sir; if a rolling-chair wasn't as bad for the woods as the bicycle that Boston chap brought down here, I'd go along with you."

Mr. Archibald had a very sharp sense of the humorous, and in his enjoyment of a comical situation he liked company. His heart was stirred to put his expedition in its true light before this man who was so honest and plain-spoken. "Mr. Sadler," said he, "if you will take it as a piece of confidential information, and not intended for the general ear, I will tell you what sort of a holiday my wife and I are taking. We are on a wedding-journey." And then he told the story of the proxy bridal tour.

Peter Sadler threw himself back in his chair and laughed with such great roars that two hunting-dogs who were asleep in the hall sprang to their feet and dashed out of the back door, their tails between their legs.

"By the Lord Harry!" cried Peter Sadler, "you and your wife are a pair of giants. I don't say anything about that young woman, for I don't believe it would have made any difference to her whether you were on a wedding-trip or travelling into the woods to bury a child. I tell you, sir, you mayn't have a mind that can give out much, but you've got a mind that can take in the biggest kind of thing, and that is what I call grand. It is the difference between a canyon and a mountain. There are lots of good mountains in this world, and mighty few good canyons. Tom, you Tom, come here!"

In answer to the loud call a boy came running up.

"Go into my room," said Peter Sadler, "and bring out a barrel bottle, large size, and one of the stone jars with a red seal on it. Now, sir," said he to Mr. Archibald, "I am going to give you a bottle of the very best whiskey that ever a human being took into the woods, and a jar of smoking-tobacco a great deal too good for any king on any throne. They belong to my private stock, and I am proud to make them a present to a man who will take a wedding-trip to save his grown-up daughter the trouble. As for your wife, there'll be a basket that will go to her with my compliments, that will show her what I think of her. By-the-way, sir, have you met Phil Matlack?"

"No, I have not!" exclaimed Mr. Archibald, with animation. "I have heard something about him, and before we start I should like to see the man who is going to take charge of us in camp."

"Well, there he is, just passing the back door. Hello, Phil! come in here."

When the eminent guide Phil Matlack entered the hall, Mr. Archibald looked at him with some surprise, for he was not the conventional tall, gaunt, wiry, keen-eyed backwoodsman who had naturally appeared to his mental vision. This man was of medium height, a little round-shouldered, dressed in a gray shirt, faded brown trousers very baggy at the knees, a pair of conspicuous blue woollen socks, and slippers made of carpet. His short beard and his hair were touched with gray, and he wore a small jockey cap. With the exception of his eyes, Mr. Matlack's facial features were large, and the expression upon them was that of a mild and generally good-natured tolerance of the world and all that was in it. It may be stated that this expression, combined with his manner, indicated also a desire on his part that the world and all that is in it should tolerate him. Mr. Archibald's first impressions of the man did not formulate themselves in these terms; he simply thought that the guide was a slipshod sort of a fellow.

"Phil," said Mr. Sadler, "here is the gentleman you are going to take into camp."

"Glad to see him," said Matlack; "hope he'll like it."

"And I want to say to you, Phil," continued Sadler, "right before him, that he is a first-class man for you to have in charge. I don't believe you ever had a better one. He's a city man, and it's my opinion he don't know one thing about hunting, fishing, making a camp fire, or even digging bait. I don't suppose he ever spent a night outside of a house, and doesn't know any more about the weather than he does about planting cabbages. He's just clean, bright, and empty, like a new peach-basket. What you tell him he'll know, and what you ask him to do he'll do, and if you want a better man than that to take into camp, you want too much. That's all I've got to say."

Matlack looked at Peter Sadler and then at Mr. Archibald, who was leaning back in his chair, his bright eyes twinkling.

"How did you find out all that about him?" he asked.

"Humph!" exclaimed Peter Sadler. "Don't you suppose I can read a man's character when I've had a good chance at him? Now how about the stores—have they all gone on?"

"They were sent out early this mornin'," said Matlack, "and we can start as soon as the folks are ready."

V.—CAMP ROB.

It was early in the afternoon when the Archibald party took up the line of march for Camp Rob. The two ladies, supplied by Mrs. Sadler with coarse riding-skirts, sat each upon a farm-horse, and Mr. Archibald held the bridle of the one that carried his wife. Matlack and Martin Sanders, the young man who was to assist him, led the way, while a led horse, loaded with the personal baggage of the travellers, brought up the rear.

Their way wound through a forest over a wood road, very rough and barely wide enough for the passage of a cart. The road was solemn and still, except where here and there an open space allowed the sunlight to play upon a few scattered wild flowers and brighten the sombre tints of the undergrowth.

After a ride which seemed a long one to the ladies, who wished they had attired themselves in walking costume, the road and the forest suddenly came to an end, and before them stretched out the waters of a small lake. Camp Rob was not far from the head of the lake, and for some distance above and below the forest stood back from the water's edge. In the shade of a great oak-tree there stood a small log house, rude enough to look at, but moderately comfortable within, and from this house to the shore a wide space was cleared of bushes and undergrowth.

The lake was narrow in proportion to its length, which was about two miles, and on the other side the forest looked like a solid wall of green reflected in the water beneath. Even Mrs. Archibald, whose aching back began to have an effect upon her disposition, was delighted with the beauty of the scene, which delight endured until she had descended from her horse and entered the log cabin in which she was to dwell for a time.

It is not necessary to describe the house, nor is it necessary to dive into the depths of Mrs. Archibald's mind as she gazed about her, passing silently from room to room of the little house. She was a good woman, and she had made up her mind that she would not be a millstone around the necks of her companions. Many people have been happy in camps, and, indeed, camp life has become one of the features of our higher civilization, and this, from what she had heard, must be a camp above the common. So, think what she might, she determined to make no open complaint. If it were possible for her to be happy, here she would be happy.

As for Margery, no determination was needed in her case. Everything was better than she had expected to find it. The cabin, with the bark on almost everything, even the furniture, was just what a house in the woods ought to be; and when she entered the little studio, which was nearer allied to the original forest than any other part of the house, she declared that that must be her room, and that living there she would feel almost like a dryad in an oak.

"You've camped out before?" said Phil Matlack to Mr. Archibald, as he was taking a survey of the scene.

"Oh yes," said the other; "I've been out a few days at a time with fishing parties, but we never had such a fine camp as this—so well located and such good accommodations."

"You are a fisherman, then?" said the guide.

"Yes. Very fond of it. Have fished ever since I was a boy, and know a good deal about bait, in spite of what Mr. Sadler said."

"I had an idea of that sort," remarked Phil; "but it ain't no use to contradict Peter. It helps keep up his spirits for him to think he can read the characters of people just as quick as he can aim a rifle. And it's a mighty important thing to keep Peter's spirits up. If Peter's spirits was to go down, things round here would flatten out worse than a rotten punkin when it's dropped."

It did not take long to establish the new-comers in their woodland quarters. The tent for the two men, which had arrived in the morning, was pitched not far from the cabin, and then Matlack and Martin went to work to prepare supper. The dining-room in pleasant weather was the small space in front of the house, where there was a table made of a wide board supported by stakes, with a low and narrow board on each side, also resting on stakes, and forming seats.

The supper was a better one and better served than any of the party had expected. The camp outfit included table cloths and even napkins.

"To-morrow," said Matlack, as he brought a dish of hot and savory broiled ham, "after Mr. Archibald gets to work, we'll have some fish."

Mrs. Archibald had been a little fearful that under these primitive conditions the two men might expect to sit at the table with them, but she need have had no such fears. Matlack and Martin cooked and waited with a skill and deftness which would have surprised any one who did not reflect that this was as much their business as hunting or woodcraft.

After supper a camp fire was built at a safe distance from the house, for although the evening air was but slightly cool, a camp without a camp fire would not be a camp. The party ranged themselves around it, Mrs. Archibald on a rug brought from the cabin, and her husband and Margery on the ground. Mr. Archibald lighted his pipe, the fire lighted the trees and the lake, and joy inexpressible lighted the heart of Margery.

"If I could smoke a pipe," said she, "and get Mr. Matlack to come here and tell me how he killed a man, I should be perfectly happy."

That night Mrs. Archibald lay awake on her straw mattress. Absolute darkness was about her, but through the open window she could see, over the tops of the trees on the other side of the lake, one little star.

"If I could get any comfort out of that little star," thought the good lady, "I would do it; but I can't do it, and there is nothing else to comfort me."

On the other side of the room, on another straw mattress, she could hear her husband breathing steadily. Then, upon the bare boards of the floor, which were but a few inches below her little cot-bed, she thought she heard the patter of small feet. A squirrel, perhaps, or, horrible to think of, it might be a rat. She was sure rats would eat straw beds, and her first impulse was to wake Mr. Archibald; but she hesitated, he was sleeping so soundly. Still she listened, and now she became almost certain that what she heard was not the patter of small feet; it sounded more like something soft which was dragging itself over the floor—possibly a snake. This idea was simply awful, and she sat up in bed. Still she did not call Mr. Archibald, for should he suddenly spring on the floor, he would be in more danger from the snake than she was.

She listened and she listened, but she heard nothing more, and then her reason began to assure her that a snake's movements on a bare floor would be absolutely noiseless; but in a moment all thoughts of serpents were driven from her head. Outside of the cabin she heard a sound that could be nothing less than the footsteps of some living creature—a wild beast, perhaps a panther. The door was shut and fastened, but the window was open. To call Mr. Archibald and tell him a wild beast was walking outside the house would be positively wicked. Half awakened, he would probably rush out of the door to see what it was. What could she do? For an instant she thought of lighting a candle and standing it in the window. She knew that wild beasts were afraid of fire, and she did not believe that even a panther would dare jump over a lighted candle. But if she struck a match and got up she would waken her husband; and besides, if the wind, of which she could feel a puff every now and then, did not blow out the candle, it might blow it over and set fire to the cabin.

She heard the footsteps no more, and lay down again, but not to sleep. The wind seemed to be rising, and made a wild unearthly sound as it surged through the trees which surrounded and imprisoned her, and shut her out from the world in which she was born and in which she ought to live. There was a far-away sound which came to her ears once, twice, thrice, and which might have been the call of some ghostly bird or the war-whoop of an Indian. At last she drew her covering over her head, determined that so long as she could not see she would not hear.

"A wedding-journey!" she said to herself, and the idea, coupled with the sense of her present grewsome and doleful condition, was so truly absurd and ridiculous that she could not restrain a melancholy laugh.

"What is the matter, my dear?" exclaimed Mr. Archibald, suddenly turning over in his bed. "Are you choking? Is the room too close? Shall I open the door?"

"No, indeed," she said, "for that was a laugh you heard. I couldn't help laughing at the thought that there should be two such idiots in the world as you and myself."

"It is idiotic, isn't it?" said Mr. Archibald. "It is gloriously idiotic, and it will do us both a world of good. It is such complete and perfect change that I don't wonder you laugh." And he laughed himself, clearly and loudly, and turned over on his side and went to sleep.

Mrs. Archibald knew that she would not sleep another wink that night, but she did sleep seven hours and a half, and was awakened by Margery singing outside her window.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

SONG OF THE BATTLE-SHIP STOKERS.

HEAVE on the coal, to win the goal
Of a blasting ocean war!
By pits of hell stand sentinel,
As the deadly cannon roar.
The engines beat in blanching heat;
Our battle-ship ploughs her course;
Up there they fight in cool daylight,
While we feed the monster's force.

Over the sea, our battery
Will lay waste the upper world;
And far from fame we feed the flame,
As the bursting bombs are hurled.
We cannot know the ebb and flow
Of the battle's rushing tide;
But hear the boom of unknown doom
Where the thundering war-ships ride.

Each moment passed may be our last,
For the crashing bomb-shells fly,
And fires of fate reverberate
In the wide, smoke-laden sky.
In lurid night we feed the fight,
As the belching cannon roar.
Heave on the coal, to win the goal
Of our country's ocean war!

KATHARINE COOLIDGE.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MADRID—PLAZA WHERE HERETICS WERE BURNED

A YANKEE IN SPAIN.

IX.—THE ENGLISH EMBASSY IN MADRID.—THE POLITICAL SITUATION FROM THE STAND-POINT OF A TYPICAL SPANIARD.

BY POULTNEY BIGELOW

ILLUSTRATED WITH PHOTOGRAPHS BY THE AUTHOR.

SIR HENRY DRUMMOND WOLF represented England in Spain on the occasion of my first visit, and to this fortunate circumstance I must attribute the rare treat of an inspection of one of the most interesting buildings in Madrid, the British Embassy. Sir Henry is as proud of his Spanish official residence as though he himself had invented it, and took me over the different apartments in the spirit of an enthusiast delighting in a work of art of his own creation. For he occupies the house which once belonged to Cardinal Ximenes—the palace of a man who was at one time more powerful than his king; the man, in short, whom some possibly sincere people still publicly defend as the organizer of the Spanish Inquisition. I confess that, even as the guest of so cheerful an entertainer as the British ambassador, the dishes that were offered me lost something of their savor for being served in halls that must have heard the moans of brave men who were being twisted out of shape in neighboring rooms. This feeling wears off after a while, else Sir Henry would not have looked so well. I am speaking here, however, of the spring of 1897. On my last visit he was away on sick-leave.

Sir Henry talked freely on the political situation, as it was then—when it seemed about as bad as to-day. Of course a diplomat can never be publicly quoted, unless he himself supplies the quotation marks. In many respects the English embassy was in a better position to know what was about to happen than any other in Madrid, not excepting our own. England is on a friendly footing with Spain, not merely for the sentimental reason that British troops helped to establish her independence from the rule of Napoleon, but for the more substantial reason that England is an excellent customer for Spanish wines, oranges, raisins, olives, and has no rival colonial interests. True it is that whenever other news is slack the Spanish press discovers that Gibraltar is on Spanish territory, but before that fact is generally appreciated there is a Carlist war, or an insurrection in one of her colonies, which serves to distract attention for the moment. English tourists are the ones that are alone recognized in Spain—the only ones credited with money and the capacity for looking after themselves. When the natives see a Yankee, they never suspect him of being other than English—which, by-the-way, is a mighty lucky thing for us nowadays. At the same time that England is highly respected by Spaniards, that country is the only one whose representative in Madrid has uniformly treated the American minister as his colleague and friend. There seems to be an unwritten law in all out-of-the-way places that whenever an American gets into a tight place he can count on the assistance of John Bull.

ARTILLERY FOR CUBA PASSING THROUGH MADRID.

Whether there was any understanding between the two governments a year ago, or whether there is at this moment (April 16), I know not, but it struck me as a happy omen, when the American Legation was guarded against the possible outbreak of a mob, and when our minister was shunned by Spanish society, that the British representative should pay him conspicuous attention—in short, give unofficial notice to Spain that England and the United States bore relations to each other that could not be strengthened in treaties.

If in the future any cause for quarrel should ever arise between England and our country, there will not be wanting friends of peace who will then recall to our people that when our legation in Madrid was in danger, it was England that spontaneously offered us the protection of her flag.

Sir Henry said nothing of this kind to me; it was all too much a matter of course. But he showed me the little rooms where the monks had prayed and fasted before going to assist at the dismemberment of some wretched heretic. These little cells make very small bedrooms for the diplomats of to-day, to be sure, but it would be a thousand pities to have this interesting building altered for the sake of more luxurious sleeping-spaces. Sir Henry pointed out to me the little grated panels in the massive doors, through which food was passed, and by means of which a watch was maintained upon the holy brethren.

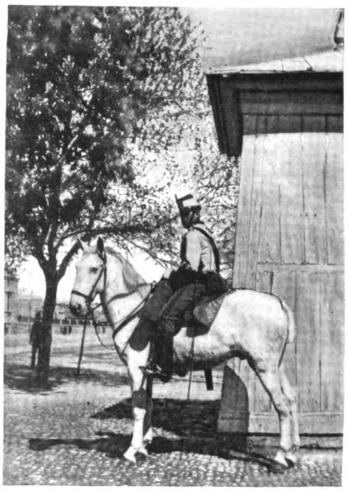
Underneath the street runs a tunnel, connecting the palace of the cardinal with the building across the way, which was the prison where the accused were confined until their bodies had lost all elasticity and their minds all capacity for coherent reasoning. I had seen enough. The prospect of a visit to those vile dungeons did not stimulate me in the least. Torture-chambers do not interest me; no more does the bull-ring.

On returning to my lodgings in the Calle de Fernando di Federico di Madrazo, I found little Carmen much agitated by the news that a señor was waiting for me upstairs. It proved to be a Spanish gentleman whom I had met at the table of Mr. Castelar—a gentleman who had filled honorably a high office under the government. He had large estates in Spain, and was a traveller familiar with social life in other capitals of Europe. He had his carriage waiting downstairs, and asked me to take a drive with him in the park. I accepted with pleasure, on condition that he frankly answer all my questions. He said he would, and so I began by the most delicate of all—how so Christian a people tolerated bull-fighting. He took my question in good part, though he warned me that amongst Spaniards who did not travel the bull-ring was almost too sacred a thing to question. Even the Queen-Regent, one of the most beautiful characters he had ever known, lost some of her influence over the people because she never would appear at a bull-fight. Yet she cannot prevent the little King from being debauched by this degrading spectacle.

I asked if the clergy did not take some organized stand against it. He said, "They are unpopular enough already; they cannot afford to jeopardize the little that remains to them."

As my friend explained this matter of the proverbial Spanish cruelty to me, I gathered these scraps of conclusions: The Spaniard, individually, is as gentle, as kind to his familiars, as the people of other European countries. His sins spring mostly from ignorance, which, in its turn, produces a certain indifference. He looks on at a cruel act merely because no one has taught him that cruelty is wrong. Societies for the prevention of cruelty to animals may exist, but so long as the public conscience on the subject is not awakened their efforts waste themselves in philanthropic resolutions. Our consul in Barcelona, H. W. Bowen, an old collegemate, told me, on the occasion of my visit there, that he had taken, or rather striven to take, an active interest in such a society from the very outset of his official residence in the country, but that he soon discovered that its functions were mainly of the resolution-passing kind.

In Spain I have frequently had to admire the intelligent manner in which the mules and their masters have understood one another in the matter of working up and down steep hills. I have seen Spanish drivers chatting with their animals and sharing their loaf of bread with them. We are of course prone to notice the occasions when a driver loses patience and flogs unreasonably, but against these few I am prepared to believe that the great majority of Spaniards love their useful animals, and treat them as well as they treat themselves. On the whole of our bicycle run I cannot recall a single instance of a lame mule, horse, or donkey in harness. I wonder if I could say as much after an equally varied journey in America or in England.



My Spanish friend knew that I was an American, of course, and yet on my return to Madrid this spring, after a year's absence, he welcomed me as cordially as ever. He spoke with feeling about the impending war, and voiced the same thoughts as his friend Castelar—that war was a disgraceful thing to happen at such a time between two such countries. "We are both to blame in this matter," said he, "but the most important thing to be done, if peace is to result, is to take such a matter as this out of the hands of popular agitators and leave it to a tribunal of impartial jurists.

"God knows that we Spaniards ardently desire peace, at any price that does not stain our national honor. The United States have helped to make the Cuban rebellion formidable, and now your government upbraids us because we do not put an end to it at once."

I pointed out to him that the American public sentiment on this subject had been developed gradually by the constant reports from Cuba, showing us that the war there was being waged in a cruel manner. He admitted this, and deplored the fact that when Spaniards got to fighting it became a question not of taking but of killing the most prisoners.

"The Cubans are like us in this matter," said he. He went on to point out that Spain at bottom lived still in the Middle Ages so far as views of war were concerned, and that things which we regarded as barbarous to them were mere matters of course.

It was hard to press this point without losing our tempers, so I asked him how far his government would be apt to go towards a solution of this Cuban matter. I pointed out at the same time that Americans had but little faith left for any promises made by the Spanish government unless action went before. Mr. Castelar had in the previous year told me that he thought the government meant to be generous in its treatment of Cuba, and the late Prime-Minister Cánovas had assured me emphatically, as late as March of 1897, that he contemplated the fullest home-rule for Cuba—home-rule that could not fail to satisfy every sensible Cuban.

HORSE-GUARD OPPOSITE KING'S PALACE, MADRID.

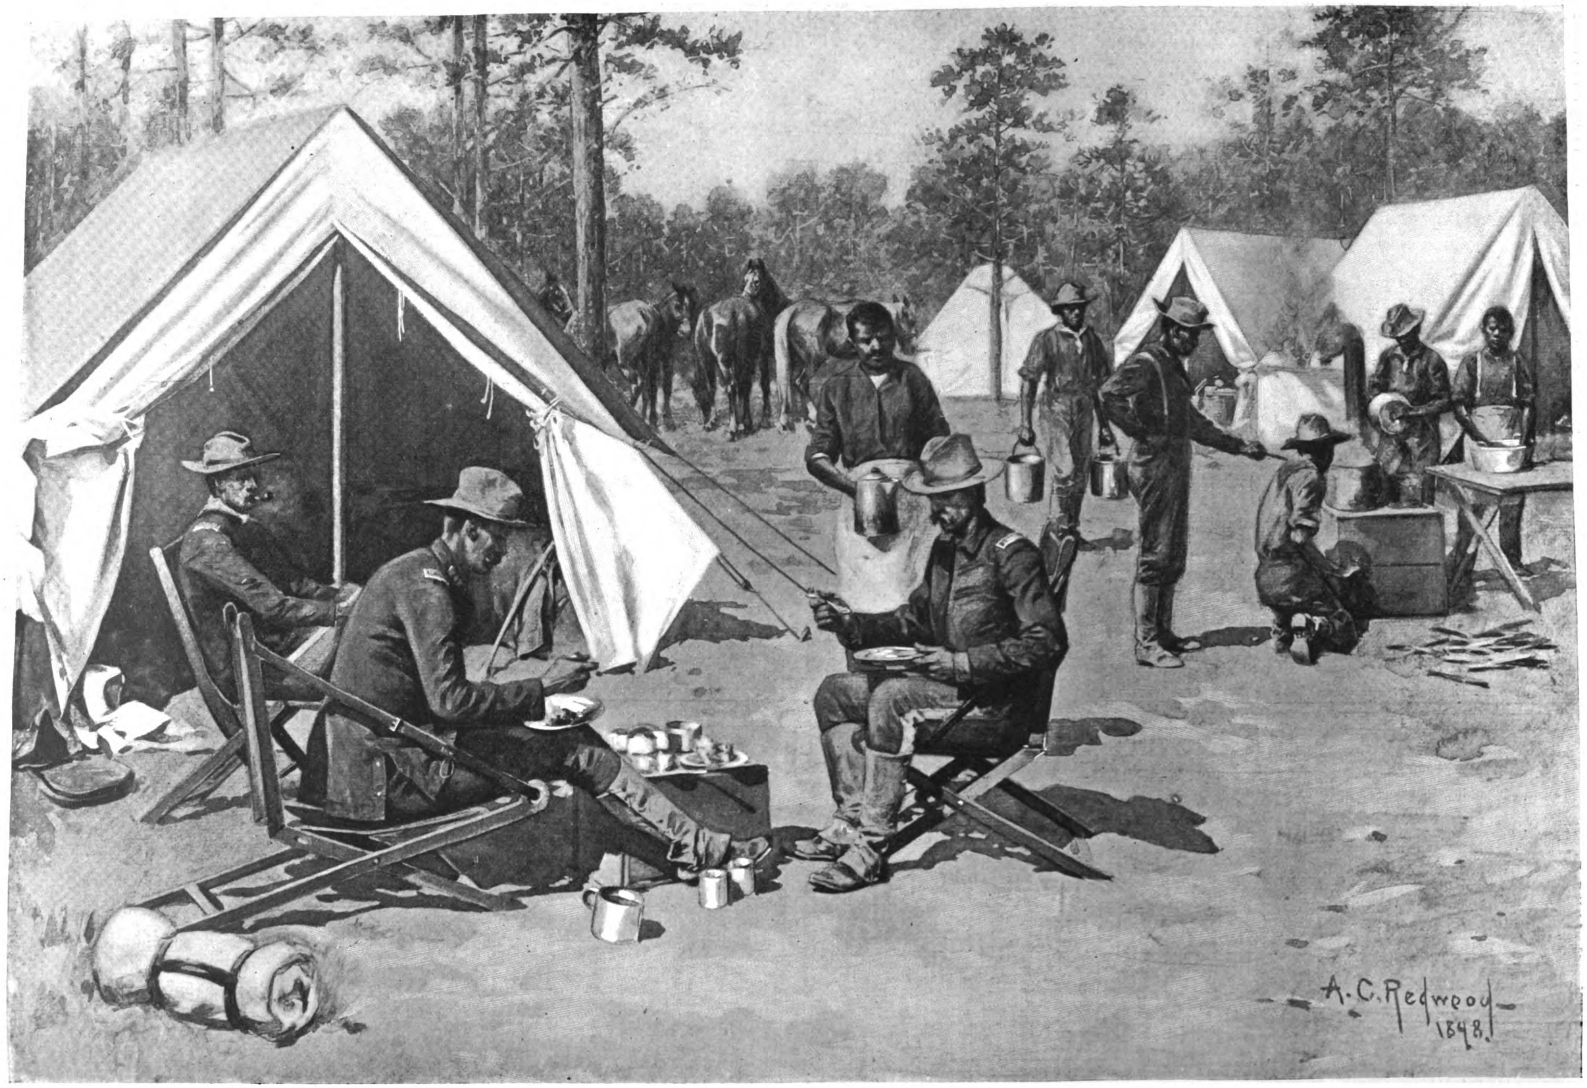
My friend did not resent my apparent lack of confidence in ministerial promises; on the contrary, he probably shared the feelings of Mr. McKinley on this delicate subject. We soon agreed that the concessions demanded of Spain must be more material than promises.

He was very much dejected, and dwelt upon the empty state of the Spanish Treasury, the difficulty of paying the interest on the national debt, the terrible depreciation in the paper currency, which during my short stay in the country had sunk from 35 per cent. to 42 per cent. below face or coin value, so that 142 pesetas in paper could only buy 100 pesetas of real money. The press of all parties had so loudly and indignantly repudiated the mere idea of parting with Cuba, at any price, that I hesitated before finally hinting to him delicately that there was a solution of the question that might fill the Treasury of Spain for the moment and enable the weary troops to return home.

He probably guessed what I meant, but pretended not to.

"Can you imagine any situation so desperate that your government would listen to a proposal for the purchase of Cuba?"

He looked attentively at me for a moment, and then said, emphatically but coldly, "Yes, I can imagine such a state of things."



I confess that I was not prepared for such an admission, least of all from a man so near to the government. He went on to explain to me that with a people so sensitive in matters of form as Spaniards it was not a light matter to carry through a diplomatic scheme of this kind without an outburst from the Jingoes, and perhaps an attempt at revolution. He had much respect for General Woodford, he said, and it was a source of great comfort to him to know that at such a time the legation was in the hands of so good a man.

My friend spoke with a full sense of his responsibility, knowing well that I appreciated the relations he held towards the government as well as to Mr. Castelar. He had no social relations with our legation, but knew that I was to dine with General Woodford that evening; and his manner convinced me that he sought in this way to get certain ideas discussed in the proper quarters without compromising his government. I cannot give this gentleman's name, but I attach considerable importance to the views he expressed, because he is not a peace-at-any-price man, but a patriotic, long-headed, and eminently trustworthy Spaniard.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

"PEASE ON A TRENCHER"—OFFICERS' MESS, 9TH U. S. CAVALRY (COLORED), PORT TAMPA.
FROM THE WATER-COLOR BY A. C. REDWOOD.

Original from PENN STATE

CAPTAIN ALLYN K. CAPRON, U.S.V.,
Troop L, "Rough Riders." Killed.

SERGEANT HAMILTON FISH, JR.,
Troop L, "Rough Riders." Killed.

SERGEANT MARCUS DENNISON RUSSELL,
Troop G, "Rough Riders." Killed.

CORPORAL ALEX. LIENNOC,
Troop K, 1st United States Cavalry. Killed.

EDWARD MARSHALL,
Correspondent N.Y. "Journal." Seriously wounded.

PRIVATE GUSTAVE A. KOLBE,
Troop K, 1st United States Cavalry. Killed.

PRIVATE EMIL BJORK,
Troop K, 1st United States Cavalry. Killed.

PRIVATE PETER H. DIX,
Troop K, 1st United States Cavalry. Killed.

VICTIMS OF THE BATTLE OF LA GUASIMA, NEAR SANTIAGO, JUNE 24.

CUBA.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

Off Santiago, Monday, June 6, 1898.

This morning at forty-five minutes past seven o'clock the ships of Admiral Sampson's squadron began firing upon Santiago de Cuba. The attack made on Tuesday of last week was simply to locate the batteries of the enemy and develop their power. Since that affair Lieutenant Harlowe of the Vixen, with several Cubans for guides, climbed the hills overlooking the harbor, and determined accurately the positions of the ships inside and the various batteries commanding the approaches to the city. On a hill to the west of the channel is a new masked battery of modern guns 150 feet above the sea, and to the eastward of Morro another masked battery, 80 feet above the water. All of these guns were fired to-day with smokeless powder, so it was hard to tell, when our ships were firing, whether the enemy were serving their guns with energy or not; an occasional shell screaming through the air and sending up a great geyser when it struck the water was the only visible sign.

To the right and left of each of these batteries were smaller groups of rapid-fire guns, so there were two distinct points to attack and two separate attacking forces, the ships being divided as follows: To the east, the New York (flag-ship), Iowa, Oregon, New Orleans, Yankee, and Dolphin, with the Porter, torpedo-boat, lying out of range; on the west, under Commodore Schley, the Brooklyn, Massachusetts, Texas, Marblehead, Vixen, and Suwanee; the last two, as well as the Dolphin on the other side, lay close inshore and devoted their entire attention to the small batteries.

The eight men from the Merrimac were confined in old Morro, and so that picturesque pile was exempted from the fire, nor was it struck by accident during the action, though the barracks near by were hit repeatedly.

Viewed as a spectacle merely, the scene was one long to be remembered. The towering hills, bathed in the morning sunlight, showed green slopes that lifted steeply toward the sky and contrasted sharply with the dark shadows of ravines; the clouds hung low over and around the r peaks, and rolled in masses of vapor down the sides of lofty Mount Cobre. Out at sea, mist and rain shut in like a curtain the borders of this scene, while the advancing pomp of thunder and lightning overhead mingled with the flash and roar and deep reverberation of the batteries on sea and shore. The New York fired the first shot, the other ships following quickly, until all were engaged, and the continual rumble and shock of the heavy discharges drowned the thunder of the heavens and echoed and re-echoed among the hills. The sunlight for a time lit up the great domes of smoke that rose and hung in fantastic shapes about the ships, but at half past eight it began to rain heavily, growing quite dark, and the smoke, beaten down, hung low over the water, wrapping the ships in an impenetrable mist. Along the lower hills thin wreaths of white vapor crept, rolling out into rings or hanging in straight lines of white in the ravines, and on a hill back of the town a fire burst out, the flames burning brightly and remaining for some time, until finally hidden in smoke and mist.

It was like trying to watch two rings in a circus. From our point of view right off Morro both divisions could be plainly seen, but only one at a time could be properly followed. The ships kept moving slowly about in short circles, firing at a range of about twenty-eight hundred yards, the guns of both divisions converging on the batteries and ships in the harbor. In the channel entrance shells were falling constantly, sending up columns of water twenty or thirty feet that looked like small waterspouts, that would topple over and disappear. These shots were from the mortar battery, that, having the range of the harbor entrance, was satisfied to fire there, although there was nothing to hit but the water. One of the Spanish ships could be seen at times through the smoke at the harbor mouth—the Reina Mercedes. She was struck several times, and must have suffered considerable damage. It is reported that the captain, five seamen, and twenty-one marines were killed, and twelve wounded (reported in the Kingston papers). Over on the west side the little Vixen, formerly the yacht Josephine, was close in under the land, firing constantly, and, with the Suwanee, making it lively for the near-shore battery One man on the Suwanee was slightly injured by a piece of exploding shell. There were many narrow escapes, however, and it seems remarkable that neither ships nor men should have suffered after being under fire for more than two hours. A shell passed over the bridge of the Texas, and striking the water twenty feet beyond the ship, exploded, giving out a suffocating odor that caused the officers on the bridge and the men in the near-by port to turn and gasp for breath. The combination of powder smoke and rain acted as an acid on the paint of the ships, peeling it off in sheets wherever it came near the muzzles of the guns. One of the forward-turret guns of the Texas was fired straight ahead across the deck, taking all the paint along the superstructure off as neatly as if it had been done with a knife. The New York also suffered in places in the same way.

The Yankee and Dolphin, over on the east side of the harbor mouth, were firing with great rapidity, both quite close inshore, with the Iowa, Oregon, and New Orleans a little farther out and keeping their guns on the enemy. The Oregon, with her big guns trained over to starboard, giving her a slight list, wreathed in pale smoke and lit by the flashes of her broadside battery, made a picture at once terrible and impressive of the modern fighting-ship. As she moved away out of action, still firing her after guns, her crew were swarming the decks and superstructure forward, playing the hose and scrubbing down as if they had been merely at morning target practice. About 10.30 the New York, that had for some time been out of action down to the eastward, came along the line flying the signal to cease firing, and the ships then drew off, getting a parting salute from the forts, which the Texas, nearest in, replied to with a couple of shots.

Bahia de Guantanamo, Tuesday, June 14, 1898.

The coast of Cuba along the south side of the province of Santiago is one succession of desolate hills, rising smoothly from the sea in most places, but dropping off now and then in steep cliffs of limestone or granite rock. In the face of these sea-walls are many caves, hollowed out by the action of the waves, and around them and into them the waters boil and fret, set on by the ground-swell and urged by the almost constant wind. Beyond this first range of rocky hills, covered with low and scraggly gray-green vegetation, is a series of steep and forbidding ranges, backed by mountains that loom blue and distant or hang nearer by over the lower hills. Precipitous and gashed with deep ravines, they offer no sign of human life or comfort, and on many of their ridged sides the foot of man rarely if ever treads. This is the kind of coast that extends westward from Cape Maisi 200 miles, and with the exception of tiny coves where small boats might land, there are no harbors that offer protection to vessels of any size, save two only—one where the hills sweep northward around the plateau in which is set the snug landlocked harbor of Santiago de Cuba, and the other the beautiful Bahia de Guantanamo, thirty-nine miles to the eastward. Eight miles east of Santiago there are a small town and cove in which an American company has built a large iron pier to which vessels come to load with iron ore, and where it is purposed to land troops to march on Santiago. A refuge for the fleet and a coaling-station being necessary on this coast, Guantanamo was selected as an available spot, and accordingly, on Tuesday, June 7, the Marblehead, accompanied by the St. Louis and Yankee, steamed up there from the fleet, the Marblehead and Yankee going in and throwing a few shots into the block-house on the hill and the houses along the beach on the inside of Windward Point, and looking about to note the possibilities of the place.

A cable line runs from Santiago to Kingston, another to Guantanamo, and from there to Mole St. Nicholas, Haiti. There is a perfect net-work of wires running out of Santiago, and on Monday, the 6th, after the bombardment in the morning, the St. Louis and cable-steamer Adria got to work and cut the last one, as they supposed. Off Guantanamo the St. Louis immediately began grappling for the cable to Mole St. Nicholas, and found and cut it in short order, the Marblehead and Yankee remaining inside in plain sight of the fort at Caimanera; at dusk the fort fired some shots, and a Spanish gunboat mounting seven 4.7-inch guns came out and gave them battle for a few minutes, and then hastily retired. There were mines in the channel farther on, which alone prevented the two ships from going up and settling matters at once. A collier was sent up from the fleet on Wednesday, with the Dolphin and Vixen, and when we steamed into the beautiful bay on Thursday we found the Marblehead on guard, the little cruiser Vixen coaling from the Sterling. Over the point of land the Spanish flag waved above the fort, but the stars and stripes flew in the harbor and had come to stay. The calm water and white beach shining in the sun, with the rich foliage along the

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google wooded shores and high blue hills beyond, made the place extremely peaceful and attractive after the rugged hills and tumbling water that we had known outside. The bay was once called Cumberland Harbor, and now would be a good time to rename it.

On board the Marblehead the lookouts never ceased to watch the fort and the gunboat, whose mast and funnel we could see over the low point which hid the deeper bay beyond. The loaded guns gave out on all sides their warning, and though a thousand eyes watched the scene from the thicket-hidden shores, no sound of gun disturbed the peace of the day.

Friday morning the transport Panther, in company with the Yosemite, arrived with the United States marine battalion, 650 men, under command of Colonel Huntington. They anchored close in off the beach, and after shelling the place and setting fire to the shanties and remains of the block-house on the low hill, the marines went ashore. The cable station, a one-story corrugated-iron affair, was shot full of holes, but left standing. The fishermen's houses were burned down for fear of contagion. Taking possession of the hill-top, they immediately began clearing away the wreckage, throwing up intrenchments, and setting up tents and camp equipage at the foot of the hill, among the palms and bushes. On the highest point a tall staff was raised, and for the first time the American flag floated in possession of the soil of Cuba.

Sad, dirty soil it was to the tired men who toiled all day in the heat and lay on their arms at night, eaten by mosquitoes, and in expectation of attack at any moment. From the very first the marine battalion has behaved splendidly. The transport Panther was fitted out with remarkable expedition—her stores "broken out," as sailors say, from the navy storehouse at the New York Navy Yard and put aboard in twenty-four hours. Jammed into narrow quarters on the Panther, the men had to suffer great inconvenience, and when finally landed and camped on the sand spit called Camp Sampson at Key West they were not much better off, and suffered from heat, flies, and mosquitoes as much as they would have in Cuba; but their fine appearance and the good behavior of the men, as well as their quick and efficient readiness for instant work, speak volumes for the officers and men of the marine corps.

Friday night and Saturday passed in constant work getting camp and intrenchments ready, and the men were worn out with loss of sleep and severe labor when darkness came down on Saturday.

Late in the afternoon two pickets, who were posted some two miles away from the camp, were eating a bite of supper and taking a rest under some trees, lulled into carelessness by the quiet that had so far reigned. These two men, privates Dunphy and McColgan, were shot and instantly killed by a Spanish lieutenant and his men, who had crept unobserved through the woods and fired at close range.

At 7 o'clock the Spaniards began firing from all sides and at close quarters. From the hills and black shadow of the trees came the sharp crack of the rifles, the bullets thudding on the ground, whirring through the air, chipping off branches and leaves of trees, and falling in a hail in the water. There were several boats near the shore, and three war-ships lying quietly at anchor in the still bay. The Marblehead fired several shots, but as their fire would have been as dangerous to friend as to foe, they could do little.

The marines had quickly formed, and from their position on the low hill came a steady return fire, checking the attack, and driving it back after a time. All night the shots were popping, now rising in furious volleys and again sinking away to scattered reports. One of the first to fall was Assistant-Surgeon Gibbs, who was shot in his tent door, having just remarked, when the firing began, that he did "not want to be killed in such a place."

On Sunday morning the Texas came in, and sent ashore two Colt automatic guns, which were dragged up and set in position at the top of the hill.

In the Saturday-night attack Sergeant Smith was killed, and early in the morning Lieutenant Neville with a platoon of men went out to find his body and bring it in. They were attacked by a strong force, and had to fall back. The bodies of McColgan and Dunphy were recovered, and with that of Dr. Gibbs were buried at ten o'clock on the southern slope of the hill, the enemy firing so heavily that the funeral party had to take to their guns, and the salutes that were fired over the graves were solid shot that whistled in among the Spaniards.

Sunday night the firing began again in heavy volleys, and the war-ships took a hand, word being passed by megaphone where to fire, when the Marblehead sent shell after shell among the enemy, one, by request, as close as one hundred feet east of the little hill which the marines were holding. The Spaniards are very much afraid of the ships, and they have learned by experience how much execution they can do.

Monday remained fairly quiet, occasional shots being exchanged, and the men lying by their guns in readiness for an alarm. Sergeant Smith was buried on Monday, with Sergeant-Major Good, a splendid soldier, who had spent many years in the service, and who was devoted to his duty.

Tuesday morning, about seven o'clock, while half the marines were at breakfast in the camp at the foot of the hill, the Spanish began firing from the woods to the eastward. The men at breakfast, having stacked their guns at the top of the hill, broke out fresh boxes and rallied, driving back the attacking party. The Marblehead's launch, coming inshore at this time, opened fire on the Spaniards, chasing them along the beach with her rapid-fire one-pounder.

It was then determined to clean the enemy out of the woods, and an attacking force under Captain Elliott was sent out—Spicer's and Elliott's companies, C and D, with Company A, divided into platoons under Lieutenants Ingate and Magill. Divided among the commands were about forty Cubans.

Ingate's column was misled by his guide, who was then disarmed and brought back under arrest. The platoon of Company A under Lieutenant Magill went around to the eastward, and drove the enemy back toward their camp and block-house near the shore on the south side of the point, where were Elliott's and Spicer's commands, having followed the shore to westward, driving the Spaniards before them; and between the two fires they were completely whipped and driven off, their block-house and water-supply destroyed, and heliograph signal outfit captured. The enemy's loss in killed and wounded exceeded the entire number of the attacking party. Several of the Cubans were killed or wounded, and many of the marines were so utterly exhausted that but for the timely aid of the Dolphin, that had steamed around the coast and sent in her boats to bring off the wounded, many would have dropped from sheer exhaustion.

Bahia de Guantanamo, Wednesday, June 15.

The still water and air of quiet that prevail are in great contrast with the turmoil and battle of yesterday—the voices of men, the whir of a steam-launch, or plash of oars comes in subdued notes across the broad surface of the beautiful bay.

The Abarenda, big and black, loaded with coal, and armed with six-pounder guns, lies near us, and has on board the seventeen prisoners captured yesterday. They were much averse to climbing up the slim rope ladder that reached to her deck, but at least have had enough to eat by this time. They all looked half starved, and reported scarcity of food, though every one and all the men found dead in the woods were loaded down with ammunition. The captured lieutenant was taken on board the Marblehead, and I saw him sitting at the hospitable ward-room table and making himself quite at home. Over toward the western shore the Panther, Yosemite, and Sterling are lying in a bunch together. The Porter lies alongside the Abarenda—small, spirited, and tireless. The Dolphin and Marblehead swing clear of the other ships, with their guns ready for instant service. On shore the flag floats over the hill, the white tents, and swarming marines, who look like big brown ants moving about on the fresh red earth of their intrenchments. Tents are going up on the hill, and at the foot, near the mess-tents and hospital, the Cuban forces are setting up shacks built of palms, cleverly put together with the Indianlike wood-lore these people have.

The sun blazes hot on the hill, and the flag droops in the faint breeze; the green rounded slopes beyond simmer in the glaring light and are still, with big black birds hovering over and dipping in among the trees.

The roughly built landing is surrounded with boats. Distilled water from the Panther comes in, in large barrels loaded into a cutter, and a sergeant superintends dealing it out to the men, who fill their canteens and supply their mess-kettles—good pure water, if it is rather warm. Earlier in the day every man who could was splashing about in the cooling sea, having a good swim and getting the kinks out of his tired limbs. All day, in fact, except at high noon, men were in the water, washing the red dirt of Cuba out of their systems and scrubbing their clothes, after five days of incessant toil and fighting. The clean deep sea-water, clear as crystal, and washing the sands within ten feet of their mess-tents, will be a great blessing to the men, and they enjoy it, if sharks do lurk farther out. The Cubans alone seem to despise such trifles, and once they swing their hammocks under the palm tents, they stick to them until they are turned out for duty.

About 10.30 o'clock a procession of boats left the Marblehead and moved in to the landing—a cutter first, with officers and armed men, and then a steam-launch towing a boat with men in bow and stern, and midship a silent figure covered with a flag—a Cuban who had been wounded the day before and had died on the ship. The boats landed at the little pier. A bugler sounds a few notes of the Dead March, and the column moves slowly up the brown hill. Flags are half-masted, and the soldier who had died bravely for "Cuba libre" is laid to rest beside the others who had given their lives for his cause as well as for their own starry flag; a silence for a time, and then a volley which marked the end, and the bugles blow a quicker step.

On board the Dolphin, in the great cool wardroom, now shorn of its luxurious fittings, lay three other poor Cubans, one very badly wounded, but being cared for by the good doctor. A fine-looking black fellow, done up in bandages and lying patiently on the long divan, opened his eyes as I gazed sympathetically at him for a minute, and then smiled in a proud way, as a soldier should who knew he had done his duty.

About one o'clock the Texas came steaming rapidly into the bay, and signalling the Marblehead to follow, swung around the low point of land which marks the entrance to the upper bay, at the head of which are the town and fort of Caimanera. The channel was known to be full of mines, and for several nights the Marblehead's launch had tried in vain to locate them or drag up the wires; but the Texas had orders to destroy the fort and drive out the thousand or more soldiers stationed there. So on she went, regardless, and the Marblehead quickly followed, and took position some distance beyond the Texas and to the left. It was a very pretty sight, and the Texas seemed to be calling by special invitation on the Dons. She swung up as close to the forts as she could go, dropped her anchor, and immediately opened fire from her port 12-inch and 6-inch guns. The Marblehead was close behind, and her 5-inch guns flashed and roared amid the deeper thunder of the battle-ship's big turret guns. The Suwanee had come from the fleet to take a hand in the proceedings, and she now took position to the right, and as near the shore as she could get, firing with her 4-inch and 6-pounder guns. The St. Paul had come in during the morning, and lay further out in the bay. Men crowded her rigging and swarmed at the mast-head and from every lofty perch on the Dolphin and all the vessels in the harbor. It was like a grand-stand view. Over the low shore they could see it all—the ships, the red-tiled roofs of town and fort, and where the shells struck and sent up the dust in thick clouds. The marines on their hill-top had even a better view, and lined up, watching it all with the greatest interest. The high hills in the background have been veiled in rain half the time during the past week, though not a drop has fallen down our way, and to-day the dark blue thunder-cloud lowering in the background made a fine setting for the ships and the wreathing smoke that floated across the bay and melted into the distance.

We had followed up after the ships, and lay as near as we could get to the Suwanee. The Marblehead's launch with a boat in tow was out looking for mines. They suspended their work temporarily and drew out of the way.

The Texas opened fire at forty-five minutes past one, and her shots followed one after the other with great deliberation and accuracy. Cheers burst frequently from the men watching as a shell from the 12-inch gun struck the fort, sending up a great cloud of yellow dust, followed by the tremendous roar of the big gun. The flash of the discharge and the effect of the exploding shell seem to be instantaneous; the eye cannot follow the difference; then comes the smoke rolling and swelling out in a vast cloud, and the shock of explosion reverberating and ringing in your ears.

Awe-inspiring as a thunder-storm is, the rapid firing of these big guns is even more so, and as you watch the dirt and dust spreading out in a thick cloud the force seems greater than it really is.

As only half the men on the Texas were engaged at the guns, her decks aft were crowded with men; officers on the bridge watched with glasses the effect of the shots, and Jackies no less interested climbed up anywhere to get a better view. The hose was kept playing to cool the ship, and a stream of water was running off the deck the entire time. We had the ship silhouetted by her own smoke most of the time, standing out in bold relief against the smoke and flame one instant, and the next enveloped in a thick haze.

Except for a few shots from the fort in the early part of the action, there was no reply to all this; its fire was badly aimed, as usual, and as ours became hotter, no doubt the garrison skedaddled. The Marblehead fired a number of shots into the barracks in the town, and after an hour and a quarter the firing ceased and the Texas withdrew. Having been in close enough to stick her nose into the mud, she left a trail of stirred-up water behind her. The Marblehead, in getting into position in the midst of the work, fouled a mine with her propeller blades; the ship was stopped, the wire hauled on board, and Lieutenant John Nickels, executive officer, calmly sawed off the connection. They afterwards pulled the thing on board, and we saw it on the poop-deck when the ship got back to her anchorage—a small can-buoy it looked, painted red, and with a lot of small barnacles sticking to it; it was dated 1896. Lieutenant Noel took off the war-head and dissected it; inside was an iron can containing one hundred pounds of guncotton, and had the contact been struck, it is probable that the Marblehead would have been destroyed. The launch tarried behind after the ships went back to their station, and continued dragging for mines. They found one after a while, and were getting it up when a lot of Spanish troops on shore opened fire on them. The bullets struck the launch and fell in the water all about the two boats. The one-pounder rapid-fire gun was quickly turned on, and the men grabbed their rifles and returned the fire vigorously. The one-pounder was banging away at a great rate, when the mounting got loose, and the gun jumped clear overboard.

Hearing the firing, the Suwanee hurried back, and began shelling the bushes with her six-pounders, and turning two Colt automatics loose on the hidden enemy, soon drove them off. The quick ping! ping! ping! of the little automatic's "lead squirts," as the sailors call them, has a mighty comfortable sound when you are behind them. The launch got the mine and towed it alongside the ship, from where it was taken ashore.

Wednesday night and Thursday passed uneventfully, the war-ships turning their search-lights on the shore at night and keeping a close watch for trouble. On Friday morning the Oregon came in for coal, and soon had two big colliers on either side of her. As the bushes and trees on the north shore of the bay were still full of Spaniards, who only waited for an opportunity to pick off a man or two, the Marblehead, Dolphin, Suwanee, and St. Paul began shelling them out about ten o'clock, and fired for half an hour. The St. Paul, astern and slightly outside of us, made music with her shells that whistled through the air at a great rate. In the afternoon the Oregon, after coaling, fired a few shots, at the railroad station and telegraph offices in Caimanera; a train was standing on the track, and at the first shot stood not on the order of its going, but went shrieking up the line.

Bahia de Guantanamo, Saturday, June 18.

This morning about six o'clock we saw a white flag waving on the shore where yesterday's firing took place. The Porter went in and sent a boat to bring off a man, who claimed to be a Cuban; he was taken on board the Marblehead and given a suit of clothes and a square meal, and sent ashore to the Cubans armed with a Lee rifle and cartridge-belt with U.S.N. on it; later in the day it was reported that he had decamped, proving to be a spy. Notices have been posted up in the woods to the effect that men who want to surrender will be well treated; the Spanish officers tell their men that they will be killed if captured. One man came in with three Mauser rifles and a knapsack full of cartridges; he said that he had been in Cuba eleven months, had fine things promised him, but had never received any pay, and had had nothing to eat for three days; under the circumstances, he had decided to become an American if they would let him. A party of Cubans this afternoon explored the strip of woods shelled yesterday, and found over fifty dead Spaniards as a result of the firing. No wonder they dread our ships!

It is quite certain now, from explorations made to-day, that over three hundred were killed or died of their wounds in the woods as a result of their encounter with the marines in Saturday, Sunday, and Tuesday's fight.

About noon the Marblehead's launch, with Lieutenant Anderson in command, went up to Caimanera with a flag of truce to arrange an exchange of prisoners, with a view to getting Hobson and his men out of Morro. Nothing was accomplished, but the launch people reported that the fort, though badly damaged, was being repaired and new guns set up, and that the gunboat looked spick and span and ready for business yet. All are well ashore except some of the Cubans, who are suffering from overeating and tight shoes, having never, many of them, worn shoes before in their lives. They have a bright new Cuban flag over their camp, and for them the prospects are brightening considerably. There is no doubt of their loyalty or courage, the last words of many of those who were killed being "Viva Cuba libre!"

Off Santiago, Sunday, June 19, 1898.

Except for a heavy ground-swell, the sea is as smooth as glass, and sparkles under the morning sun like a polished mirror. Looking over the ship's side, the blue water, cool and deep, is lit far down by myriad shafts of light;

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google fish swim about, touched with brilliant color, and sea-weed, beautiful and delicate, floats along on the lapis-lazuli surface. The ships dip slowly to the long swell; the bugles call the clean-jacketed sailors to Sunday morning inspection, and they crowd the decks in silent ordered lines that have no look of war.

The distant hills are shining through the mist—pale green, with blue shadows streaked across here and there—their edges and hard lines softened by the morning air and, coming down to the blue line of the sea in splendid sweeps of color, meet the white foam on the beach. The gray walls and towers of Morro stand out clear and distinct, the red and yellow flag floating above, and the fresh earth along the lower ridge alone telling of the week's work by the busy men in the beleaguered city. All is still and calm now, however, and on the Texas, near by, the church flag floats above the stars and stripes—the only flag that ever does—while all hands are called to prayers and a short sermon by the chaplain. Home and all that it means seem far away, but the simple ceremony, the order and quiet, come with soothing and cheering influence to many a tired man.

There are colliers and despatch-boats moving here and there among the scattered ships, and newly arrived and very welcome is the store-ship Celtic, which came down, convoyed by the Dixie, loaded with provisions for the fleet. Launches and cutters swarm about her, for fresh stores and fresh food of any kind are needed by nearly all the fighting-ships, which have been at sea three or four weeks, and all hands reduced to paymaster's stores—canned food and salt meat; no ice, and no fruit or vegetables. Fruit in the West Indian ports is so cheap and good that it seems remarkable some clever Yankee has not loaded up a steamerful, with ice, beer, tobacco, and small luxuries, and obtained permission to "bum-boat" the fleet. There's millions in it. Delicious pineapples, called "pines" down here, cost fifty cents a dozen at Kingston; bananas, fifteen cents a bunch; limes, oranges, mangoes, and similar things cost little on shore, but are priceless luxuries to a lot of men living on salty food and drinking lukewarm water. We usually supply ourselves liberally when in port, and carry enough to give some away to our friends for a few days, after which we are short till we make another run to a market.

Last night the Vesuvius fired three shots from her dynamite-guns into the batteries on shore. Her guns do not make much noise, but when the shells strike and explode, there is a sound as if a block of houses had fallen down in one awful and tremendous crash. One shot was fired from the west battery in return, but did no harm.

No doubt the reports from Santiago, viâ Kingston, of damage to the Reina Mercedes, Vizcaya, and other ships are intended to be misleading; yet it is scarcely possible that all the shells that have dropped into the harbor have been harmless, and though we have no certain information as to the actual loss caused to the enemy, it is fair to suppose that they have not all been in vain.

The Spaniards have been busy all the week strengthening the batteries to the westward of Morro, and one or two new and large guns have been mounted. These, it is supposed, were taken from some of the ships in the harbor. The east batteries have also been strengthened, and it does not seem likely that this peaceful manner of sitting down in front of the enemy and waiting for him to surrender will soon reduce the fortress of Santiago.

One thing is certain, that the sinking of the fine big Merrimac and her 2000 tons of coal has availed but little, as her spars, which alone interfere with the passage of a vessel, could be easily removed should the Spanish care to do so; but to the American fleet forcing a passage in, the sunken ship might be a far more serious obstacle.

The sight of so many fine ships loafing about and doing so little is rather discouraging; but the army is expected daily, and then some active operations will no doubt begin. In the mean time the weather has been fine, and everybody is well. The sea-breeze comes in every morning about ten o'clock—the sailors call it the doctor—and it cools with fragrant breath the fierce heat of the early morning.

OFF SANTIAGO, Monday, June 20, 1898.

Early this morning we were informed that the army transports had been sighted to the eastward. We ran out a few miles, and at ten o'clock had them in full view on the horizon. The day was perfect, a light breeze ruffling the long swell of the sea, the sky filled with brilliant clouds, the hills showing pale blue behind us, and the fresh morning air coming out of the southeast was like the breath of summer on the New England coast. Far down to the eastward the trailing smoke of the laggards reached to the limit of vision—thirty-five ships, counting the convoys; the big Indiana looming ponderous and powerful, and able to play well the part of protector.

The tug Osceola went in advance as scout, and the Annapolis guard-ship, second with the Detroit and Machias, torpedo-boat Du Pont, and other cruisers scattered down the line. The Gloucester went out to meet the fleet, and when they turned toward the land and mixed up the long line it reminded me of one of the great gatherings of vessels at an international yacht-race off Sandy Hook. Thousands of soldiers looked down from the decks, and at the blue hills they were coming to conquer.

There were cheers and shouts and waving of hats. The slow voyage was ended, and presently the booming of guns as the navy saluted the army welcomed them right royally. It was a scene to be remembered always, and one not often repeated, and would thrill the blood of the most indifferent patriot that ever lived.

The army and navy forever,
Three cheers for the red, white, and blue!

ran in our thoughts, and hurrah was on the tip of every tongue. You couldn't help it. The Jackies grinned from their grim floating forts at the soldier boys, and sunburnt men who had tramped and ridden all over the plains of the West for Uncle Sam, but had never seen a foreign shore or a fleet of fighting-ships before, smiled back in return.

Certainly if the day was any omen it was a good one, and the army was introduced to Santiago under the most favorable circumstances.

CARLTON T. CHAPMAN.

A NAVAL DIARIST.*

An old sailor's life is proverbially one of movement and unlimited reminiscence; and a book at hand, by Rear-Admiral Franklin (retired), of our own navy, is an example of how interesting and varied may be the years afloat and ashore. His pictures of our naval service under the régime of about the year 1842 are pertinent and striking—its discipline, its outward show, its morale. At the time of his first professional studies our naval schools were nearly non-existent. Even on a receiving-ship the tuition was poor, and in the steerage mess the midshipmen "lived like pigs." Rear-Admiral Franklin characterizes the "general tone and style" of excited sea diction as being "very much the same as Marryat describes"; and in his pointing out the American navy's customs as derived from those of the mother-country, he says that the resemblance "was so striking that but for the flag and the crown on the one, and the flag and the eagle on the other, one might have imagined himself, if his eyes had been suddenly unbandaged, to be on board a ship of either nation." As to our naval dress, Rear-Admiral Franklin notes that blue as the distinctive color for seamen's rig dates only from about the middle of the last century; that when he went to sea one epaulette was worn, rather than two—a mere detail of a lieutenant's uniform—and fixed on the right shoulder; and that "there was no objection to wearing high silk hats" with uniforms! The social memorabilia are many; and the grace of an old sailor's gallantry, and the warmth of long friendships in his profession, and a kind and generous nature pervade the volume. The chapters referring to the author's active service during the civil war are merely a few of those of special

* Memories of a Rear-Admiral who has served for more than Half a Century in the Navy of the United States. By S. R. Franklin, Rear-Admiral, U. S. N. (Retired). Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, Deckel Edges and Gilt Top, $3. New York and London: Harper and Brothers.

(Continued on page 676.)

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa.—[Adv.]

ALWAYS WATCHFUL.
THE milk used for the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is from the best dairies, under contracts with farmers, guaranteeing purity and richness in health-giving constituents.—[Adv.]

LADIES are greatly benefited by Dr. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS, the South American Tonic.—[Adv.]

USE BROWN'S Camphorated Saponaceous DENTIFRICE for the TEETH. 25 cents a jar.—[Adv.]

BRIGHT eyes, rosy cheeks—the result of taking ABBOTT'S, The ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA BITTERS.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

"SHOOTING THE RAPIDS"

is often very risky business. Trust only in an experienced guide—one with a cool head and a strong arm.

SHAVING is risky, too, unless you have just the right shaving soap. In many soaps, disease germs, rank poison, smarting and burning sensations are the Hidden Rocks that threaten your safety, health, and comfort. Don't shave with soaps you know nothing about. Trust only in shaving soaps of known purity and long-established reputation.

You can always rely on the absolute purity and safety of WILLIAMS' SHAVING SOAPS, while the rich, cooling lather insures a degree of ease, comfort, and luxury in shaving afforded by no other soaps.

Does your barber use WILLIAMS' SOAP? Do you?

Williams' Soaps sold everywhere, but sent by mail if your dealer does not supply you.

Williams' Shaving Stick, 25 cents. Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10 cents.
Luxury Shaving Tablet, 25 cents. Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50 cents.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barbers'), 6 round cakes, 1 lb., 40c. Exquisite also for Toilet. Trial Cake for 2c. Stamp.

THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO., GLASTONBURY, CONN.
London, 64 Great Russell St., W. C. Sydney, Australia, 161 Clarence St

Pepsalt...

is the best of table salt, into every grain of which is incorporated digestive substances natural to the stomach. Fill your salt-cellar with Pepsalt and use it in place of salt at your meals. If you have indigestion your stomach does not supply the necessary amount of the dissolving or digestive juices. Pepsalt taken in place of salt at your meals makes good this deficiency, as you take with every mouthful of your food a similar substance to that which is required and at the right time, and your indigestion is a thing of the past.

Send for sample in salt-shaker bottle and try it.

Price 25 cents, postpaid.
THE VAUPEL SAMARITAN CO., (Permanent Bldg.), 176 Euclid Av., Cleveland, Ohio.

Indigestion Has No Terrors For Him
That salt-shaker is filled with Pepsalt

PEPSALT CURES AND PREVENTS INDIGESTION

A Year from a . . . . Reporter's Note-Book

By RICHARD HARDING DAVIS

Author of "Soldiers of Fortune," "The Princess Aline," "Three Gringos in Venezuela," etc. Illustrated. Post 8vo, Paper Boards, $1.50.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York and London

BOKER'S BITTERS
The oldest and best Specific against dyspepsia; an appetizer and a promoter of digestion.
Ask your Grocer, Liquor Dealer, or Druggist.

He is a Public Benefactor Who provides the people With a pure stimulant.
OLD DEARBORN RYE
Bottled in bond, supplies this long-felt want. Sold by all leading dealers. Prescribed by all leading physicians. Write for circular and prices.
W.P. Squibb & Co. Lawrenceburgh, Dearborn County, Ind., Distillers

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.
Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.
Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms — SOHMER BUILDING, Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(Continued from page 675.)

interest to American naval readers. They include a sketch-portrait of Farragut shortly after the attack on Mobile, and a vivid page describing the burning of the Merrimac. There is a ring of the present continual conflict between Spanish war despatches, as the Madrid journals report them, and the truth of matters, in such an anecdote as Rear-Admiral Franklin tells of his going to report at Norfolk the destruction of the Merrimac. He had witnessed the complete shattering of the dreaded ram by the explosion of the magazine. But on telling his story, "the flag-officer said to me, 'One of the officers of the Merrimac is here on leave, and he declared emphatically that the Merrimac has not been destroyed!' I replied that I did not care what he said, that there was no more doubt in my mind that the bones of the Merrimac were now at the bottom of the sea than that I was living at the moment. He then said, 'Oh, I am perfectly satisfied with the correctness of what you reported, but let him enjoy his delusions.'" (The italics are ours.) To Admiral Farragut we have this tribute from the author: "I think Farragut was the pluckiest man I ever knew. I think he was absolutely insensible to fear; indeed, that feeling did not enter into his make-up as a man at all. I do not believe that he could appreciate the meaning of the word." The style of Rear-Admiral Franklin's book, direct and simple, adds to the reader's pleasure in it; and whether he is describing an eruption of Mauna Loa, an evening at an opera of long ago, an interview with a Sultan of Turkey, a royal visit to a United States ship or a beautiful hostess at a dinner party, he is equally at ease and equally sincere in recording an impression. He was appointed an acting midshipman in 1841; and his long story seems short, so thoroughly interested is he in telling it to us. E. IRENÆUS STEVENSON.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

(Continued from page 659.)

range of the San Luis battery that commands the approach to Santiago from the southeast—a force of Cuban allies is posted; within the trochas that surround Santiago on three sides, from twelve to fifteen thousand Spanish soldiers, under Linares, expect attack. The indispensable Cubans play their parts, by command of the insurgent general Garcia, some along the woods west of Santiago to intercept re-enforcements for the beleaguered town despatched by Blanco, some to block the way between Santiago and Caimanera (Guantanamo Bay) on the east, while three thousand, led by Garcia in person, have been brought in our transports to-day from Aserradero to Siboney, an anchorage six miles southeast of Sevilla. Within the harbor, Cervera's fleet; just beyond its entrance, Sampson's war-ships, guarding against a possible evasion—now that the sunken Merrimac is admitted to be not a complete obstruction in the channel. On land there is no marked disparity in the opposing forces, and re-enforcements for either or both may arrive before the blow is struck. The Yale, with a force of volunteers, should reach the coast and land her men to-morrow, while General Pando, with eight thousand Spaniards from Manzanillo, may attempt the rescue of Linares. To intercept Pando's re-enforcements has been Garcia's chief anxiety. A little pause will be given to our side while the paths from the coast are being widened into roads over which cannon may be hauled up to points commanding a beautiful old city with an ugly flounce of trenches and barbed-wire on its outskirts. Heavier guns are still to be landed; a few Gatling, Hotchkiss, and field guns have reached the front. It is reported that every road and path leading to Santiago has been mined with dynamite—a Spanish offset to the Vesuvius, "earthquake-thrower," that night after night has been "coughing" at the defences near the harbor's mouth. "Rough Riders" and dismounted regular cavalry encamp to-night on a plain within three miles of Santiago.

Monday, June 27.—Our marines at Camp McCalla, now in undisputed control of the outer bay, ask permission to attack the Spanish garrison at Caimanera, on the western shore of the landlocked portion of the harbor. A despatch from Miss Clara Barton announces her arrival at the landing-place in Guantanamo Bay, and states that Red Cross tents have already been erected.

Admiral Camara has received orders from Madrid, it is said, to proceed through the Suez Canal with the warships under his command. Our consul at Port Said has protested against permitting the Spanish fleet to refill its bunkers with coal there.

An official bulletin of the Navy Department announces that "Commodore Watson sails to-day in the cruiser Newark to join Admiral Sampson at Santiago, where he will take under his command an armored squadron, with cruisers, and proceed at once to the Spanish coast." Another official bulletin, subsequently posted, adds the information that "this squadron will sail for the coast of Spain immediately." The Bureau of Navigation has given to the press the following particulars: "Commodore J. A. Howell is assigned to the command of the First Squadron of the North Atlantic fleet. Commodore W. S. Schley is assigned to the command of the Second Squadron of the North Atlantic fleet. Commodore John C. Watson is assigned to the command of the Eastern Squadron. The Eastern Squadron will be composed of the following vessels: Flag-ship Newark, battle-ship Iowa, battle-ship Oregon, cruiser Yosemite, cruiser Yankee, cruiser Dixie, and the colliers Scindia, Abarenda, and Alexander."

The third expedition to the Philippines, commanded by General Arthur McArthur, who makes the Indiana his flag-ship, sails from San Francisco. The other vessels starting to-day are the City of Para, Ohio, and Morgan City. The Valencia will sail to-morrow.

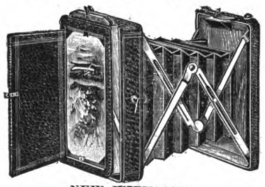
Brigadier-General R. T. Frank, who succeeded Major-General Wesley Merritt in command of the Department of the East, with headquarters at Governors Island, New York, is relieved of that command and ordered to report in person to the Secretary of War for assignment to duty. Brigadier-General G. L. Gillespie is ordered to take command of the Department of the East.

Tuesday, June 28.—From Cape Frances, the southeastern point in the province of Pinar del Rio, to Cape Cruz, the southwestern point in the province of Santiago de Cuba, every port but one has been an open door through which supplies could freely pass to the Spanish army of occupation. Notice was served to-day that these doors have been closed. President McKinley's proclamation of this date declares that "in addition to the blockade of the ports specified in my proclamation of April 22, 1898, the United States of America has instituted and will maintain an effective blockade of all of the ports on the south coast of Cuba, from Cape Frances to Cape Cruz, inclusive, and also of the port of San Juan, in the island of Porto Rico." The reference in the last clause is to the blockade of San Juan by the St. Paul (Captain Sigsbee), which has been in effect for a week already. As for Captain Sigsbee's efficiency in that command, a striking bit of evidence is supplied in the bulletin posted by the Navy Department to-day:

Captain Sigsbee reports that on Wednesday afternoon, while off San Juan, Porto Rico, he was attacked by a Spanish unprotected cruiser and the Spanish torpedo-boat-destroyer Terror. The Terror made a dash, which was awaited by the St. Paul. The St. Paul hit the Terror three times, killing one officer and two men and wounding several others. The Terror dropped back under cover of the fortifications with difficulty, and was towed into the harbor in a sinking condition, where she is now being repaired. Later a cruiser and a gunboat started out, but remained under protection of the forts.

Wednesday, June 29.—General Shafter reports that Spanish re-enforcements for General Linares, numbering eight thousand, with pack-trains and droves of animals, are advancing from Manzanillo to the relief of Santiago. An equal force (i. e., eight or nine thousand men, General Snyder's division of the Fourth Army Corps) is now leaving Tampa for Santiago to aid Shafter.

Major-General Merritt, sailing for Manila this morning on the Newport, expects to overtake the transports of the third Philippine expedition.



The Navy Department makes public this afternoon a portion of a despatch from Admiral Dewey, dated at Cavité, June 23, as follows:

No change in the situation since my telegram of June 17. Five German, three British, one French, one Japanese men-of-war in port. Insurgents constantly closing in on city. Aguinaldo, insurgent leader, with thirteen of his staff, arrived June 19, by my permission, on the Nan Chan. He established himself at Cavité, outside the arsenal, under the protection of our guns, and organized his army. The progress of Aguinaldo has been wonderful. He has invariably conducted the war humanely. My relations with him are cordial, but my conferences have been only of a personal nature.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Here you have it

For Tourists, Bicyclists, and Everybody.

NEW WITH 1898.

THE TOURIST POCKET CAMERA, $10.00

LIGHT—Made of Aluminum, covered with Leather.
STRONG—Self-locking side arms made of Brass.
COMPACT—Only 1½ x 4¼ x 5¼ inches when closed, slipping readily into an ordinary coat-pocket.
TESTED—Every camera tested before leaving factory, and will produce perfect pictures.
QUALITY OF WORK is the best, the lens used being the high-grade Bausch & Lomb Meniscus.
SIZE OF PICTURE is 3¼ x 4¼ inches, the popular lantern-slide size. This is the only Pocket Camera in the world taking as large a picture.

We also make a full line of Long and Short Focus Hand and Tripod Cameras 4 x 5 and 5 x 7, with all Movements and Latest Improvements, Superbly Finished, at Popular Prices. Ask your dealer for them, or send for free catalogue to MONROE CAMERA CO., 48 Stone St., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

HOW OFTEN YOU HEAR A MAN SAY
MY SHIRT PUSHES UP AROUND NECKBAND
OR DRAGS ON THE BACK OF THE NECK
OR DRESS SHIRT FRONT IS NOT SMOOTH
WEAR Clem SHIRTS AND AVOID THESE ANNOYANCES

FOR SALE AT FURNISHERS OR ADDRESS THE MAKERS

H. C. CURTIS & CO.
TROY, N.Y.

No. 4711 ESSENCE OF Rhine Violets No. 4711

The highest degree of refinement.—Wonderfully delicate and lasting.—Absolutely true odor of the living flower.—Be sure to get the "No. 4711."

Sole U. S. Agents
MÜLHENS & KROPFF
NEW YORK

CENTURY LAWN SPRINKLER

Nickelled brass nozzle on steel stand. Will last a lifetime. Connects to ordinary hose coupling. Covers one to five hundred square feet by regulating pressure. Sent, expressage prepaid, to any address, on receipt of . . . $1

Circular on application.

CENTURY NOVELTY COMPANY,
606 14th St., Washington, D. C.

KLONDIKE NECESSITIES
Take a SMITH & WESSON large Revolver

when you go to the Klondike, or you may return empty handed.

Catalogues of desirable weapons for heavy use mailed on application.

SMITH & WESSON,
15 Stockbridge St., Springfield, Mass.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE
Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak.

Kodak Photography Is Easy Photography

All 1898 Kodaks use our light-proof film Cartridges and can be Loaded in Daylight.

$5.00 to $35.00.

Catalogues free at agencies or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

CHICKEN
NOVEL MEXICAN DELICACY.

Minced chicken, highly seasoned with Mexican spices, and wrapped in corn husks. Unique, delightful. At grocers, or ½ pound can mailed for 10 c in stamps. Booklet sent on request

TAMALE
ARMOUR PACKING CO.
DEPARTMENT H
KANSAS CITY, MO. U.S.A.

Hunter Baltimore Rye

Warranted a Pure Tonical Stimulant.

The Best Whiskey in America.

Sold at all First-class Cafés and by Jobbers.
WM. LANAHAN & SON, Baltimore, Md.

If Fishes Could Read

Our catalogue they wouldn't be caught. It tells everything "catching" for the modern Isaak Walton.

If not sold by your local dealer, we will mail samples of

PFLUEGER'S "Luminous" Bait

for either trout, bass or muskallonge for 50 cts. in stamps. Illustrated catalogue free.

The Enterprise Mfg. Co., Akron, O.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

MAGAZINE, - $4 00 a Year
WEEKLY, - $4 00 a Year
BAZAR, - - $4 00 a Year
ROUND TABLE, $1 00 a Year

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE SPANISH RESERVE SQUADRON, UNDER COMMAND OF ADMIRAL CAMARA, ON ITS WAY TO PORT SAID.—DRAWN BY L. A. SHAFER.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NEWS FROM THE KLONDIKE.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

March 12, 1898.

Word was brought to Dawson of the state of the water at the Yukon flats. A great tide of human beings was pouring into Dawson by way of the Chilkoot passes, and Captain Hansen, manager of the A. C. Company, saw that if the boats did not get up the river the situation would be extremely critical. He went down in the A. C. boat Marguerite to Fort Yukon, where he learned of the alleged failure of the boats to pass over the bars, and assuming, it is said, that a bona fide effort had been made, he returned to Dawson, reporting that low water would not allow the other boats, the Bella and the Weare, to get up, that there was a shortage of provisions, and that those who had no grub must flee for their lives. There was held a series of meetings to discuss the grave situation. Captain Hansen, greatly wrought up, went about, up and down the streets, addressing crowds of men, urging them to go! go!

Healy of the N. A. T. Company, in what we can attribute to nothing else than the narrowest spirit of business rivalry, kept telling every one that there would be no shortage of grub, no starvation, and he posted a public notice to that effect. A meeting was held, in which the companies were called upon to state how far they could be depended upon. It was shown that if the other boats did not get up, there was not sufficient grub for all in the country. Healy admitted this to be the case. His attention was thereupon called to the sign he had posted, and it was taken down. The miners and people of Dawson, as the situation grew more serious, held angry meetings, and organized a committee of twelve, who called upon the small Mounted Police force, announcing their intention to divide up evenly what grub the stores had, and warning the police of the uselessness of making resistance. The officer in command went to Captain Hansen and Captain Healy, and told them that to make resistance with the handful of men at his command was simple suicide. The companies thereupon set about to defend themselves; and the A. C. Company, for one, barricaded the doors of its corrugated metal warehouse with provisions and supplies, and armed its employés with Winchesters. The day before the day set for the division, to the relief of all, and no doubt to the astonishment of Captain Hansen, the Weare steamed into the dock, followed a few days later (on September 30) by the Bella, both boats reporting a hold-up at Circle City. The Bella was thirty-five tons short, and the Weare twenty-five tons. The boats had been ordered to leave no cargo at Circle City, but to proceed on to Dawson, the point most in need of relief, Circle City being 280 miles nearer the food centre. In consequence of the danger of starvation, and the excitement at Dawson, and Hansen's report that the boats would not get up, the inhabitants at Circle City determined to stop the boats and take enough supplies by force to put themselves beyond danger. When the Weare arrived the boat was boarded by men armed with Winchesters, and the captain ordered to take off a part of his cargo, and at the same time the money was tendered to pay for the goods in full. The captain of the Weare made angry protest, but was forced to land twenty-five tons. She was believed to carry 200 to 250 tons of cargo of all kinds. It is charged that a large part of this was whiskey, or rather one way of putting it is that some charge that if the Weare had carried flour in place of the whiskey she had aboard, all danger of famine would have been removed. When the Weare was about to start up, the N. A. T. passengers who had come as far as Circle City applied for passage, but were denied it, on the ground that orders were for nothing but freight to be taken to Dawson. Three days later the Bella arrived at Circle City. The miners met her at the dock, and demanded the removal of her cargo. An eye-witness describes the scene as follows:

"The Bella arrived about nine o'clock in the evening. It was dark, and quite a number of people were on the dock. When the gang-plank was fast, a committee of miners went aboard and told the captain that they had held a miners' meeting at the A. C. store that day, that they were short of grub a certain amount, that the committee had a list thereof, and they gave the captain a copy and told him they wanted the grub left at the warehouse at Circle, and if he would not willingly do so they would compel him to. They claimed, in the first place, that they needed the grub; in the second place, that it belonged to the citizens of the United States, and that the company had no right to ship it out to Canada. The matter was referred to Captain Rae of the United States army, who was a passenger on the boat. Captain Rae told the committee that the cargo did not belong to the company, but had been sold (and the money taken) in Dawson, and they were trying to get it there. The committee replied that it did not make any difference, they were going to have it anyway, and they sent a committee down to open the hatch. Captain Rae again appealed to them. He told them it was lawlessness, against order, and not the proper thing to do at all; that if he had any soldiers he would see that they did not do it, he would undertake to fight them, but he was but one man with one gun. He told them he wished they would remember the people up-river, who perhaps were needing provisions a great deal more than they; that they might go and take out stuff, but without his permission, and he urged them to take as little as possible. He further told them that such practices were bad in a new country like this, and that it would lead to more wrong actions. He promised them that another year he would have soldiers, and they would not dare to do such a thing then. There were, no doubt, men in Circle City who, if they found out they could hold up a boat with provisions consigned to Dawson, would hold up the same boat from Dawson with gold consigned to Seattle."

The miners listened to the speech of Captain Rae, and then set to work unloading. They worked from half past nine till one, removing thirty-five tons of the boat's cargo, such as flour, bacon, hams, canned goods, etc. The Bella reached Dawson with eighty tons.

Before starting, the Bella, in contrast to the action of the other company, took aboard a number of her own passengers, dropping a barge she had in tow, and even three passengers of the N. A. T. Company, making scant forty in all. There was talk at Meneek of holding up the Bella, as there was but seven months' grub to last nine months, but the miners at a meeting decided not to do so.

On the arrival of the boats Hansen continued to urge the people to go, and meetings were being held all the while. Hansen offered the free use of the Bella to those wishing to go down. Healy made a charge of fifty dollars to those who went on his boat, the Weare. Hansen further told the people that if any were short he would supply them with grub to Forty Mile, and at that place the storekeeper of the A. C. Company would supply them with grub to Circle, and if any were without money grub was to be supplied them free of cost. Of those who got up-river, about thirty had to go back, and thus of all the number who started for the gold-fields after the arrival of the Portland with her gold, not over a dozen were able to remain at Dawson. Thus were the hardships of the trail compensated for by the disappointments of the easier and less expensive route.

The Bella remained but twenty-four hours before pulling out. The river was running full of ice, and navigation was dangerous. When the boat reached Circle the captain considered it unwise to go on. The passengers urged the captain to do so, and threatened to take charge of the boat themselves, but next morning, when they were about to carry out their threat, the boat was frozen fast in the ice. Many went down in small boats. The old-timers, who knew better than any one else, were the very first to leave. The whole number that went down river was perhaps three or four hundred. Among them were many of the new arrivals, and it marks the seriousness of the situation when officials of the new government, such as the Gold Commissioner's assistant and a party of surveyors, had to keep straight on.

All haste was made by those going the other way. Men with hand sleds, with now and then a dog team, were leaving in batches of twenty to fifty a day after the 1st of November. The price of everything necessary for the trip out rose, until dogs brought as high as $300 apiece. A basket sledge cost $75; dog feed, $1 a pound, snow-shoes, $30; moccasins, $7 50 to $10; moose-hide mittens, $7 50 to $10. The dog-teamsters were making money by taking parties out; $600 to $1000 was the price for passage, and that price has ruled during the winter. The situation was relieved by many of those who came in with short supplies selling their outfits. A four-thousand-pound outfit sold for $4000; $1 a pound ruled. Outfits were eagerly snatched up at that price. The restaurants were the most eager buyers. There were two in the place. They were running about half the time. They would have to close until another outfit could be had. Meals were $3 50, porterhouse steak, $8; coffee, 50 cents; pie or sandwich, 75 cents; cocoa, $1 50 a cup; and everything else in proportion. These prices continued the same until the 1st of March, when a meal could be had for $2.

Quantities of meat came to Dawson. The Indians turned in thousands of pounds of moose meat. Last year they got $30 a ham; formerly, at Forty Mile, $3 50 a ham; now they get $90 to a $100. Jack Dalton brought a hundred head of cattle over his trail to mouth of Pelly about June 1, butchered them, and rafted down, and a man named Cameron brought sixty more by same trail. Fern took seventy, William Perdue seventy, and Hibbard Norton eighteen to Five Fingers by branch of Dalton's Trail. W. S. Courtnay drove 595 head of sheep to mouth of Pelly. Both Courtnay and Perdue, starting late, had experiences in the river never to be forgotten. Prices of meat have been $* to $1 50 a pound. The grub question has been the one question all winter. Numerous parties went out with the intention of tramping in in the spring. Supplies can be brought down river on the water before the steamers arrive. The miners, wherever one goes, appear to be well supplied, and do not stint themselves nor allow others to do so. There has been no speculation in grub among the old-timers. There has been much swapping and selling of flour, but always at $6 a sack. Flour has been gradually coming down, $50 prevailing during the winter. At the beginning of March, however, there was a sudden slump, and flour could be had for $25. It appears as if every one had been hoarding flour, until all at once they saw the end of winter and the relief of the situation, though there are many, many people who have run short, and are going either hungry or on one meal a day. There is no need of this, as food can be had for price, and Dawson is an easy place to make money for a man of resource who will work hard. There is more flour than anything else now, but other things have gone up. Butter is $2 50 a pound; lard the same; chocolate, $3 a pound; condensed milk, $1 25.

The N. A. T. Company was utterly unable to fill its orders, and there has been much bitterness among the miners. The A. C. filled all its orders. After the A. C. was sold out the N. A. T. began putting on its shelves various goods, and the prices raised, the pretence being made that it is stuff freighted up from Forty Mile. That's the Yukon way of conducting business. At the A. C. store Indians and women of the town have been able to buy anything, even flour, but no one else. The N. A. T. Company also has its favorites. Some can buy, others not. Nearly everything sold is on order. It is a favor of the most marked kind. The stock in both stores is very small. One of the clerks in the store remarked, laughingly, that that was the first place he was ever in where the less you could sell the better clerk you proved to be.

If grub has been scarce, there has appeared to be no end of liquor, but even that is giving out. Alcohol has been selling at $3300 a cask. Nails, for some singular reason, are scarce, being worth $5 a pound, $500 a keg; in connection with which there is an old man hard at work on the contract of removing the nails from the charred wood-work of the old opera-house that was burned the opening night, in return for the privilege of panning out the gold-dust dropped into the sawdust of the saloon. Coal-oil, too, has been $40 a gallon; candles, $40 a box.

Wages have been $1 50 an hour, but, on account of the short days, men have not averaged more than $6 to $7 a day. Of the new-comers, many took lays to work for one-half, a section of forty feet, on good claims, and went to work sinking holes. An astonishing number of these lays have been thrown up, for reasons to be explained at length later. Many men have been doing well cutting and sawing wood at $30 to $40 a cord. More who want to take no chances are working for wages. Little actual prospecting has been done by any one. Yet it has been nothing but a succession of stampedes all winter, at present over 7000 claims having been staked and recorded.

We had no communication with the outside world until January 4, when the official mail arrived, and on the 25th of February forty dogs brought in part of the regular mail, much more being left behind at Little Salmon, some having come direct from Dyea. The provisional government were ice-bound at Big and Little Salmon. Some of them have arrived just now. Major Walsh, the commissioner of the new "Yukon Provisional District," is still at Big Salmon, and over half a ton of mail yet at Little Salmon. The river closed in November, and there were many narrow escapes at all points.

There have been numerous cases of freezing of toes and hands, and even lives lost, but the winter has been unusually mild. A double clean-up will go out this year. Much work is being done on Eldorado and Bonanza. A striking thing is the small amount of work done on the several creeks, the very great unevenness of the pay, and the great confidence in the creeks. The country is full of gold, but at the present time it has hardly been prospected. As soon as the river froze those stranded at Circle and below began to work toward Dawson.

Al Thayer and George Ransbury, N. A. T. Company passengers, were the first to reach here, having left Circle October 30, with six dogs and two sleds, in company with an Indian guide, Paul. They brought enough provisions to take them back to Circle if necessary, and a large supply of candles and moccasins to sell for ready cash—a total weight of 1000 pounds. They were thirty-eight days in an extremely cold snap, and had to chop a trail forty times across the Yukon ice. Thayer, beyond a doubt, saved the lives of Joaquin Miller and his companion, W. H. E. Canovan, who left Circle ahead of them with a hand-sled, against the urgent advice of those familiar with the hardships and dangers of winter travel in the snow. It is just the sort of thing Miller has been doing ever since he started to come here with $50 in his pocket, and is characteristic of the man who in his reports is still advising more men with $50 in their pocket to come in to the Yukon. Thayer passed Miller on the opposite side of the river, broke down at Charley River, eighty miles out, and in consequence was overtaken. With 150 miles still ahead of them, Miller had the following supply of food: 24 lbs. German sausage, 6 lbs. bacon, 6 lbs. pilot-bread, 10 lbs. beans, and they bought 6 lbs. of moose meat at Charley River. Exchanging their sleds, Thayer took them in charge and brought them on to Dawson. Miller is advising people about this country, using the prestige of his name as a writer of fiction and poetry. He is not fitted to advise who came into this ill-provided country without an outfit, and who has been from the start, and is now, dependent wholly on the bounty and foresight of others. Poetry is out of place here in winter, unless the dreams of the dreamer can thaw the frozen mercury or satisfy the demands of a Yukon appetite.

On the 16th of February A. E. Carr, otherwise known as Jack Carr, arrived with the mails, having made the remarkable journey of 1700 miles from St. Michael, leaving there Thanksgiving day. He has passed on toward Dyea.

Tappan Adney.

THE SHOW.

"Come in, come in!" the Showman cries;
And touts with clattering, fleshless jaws.
"My panorama edifies,
My portraits catch even Hell's applause.
I've store of paintings praised Below,
With scenes to make Friend Satan vain.
But none such mastery can show
As these—the ghastly art of Spain.

"From burning homes, from screw and rack
See Jewish maids and graybeards flee;
With branded brow and livid back,
The pillaged Moors attain the sea.
And, pray, admire these dungeons grim,
That stake, those robes with tongues of flame!
They wrought their work as serving Him
A Torquemada dared to name.

"Roll on, my show! Dark Alva here,
My apt lieutenant, sullen stands—
Stranger to mercy as to fear—
Apollyon of the Netherlands.
And there, toward helpless England's shore,
The dread Armada glides, ill-starred;
My harvest had been thousands more
Had Ireland's reefs forgot their guard!

"Ho, for the New World! Knife in hand,
Their victims gasping at their feet,
See false Menendez and his band,
Their master-butchery complete.
In tortures that a fiend might dread,
Lo, shrieking Incas gold upyield.
And look! The Spanish Main runs red,
The Spanish pirates' booty-field.

"Now note what horrors choice I have;
The Eastern Indies' story rare.
The blazing hut, the ravished slave
Define the Spaniard's fostering care.
And, next, baptized with sister-name,
The Western Isles present their ring,
By Spanish crime, for Spanish shame,
A record filled to festering!

"And last, I show thee, blackened jewel,
Of all the Antilles carcanet!
What! Didst thou fancy Time's long school
Could make the Spaniard human yet?
Scourged—prostrate—with thy strangled cry,
I, Death, have seemed thy friend—of all!
Despair not! In the darkening sky
Justice and vengeance wait to fall!"

E. Irenæus Stevenson.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Solvent Power of BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

Nature's Antidote to Uric Acid Poisoning

Dr. C. H. Davis, of Meriden, Conn., reports in "New England Medical Monthly."

"Mr. R. L. Roys, of this city, consulted me about two years ago for Stone in the Bladder, from which he had been suffering for years. On my suggestion BUFFALO LITHIA WATER as he he commenced the use of was very much opposed to operative interference. After using the Water for a short time, disintegration to a certain extent took place and large quantities of stone were passed. For several days in succession he passed as much as a teaspoonful of the debris, and at intervals for a considerable period he passed large quantities, and under the continued use of the Water there was a constant passage of Calculi until he was entirely relieved."

"The photograph herewith is a correct representation and exact size of some of the largest specimens of calculi discharged by Mr. Roys. A chemical and microscopical analysis showed that they are URIC ACID with a trace of the Oxalate of Lime."

Possessing the power to disintegrate and eliminate Uric Acid in the form of Calculi, it goes without saying that it is equally potent as a preventive of the accumulation of Uric Acid or its Salts in the system, constituting it both a powerful remedy for and preventive of all Uric Acid Poisoning, embracing Gout, Lithæmia, Rheumatism, Calculi, Bright's Disease, Herpetiform Neuralgic Affections, Nervous Depression, Nervous Irritability, some forms of Dyspepsia and Asthma, Eczemas and undefinable ills without end. Pimples, Blotches and other facial eruptions due to excess of Uric Acid are not only removed by this Water, but it imparts a smoothness and softness to the skin, and a clearness to the complexion not to be obtained from any of the cosmetics of the shops.

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

is for sale by Grocers and Druggists generally. Pamphlets on application.

PROPRIETOR, BUFFALO LITHIA SPRINGS, VA.

Springs open for guests from June 15th to Oct. 1st.

Have You Read—

Memories of a Rear-Admiral

Who has Served for More than Half a Century in the Navy of the United States. By S. R. FRANKLIN, Rear-Admiral U. S. Navy (Retired). Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, $3 00.

Collections and Recollections

By One Who Has Kept a Diary. With One Illustration. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 50.

Through the Gold Fields of Alaska to Bering Straits

By HARRY DE WINDT, F.R.G.S., Author of "A Ride to India," etc. With a Map and Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 50.

NEW YORK AND LONDON

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers

WONDERFUL TRIËDER BINOCULARS

½ Actual Size.

Have 8 to 10 times the power of the best of the old-style field and opera glasses.

Pocket size—invaluable for Army and Navy, War Correspondents, Race Meets, Regattas, Travel, and the Theatre.

Send for Descriptive Catalogue. For sale by leading Jewelers and opticians throughout the United States. Among them:

New York—Theodore B. Starr, F. G. Schmidt.
Brooklyn—J. B. Hoecker, 312 Fulton St.
Chicago—C. D. Peacock, Spaulding & Co., Hyman, Berg & Co., N. Watzy, H. Borsch.
Philadelphia—Queen & Co., Bonschur & Holmes.
Washington—Franklin & Co., Moore & Leding, D. N. Walford.
Boston—Pinkham & Smith.
St. Louis—A. S. Aloe Co., Erker Bros.
San Francisco—Hirsch & Kayser.

Prices Range From $44.50 to $72.50.

C. P. GOERZ, 52 Union Sq. (East), N.Y. City

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

Travelers' Letters of Credit

Available in All Parts of the World

ISSUED BY

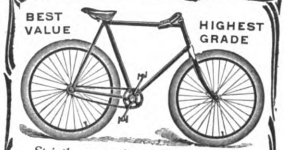
Guaranty Trust Co.

of New York.

NASSAU, CORNER CEDAR STREET,
LONDON OFFICE, 33 LOMBARD ST., E. C.

The Scientific American Army and Coast Defence Supplement

This publication is intended to extend and amplify the work of the recent "Scientific American Navy Supplement," and contains over 100 large and first-class engravings, showing among other subjects:



Disappearing Guns, Machine Guns, Armor,
Rapid-Fire Guns, Projectiles, Mortars,
Submarine Mines, Dynamite Guns, Etc.

Price by Mail, 25 Cents.

A magnificent double-page supplement of our largest battle-ship, the "Iowa," also accompanies this issue, which is in every way up to the standard of excellence of the "Navy" Supplement, and the two publications include the most complete, reliable, and up-to-date information regarding our Navy and Coast Defence that has yet been published in periodical form. A copy of the "Navy" and the "Army and Coast Defence" Supplements sent by mail on receipt of 50 cents.
For sale by all newsdealers, or address,

MUNN & CO., Publishers,
361 Broadway, New York.

Gales' CYCLES

Strictly up to date. Every practical modern idea used in its construction.

Narrow Tread. Large Tubing. Large Balls and Bearings.

Detachable cranks, patent barrel hubs, requiring but one oiling a season; ball holders in all bearings that are absolutely dust proof. Adjustable handle bars; guaranteed in every particular by an old house of established reputation.

GOTHAMS, $25. PRICE $50. DUANES, $35.

Schoverling, Daly & Gales,
320 BROADWAY, N. Y.

MAGIC LANTERNS WANTED AND FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE. HARBACH & CO. 809 Filbert St. Phila. Pa.

The Exhilarating Mountain Air

of the "Rockies" is a buoyant promise of health and pleasure.—It is a new kind of air—you'll enjoy it. The delightful summer resorts —Denver — Manitou — Colorado Springs and the "Mountain Locked Inns" charm everyone. The most popular train between the East and the Rocky Mountains is

The COLORADO SPECIAL

ONE NIGHT TO DENVER

Via Chicago, Union Pacific and North-western Line.

Leaves Chicago 10 A. M. daily. Stop-overs allowed at Trans-Mississippi Exposition. Low rate tourist tickets and detailed information at all ticket offices.

Chicago & North-Western Ry.

The Pioneer Line West and Northwest of Chicago.

PRINCIPAL AGENCIES:
NEW YORK, 461 Broadway. BOSTON, 368 Washington St. CHICAGO, 212 Clark St.

GETTYSBURG BATTLE-FIELD.

Personally-Conducted Tour via Pennsylvania Railroad.

On Saturday, July 16, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will run a special three-day tour to Gettysburg, the Mecca of American patriotism. Leave New York 8.50 A.M.; Trenton, 10.58 A.M.; Philadelphia, 12.20 P.M. Round-trip rate, including two days' hotel accommodations and carriage drive over the battle-field—all necessary expenses—$13.50 from New York, $12.50 from Trenton, $10.00 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points. A tourist agent and chaperon will accompany the party, and Capt. James T. Long, the celebrated guide, will describe the battle at the High-Water Mark, "Bloody Angle."

CHEW

Beeman's

The Original

Pepsin Gum

Cures Indigestion and Sea-sickness.

All Others Are Imitations.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NOTE.—Safety from alummed food lies in buying only the Royal Baking Powder, which is a pure cream-of-tartar baking powder and the best that can be had.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

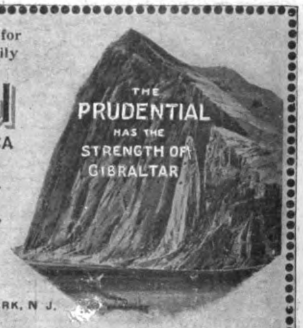
There is a Wealth of pleasure and refreshment in bouillon made of

Armour's Extract of BEEF

It is easily prepared—boiling water and a pinch of salt are the only other ingredients. Our book, "Culinary Wrinkles," mailed free.



Armour & Company, Chicago.

Now is the time to prepare for future needs of the family

The Prudential INSURANCE CO. OF AMERICA

Issues Life Insurance policies for Fathers, Mothers or Children, which are profit sharing.

JOHN F. DRYDEN, PRES'T, NEWARK, N. J.

New Fiction for Summer Reading

SILENCE, and Other Stories. By MARY E. WILKINS. 16mo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

Miss Wilkins, better than any other of our story-tellers, has penetrated the character of New England people. She knows the energy, the directness, the reserve, the reticence, and the fire beneath the ice, which are peculiar to men and women who have lived away from great cities.

THE STORY OF A PLAY. A Novel. By W. D. HOWELLS. Post 8vo, Cloth, $1 50. (Uniform with the Library Edition of W. D. Howells's Novels.)

Mr. Howells's progress in the field of American fiction has been so uniform, so consistent, so steadily upward, that to-day the announcement of a new work from his pen possesses all the elements of a literary event.

GHOSTS I HAVE MET, and Some Others. By JOHN KENDRICK BANGS. With Illustrations by NEWELL, FROST, and RICHARDS. 16mo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

In "The Pursuit of the House-Boat," and its predecessor, Mr. Bangs ventured into the world of spirits, and showed that humor reigns supreme beyond as well as this side the Styx. In "Ghosts I Have Met" the world of spirits comes to Mr. Bangs, and he sets forth his impressions of its inhabitants.

SENORITA MONTENAR. A Novel. By ARCHER P. CROUCH. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

Comes with the fine tang of powder and the heartening clatter of cutlasses. . . . Splendid victories at sea and land over superior Spanish forces follow each other with a whirl that is good enough to take the reader out of the ruts of commonplace, and make him realize the color and the romance of those old days.—New York Press.

SPUN-YARN. Sea Stories. By MORGAN ROBERTSON. Illustrated. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

Short stories that are vigorous, ingenious, and terse enough to attract more than ordinary attention. Astonishing in plot, vivid and simple and direct in style.—New York Press.

THE RED-BRIDGE NEIGHBORHOOD. A Novel. By MARIA LOUISE POOL. Illustrated by CLIFFORD CARLETON. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 50.

Such stirring incident and such clever delineation of character as place Miss Pool indisputably in the highest field of American characteristic fictionists.—Chicago Times-Herald.

DREAMERS OF THE GHETTO. By I. ZANGWILL. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 50.

As a study of the race the book is a noble contribution to literature; as a mere collection of interesting stories it stands pre-eminent for its intensity, tenderness, and absorbing interest.—New York World.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York and London

ages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent stamp EORGE H. DANIELS, C. P. A. New York Central, New York.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2169.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS.
All Rights Reserved.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 16, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

AFTER CERVERA'S DEFEAT—CAPTAIN PHILIP GIVES THANKS ON THE DECK OF THE "TEXAS."

DRAWN BY T. DE THULSTRUP.

"I want to make public acknowledgment here that I believe in God, the Father Almighty. I want all you officers and men to lift your hats, and from your hearts offer silent thanks to the Almighty."

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, JULY 16, 1898

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

This Paper will be the best Pictorial History of the War with Spain, as it was of the War of 1861. Its Special Artists and Correspondents will follow the Army and Navy, and notable Events in Washington and elsewhere will be accurately portrayed.

| ARTISTS. | CORRESPONDENTS. |
|---|---|
| CARLTON T. CHAPMAN. | JOHN FOX, Jr. |
| RUFUS F. ZOGBAUM. | FRANK D. MILLET. |
| FREDERIC REMINGTON. | JOHN F. BASS. |
| T. DE THULSTRUP. | O. K. DAVIS. |
| W. A. ROGERS. | HAROLD MARTIN, |
| CLYDE D. V. HUNT. | AND OTHERS. |

Mr. FOX and Mr. REMINGTON are now with General SHAFTER'S Army, Messrs. MILLET, BASS, and DAVIS are on their way to the Philippines, Mr. HUNT is with the Cubans, and Mr. MARTIN at St. Thomas.

"Ragged Lady," by WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS, a story of New England character and life, was begun in the number of HARPER'S BAZAR issued on July 2, and will be continued during the year. Mr. HOWELLS has written nothing more idyllic, nothing more distinctly American, than "Ragged Lady." The heroine is original and piquant, and the novel leads up to a dramatic climax. The story is illustrated by A. I. KELLER.

ON the 6th of June Mr. RICHARD HARDING DAVIS, writing from Tampa, denounced as untrue certain statements concerning General SHAFTER'S proposed expedition to Cuba, then in course of preparation, written by Mr. POULTNEY BIGELOW, and published in the WEEKLY. Mr. BIGELOW had stated that the army was unprepared for the movement, that it had neither the proper clothing nor the proper food, and he warned the country against the mistake that was being made by those in authority. Mr. BIGELOW wrote his article at a time when the expedition might have been delayed, and for making these revelations Mr. DAVIS denounced Mr. BIGELOW as a traitor. Now we learn from Mr. RICHARD HARDING DAVIS, writing from "the trenches at San Juan, Cuba," under date of July 3, that Mr. BIGELOW'S statements have been verified by facts; that the soldiers at the front are actually suffering from lack of proper clothing; that, soaked with tropical rains and blistered by a tropical sun, they have been without sufficient food; that "some of them have been without food for forty-eight hours," and that "when food did come, it was hardtack and coffee"; that "the army needs artillery. It needs some one in command who is well, strong, and able to stand hardships of a campaign, and it needs mules for transport." He adds, therein confirming Mr. BIGELOW'S declarations which he had denounced a month before, "Truthfully, the expedition was prepared in ignorance and conducted in a series of blunders." He says, moreover, that the "commanding general has not yet been within two miles of the scene of operation." Most important of all, writing on the field of battle and in the very presence of a re-enforced enemy, he declares that "the situation is exceedingly grave," and informs the enemy that if they will make a sortie, our troops must retreat. Either knowledge or honesty has come too late to Mr. DAVIS; while as to "treason," which of these two men is guilty of the sort that—to use Mr. DAVIS'S own words—"should be pointed out quickly and nailed up high as a warning," Mr. BIGELOW, who warned the country against its unpreparedness for the undertaking, or Mr. DAVIS, who betrays it in the face of the enemy and while his shells are sowing death among our troops?

EX-SENATOR EDMUNDS'S address at Philadelphia on the Fourth was a timely reminder, by one of our ablest statesmen, that the idea of colonial expansion, now adopted as a rule of political action in certain quarters, should be discouraged as dangerous to the republic. We need telling illustrations of the fact that opinions should be weighed as well as counted, particularly at the critical time of a departure from established public policy. By the noisy school of aggression conservative declarations of this kind may be called sentimental and antiquated, but they command the assent of the best public opinion of the country. The taking over of new territory, whose people can never be incorporated in the Union, is contrary to the nature and mission of our system of government.

GOVERNOR BLACK and his Republican friends in the State are expecting to give to New York some new election machinery. The present bipartisan police board of the city was established through a deal between Tammany and the Republican machine under PLATT, for the purpose of giving PLATT part of the patronage of the police force of the metropolis, while, in return, Tammany was to have Republican aid in securing legislation which it needed for its own corrupt purposes. In making the bipartisan police commission, the pretence was that the police board had control of the election machinery, and that both parties should therefore be equally represented upon it. The deal between PLATT and CROKER having been disrupted by Governor BLACK, the latter now discovers that it is not necessary that the Police Commissioners should constitute a board of elections, and therefore he favors the separation of the two functions by the establishment of a board of elections—the real reason probably being that with the police commission composed as it is to-day the election machinery of the city would be entirely in the hands of the Governor's enemies, PLATT having made up his mind to defeat him for renomination, or, if he should be renominated, to prevent his election. A pure election machinery is something for which all decent citizens hope, but it cannot be established by a bipartisan system. Bipartisanship means trading, and nothing else.

SEVERAL Republican State conventions in the West have pronounced strongly in favor of the gold standard. After years of hesitation and of paltering with this important issue, the Republican party seems to be coming out on the right side. The coquetry of the politicians has made the silver cause strong enough to capture the Democratic party, just as Republican dallying with the greenback question gave the fiat-money men so strong a hold on that political rag-bag. It seems to be the fate of the Democratic party, so far as the money question is concerned, to accept the cast-off clothing of the Republican party after the latter has outgrown it. Not only has Oregon pronounced for the gold standard, but the Republicans of the First Congressional District of Iowa have followed, declaring themselves "in favor of the present monetary standard of gold, the standard of the commercial world," and demanding "such legislation by the Congress of the United States as will secure the enactment of this much-needed law." The Minnesota Republicans say that they believe "that the national honor and the material interests of the American people require the maintenance of the present gold standard." Ohio Republicans also have spoken in favor of gold, and the Republican party seems therefore to be fully committed to the cause of sound money. It is evident that if the Republican majority had passed the bill they would have obeyed the wishes of their constituents, and would therefore have assured the return of a Republican majority in the next House.

THE boundaries of the United States have been extended by the passage of the NEWLANDS resolution, and Hawaii is now a part of this country. Now that the islands are ours, we trust that the legislative branch of the government will set itself seriously to the task of carrying on their government, and that it will be many years, and only after a radical change in the character of the population of the islands, before any effort will be made to secure their admission to Statehood. At present the resolutions make the President an autocrat, as we have already pointed out. This condition should not exist any longer than is necessary, for it is utterly opposed to the character of our government and the nature of our institutions. That we shall be able to carry on the government of these islands wisely in the end we have no doubt, because we have faith in the character and capacity of the American people. But in the mean time their possession will greatly complicate our existing difficulties, and will add others. It will naturally promote a desire for further extension, and further extension will bring its attendant responsibilities. Even now with Hawaii we must consider seriously the relations between the executive and legislative branches of the government, and if possible we must greatly strengthen the former. We cannot rule Hawaii well under the system which has made our preparations for war so arduous and unsatisfactory. The arm that reaches out to enfold distant islands of the ocean ought to be a stronger one than we possess, or than the founders of our government had in contemplation.

M. MARC LANDRY, the naval expert of the Paris Figaro, is probably still alive, although he has not been heard from very recently. If he is, the news of the destruction of CERVERA'S fleet must have convinced him that he is unfitted, either by reason of his prejudices or by his ignorance, to criticise the American navy. One thing this war has demonstrated, and that is that our navy, so far as its size permits, is one of the most perfect fighting-machines that the world has ever seen. It has dealt its blows with a vigor, a thoroughness, and an assurance that are the result only of sufficient preparation and perfect self-respect and self-confidence. The individual American sailor does not differ essentially from the individual American soldier. He is no more intelligent, he is no more courageous, he is no more ready to do his duty, than the other. But he is not hampered so much as the other by conditions and circumstances over which he has no control. The navy is more completely under the command of naval officers than the army is under the command of soldiers. What the navy has done is a tribute not only to the character of its officers and its men, but an illustration of the value of freedom from too much political interference. Taking the army and navy together, and looking at what they do as soldiers and sailors, divorced entirely from all questions that arise from political interference or civilian control, these two services have in recent weeks given the most convincing evidence of the value of democratic institutions as they go to the making of individual character. The American soldier and sailor, self-respecting and self-reliant and intelligent as they are, are the outcome of our institutions.

ALTHOUGH it is a subject which is somewhat difficult to mention, because of the fact that one is likely to be misunderstood, the attitude of Congress toward our military and naval heroes is a matter of so much importance that it ought not to be avoided. Every honor should be paid to the soldiers and sailors in the field who are making heroic efforts, efforts which we and those who are to come after us will always recall with pride. By all means, the officers who perform exceptional service should receive adequate promotion, and the men under them ample reward. But there is too great a tendency among our politicians and their friends of the daily press to go into hysterics, and to act as if each instance of duty performed is something to call forth a response consistent only with the theory that the performance of duty in this country is surprising. The officers of the army and navy keenly resent this hysterical adulation. They are trained to believe that all that they are and all that they have belong to their country. They are men of great intelligence and of the highest character. They make up the only body of public servants that we have who are entirely and unselfishly devoted to the government. It is therefore humiliating to them to receive excessive rewards for the performance of duty. They earn their professional honors, and, like all men who deserve them, they expect their proper rewards, but they do not want frenzied adulation. A case in point is General WHEELER'S recent order concerning the action at La Guasima. Every officer that the general saw was recommended to the government, and commanding officers were called upon to make further recommendations for deeds that were performed out of the general's vision. This wholesale adulation humiliates those on whom it is bestowed, and takes away the pleasure of exceptional honor when it is won. Another instance is the hasty resolutions giving the thanks of Congress to Commodore SCHLEY for the destruction of CERVERA'S fleet. Commodore SCHLEY deserves the praise due to a brave and skilful man who has performed his duty; but it does not follow that he should receive an honor in the giving of which Congress would insult Admiral SAMPSON, the commander of the fleet, who, had he been present, would have done precisely what every other officer in the fleet did, and to whose preparations and watchful care was largely due the readiness of the fleet to intercept the Spaniards. No soldier or sailor will differ from us when we say that justice is much more gratifying to him than adulation.

THE achievements of the American army in Cuba are of the most glorious character. They illustrate the courage, endurance, and loyalty of the American soldier, whether he be regular or volunteer, and the intelligence and character of the regular officers. Every American must feel a thrill of pride by reason of these achievements. The mere thought of the victory which was gained over the Spaniards is stimulating alone, but when we consider all that our soldiers gained, all the sacrifices that they made, all the hardships that they endured, we not only feel proud of their success, but are struck with wonder by the exhibition of rare qualities which was called forth by strenuous conditions. It was the work of the reg-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ular army of the United States, assisted most valiantly by the "Rough Riders," the Seventy-first New York and the Second Massachusetts volunteers. We know now the stuff of which these men are made. They went to Cuba ill prepared for such conditions as they encountered and such battles as they have fought. There were less than half as many of them as there should have been. They were practically without cavalry, because the government did not send enough horses. The force of artillery was not one-tenth of what it should have been. The means for the transportation of food were so inadequate that correspondents tell us that all the time the men were on half rations, and that some of them, at least, engaged in hard fighting after a fast of thirty-six hours. They were not properly clad, and their heavy uniforms became so much of an encumbrance that they were obliged to throw them and their blankets away. So inadequately fitted out was this expedition that when the battle was at its height the rough pathways over which the volunteers had made their way to the front were choked with the wounded going to the rear to find surgeons, some of them being obliged to walk twelve miles before reaching the needed medical assistance. They fought in an unknown country, amid strange surroundings, tortured by tropical insects and tropical vegetation, soaked by tropical rains, and breathing pestilential air while they slept. Opposed to them was an excellent body of Spanish infantry, well intrenched, and fighting with desperation. Although this is the richest and, in reputation at least, the most progressive country of the world, the soldiers of the effete monarchy used smokeless powder, while our men were obliged to depend upon the old-fashioned explosive, the smoke of which clearly revealed their position to the enemy, and made them an excellent target. As has been said by the New York Sun, according to all the rules of war our men should have given up as defeated, but they are American citizens and American soldiers, and they did not succumb to the strenuous adverse conditions. We have every reason to be proud of our fellow-citizens in arms. They have added new glory to the American name. They have met and overcome the difficulties which have stood in their way, some of which were not due to the enemy. But of that there will be time and occasion to speak later on. The country is now content to enjoy to the full this splendid exhibition of American manhood.

A SUGGESTIVE INCIDENT.

THERE are many complications to be anticipated so long as we hold the harbor of Manila, and these complications will become more numerous and more acute after Admiral DEWEY and General MERRITT have made good our claim to the Philippines. The most important question that can arise from our defeat of Spain and our capture of the islands is as to their disposition. When this question comes into the sphere of practical politics the discussion of it will probably be long, and it may seriously affect the politics of the United States for years to come. In the mean time we ought to be preparing ourselves for its solution, and ought to make up our minds definitely as to the policy to be pursued for the future—whether we are to expand by assuming a dictatorship over tropical territory which, if the history of colonial powers is of any value by way of precedent, we will never colonize, or whether we are to remain content with our vast possessions, which already present to our politicians problems which they have not solved nor even intelligently approached. While it is true that some newspaper writers, both American and English, and some military publicists have settled this question for the American people, and have already announced that the result of our war with Spain is to be aggrandizement, it is clear to any one who knows this country and its people that these prophets are unwise, because there is generally a vast difference between what our people say in their excitement and what they do in their calm and calculating moments. The general recognition of this difference, and the practical wisdom, therefore, of accomplishing a great political change by a coup, if it is to be done at all, have been recently illustrated by the advocates of Hawaiian annexation, whose fear of an adverse verdict by the people prevented them from inserting an annexation plank in their party platforms, and inspired them to attempt a snap-judgment against the people by way of a joint resolution, which would probably be declared unconstitutional if it should ever be brought before the Supreme Court for interpretation.

In view of the debate that is sure to follow the war, and in view of the fact that public opinion now seems to be tending towards the adoption of the imperial scheme, every fact and incident bearing upon the problem should be carefully considered. If this were a European question, if England, France, or Russia were fronting a problem akin to that which is looming up before us, the statesmen of the interested power would not be worthy of their posts if they were not actively engaged in turning the experiences of the present to the account of the future. We Americans, especially in answering so fundamental a question as this, are all statesmen, for we must settle the national policy at the polls, and it behooves us, therefore, to consider carefully every fact that bears upon this issue of a future which every step in the war is bringing nearer. Public and general discussion of this question becomes all the more important in view of the character of the politicians who now control the Senate, which exercises, conjointly with the President, the treaty-making power. As to the House of Representatives, it is distinctly better equipped than the Senate, both intellectually and morally, for dealing wisely and honorably with questions affecting the direction of the national forces and energies and the character of our international relations. The House represents the popular will and the popular conscience, while the Senate stands for the abasement of our politics; for Senatorships have always been the prizes of party leadership, and party leadership of the kind under which the nation now suffers naturally produces the Senators of to-day. The question of expansion is to be determined by such Senators as QUAY, MURPHY, PLATT, MORGAN, and the like, unless intelligent discussion of the issue shall arouse a public sentiment which will affect the minds of such Senators as LODGE and his kind, men who need to be with the public—in a word, who have not yet debased themselves to the level of absolute dependence on machinery and corruption.

The question of the moment which bears upon the overshadowing problem of the future is raised by the presence of an unduly large German fleet at Manila. And while the presence of these ships is suggestive of the complications that are before us rather than a menace of immediate danger, its portent may as well be heeded. Stated briefly, it is, if events move as the expansionists predict, to quote the London Spectator, that our country "stands at the parting of the ways, that her external policy must be radically modified, and that she is engaged in a war which may so develop that it will occupy years, create a national debt, and leave the United States with a powerful army and the second fleet in the world. This is the vision of the future which we are called upon to contemplate, and which the unfriendly conduct of Germany is making very clear. We need have no fear that Germany will physically interfere with our operations at Manila. Although there may be much or little sincerity in the friendly professions of the Emperor, he will not be quick to enter upon an unjust war with this country. He is too clever for that, and has too much at stake in the East to risk such an encounter as would follow an attempt on his part to deprive us of any fruits of victory that would be recognized as legitimate by military and international law, a conflict in which this country would be greatly assisted by German Americans. German insults ought not to disturb us so long as we are confident that either alone or with the aid of Great Britain we shall be able to prevent Germany from doing us any injustice. Indeed, owing to the geographical relations of the two countries and the present state of the German navy, Germany is the first-class European power with which we stand on most nearly even terms. The prospect of a hostile encounter, however, is very remote. Such a war as Germany might begin if she were to insist upon her present attitude, which is evidently in the nature of a bluff, is not in the cards of the Emperor's game. It is true that her fleet at Manila is too large to be explained by the professed desire to protect the interests of German citizens in the Philippines, and that the presence of Admiral VON DIEDRICH and of Prince HENRY is clearly intended to be awe-inspiring. Admiral DEWEY, however, is equal to the situation, and neither he nor General MERRITT is likely to be too deeply impressed by imperial dramatics. Nor do we expect that either the German admiral or the imperial brother will go far enough to vindicate the Spectator's fears that shots may be exchanged between the American and German ships. We may certainly count on German prudence and calculation for the safety of Admiral DEWEY'S fleet from attack. Nevertheless, there is food for much reflection in the situation, and it is fortunate that we have so pregnant and apropos a circumstance to serve as a warning against any undue haste in adopting the policy of expansion, unless we are prepared to accept the possibilities mentioned by the Spectator—a complete revolution of our external policy, the broadening out of the war until it includes all the European nations now rivalling one another in their efforts to secure commercial and military ascendency in China, and, as a direct consequence of such a war, a large permanent standing army, and a navy large enough to withstand either of the two great European combinations; or, with the aid of England, to resist the allied fleets of Continental Europe. There are other facts and conditions in our current political and military history that suggest further considerations which must be taken into account, but they can be more profitably discussed later on. At present we would best be reflecting on the future of this republic, if we undertake the government of Pacific islands, as it is pointed to by this insolent effort to put a staying hand upon us in the midst of our war with Spain. Germany wants a foothold in the Philippines. The Berlin correspondent of the London Times says that it is "quite certain that Germany will do her best to obtain a footing on the islands." There are other powers interested in the East, and England is most anxious to have us for a neighbor there. In a word, if we keep the Philippines our frontiers will touch the frontiers of Europe at the point where there is at present most likelihood of the breaking out of war. In such a war we would be compelled to engage for the defence of what we had taken, for the maintenance of our national dignity, and for the proper performance of our new international obligations. This is what is suggested by imperial German bumptiousness, although it may be harmless for the moment, and, furthermore, although it is quite likely that the German nation would not be arrayed against us when the war actually came upon us. We are not at present, apparently, so much in danger of entering "entangling alliances" as of drifting into entangling differences which will change us from a peaceful republic to a strong military power. Is the next step of democracy to be, as HERBERT SPENCER predicts, a backward one towards militarism?

DIARY OF THE WAR.

Thursday, June 30.—General Wheeler in his official report to General Shafter states that the casualties in the engagement at La Guasima last Friday were—First United States Volunteer Cavalry (strength 500), killed 8, wounded 34; First United States Regular Cavalry (strength 244), killed 7, wounded 8; Tenth United States Regular Cavalry (strength 220), killed 1, wounded 10. Total strength 964; killed 16, wounded 52.

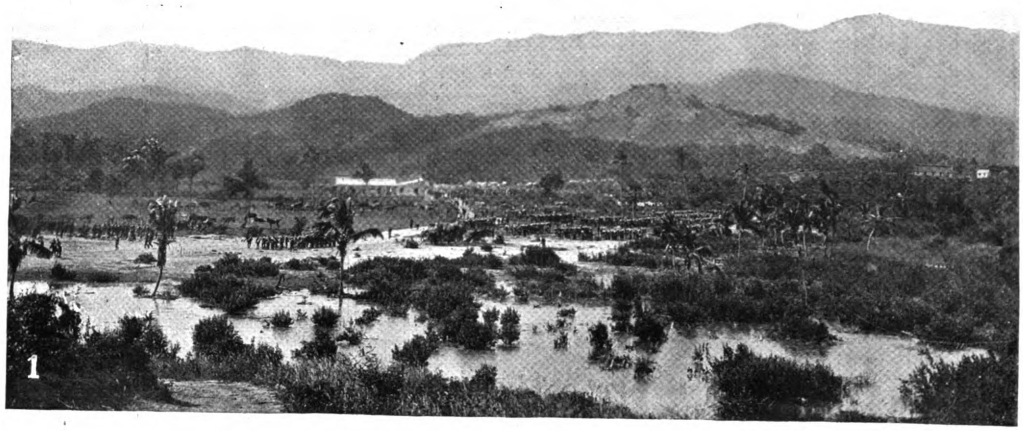
The situation at Santiago is marked by steady advance on our side; on the Spanish side, by withdrawal to positions of great strength commanding the approaches to the city. General Shafter has established his headquarters in the field. Siege-guns were landed at Baiquiri Tuesday night, but it will be impossible to move them to the front for several days. Our line extends northward to the neighborhood of El Caney, a town four miles northeast of Santiago.

The cruiser Charleston and the three transports of the first relief expedition arrived at Cavité (Manila Bay). On the way they stopped at the capital of the Ladrone Islands, and, in obedience to instructions given to General Anderson before the expedition sailed from San Francisco, took possession of the place (June 21). The governor of the islands, with other Spanish officers, and fifty-four soldiers were carried as prisoners to Manila. It is said they were "unaware that war had been declared. When the Charleston commenced to bombard the fortifications the governor sent off a boat with apologies for failing to return the salute, as he had no powder." A company of the Fourteenth United States Infantry was left on the island of Guam, to retain control.

Friday, July 1.—On the heights that overlook Santiago are El Caney and San Juan, the former northeast, the latter southeast of the city. The retention of both places was regarded as indispensable to the Spanish defence; the capture of both seemed the next step in our plan of attack. They were so strongly held by entrenched forces, with the support of artillery and marines from Cervera's fleet, that both were pronounced impregnable to any ordinary assault. Both were carried by assault to-day, as the final outcome of long and fierce contests. At six o'clock this morning Capron's light battery of four guns opened fire on El Caney from a bluff about one and a half miles distant. The shells struck fairly, but were not heavy enough to demolish the fortifications; and now, as throughout the day and all along the line, heroic self-sacrifice on the part of our men accomplished results that heavy guns are designed to effect with less exposure. At eight o'clock General Lawton's infantry took the problem in hand, working their way up the hill side, the Seventh, Twelfth, and Seventeenth Infantry (General Chaffee's brigade) leading in the attack; and so, eleven hours after firing had begun, they won the trenches (which "looked like slaughter-pens"), the fort, and the block-houses. More than a hundred Spaniards were made prisoners; others escaped to Santiago. And meanwhile San Juan, even more strongly held and more essential to the defence of the city, was meeting the same fate. Here there was also an opposing American battery (Grimes's battery); here also the bitter work was done by men on foot, climbing a bare hill side against a pelting rain of bullets, and in despite of a battery that had not been silenced. That splendid trio the "Rough Riders" and the First and Tenth Regulars showed once more the splendid courage and strength and skill it was no longer necessary to prove after their charge at La Guasima one

(Continued on page 702)

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



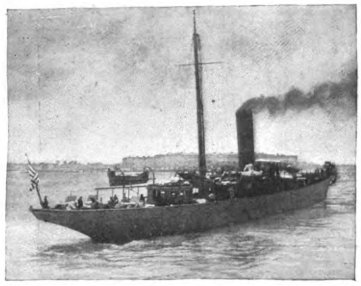
THE INVASION OF CUBA—WITH THE TROOPS AT BAIQUIRI.

Photographs by James Burton, Special Photographer for "Harper's Weekly."

1. Troops going Ashore in Men-of-War's Boats. 2. Hill on which the Stars and Stripes were raised. 3. Troops landing at the Pier.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE INVASION OF CUBA—WITH THE TROOPS AT BAIQUIRI.



Photographs by James Burton, Special Photographer for "Harper's Weekly."

1. The Army leaving Camp for the Attack on Santiago. 2. View Inland from the Landing-place. 3. General View of the Camp.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

Yale made President McKinley an LL.D. and John Hays Hammond an A.M., both in absentia. It may be questioned whether it pays a great university to grant honorary degrees in absentia. So far as is known, an honorary LL.D. is of no practical value to its recipient. It does not bring him an income, nor entitle him to the usufruct of valuable emoluments of any sort; but it gives him a chance to go to Commencement and be exhibited, to make some speeches, meet many learned and agreeable men, make advantageous acquaintances, and have a very good time. All these advantages are missed by gentlemen who are honored in their absence. The President could not go to New Haven to get his degree this year, but Yale might have waited until after the war, and then engaged him. He ought not to go into the Yale catalogue without having at least one experience of New Haven; and, on the other hand, Yale should have had the satisfaction of leading her lion across the stage and of hearing him roar.

U. S. S "GLOUCESTER,"
Formerly J. P. Morgan's Yacht "Corsair," on board which Admiral Cervera was taken after leaving his Flag-Ship, July 3.

Mr. John Hays Hammond is a graduate of the Sheffield Scientific School of the class of 1876. Just now he is in Russia or Siberia, advising with the Czar about new mines on the lines of the Siberian railway. It is doubtless an unusual experience for him to be within reach of New Haven in June. Universities like Oxford, Cambridge, and Chicago, which confer degrees several times in the year, or whenever it is convenient, have an advantage over the institutions which stick to one Commencement, in being able to cook their hare whenever they happen to catch him. Harvard still adheres to her old custom of conferring degrees only once a year, but her learned doctors are always on hand to witness their own creation. This year her LL.D. degree was conferred upon the Earl of Aberdeen, Governor-General of Canada, and upon James Mason Crafts and Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson.

As an indication of the present standing of Professor Charles Eliot Norton in the Harvard community, it is interesting to find him chosen president for the coming year of the Harvard Phi Beta Kappa. Whether this honor was done him in spite of his disapproval of the war with Spain or in consequence of it does not appear. It is probable, however, that the esteem in which he is held by the learned brethren in Cambridge is based on considerations which are not much affected one way or the other by his sentiments about the war.

The war sentiment in the Boston district is much more generally and carefully qualified than in New York. Boston abounds in men who believe in carrying the war through with spirit now we are in it, and who are ready to fight if their turn comes, but the sentiment is also very prevalent there that there should not have been any war at all.

Results of entrance examinations, so far as learned, indicate that the next Freshman class at Princeton will be considerably larger than any of its predecessors. It is thankfully inferred by the authorities of the university that public confidence in the morals of the institution has not been impaired by the painful controversy over the Princeton Inn.

A speaker at the recent International Temperance Congress at Prohibition Park, on Staten Island, opposed the sending of cakes and sweetmeats to soldiers, "as calculated to increase their thirst and the desire for intoxicants." It is not generally understood that the consumption of sweets creates an alcoholic thirst. It does create a thirst, but one which, in most cases, mere water is competent to quench. It is true enough, though, that cake and jam isn't good for soldiers. It is wretched stuff to work on, and cases have been reported where an importation of soft sweet food from friends at home has incapacitated, for a time, half the men in a company. Soldiers are athletes in training, and moderate privation on occasion does them less harm than overfeeding with unsuitable food.

The Post Office Department has decreed that second, third, and fourth class mail-matter shall no longer be returned to the sender or reforwarded to another address until extra postage has been prepaid. The classes of matter affected by the new rule include newspapers and all periodicals, books, pamphlets, circulars, and the like, and merchandise. Where the matter held is of "obvious value" the sender is to be notified, if possible, and a chance given him to pay the postage due. The object of the rule is economy. Its result will be to increase losses by mail and distress proportionately the patrons of the post-office. Nevertheless, it is proper to remember that the classes of mail matter affected are those which cause the deficit in the department's annual report. It is the abuse of the privileges granted to second-class matter especially that makes the department run behind, and a reduction in the cost of handling that class of mailable matter may be worth buying at the cost of some inconvenience.

There is some perplexity apparently as to what disposition to make of Spanish prisoners of war. Admiral Cervera and his officers are destined, we are told, to come North, either to Annapolis or Portsmouth or New York. No doubt they will be made as comfortable as the status of their minds, poor gentlemen, admit, and if private hospitality is suffered to intervene it may be they will pass the summer at Newport. There are few persons living towards whom Americans in general are kindlier disposed just now than towards Admiral Cervera. There is sympathy for him as a brave man in misfortune, and a cordial liking for him—so far as he is known—as a gentleman.

DON PASQUALE DE CERVERA Y TOPETE,
Count de Jerez and Marquis de Santa Ava, Rear-Admiral, Spanish Navy.

As for the Spanish soldiers and sailors, who seem to have accumulated in considerable numbers in the hands of Admiral Sampson and General Shafter, why not send them back to Spain and put them ashore. They would doubtless be better pleased, on the whole, to be at home, and once there they would have to stay there, for Spain has now no means of sending them anywhere else. They can't do us any harm in Spain, we would be quit of the expense of feeding them and of the bother of guarding them, and there is no immediate prospect that we shall need any considerable number of Spanish prisoners for purposes of exchange.

Another alternative would be to bring them to New York, find them jobs, and have them naturalized in time for the fall elections, but that would be hardly military, and very likely our Italian fellow-citizens would object.

M. Jules Lemaître, in a recent discourse at the Paris Sorbonne, put the case against Latin and Greek in a way that must seem to us Americans even more effective than the arguments of our own critics of classical education. We are used to hearing that the time spent by our schoolboys in learning the dead languages would be better spent in learning modern languages and science, but, whatever else our lads may neglect, they don't get out of school without at least a working knowledge of English. M. Lemaître's complaint is that, having studied Greek and Latin twelve years, he has remained "ignorant of English, a language spoken by half the world," and that he only knows German "in a pitiful manner." It is probably true that folks who must choose whether their children

AGUINALDO,
The Philippine Insurgent Leader.

LIEUT.-COM. RICHARD WAINWRIGHT, U.S.N.,
Commander of the converted Yacht "Gloucester" in her plucky Fight with the Spanish Torpedo-boat-destroyers, July 3.

shall study Latin or English have a harder choice to make than we have when we weigh Latin against French or German. We have this advantage, too, that any fair scholar who knows English by nature and learns Latin, ought to make very easy work of French, Spanish, and Italian, whereas Frenchmen who learn Latin are not proportionately helped towards a working knowledge of either English or German.

On the other hand, it is interesting to find Mr. G. W. Smalley, in the current Harper's Magazine, advising aspiring writers of English to read French. "The good French writers," he says, "have the qualities which the best English writers lack or have in less degree—lucidity, simplicity, directness, and others—and will supplement and correct that training in English which the writer of English must have. . . . Read French, and do not read German," says Mr. Smalley, "and read Pascal above all other French writers."

A London despatch, dated July 1, told of Mr. E. A. Abbey's election as a member of the Royal Academy. His promotion has come quickly. It cannot be more than three years, at the outside, since he became an associate member. Promotion, however, has been more rapid than is usual in the Academy since then.

All Spanish war-ships in the Atlantic Ocean being now destroyed, may we not have some of the mines taken out of our harbors, and put our larger yachts in commission again? So far as steam-yachts go, Uncle Sam has pretty nearly a monopoly of sport, but there are schooners and other sailing-craft still in possession of private owners, who will doubtless be glad to get out as soon as harbor mines cease to make navigation perilous. The omission of the New York Yacht Club's annual cruise, which has been announced, is timely, but a little sporadic sailing by individuals would not be out of order.

The fiscal branch of the government neglected a seasonable source of revenue when it omitted to impose a stamp-tax on war poems. There are some 20,000 newspapers printed in the United States, of which 2000 are issued daily. Nearly all now publish original war poems in every issue. A moderate tax on all war poems printed—say ten cents each—would bring in an appreciable revenue, while a ten-cent tax, prepaid by an adhesive stamp, on every war poem submitted for publication would yield funds in a way to gladden Mr. Gage's heart. If Uncle Sam continues to develop the internal-revenue business, and really applies his mind to it, he will be able to think of many things which may be taxed, to the general content of the community and without hardship even to the payers of the exaction.

A newspaper paragraph, dated June 28, told of an interesting clash between the principal of the Boys' High-School of Reading, Pennsylvania, and the valedictorian of the graduating class. The valedictorian, a lad named Deeter, read a graduating essay, to some passages in which the principal, Dr. Scheibner took exception as being unpatriotic. In consequence he refused to sign young Deeter's diploma, though he did not refuse to let him have it if he was content to take it unsigned. What makes the controversy interesting is that the passage which gave offence is understood to have commented unfavorably on the practice very much in favor now in American schools of attempting to instil patriotic sentiments into

LOCOMOTIVES AT BAIQUIRI,
Destroyed by Spanish Soldiers before the landing of the United States Troops.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

COL. CHAS. A. WIKOFF, U.S.A., 22d U.S. Infantry.

LT.-COL. J. M. HAMILTON, U.S.A., 9th U.S. Cavalry.

MAJOR A. G. FORSE, U.S.A., 1st U.S. Cavalry.

CAPT. T. W. MORRISON, U.S.A., 16th U.S. Infantry.

CAPT. WM. O. O'NEILL, "Rough Riders."

LIEUT. JULES G. ORD, U.S.A., 6th U.S. Infantry.

LIEUT. D. M. MICHIE, U.S.A., 17th U.S. Infantry.

LIEUT. CHAS. H. FIELD, U.S.V., 2d Massachusetts Volunteers.

CORP'L GEORGE H. DOHERTY, Troop A, "Rough Riders."

CORP'L GEORGE L. IMMEN, Co. C, 71st New York Volunteers.

OFFICERS AND MEN OF UNITED STATES TROOPS KILLED IN THE ATTACK ON THE SPANISH FORCES AT SANTIAGO, JULY 1 AND 2.

school-children by drilling them in singing patriotic songs, and by causing them to repeat, somewhat parrotlike, high-sounding sentiments which few of them can be expected to understand. The expediency of this feature of public-school education seems fairly open to discussion, and attempts to choke off reasonable and decorous criticism of its methods are likely to have an effect the opposite to that desired. The sort of patriotism that is so boisterous about "Old Glory" that it discountenances free speech should try to get its bearings, and make sure it is not off its course.

Ensign Irvin V. Gillis, a young gentleman whose portrait appears herewith, is a son of Commodore Gillis, and is the executive officer of Captain Fremout's torpedo-boat Porter. Mr. Gillis's specialty is catching torpedoes. One dark night, Admiral Cervera, while he still had a fleet, sent a destroyer out to distribute torpedoes among the ships of the American fleet. They did no harm, but the Porter sighted some of them the next morning, and Captain Fremont relates how Mr. Gillis jumped in after one of them which was seen slowly approaching the Porter, got his arm around it, changed its direction, and was feeling for its war-nose to unscrew it, when it sank. That one was lost, though not from any fault of Mr. Gillis's; but the next one was caught and brought aboard, to be shown by Captain Fremont as "a most interesting prize, and worth to the officers and crew of the Porter just $6000 of the government's money."

ENSIGN IRVIN V. GILLIS, U.S.N.

It was given out last week that the third class of cadets, having so far forgotten themselves as to cheer for Colonel Mills, their late commandant, now before Santiago, had all been put under arrest by order of Colonel Mills's successor. West Point in these days must be a gloomy place. The superintendent, General Ernst, has gone to the war; all the officers who could get away have gone to the front in one direction or another, the commandant is master of all he surveys, and the cadets apparently are compelled to keep under strict restraint their natural exuberance over the war news. It would seem to a layman as if it might be expedient to give these young men a chance to vent their feelings now and then in lawful cheers.

The extraordinary privations lately endured by the citizens of Chicago are of a nature to exact sympathy from the most obdurate heart. From July 2 to July 6 Chicago had no local newspapers. On July 1 the stereotypers in all the newspaper establishments struck, and newspapers ceased to be issued in Chicago. It took four days to get new stereotypers from other cities, and to convince the officers of the typographical union that the strike was ill-advised and not deserving of the type-setters' support. During those four days came the most important news of the fighting around Santiago and the news of the destruction of the Spanish fleet. Chicago got it all at second hand, over telephones and out of newspapers sent from St. Louis, Milwaukee, New York, and all outlying cities. On July 5 the printers, having investigated the stereotypers' grievances, decided, by a vote of 350 to 120, that the stereotypers ought not to have struck and should not be supported. Next morning the papers were able to issue four-page sheets, given up entirely to news, and doubtless they were able on the same day to give to the public the news of the loss of the French liner.

Inasmuch as all the daily papers in Chicago are on a one-cent basis, and as most of them at this time of year, when advertising is dull, lose a little something on each copy they sell, the proprietors endured the situation with more equanimity than they might have shown if they had been losing more money by the stoppage. The sufferings of the citizens of the town, cut off from their natural supply of news at a time when the whole country was holding its breath, may be imagined. It is a comfort to feel that their necessities have now been supplied, and that by this time they have caught up again with the progress of civilization.

William Tudor, 37 Brimmer Street, Boston, is collecting funds to supply the "Rough Riders" with hammocks, mosquito-netting, abdominal bands, and other requisites to warfare in the tropics. The Riders come from all parts of the country, and represent all sorts of folks, from New York club-men up to full-blooded Indians. As they come from no State in particular, they are no one's special care, and the only things they seem absolutely sure of getting in sufficient quantity seem to be ammunition and advertising. Whoever their press agent is, there is no disputing his extraordinary efficiency. But advertising, with all its virtues, does not take the place of cholera-bands in the tropics, and it is well that some one is making a business of providing the "Rough Riders" with something else than notices.

Dr. Cornelius Herz, who died at Bournemouth, England, on July 6, led a life full of curious adventure, and his autobiography, if he had left one which did justice to its theme, would have been lively and instructive reading. His notoriety as a man who was mixed up in the Panama swindles is world-wide. Every one may not know that, though born in France, he came in boyhood to New York, got his early education here, and was an American citizen. He served in the Franco-Prussian war, on the side of France, then practised medicine two years in Chicago, then spent a few months in New York, and thence moved to San Francisco. That environment was suited to his gifts, and for a year or two he was highly successful, being able to form a lucrative partnership, and presently to owe very large sums of money to confiding friends. In 1878 he went back to Paris, as representative of a telephone and electric-light company, and there became the able lieutenant of Baron Reinach, Jewish banker, and one of the greatest of the company of cracksmen who robbed the French peasants in the name of the Panama Canal. It is obvious what interesting passages there must have been in a life whereof the main achievements are in such bold relief. Dr. Herz's records, if he left any, should find their way into the hands of some competent writer.

Mrs. Seth Low, Mrs. R. F. Cutting, and Miss Schieffelin (242 East Fifteenth Street, New York) are included among a number of ladies who are authorized to receive subscriptions to buy band instruments for the Twelfth Regiment of New York Volunteers. The Twelfth, it seems, which is now at Chickamauga, had no band, and its friends in New York did not like to think of it as going off to the wars uncheered by its own outfit of martial music. About $2000 in all is wanted, part to buy the instruments, part to supplement the pay of the musicians. Musicians, as a rule, don't fight, but when fighting is going on they help the hospital corps. Money therefore which sends musicians to the front provides aid for the injured as well as band music.

Mr. Frank A. Vanderlip, whose picture appears on this page of the WEEKLY, is Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and, like his chief, comes from Illinois. The $200,000,000 war-bond issue has been his especial charge, and he is the author of "Circular 101," which told how to buy the bonds. This circular, which was distributed by hundreds of thousands, proved to be easily understood, and has done its business well. Mr. Vanderlip is credited with a clear mind, excellent business abilities, and an exceptional capacity for hard work.

FRANK A. VANDERLIP, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

E. S. MARTIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Fort, or Intrenchments, on Site of old Block-house. Hospital. Officers' Mess. Cuban Camp. Cable-house.

LANDING A FUNERAL PARTY AT CAMP McCALLA.

"Marblehead." Town of Caimanera. "Texas." Fort. "Marblehead's" Launch. "Suwanee."

SHELLING THE SPANIARDS OUT OF CAIMANERA, FORT AND TOWN.

EVENTS AT GUANTANAMO BAY, JUNE 15.

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS.*

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "THE GREAT STONE OF SARDIS," ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY A. B. FROST.

VI.—CAMP ROY.

NO thoughts of idiocy crossed the minds of any of the camping party during their first breakfast under the great oak-tree. The air, the sunlight, the rippling waters of the lake, the white clouds in the blue sky, the great trunks of the trees, the rustling of the leaves, the songs of the birds, the hum of insects, the brightness of everything, their wonderful appetites—the sense of all these things more than filled their minds.

For the greater part of that day Mr. Archibald fished, sometimes in a stream which ran into the head of the lake about a quarter of a mile above the camp, and sometimes on the shores of the lake itself. Margery sketched; her night in the studio had filled her with dreams of art, and she had discovered in a corner a portable easel made of hickory sticks with the bark on, and she had tucked some drawing materials into one of her bags.

Mrs. Archibald was a little tired with her journey of the day before, and contented herself with sitting in the shade in pleasant places, occupied with some needlework she had brought with her, and trying to discipline her mind to habits of happiness in camp. This was not very difficult during the first part of this beautiful day, but toward the end of the afternoon she began to think less of the joys of a free life in the heart of nature and more of the pleasure of putting on her bonnet and going out to make some calls upon her friends. In this state of mind it pleased her to see Phil Matlack coming toward her.

"Would you like a cup of tea, ma'am?" said he.

"No, thank you," she answered. "It would seem rather odd to have afternoon tea in the woods, and I really don't care for it."

"We can have 'most anything in the woods, ma'am," said Matlack, "that we can have anywhere else, provided you don't mind what sort of fashion you have it in. I thought it might be sort of comfortin' to you to have a cup of tea. I've noticed that in most campin' parties of the family order there's generally one or two of them that's lonesome the first day; and the fact is I don't count on anything particular bein' done on the first day in camp, except when the party is regular hunters or fishermen. It's just as well for some of them to sit round on the first day and let things soak into them, provided it isn't rain, and the next day they will have a more natural feelin' about what they really want to do. Now I expect you'll be off on some sort of a tramp to-morrow, ma'am, or else be out in the boat; and as for that young lady, she's not goin' to sketch no more after to-day. She's got young Martin out in the boat, restin' on his oars, while she's puttin' him into her picture. She's rubbed him out so often that I expect he'll fall asleep and tumble overboard, or else drop one of his oars."

"Mr. Matlack," said Mrs. Archibald, "will you please sit down a moment? I want to ask you something."

"Certainly, ma'am," said he, and forthwith seated himself on a log near by, picking up a stick as he did so, and beginning to shave the bark from it with his pocket-knife.

"Do you know," said she, "if there are panthers in these woods?"

Matlack looked up at her quickly. "I expect you heard them walkin' about your cabin last night," said he; "and not only panthers, but most likely a bear or two, and snakes rustlin' in the leaves; and, for all I know, coons or 'possums climbin' in and out of the window."

"Oh, nothing so bad as that," she replied. "I only thought—"

"Excuse me, ma'am," he interrupted. "I didn't mean that you heard all those things, but most likely a part of them. Hardly any family parties goes into camp that some of them don't hear wild beasts the first night. But they never come no more. Them kind of wild beasts I call first-nighters, and they're about the worst kind we've got, because they really do hurt people by scratchin' and clawin' at their nerves, whereas the real wild beasts in these parts—and they're mighty scarce, and never come near camp—don't hurt nobody."

"I am glad to hear it," said she. "But what on earth can be keeping Mr. Archibald? When he started out after dinner he said he would be back very soon."

"Oh, he's got the fever, ma'am," said Matlack.

"Fever!" exclaimed Mrs. Archibald, dropping her work in her lap.

"Oh, don't be frightened," said he; "it is only the fishin' fever. It don't hurt anybody; it only keeps the meals waitin'. You see, we are pretty nigh the first people out this year, and the fish bite lively. Are you fond of fishin', ma'am?"

"No, indeed," said she; "I dislike it. I think it is cruel and slimy and generally unpleasant."

"I expect you'll spend most of your time in the boat," suggested Matlack. "Your husband rows, don't he?"

"He doesn't row me," said Mrs. Archibald, with earnestness. "I never go out in a boat except with a regular boatman. I suppose you have a larger boat than the one that young man is in? I can see it from here, and it looks very small."

"No, ma'am," said Matlack; "that's the only one we've got. And now I guess I'll go see about supper. This has been a lazy day for us, but we always do calc'late on a lazy day to begin with."

"It strikes me," said Matlack to himself, as he walked away, "that this here camp will come to an end pretty soon. The man and the young woman could stand it for a couple of weeks, but there's nothing here for the old lady, and it can't be long before she'll have us all out of the woods again."

"You can come in," called Margery, about ten minutes after this conversation; and young Martin, who had not the least idea of going to sleep in the boat, dipped his oars in the water and rowed ashore, pulled the boat up on the beach, and then advanced to the spot where Margery was preparing to put away her drawing materials.

"Would you mind letting me see your sketch?" said he.

"Oh no," said she; "but you'll see it isn't very much like the scene itself. When I make a drawing from nature I never copy everything I see just as if I were making a photograph. I suppose you think I ought to draw the boat just as it is? But I always put something of my own in my pictures. And that, you see, is a different kind of a boat from the one you were in. It is something like Venetian boats."

"It isn't like anything in this part of the world, that is true," said the young man, as he held the drawing in his hand; "and if it had been more like a gondola it would not have suited the scene. I think you have caught the spirit of the landscape very well; but if you don't object to a little criticism, I should say that the shore over there is too near the foreground. It seems to me that the picture wants atmosphere; that would help the distance very much."

"Do you draw?" asked Margery, in surprise.

"I used to be very fond of sketching," said he. "I staid at Sadler's a good part of last winter, and when I wasn't out hunting I made a good many drawings of winter scenes. I would be glad to show them to you when we go back."

"Well," said she, "if I had known you were an artist I would not have asked you to go out there and sit as a model."

"Oh, I am not an artist," replied Martin; "I only draw, that's all. But if you make any more water sketches and would like me to put some ducks or any other kind of wild-fowl in the foreground I will be glad to do it for you. I have made a specialty of natural-history drawings. Don't bother yourself about that easel; I'll carry up your things for you."

About half-way to the cabin Margery suddenly stopped and turned round toward the young man, who was fol-

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2167.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

lowing her, "How did you come to be a guide?" she asked.

He smiled. "That's because I was born a naturalist and a sportsman. I went into business when I finished my education, but I couldn't stand that, and as I couldn't afford to become a gentleman sportsman, I came here as a guide. I'm getting a lot of experience in this sort of life, and when I've saved money enough I'm going on an exploring expedition, most likely to Central America. That's the kind of life that will suit me."

"And write a book about it?" asked Margery.

"Most likely," said he.

That night, after supper, Margery remarked: "Our two guides are American citizens, and I don't see why they can't eat at the table with us instead of waiting until we have finished. We are all free and equal in the woods."

"Margery Dearborn!" exclaimed Mrs. Archibald. "What are you talking about?"

She was going to say that if there were one straw more needed to break her back, that straw would be the sight of the two guides sitting at the table with them, but she restrained herself. She did not want Mr. Archibald to know anything about the condition of her back.

"So long as they don't want to do it, and don't do it," said she, "pray don't let us say anything about it. Let's try to make things as pleasant as we can."

Mr. Archibald was lighting his pipe, and when he was sure the tobacco was sufficiently ignited he took the pipe from his mouth and turned toward his wife.

"Harriet," said he, "you have been too much alone today. I don't know what I shall do to-morrow; but whatever it is, I am going to take you with me."

"Of course that depends on what it is you do," she answered. "But I will try to do everything I can."

Mr. Archibald heaved a little sigh, which was not noticed by any one, because it sounded like a puff.

"I am afraid," he thought, "that this camping business is not going to last very much longer, and we shall be obliged to make the rest of our wedding-journey in a different style."

The next morning, when Mr. Archibald went out of his cabin door, he looked over the lake and saw a bird suddenly swoop down upon the water, breaking the smooth surface into sparkles of silver, and then rise again, a little silvery fish glittering in its claws.

"Beautifully done!" said he. "A splendid stroke!" And then turning, he looked up the lake, and not far from the water's edge he saw Margery walking with Mr. Clyde, while Mr. Raybold followed a little in the rear.

"Harriet," he cried, quickly stepping into the cabin again, "look out here! What is the meaning of this?"

Mrs. Archibald was dressed, and came out. When she saw the trio approaching them, she was not so much surprised as was her husband.

"I don't know the meaning of anything that happens in these woods," she said; "but if a lot of people have come from the hotel with those young men I cannot say I am sorry."

"Come," said her husband, "we must look into this."

In two minutes the Archibalds had met the new-comers, who advanced with outstretched hands, as if they had been old friends. Mr. Archibald, not without some mental disquietude at this intrusion upon the woodland privacy of his party, was about to begin a series of questions, when he was forestalled by Margery.

"Oh, Uncle Archibald and Aunt Harriet!" she exclaimed, "Mr. Clyde and Mr. Raybold have come out here to camp. Their camp is right next to ours, and it is called Camp Roy. You see, some years ago there was a large camping party came here, and they called the place Camp Rob Roy, but it was afterwards divided, and one part called Camp Rob and the other Camp Roy."

"Indeed!" interrupted Mr. Archibald. "Mr. Sadler did not tell us that ours was only half a camp with only half a name."

"I don't suppose he thought of it," said Margery. "And the line between the two camps is just three hundred feet above our cabin. I don't suppose anybody ever measures it off, but there it is; and Mr. Clyde and Mr. Raybold have taken Camp Roy, which hasn't any house on it; and they started before daybreak this morning, and brought a tent along with them, which they have pitched just back of that little peninsula; and they haven't any guide, because they want to attend to their own cooking and everything, and the man who brought the tent and other things has gone back. They are going to live there just like real backwoodsmen, and they have a boat of their own, which is to be brought up from the bottom of the lake somewhere—I mean from the lower end of the lake. And, Aunt Harriet, may I speak to you a moment?"

With this the young woman drew Mrs. Archibald aside, and in a low voice asked if she thought it would be out of the way to invite the two young men to take breakfast with them, as it was not likely they had all their cooking things in order so early.

Five people sat down to breakfast under the great oak-tree, and it was a lively meal. Mr. Archibald's mental disquiet, in which were now apparent some elements of resentment, had not subsided, but the state of his mind did not show itself in his demeanor, and he could not help feeling pleased to see that his wife was in better spirits. He had always known that she liked company.

After breakfast he took Matlack aside. "I don't understand this business," said he. "When I hired this camp I supposed we were to have it to ourselves; but if there are other camps jammed close against it we may be in the midst of a great public picnic before a week is out."

"Oh, that camp over there isn't much of a camp," replied the guide. "The fact is, it is only the tail end of a camp, and I don't suppose Peter Sadler thought anybody would be likely to take it just now, and so didn't think it worth while to speak of it. Of course it's jammed up against this one, as you say; but then the people in one camp haven't the right to cross the line into another camp if the people in the other camp don't want them to."

"Line!" said Mr. Archibald. "It is absurd to think of lines in a place like this. And I have no intention of making myself disagreeable by ordering people off my premises. But I would like to know if there is another camp three hundred feet on this side of our cabin, or three hundred feet back of it."

"No, sir," said Matlack, speaking promptly; "there isn't another camp between this and the lower end of the lake. There's a big one there, and it's taken; but the people aren't coming until next month."

"If a larger party had taken Camp Roy," said Mr. Archibald to his wife a little later, "I should not mind it so much. But two young men! I do not like it."

VII.—A STRANGER.

It was at the close of a pleasant afternoon four days after the arrival of the young men at Camp Roy, and Mrs. Archibald was seated on a camp-stool near the edge of the lake intently fishing. By her side stood Phil Matlack, who had volunteered to interpose himself between her and all the disagreeable adjuncts of angling. He put the bait upon her hook, he told her when her cork was bobbing sufficiently to justify a jerk, and when she caught a little fish he took it off the hook. Fishing in this pleasant wise had become very agreeable to the good lady, and she found pleasures in camp life which she had not anticipated. Her husband was in a boat some distance out on the lake, and he was also fishing; but she did not care for that style of sport. The fish were too big and the boat was too small.

A little farther down the lake Martin Sanders sat busily engaged in putting some water-fowl into the foreground of Margery's sketch. A critical observer might have noticed that he had also made a number of changes in said sketch, all of which added greatly to its merits as a picture of woodland scenery. At a little distance Margery was sitting at her easel making a sketch of Martin as an artist at work in the woods. The two young men had gone off with their guns, not perhaps because they expected to find any legitimate game at that season, but hoping to secure some ornithological specimens, or get a shot at some minor quadrupeds unprotected by law. Another reason for their expedition could probably have been found in some strong hints given by Mr. Archibald that it was unwise for them to be hanging around the camps and taking no advantage of the opportunities for sport offered by the beautiful weather and the forest.

It was not long before Margery became convinced that the sketch on which she was working did not resemble her model, nor did it very much resemble an artist at work in the woods.

"It looks a good deal more like a cobbler mending shoes," she said to herself; "and I'll keep it for that. Some day I will put a bench under him and a shoe in his hand instead of a sketch." With that she rose, and went to see how Martin was getting on. "I think," she said, "those dark ducks improve the picture very much. They throw the other things back." Then she stopped, went to one side, and gazed out over the lake. "I wonder," she said, "if there is really any fun in fishing. Uncle Archibald has been out in that boat for more than two hours, and he has fished almost every day since he's been here. I should think he would get tired of it."

"Oh no," said Martin, looking up with animation. "If you know how to fish, and there is good sport, you never get tired of it."

"I know how to fish," said Margery, "and I do not care about it at all."

"You know how to fish?" said Martin. "Can you make a cast with a fly?"

"I never tried that," said she. "But I have fished as Aunt Harriet does, and it is as easy as can be."

"Oh," said he, "you don't know anything about fishing unless you have fished with a fly. That is the only real sport. It is as exciting as a battle. If you would let me teach you how to throw a fly, I am sure you would never find fishing tiresome, and these woods would be like a new world to you."

"Why don't you do it yourself, then?" she asked.

"Because I am paid to do other things," he replied. "We are not sent here simply to enjoy ourselves, though I must say that I—" And then he suddenly stopped. "I wish you would let me teach you fly-fishing. I know you would like it."

Margery looked at the eager face turned toward her, and then she gazed out over the water.

"Perhaps I might like it," she said. "But it wouldn't be necessary for you to take that trouble. Uncle Archibald has two or three times asked me to go out with him, and of course he would teach me how to fish as he does. Isn't that somebody calling you?"

"Yes," said Martin, rising; "it's Phil. I suppose it's nearly supper-time."

As they walked toward the camp, Margery in front, and Martin behind her carrying the drawing-materials and the easel, Margery suddenly turned.

"It was very good of you to offer to teach me to fish with flies," she said, "and perhaps if Uncle Archibald doesn't want to be bothered, I may get you to show me how to do it."

The young man's face brightened, and he was about to express his pleasure with considerable warmth; but he checked himself, and merely remarked that whenever she was ready he would provide a rod and flies and show her how to use them.

Mrs. Archibald had gone into the cabin, and Margery went up to Matlack, who was on his way to the little tent in which the camp cooking was done.

"Did Mrs. Archibald tell you," said she, "that we have invited Mr. Clyde and Mr. Raybold to supper to-night?"

The guide stopped and smiled. "She told me," said he, "but I don't know that it was altogether necessary."

"I suppose you mean," said Margery, "that they are here so much; but I don't wonder; they must do awfully poor cooking for themselves. I don't suppose they will bring anything back that is good to eat."

"Not at this time of year," said he, "but I shall be satisfied if they bring themselves home."

"What do you mean by that?" asked Margery, quickly.

"Well," said Matlack, "I don't doubt the bicycle fellow will always come back all right, but I'm afeared about the other one. That bicycle chap don't know no more about a gun than he does about makin' bread, and I wouldn't go out huntin' with him for a hundred dollars. He's just as likely to take a crack at his pardner's head as at anything else that's movin' in the woods."

"That is dreadful!" exclaimed Margery.

"Yes, it is," returned the guide; "and if I had charge of their camp he wouldn't go out with a gun again. But it will be all right in a day or two. Peter will settle that."

"Mr. Sadler, do you mean?" asked Margery. "What's he got to do with it?"

"He's got everything to do with it," said Matlack. "He's got everything to do with everything in this part of the country. He's got his laws, and he sees to it that people stand by them. One of his rules is that people who don't know how to use guns shan't shoot in his camps."

"But how can he know about the people out here in the woods?" asked Margery.

"I tell you, miss," said Matlack, speaking slowly and decisively, "Peter Sadler's ways of knowing things is like gas—the kind you burn, I mean. I was a-visitin' once in a city house, and slept in a room on the top floor, and there was a leak in the pipe in the cellar, and that gas just went over the whole house, into every room and closet, and even under the beds, and I've often thought that that was just like Peter's way of doin' things and knowin' things. You take my word for it, that bicycle man won't go out huntin' many more days, even if he don't shoot his pardner fust."

"He won't go to-morrow," thought Margery; and then she said to Matlack: "I think we ought to know Mr. Sadler's rules. Has he any more of them?"

"Oh, they ain't very many," said Matlack. "But there's one I think of now, and that is that no woman shall go out in a boat by herself on this lake."

"That is simply horrid!" exclaimed Margery. "Women can row as well as men."

"I don't say they can't," said Matlack. "I'm only tellin' you what Peter's rules are and that's one of them."

Margery made no reply, but walked away, her head thrown back a little more than was usual with her.

"I've got to keep my eye on her," said Matlack to himself, as he went to the cabin; "she's never been broke to no harness."

Mr. Raybold did not shoot Mr. Clyde, nor did he shoot anything else. Mr. Clyde did shoot a bird, but it fell into the water at a place where the shore was very marshy, and it was impossible for him to get it. He thought it was a heron, or a bittern, or perhaps a fish-hawk, but whatever it was, both ladies said that it was a great pity to kill it, as it was not good to eat, and must have been very happy in its life in the beautiful forest.

"It is very cruel to shoot them when they are not strictly game," said Mr. Clyde, "and I don't believe I will do it. If I had the things to stuff them with, that would be different, but I haven't. I believe fishing is just as much fun, and more sensible."

"I do not!" exclaimed Mr. Raybold. "I hold that hunting is a manly art, and that a forester's life is as bold and free to him as it is to the birds in the air. I believe I have the blood of a hunter in me. My voice is for the woods."

"I expect you will change your voice," thought Margery, "when Mr. Sadler takes your gun away from you." But she did not say so.

Mr. Archibald stood with his hands in his pockets reflecting. He had hoped that these two young men were inveterate hunters, and that they would spend their days in long tramps. He did not at all approve of their fishing. Fishing could be done anywhere—here, for instance, right at this very door.

Supper was over, and the five inhabitants of Camps Rob and Roy had seated themselves around the fire which Martin had carefully built, keeping in view a cheery blaze without too much heat. Pipes had been filled and preparations made for the usual evening smoke and talk, when a man was seen emerging from the woods at the point where the road opened into the clearing about the camp. It was still light, for these hungry campers supped early, and the man could be distinctly seen as he approached, and it was plain that he was not a messenger from Sadler's.

He was rather a large man, dressed in black, and wearing a felt hat with a wide, straight brim. Hanging by a strap from his shoulder was a small leather bag, and in his hand he carried a closed umbrella. Advancing toward the fire, he took off his hat, bowed, and smiled. He wore no beard, his face was round and plump, and his smile was pleasant.

"Good-evening, ladies and gentlemen," said he, and his voice was as pleasant as his smile.

"Good-evening," said Mr. Archibald, and then for a moment there was a pause.

"I presume," said the new-comer, looking about him, "that this is a camp."

"It is a camp," said Mr. Archibald.

"The fact is so obvious," said the man in black, "that it was really unnecessary for me to allude to it. May I ask to be allowed to sit down for a few moments? I am fatigued."

At this juncture Phil Matlack arrived on the scene. "Well, sir," said he, "have you any business with anybody here? Who do you wish to see?"

"I have no business," said the other, "and—"

"And you are a stranger to everybody here?" interrupted Matlack.

"Yes, but I hope—"

"Now then," said the guide, quickly, "I've got to ask you to move on. This is one of Peter Sadler's camps, and he has strict rules against strangers stoppin' in any of them. If you've lost your way, I'll tell you that that road, if you don't turn to the right or the left, will take you straight to Sadler's, and there's time enough for you to get there before dark."

"Mr. Matlack," exclaimed Mrs. Archibald, who had risen to her feet, "I want to speak to you! It's a shame," she said, when the guide had approached her, "to send that man away without even giving him a chance to rest himself. He may be a very respectable person on a walking tour."

"I guess he is on a walkin' tour," said Matlack, "and I guess he's a regular tramp, and there's no orders we've got that's stricter than them against tramps."

"Well, I don't care who he is," said Mrs. Archibald, "or what your rules are, but when a perfectly good-mannered man comes to us and asks simply to be allowed to rest, I don't want him to be driven away as if he were a stray pig on a lawn. Mr. Archibald, shouldn't he be allowed to rest awhile?"

Her husband rose and approached the stranger. "Where are you going, sir?" said he.

The man looked at Matlack, at Martin, who stood behind him, and then at the rest of the company, and after this comprehensive glance he smiled.

"From present appearances," he said, "I think I am going to go."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Mr. Archibald laughed. "When do you expect to get there?" he asked.

"It seems to me," said the other, reflectively, "that I am always going there, and I suppose I shall have to keep on doing it."

"Look here," said Mr. Archibald, turning to Matlack, "give him some supper, and let him rest. There will be time enough for him to get to Sadler's after that. If Sadler has anything to say against it, refer him to me."

"All right, sir," said Matlack, "if you say so. I'm no harder on my fellow-beiu's than other people, but rules is rules, and it isn't for me to break them."

"My dear sir," said the stranger to Mr. Archibald, "your words are more grateful to me than the promise of food. I see that you consider me a tramp, but it is a mistake. I am not a tramp. If you will allow me, after I have eaten a little supper—a meal which I must admit I greatly need—I will explain to you how I happen to be here." And with a bow he walked toward the table where Matlack and Martin had been eating their supper.

"Do you know what I think he is?" said Mr. Clyde, when Mr. Archibald had resumed his sent and his pipe. "I believe he is a wandering actor. Actors always have smoothly shaven faces, and he looks like one."

"Actor!" exclaimed Arthur Raybold. "That's nonsense. He's not in the least like an actor. Anybody could see by his tread and his air that he's never been on the stage. He's more like a travelling salesman. The next thing he'll do will be to pull out of that bag some samples of spool thread or patent thimbles."

"You are both wrong," said Margery, "entirely wrong. I have been looking at him, and I believe he is a Methodist minister with a dead horse. They ride circuits, and of course when their horses die they walk. Just wait a little, and see if I am not right."

They waited a little, and then they waited a little longer, and they had begun to be tired of waiting before the stranger finished his meal and approached the fire. His face was brighter, his smile was more pleasant, and his step had a certain jauntiness in it.

"I thank you all," he said, "for the very good meal I have just enjoyed. I am now going to go, but before I start I would like very much—indeed, I crave it as a favor—to place myself before you in my proper light. May I have permission to do so, madam and sir?" he said, addressing Mrs. and Mr. Archibald, but with a respectful glance at the others, as if he would not ignore any one of them.

"Certainly," said Mrs. Archibald. "Sit down and tell us about yourself."

The stranger seated himself with alacrity a little back from the circle, and nearer to the young men than to the Archibald party.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

A YANKEE IN SPAIN.

X.—IN A SAVAGE CORNER OF MOORISH SPAIN—ABSENCE OF BEGGARY—EXCELLENT DINNER.

BY POULTNEY BIGELOW.

ILLUSTRATED WITH PHOTOGRAPHS BY THE AUTHOR.

THE sort of thing we relished most was our run along the Mediterranean between Alicante and Valencia, around a bold promontory from which may be seen in clear weather the western islands of the group near Majorca. Magnificent caves indent this coast, and little coves create most seductive invitation to smugglers. There are no railways here, and to judge from our experience, and especially that of our bikes, no white man ever before trod that romantic and rocky path.

We had not gone far out of Alicante when rain commenced and soon converted the already heavy road into a mire of clay. We stopped at a road-side posada, where sat three moorish-looking muleteers making a hearty meal of a rice and meat stew, which they conveyed to their respective mouths directly from a vast bowl, which appeared to be the common family utensil for all emergencies. The house consisted mainly of a door towards the road, and a roof that extended well out in the shape of a veranda, over which climbed vines. One side of this one room was occupied by a vast fireplace, the other by a store-room. The building must have been originally intended for a fortress, or else built when wood was very expensive, for even the shelves were of masonry, and an incendiary could have done no more mischief than in the vaults of a safe-deposit company.

EVERYWHERE IN MADRID.

MOORISH HOUSE NEAR SAN JUAN DE ALICANTE.

With truly magnificent courtesy the three ragged muleteers took pity on our bedraggled appearance, and invited us to share their mess. We exchanged courtesies as well as we could by offering them our cigarettes and wine. Then we got the good lady to make us a savory tortilla, which, followed by the vigorous goats'-milk cheese of the country, made us once more happy. Nothing could have exceeded the courtesy of our rough entertainers. They might cheerfully have cut our throats in the night, had they been tempted in the right manner, but until that moment arrived they would, I am sure, have made life as sweet to us as courtliness could suggest.

It struck us throughout our trip that beggary ceased the moment we got beyond the atmosphere of the show places where tourists congregate. In small places we did, to be sure, meet with signs of great poverty, and at the posadas would occasionally see a beggar—not the impudent, whining imposter of Toledo and Madrid, but a decayed grandee sort of a character, who stood before us in the majestic folds of a ragged serape, offering us in dignified accents an opportunity of showing towards him some of that hospitality which he would gladly have exhibited to us in his days of prosperity. I never saw beggars rudely treated in the small places; on the contrary, they appeared favorably known as the victims of misfortune, and it was assumed that they would not ask for bread if they were not hungry. More than once have we seen our hostess, in the midst of conversation, rise to cut a slice of bread for a man who merely stood respectfully outside the door, eloquently admiring the food within. Then this same man would take his bread, sit down on a stone hard by, and eat up every bit of it. It would be a bold woman indeed who would dare offer a piece of dry bread to a tramp on an American road. He would probably throw the bread at her head and then fire her barn.

Our intolerance on the subject of beggary no doubt is the unconscious result of growing up in a community where labor is highly paid and where mendicancy implies almost invariably idleness or drunkenness. Besides, we have a superabundance of charitable institutions for those who cannot earn a living. In Spain, however, society is more primitive, and the impotent members thereof, instead of being quartered at great expense in poorhouses and asylums, are relieved inexpensively, so far as the government is concerned, by being abandoned to the sometimes uncertain generosity of the way-side. The police appear to discourage tramping, in the interest of the public security. A beggar can do little harm when he is amongst those who know him, but once start a gang of them on the highroads of a country, and they soon acquire a taste for adventure highly harmful to hen-roosts and unprotected property.

We held a council of war at the posada, to decide whether we should plough our way through the mud or go back to Alicante for the night and make a start when the rain had ceased. As usually happened in all our councils of war, we decided unanimously to push on, in spite of rain and mud, to avoid big towns at any cost, and to run our chances of a night's lodging.

The nearest village was a couple of hours further on, and our muleteers said there was a house where we might get beds. Señor Matias was the owner. We had no knowledge of the road ahead excepting what we could gather from peasants. Spanish cycling clubs, guide-books, and maps gave us no help on this road—not that they helped us much anywhere else.

We shook hands all round, after paying our modest bill, and pushed through the mud and rain towards San Juan. Most roads of Europe, in their worst state, yet preserve on one side or the other the possibility of a foot-passenger's making his way with tolerable security. Not so in these parts. We were, it is true, on a highroad over which the royal mail was conveyed once a day. It was marked on the best map of Spain that could be procured as a first-class national macadamized road, and this shows that people can often talk about the same thing and each mean something very different.

The rain came in showers, with bursts of splendid sunshine in between. We soon got so thick with mud that we did not mind a hodful more or less, for we revelled in exquisite bits of mediæval (that is to say, Moorish) architecture. By the side of our road ran irrigating ditches with massive masonry sluices that had been built in the days of Carthage, and had probably never known repair since African warriors governed these coasts. And it is well for us that those magnificent Moors were such good engineers, for, poor as the Spaniard is to-day, he would be much poorer yet were he not profiting by the irrigation prepared for him a thousand years ago by people whom he subsequently drove out of the country.

At length the narrow streets of San Juan took us into their wallowy embrace. The little donkeys that passed us sank up to their knees, while we had ceased to care how far we went, so long as each step brought us nearer to Señor Matias.

What a blessed moment that was when we finally dropped down on a bench in his inn-yard and commenced to remove our boots! I say inn-yard for want of a word in our language that fits. The house, from our point of view, did not commence until the upper story. That is to say, we came in upon a broad space partly occupied by a mule-cart and partly by kitchen utensils. From this apartment radiated doors communicating partly into a stable for donkeys, partly into a storage-room for forage, partly into sleeping-quarters for the servants and the poorer guests, and partly into a yard devoted to manure and chickens. There appeared to be no door to this house—at least not on the ground floor. The population of the village drifted in and out without restraint, and I must again note the excellent manners they exhibited towards strangers like ourselves, who at such a time must have been well worth staring at. There is no sign to mark this house as an inn, nor is there anything to indicate that the establishment supplies likewise a large variety of general articles in the way of wine, groceries, bread, and the things usually kept at small country stores. Five drovers were having their supper at a table near the mule-cart as we came in, and a kindly old lady was cooking savory things for them at the big gypsy fire in the corner. She had no light to see by save an iron bowl filled with lard, from the corner of which emerged a slender thread which served as a wick. It was the light that shone in the tent of Hannibal two centuries before Christ was born, and it is the light which will shine for centuries to come in this part of the world unless from without comes a heavy jog to this backward people, a reminder that they must use improved tools or else become unfit to compete with their fellow-men in other parts of the world.

As I sat with the five muleteers, watching the kindly old lady cooking for a large household by the light of a lamp so feeble that it could hardly have sufficed to show the way in a mine shaft, I could not help wondering how long this state of things could last in a land that was a geographic portion of Europe, whose king claimed the title or "Most Catholic." I seemed to be an anachronism with my kodak, my bike, my stylographic pen, my portable type-writer—all recent triumphs of Yankee invention. I felt that I was in a way like Mark Twain's Yankee at the court of King Arthur, and that the people about might readily regard as witchcraft the mechanical devices so far beyond their power to appreciate or even to understand.

ITINERANT KNIFE-SHARPENER.

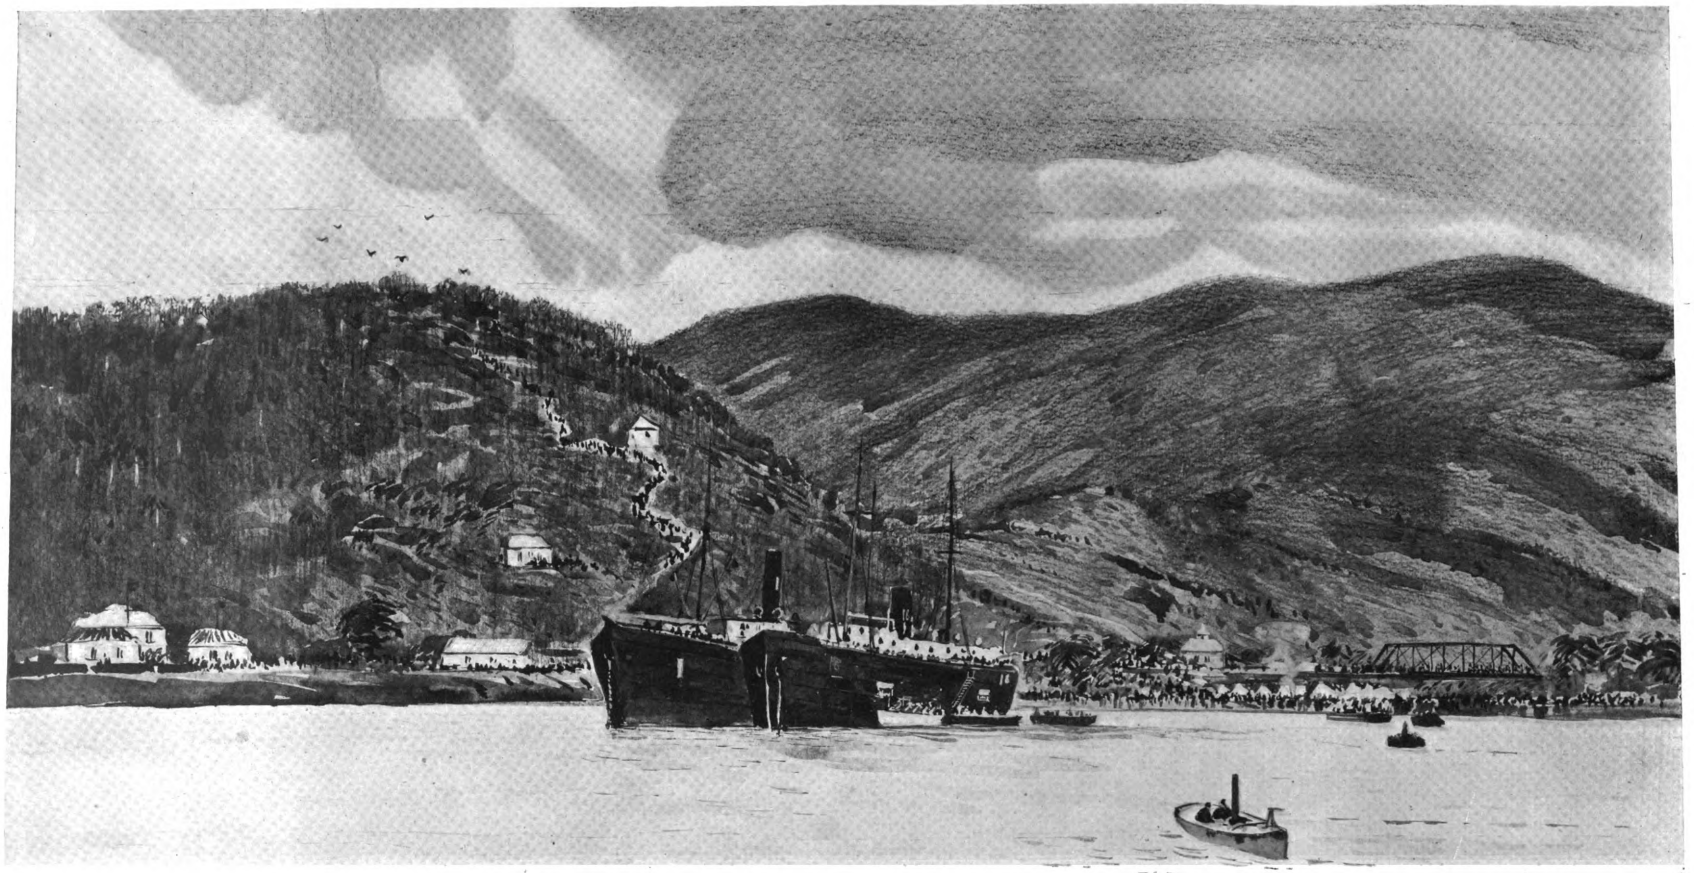
Now and then purchasers came in, who waited patiently until Matias turned up from the stable, or his wife from where she was preparing our beds, or the kindly old lady from the fireplace, or some other member of the large household. No one was in a hurry, or, if he were, he did not show it.



When we had unstrapped the luggage from our bikes and put on bedroom slippers (a great luxury at such a time) we went up stairs, the part of the house evidently reserved for distinguished strangers. Here was a broad hall opening out at the front into a dining-room which faced the village street. At the back the hall opened upon a garden full of palms and southern trees. The bedrooms were merely alcoves opening upon this hall, black spaces large enough to hold a bed and a chair. We were so glad to get this much that we questioned nothing, but made ready for dinner.

We little thought that a prehistoric lamp and a gypsy fire could have made such a dinner as the one we enjoyed that night in this far-away little Spanish village. The event made such an impression on us that the two songsters of the party treated the community to one of their choicest selections from "Carmen," which, by-the-way,

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

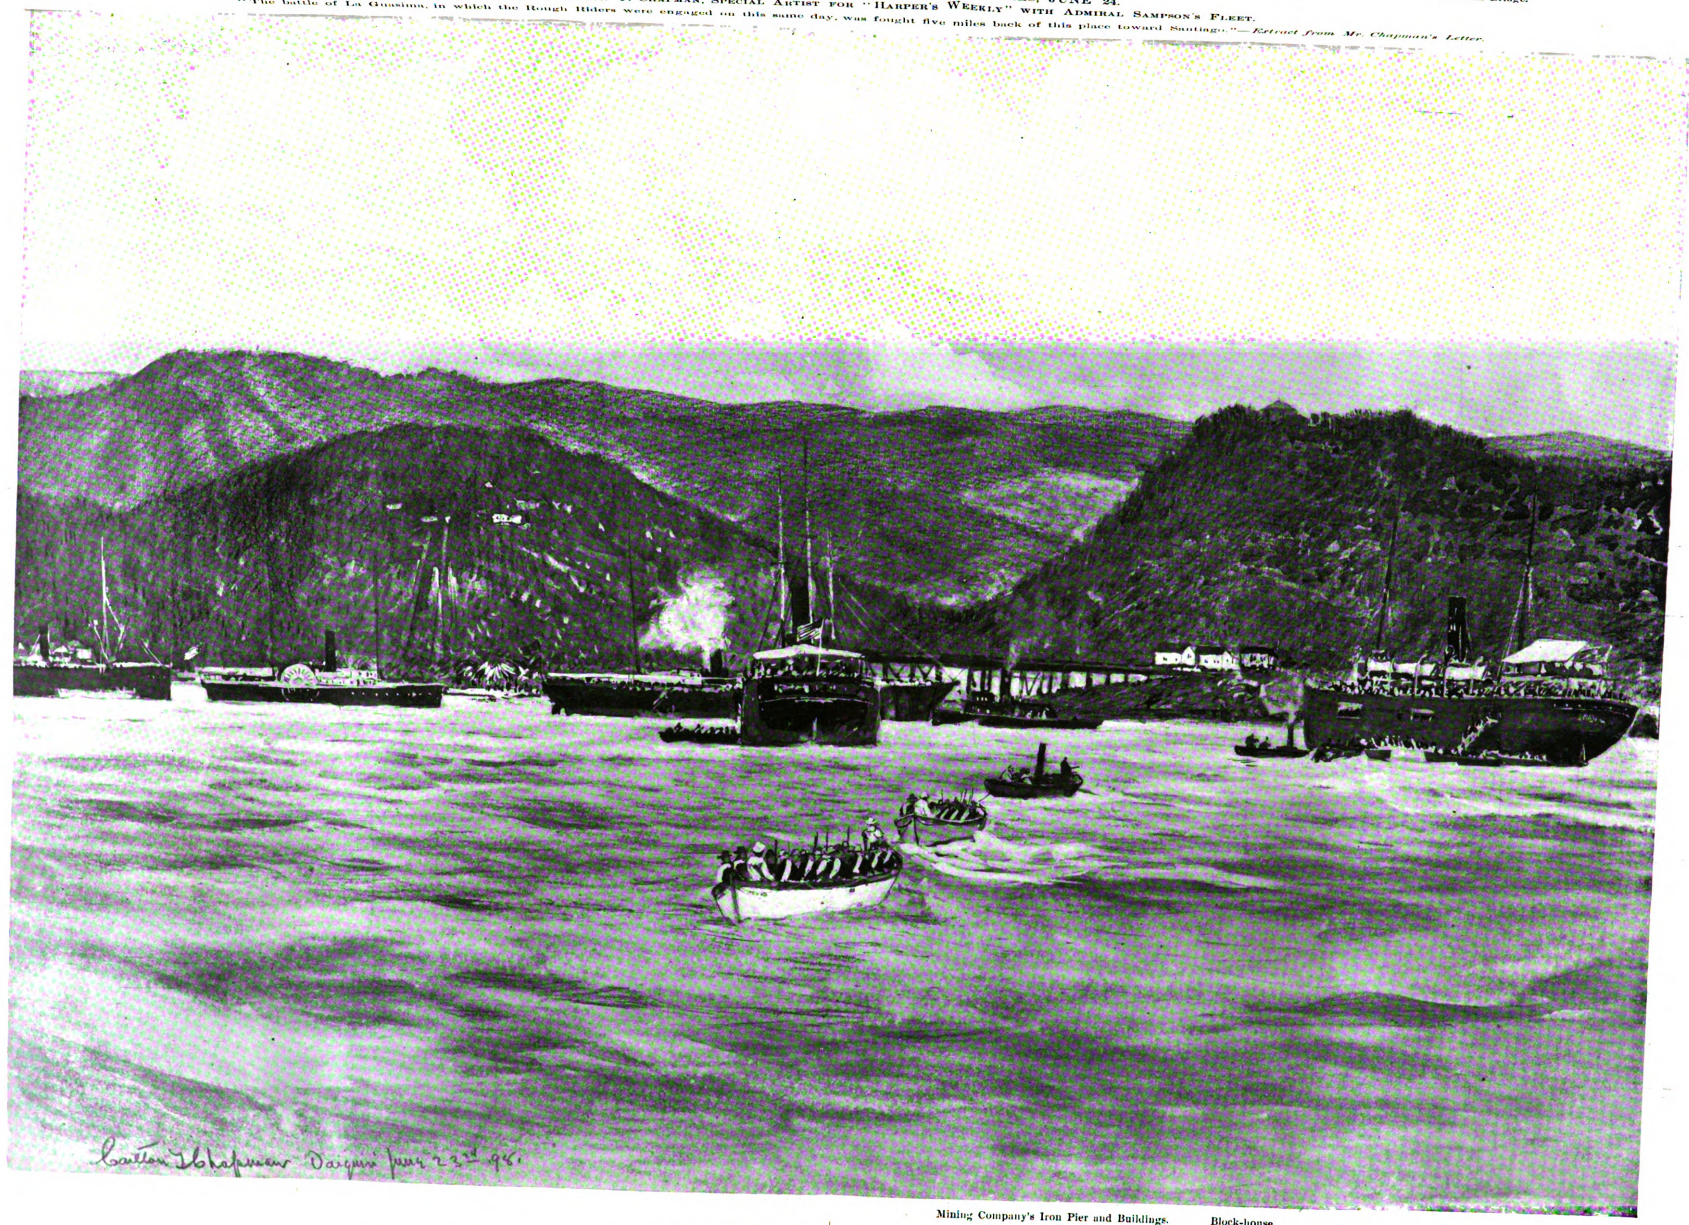
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LANDING TROOPS AT ENSENADA DE LOS ALTARES, JUNE 24.

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.

"The battle of La Guasima, in which the Rough Riders were engaged on this same day, was fought five miles back of this place toward Santiago."—Extract from Mr. Chapman's Letter.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE



Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Railroad Buildings. Troops filing up the Hill. Camp. Railroad Bridge.

LANDING TROOPS AT ENSENADA DE LOS ALTARES, JUNE 24.

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.

"The battle of La Guasima, in which the Rough Riders were engaged on this same day, was fought five miles back of this place toward Santiago."—Extract from Mr. Chapman's Letter.

Mining Company's Iron Pier and Buildings. Block-house.

LANDING TROOPS AT BAIQUIRI, JUNE 23

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

sounds to a Spaniard about as much like his music as cockney does like plantation talk to a darky. However, the people showed no resentment, and the host even paid us some hollow compliments on the sweetness of our English song. George tried to explain to him that it was not English, but Spanish, which only confirmed Matias in his original view. He paid us a high compliment that night, no less than waiting on us himself, with a vast sombrero on his head, a cigarette between his teeth, and a species of smock which he wore when dressed for parade.

STREET-SWEEPERS, MADRID.

George thinks we earned this honor by reason of having sung "Carmen." That may be. I am inclined to think that we won his heart by taking an interest in his wine-cellar, by sampling some specimens of his Alicante vintage, both red and white, and finally by selecting with knowledge the wine which he too regarded as the best.

By-the-way, let me remark that throughout Spain I cannot remember seeing a single drunken man, not even among the soldiers. And Spain is the country where wine is cheaper than milk—at times not dearer than pure water. Here is stuff for the teetotaler. Perhaps if in America we removed the tax on wine, we might assist the cause of temperance. Whiskey might at the same time be rated as a poison, and prohibited altogether save under medical advice. For myself, I believe in total abstinence from alcoholic drink. And the best way to fight alcohol is to make light wine abundant and cheap. The world over we find that the cheaper the wine the more temperate the people; for drunkards, commend me to England and the United States, where wine is heavily taxed.

Do you want to know what sort of dinner we got in this savage section of mountainous Spain? Go there and sing to Matias, and he will provide the same for you.

First course: cheese, salt fish, cold ham. These by way of a cocktail.

Second course: Matias brought up from the gypsy fire a casserole, hot from the ashes, filled with a delicious medley, such as I recall having enjoyed at Señor Castelar's eventful dinner. I cannot remember the native name, but there was much onion or garlic, potato, and pieces of meat, and many odds and ends not readily analyzed. Matias told me all about the make of this dish, and Ned vowed that he would give a grand dinner when he got home, just like this one. We had some inkling of what was to be the extent of our meal, for before each of us was a stack of plates, each plate portending a separate course. Thus, after the table was once laid, Matias had only to take away, never to bring on plates. Of course we kept the same knife and fork throughout.

The third course was a tortilla, or Spanish omelet, through which were scattered raw beans, which looked rather pretty, but which we judiciously dropped into our pockets when Matias was not looking.

As fourth course came an excellently dressed lettuce salad, which confirmed me in my respect for Matias. Then came a variety of fruit—nuts, raisins, oranges—all grown in the neighborhood; and finally a little cup of black coffee that could not have been produced better at that famous little French place in New Orleans. We had drunk with this Lucullian banquet a wine of Alicante that would have been rated at three dollars a bottle, yet our bill for all this luxury came in at the rate of one dollar a day for everything. At night we slept soundly on soft mattresses with clean sheets, and in the morning washed in tin bowls at the chairs out in the general hall. Do you wonder that we love Spain?

ON THE WAY TO MANILA.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

U. S. Troop-Ship "Australia," at Sea, nearing Honolulu, May 30, 1898.

"Those little flannel-cakes! If I could only get some of those little flannel-cakes again, it seems to me I should be satisfied."

He was a private of Company E, First Oregon Volunteers, a "trooper of the forces, who has run his own six horses." In his Portland home he has entertained himself as befits a gentleman of cultivated tastes and independent means. The National Guard has not been one of his amusements; he has always had a disinclination to "play soldier"; but the call to arms found in him one of its first responses. Now he is enduring some of the discomforts he knew he would have to take when he took the oath to support the Constitution and obey the orders of the President of the United States and his superior officers.

"How many times," he says, "have we gone over the bill of fare so critically, trying to pick out something good! Now, if I could only get some of those little flannel-cakes!"

It is an individual case, but not a particular. The demand—not for flannel-cakes always, but for a good, clean, and square meal—is general, and it is an indication of a state of affairs that ought to be set forth very clearly in the interests of the thousands of volunteers who are to follow this first expedition to Manila; in the interest of the administration, which is responsible for the welfare of these volunteers; and in the interest of the country, which both soldiers and administration are bound to serve.

The facts are plain to any one. It is natural, of course, for men who never have been used to roughing it to find life aboard a troop-ship hard to take. Quarters are close and cramped, food is very plain, and there is no great variety of it. Conditions generally are unpleasant. These things the men recognize, and there is very little complaint about them. But there is a demand that the food be served in proper quantities, that the potatoes be boiled until they are cooked thoroughly, that the salt pork be not raw, and that the bacon be done. Beans are not palatable when they are hard enough to be used as poker-chips, and rice is not good to eat when it takes a mill to grind it. Hardtack is a good diet, but not as a steady thing when there is opportunity for fresh bread occasionally. These things, however, are but superficial causes of complaint, and are being eradicated rapidly. Most of them were caused at the start by the rolling of the ship, which so seriously incapacitated so many of the officers of the regiment that proper inspection was not possible. It also added to the discomfort of the men, so that they were inclined to exaggerate their hardships.

There is a much more serious matter for objection and complaint in the equipment of the men. They are sent out to a climate terribly hot and distressingly humid with an absolutely inadequate supply of proper clothing. Under-clothing was issued to-day. It is made of Canton flannel, of a weight that would prove extremely acceptable at the summit of White or Chilkoot Pass, and, even such as it is, there is not enough to go around. Shoes will not go around—to one company which turned in a requisition for sixty-four pairs, twenty-one pairs were issued. There is a large supply of brown duck suits to be issued sometime, by-and-by, but not a helmet or a suitable sun-hat to go with them.

Yet one of the great dangers of life in the Philippines is sunstroke.

These things will be overcome, of course, in time, and "when we have taken Manila." We can get all we want and just what we want in Manila—when we have taken it. But the expectation is that in order to take Manila we shall want some guns—rifles for the soldiers. The guns of the First Oregon are quite in keeping with the clothing outfit. They are the old-fashioned Springfield rifles. Originally they were hard-shooting guns, but that was long ago. Now the rifling has been worn out of a great many of them, and something else is the matter with some of them. There are 200 new rifles, which ought to be in good condition for service; they are of the old model, but they are efficient. The First California boys carry the same guns.

They are going to meet Mauser rifles, and apparently some one is relying on the pluck and dash of our fellows, and on the cowardice of the Spaniards. Our boys have got the pluck, and they will show the dash. There need be no question on that score. But if the Spaniards happen to stay and fight, there is likely to be a sorry tale to tell when these old Springfields take the field against the Mausers.

Now all this adds new emphasis to the great lesson this little war with a sixth-rate, bankrupt, "effete monarchy" is teaching the United States—the lesson of the folly of being unprepared. But it points another moral. We need guns, sabres, men, equipment—everything pertaining to the make-up of an efficient army. But, more than all, we need a different system of administration. Consider this: Uncle Sam has been training a reasonably large number of his young men for a good many years in the art and science of warfare. Most of them have developed remarkable fitness for their occupation. Nearly every one of those who have had experience extending over years enough to put a captain's bars on their shoulder-straps is competent to equip and outfit an expedition of this size. Time is one of the great considerations. There must be no delay. All sorts of conveniences and comforts for the men are sacrificed in order to gain time. Even essentials of equipment are let go. And yet, with all this imperative haste, the management, instead of being put into the hands of the competent, thoroughly trained men who have made such things their life work and have developed it into a science, is kept in the bureaus at Washington. Every detail must be reported "to the Department."

"The Department" wheels around on its revolving-chair and considers the thing a while, and then telegraphs its consent. But a day has been lost, and the expedition might have been 300 miles nearer Manila and Admiral Dewey.

Some army men will say that this ought not to be said now, because it is furnishing information to the enemy. But it is better to furnish what small information the enemy can get out of this if its publication will do anything toward preventing more of such work. And every man in the service knows it is all true. The trained men are set aside for somebody else at the time of all times when their services ought to be used to the fullest possibility, and when the greatest advantage ought to be taken of their training and their ability.

We need a lot of things to make this war as successful as it should be. We need more common-sense and less politics.

Honolulu, H. I., June 4.

The two days spent in Honolulu by the soldiers of General Anderson's brigade of General Merritt's Philippine army were a most decided change from the lazy life of the days aboard the transports. Loafing on the hurricane-deck, watching the flying-fish, and speculating on the end of man, in particular the man who goes to the Philippines as a private soldier, gave place to positive emphatic things to do, most desirable things too, in a most delightful city. Honolulu has developed for herself lately a Hawaiian version of "There'll be a hot time in the old town to-night." They say it very briefly here, but for these two days they have been saying it a great many time. "Wele ke nao," they say, and you hear it everywhere. They have been living up to it, too. There has been a hot time—such a hot time as even Honolulu, noted for hospitality, has not seen before. It began when the three troop-ships, City of Peking, Australia, and City of Sydney were sighted on Wednesday afternoon, and there has been scarcely a moment's cessation since. The whole city turned out to welcome the transports in. The wharves were thronged, and there were constant volleys of cheers, until even after the ships were in their berths. As soon as gang-planks were down the serious business began. There were receptions at once at the clubs for the officers, and they were not over until early in the morning.

Kapiolani, the dowager queen, had taken the opportunity of the arrival here of the Charleston to arrange for the presentation of a beautiful silk flag to the ship which brought home the body of her husband, King Kalakaua, who died in San Francisco. The formal presentation occurred in the morning after the troopers got here, being delayed for that purpose. All the officers were present, and the United States diplomatic representatives. The presentation was made by Kapiolani's nephews, Prince Cupid and Prince David, who made the address. Afterward there was a luncheon on the ship. President Dole received the officers that afternoon. The men were permitted to come ashore, half a company at a time, and they did have such a good time. They wandered about the streets, staring at the curious shops, and they swarmed on the beach at Waikiki and went swimming in the surf. The Kapiolani Park was open for them, and the government and Hawaiian bands gave a concert.

Yesterday was the great day—it was feast-day for the boys. Arrangements had been made to give every soldier in the brigade a "square meal." All the city had contributed. Tables were set up under the trees in the grounds about the government buildings, and spread with everything that even a hungry soldier who has had nothing but government rations for seven days could name as part of a "square meal." The government band was there to accompany the great feast with sweet music. At 9.30 in the morning the soldiers left their ships and marched up by companies. They filed into the government grounds, and attacked the tables in battalion front.

Every man in the expedition, except the unlucky chaps who had been detailed to sentry duty, was in the hungry army. Every man got what he wanted. There was a great quantity of soda and mineral water, and 3500 quarts of water that had been boiled and then cooled. The boys strolled about the grounds after the feast was over, and in the afternoon went out to Waikiki for surf-bathing. Every soldier in town was decorated with wreaths of flowers, and many of them were half concealed by the leis.

In the morning Chief-Justice Judd, on behalf of the Sons of the Revolution resident in Honolulu, delivered a formal address of welcome to General Anderson. The general, in reply, hoped that annexation would soon be an accomplished fact.

President Dole held an informal reception in the Government Building for the soldiers who were feasting in the grounds. Little groups of them were presented to him constantly.

The hospitality of Honolulu is remarkable; the exhibition of it in the last two days is something no man who witnessed it will ever forget. But through it all this curious feature has struck the soldiers with especial force: the flags that greeted the arrival of the transports, fluttering from a forest of tall poles, from every prominent building, and from scores of residences, that waved in hundreds in the streets, were the stars and stripes. Yet over the government buildings there floated a strange flag—the banner of the Hawaiian Republic. The gentlemen and ladies who so royally extended their hospitality are Americans. The language they speak is English. The men we dealt with in the shops were Americans; we bought goods made in the United States, and we paid for them with United States money; we rode about in carriages built in the United States and pulled by American horses; we were at home, and our own flag waved over our heads constantly. But over the government buildings a strange flag floated, and we were in a foreign land.

BATHING BY SQUAD ON THE TROOP-SHIP "AUSTRALIA" BOUND FOR MANILA

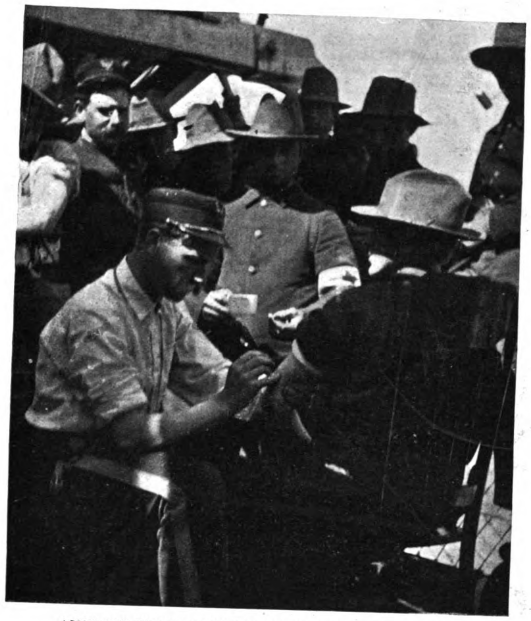
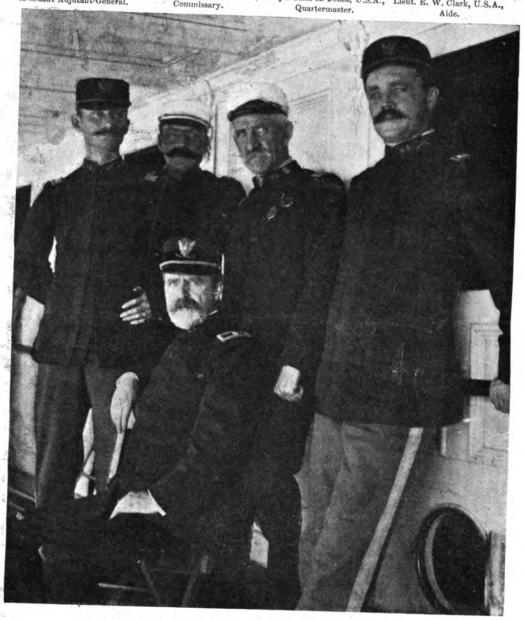
Oscar King Davis.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



CHAPLAIN GILBERT HOLDING CHURCH SERVICE, MAY 29.



ON THE HURRICANE-DECK.

Lieut. H. P. McCain, U.S.A., Assistant Adjutant-General. Lieut. S. A. Clomans, U.S.A., Commissary. Major Sam. R. Jones, U.S.A., Quartermaster. Lieut. E. W. Clark, U.S.A., Aide.

ASSISTANT-SURGEON WHITING HOLDS A VACCINATION BEE.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL T. M. ANDERSON AND STAFF.

DINNER.

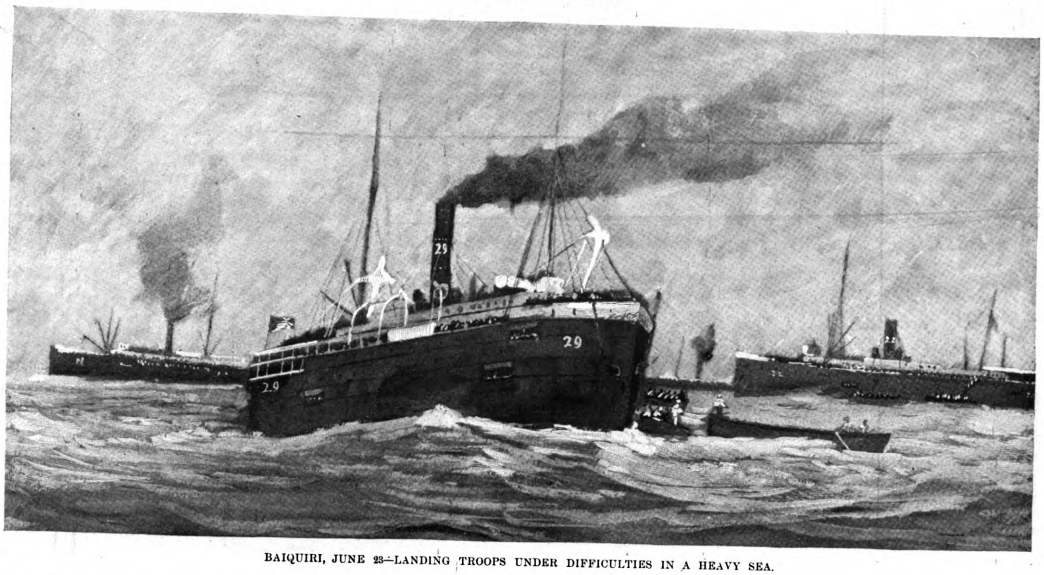
STRING BAND OF COMPANY E., 1ST OREGON VOLUNTEERS.

WITH OUR TROOPS FOR MANILA.

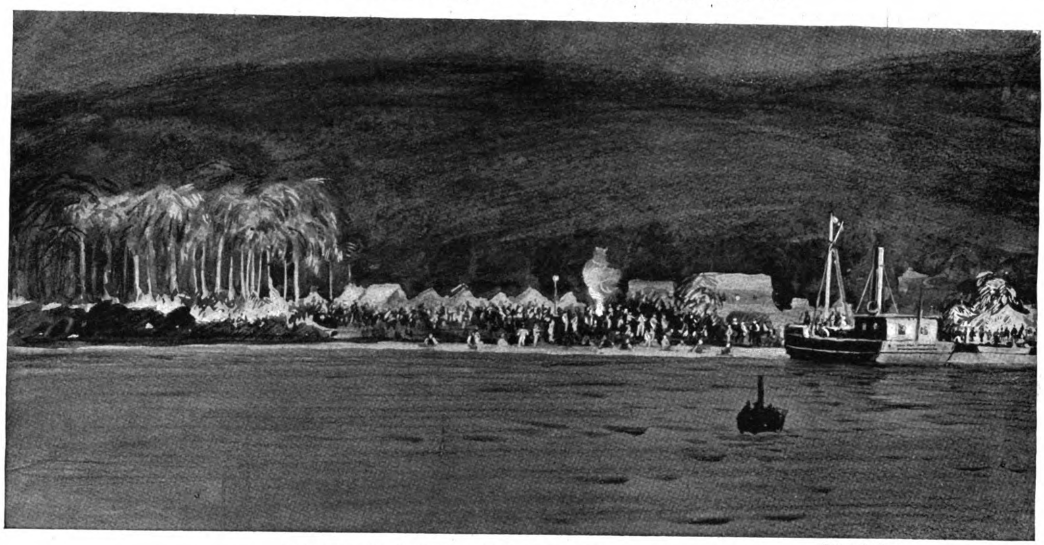
SCENES ON THE TRANSPORT "AUSTRALIA," OF THE FIRST EXPEDITION, CONVEYING GENERAL ANDERSON AND THE 1ST OREGON VOLUNTEERS. PHOTOGRAPHS BY OSCAR K. DAVIS, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



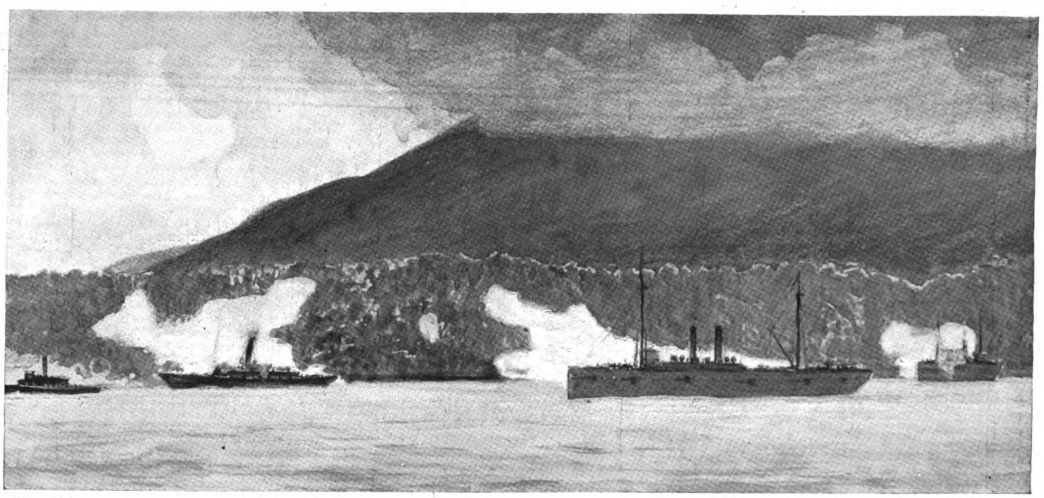
Digitized by Google



TORPEDO-BOAT "ERICSSON" RECONNOITRING OFF SANTIAGO HARBOR TO OBSERVE THE ERECTION OF NEW SPANISH BATTERIES — DRAWN BY H. REUTERDAHL.

"At dawn the Spanish sighted the 'Ericsson' close under their batteries, and sent a 10-inch shell whizz-whirring over her. Others followed, one going between her two funnels."—Correspondence from Santiago.

Original from PENN STATE



BAIQUIRI, JUNE 23—LANDING TROOPS UNDER DIFFICULTIES IN A HEAVY SEA.

Lighter with Stores.

ENSENADA DE LOS ALTARES, JUNE 24—THE FIRST CAMP ON THE BEACH.
"The 'St. Louis' kept her search-light on the beach, and the soldiers went in swimming."—Extract from Mr. Chapman's Letter.

"Wompatuck." "Scorpion." "Detroit." "Suwanee."

SHELLING THE ENEMY OUT OF THE SHORE ROADS NEAR SANTIAGO, JUNE 24.

LANDING THE TROOPS OF THE SANTIAGO EXPEDITION.
DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SEASICK SOLDIERS OF 3d UNITED STATES INFANTRY ON TRANSPORT "ARANSAS."

THE LOSS OF "LA BOURGOGNE."

At five o'clock on Monday morning, July 4, the French transatlantic liner La Bourgogne was run into by the British full-rigged sailing-ship Cromartyshire, about sixty miles south of Sable Island, and sunk. The collision occurred in a fog. It appears that each ship heard the other's fog signal, but apparently too late to avoid disaster, for, almost as soon as the Britisher saw the steamship loom up in the fog, the Cromartyshire rammed La Bourgogne amidships. The two vessels then drew away from each other, and, so thick was the fog, the captain of the Cromartyshire thought the liner had proceeded uninjured. Not until an hour or more later, when the mist lifted, did the Englishman know of the terrible catastrophe that had resulted. The liner had sunk ten minutes after being struck!

La Bourgogne sailed from New York Saturday, July 2, with 750 souls on board. Of these, 220 were first and second cabin passengers, 297 were steerage passengers, 11 were officers, and there were 222 in the crew. Of these there were saved not one first-cabin passenger, only 11 second-cabin passengers, 51 steerage passengers, and 104 of the crew, making a total of 166 saved out of 750 in all on board. All the officers but four, and all the women but one, were drowned. There were over a hundred women on the ship, and many children. Captain Deloncle went down with his ship.

These passengers who were saved are unanimous in asserting that the crew behaved in a most brutal and cowardly manner and displayed a woful lack of discipline. The sailors apparently made little effort to launch the life-boats, leaving this to the passengers, with whom they afterwards fought for places in the boats and on the rafts. One boat-load of women, without oars, was upset, and all were lost. Mrs. La Casse, the only woman saved, was rescued by her husband, who had to fight his way to a raft. The men in the floating boats and on the rafts hit with oars those who tried to grasp a place of safety. Some passengers assert that many of the crew and steerage used knives in fighting for places in the life-boats. The officers apparently exerted no authority whatever. When the Cromartyshire had rescued those on rafts and in boats, her captain, Henderson, called for volunteers to man boats and search for more survivors. The French crew refused to aid in this work. An hour later the steamship Grecian appeared and towed the Cromartyshire to Halifax. The officers of the Compagnie Générale Transatlantique, owners of La Bourgogne, offer as a reason why no first-cabin passengers were saved, that the first cabin companionway was totally blocked by the bending in of the ship's sides by the collision, thus effectually shutting off all avenue of escape for those in saloon state-rooms.

Conspicuous for their heroism on this occasion of relapse to the rights of brute force were three Catholic priests. These men, when they saw that the ship was bound to sink with a majority of those on board, gathered as many of the panic-stricken passengers as they could, and delivered absolution to those of their faith. None of the priests was saved. Of the first-cabin passengers, a number were well known socially, among others the wife and daughter of ex-Judge John F. Dillon, of Fair Hills, N. J.

MESS HOUR—OPENING MEAT-CANS BETWEENDECKS ON A CROWDED TRANSPORT—THREE TIERS OF BERTHS.

WITH THE TROOPS FOR SANTIAGO.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

On Docks at Port Tampa, June 12, 1898.

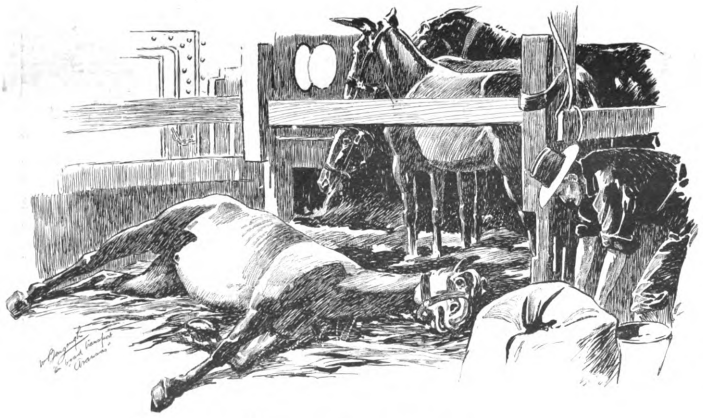
It is after midnight, and I can't get a row-boat out to the transport Iroquois, that is to carry me to Cuba—and we sail to-morrow. We have been sailing to-morrow for several days, but to-morrow—we sail! I can't get a bed at the inn here—not a pallet, a blanket, a place on a billiard table, or even on the floor.

Being new and untried, I had one drawback as a correspondent, but luckily I learned my trouble early. I had no policy. A war artist found this out, and being friendly, he took me from an unfinished letter to a private room. He had something on his mind, he said, and I could finish the letter any old time.

"You don't know much about the army?"

I told him that until six weeks ago I was not able to tell a doughboy officer from a cavalryman by the stripes down his leg. He smiled with infinite pity and tolerance.



"Therefore," I said, "I am not a military critic, and shall not pass judgments and deliver opinions for some days yet."

"You've got to," he said, in a tone that ended argument. "You must have a policy. I'll give you one." And he began.

Now the war artist with pencil has no peer, and with his pen he laid bare in these columns, not long ago, the bowels of a battle-ship after a fashion that would have done no discredit to Kipling. But when he talks—there's the rub. He is a linguistic terror to the foreign attachés who are beginning to plume themselves on their English. He favors monosyllables, pauses, dashes, exclamation points, Indian sign-language, and heys, huhs, and humphs that fill out sentences, complete paragraphs, and round up elaborate argument.

"There is a lot any damn fool can say—of course—hey? But you mustn't say it—huh? Give 'em hell afterwards. That's right—ain't it? Understand? Regular army all right." (Sign-language here.) "These damn fools outside—hey? Best army in world at close of war" (sign-language), "best equipped—you understand, huh? Congress" (violent sign-language) "wanted to squish it—squish it—that's right—you understand—huh? Cut it down—cut it down—see? Illustrate—wanted 18,000 mules—got 2000—same principle—that's right. No use complainin' now—hey? No good—people think you complainin' of regular army—regular army all right, huh? You mustn't say it now. Give 'em hell afterwards—understand?" (Sign-language.) "All right now—go ahead."

I nodded my head basely—the policy was so simple, so lucid, and I believed I might understand after I had thought it all over; and, after thinking it all over and translating the artist into English, I make out, with an active use of inference and common-sense, merely that most men in public life do no more than they have to do; that political systems shrink in consequence, until they fit closely to immediate needs; that when there is a sudden need for sudden elastic expansion the system has grown stiff from disuse; and that the honest public servants are now doing their best, and that we must be patient. That the trouble is with the men and the people who have blindly refused to recognize the possibility of the emergency now upon us—the landlubber of the Western interior, the rural Populists and the city agitators, and the tender hearts of Boston; that these are the men who are to be "given hell"—afterwards—to the particular end that never again shall a soul of them see Washington except at his own expense and for his own personal business or pleasure.

SEASICK HORSE ON A TROOP-SHIP.

I am aboard the Iroquois now, and the transports are moving down the bay to St. Petersburg, where the Iroquois grounds on a sand bank near the docks, and an hour later anchors near by for the night. The other transports have gone on to quarantine, and we will sail to-morrow. We have been sailing to-morrow for several days, as I have said before, but to-morrow we sail!

Nearing Santiago, Monday Morning, June 20, 1898.

And we did sail. Just now we are not more than twenty miles away from the harbor of Santiago, and running fearlessly along the big, grim coast mountains of Cuba, with colors to the breeze and the band playing. In two hours we hope to hear a welcome from Sampson's guns, and then—well, nobody knows what will happen then.

The troops are in two divisions of three brigades, and with three regiments to each brigade, the Second Massachusetts and the Seventy-first New York constituting the volunteers. Besides, there is General Wheeler's cavalry of forty troops, of which four troops alone are mounted.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CHIEF-TRUMPETER C. W. PLATT OF THE "ROUGH RIDERS" RAISING THE AMERICAN FLAG AT BAIQUIRI.*

But in spite of transport and war-ship, officer and soldier, I cannot realize that this is war; that this is not some strange huge excursion; that we are not to land in peace and safety, and in peace and safety go back as we came; that even at this moment a little farther down these gashed mountains, showing ever clearer through the mist, are enemies with whom the officers and soldiers around me may soon be in a death-grapple. The officers seem to realize it, however, for, while they are cheerful, an intense seriousness is perceptible under all, and an active longing to get to shore and to work. And these soldiers! cooped up as they are like chickens, short of rations, aboard here for two weeks, restless and sick with inactivity —nobody hears a word of grumbling or sees a sour face. Big fellows, strong fellows, they are—intelligent, quiet, orderly, obedient, good-natured, patient—patient beyond words. Here and now, in advance, I take off my hat with profound respect and perfect confidence to "plug" and "doughboy" —Uncle Sam's own boys of horse and of foot. They were lying asleep all over the decks this morning at daybreak. Their faces looked gray in the dawn, and some lay in attitudes that suggested ghastly premonitions. The premonitions will come true fast enough so far as some of the poor fellows are concerned, doubtless, but when the blow strikes, may it come painless and bring peace.

This boat carries "Iron" Lawton, who commands the second division; Chaffee the strong, now a brigadier-general—and the Major. General Lawton was colonel of a regiment at the close of the war, before he was twenty-one years old. He captured Geronimo, who called him "the big captain," and refrained from killing him because he made such a superb figure on horseback. Everybody who knows the army has his eye on General Chaffee; and as for the Major—there are many majors on the expedition and several on this boat, but only one Major. The Major was a civilian a little while ago, but he gives not a sign. At sunrise the lucky eye of observation turns without a particle of regret from the spectacle of shining Aurora rising from her bath to the pink-robed Major going down to his, so even in the race for glory are the goddess and the son of Mars. The one break in the monotony of the sail was the Major's battle. It was just after the war-ships met us off Key West, and a sudden firing began. Out ran the Major and set his pajamas fluttering from the rail.

"There they are! Three to one against us! See those Spanish ships over there? Where's the general—where's the general?" A moment later we heard him waking the general.

"General, the fight is on. The fight is on."

But the fight was not on—the Indiana was merely giving hoarse commands to an impudent steamer to heave to. After that a mischievous subaltern told him a secret of ordnance, and the Major got out his camp-cot and slept in the farther end of the saloon that night. Next day he reprimanded an aide for smoking below.

"Young man," he said, "don't you know that there are twenty tons of gunpowder stored in there under my state-room?"

However, merely because the Major is excitable and doesn't like his bed feathered with gunpowder is no sign that he will not fight—the Major may be a lion. The dandies fought well at Waterloo, and I imagine that certain young men under Colonel Roosevelt will give a good account of themselves when the time comes. At any rate, they are taking their medicine like men, and are asking no favors because they are gentlemen. I saw a little fellow on the docks at Tampa, brown as the skirts of his hunting-saddle at home, in a coarse blue shirt, with his tooth-brush stuck through the band of his slouch-hat, and in company with a hulking Irishman whom he called "Doc," and who called him by his first name. The "chumminess" of the two made me laugh outright, and I wondered if the Irishman knew the generative energy, social and financial, that was bottled up in his small comrade. Perhaps he did know, and most likely he cared not a whit for the same.

We are off Santiago Harbor now, and Morro Castle is plain through the thin mist, as are the battle-ships patrolling in stern procession under and past it and back again. The flag-ship has gone in to take General Shafter to confer with Sampson, while the transports pitch impatiently on a swelling sea of sapphire, and wait.

Night comes, and we hear nothing.

The belief is that Cervera has been asked over to the admiral's ship to dine with General Shafter and surrender, and the suspicion is that the three are having a high old time over the terms.

It is morning again, and we are putting out to sea—God knows whither bound. The Major has solved the problem.

"Supporting Spanish tradition," says he, "Cervera says 'Mañana.' 'Mañana be damned,' says Shafter. 'Mañana we land.'"....Apparently the Major is right, for we have made a big sea circle, and are heading straight for the shore again. But it's a false hope. However, we are to force a landing to-morrow—sure.

OFF BAIQUIRI, June 22, 1898.

There was a sober thrill last night through this ship. Orders came at dusk that we were to force a landing at daybreak, and General Lawton was to be the first man to set his foot on the Cuban coast. There was a quick conference, rations for three days were issued, outfits were overhauled and tightened, and all night the ship was in a bustle of eager preparation. Like a New England farmer, we got up next morning and ate breakfast in the dark; and like him, we sat around and waited for the light. Day broke and showed the big emerald-green mountains rosy with light, the coast foothills still in shadow, the spray breaking high against the low rock wall that makes the

(Continued on page 700.)

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

MODERN CIVILIZATION.

IT is observed that nature's supply of food for infants is lacking in the higher civilization; but the deficiency is perfectly supplied by the use of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk.—[Adv.]

A ROYAL road to good digestion:—via ABBOTT'S—the ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA BITTERS. Good for the stomach, pleasant to taste. Get only the genuine—"ABBOTT'S." —[Adv.]

NOTHING contributes more towards a sound digestion than DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pears'

To keep the skin clean is to wash the excretions from it off; the skin takes care of itself inside, if not blocked outside.

To wash it often and clean, without doing any sort of violence to it, requires a most gentle soap, a soap with no free alkali in it.

Pears', the soap that clears but not excoriates.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

NEVER HAS ANYTHING BEEN SO HIGHLY AND SO JUSTLY PRAISED AS

VIN MARIANI

MARIANI WINE, the FAMOUS TONIC for BODY, NERVES and BRAIN.

GEN. SIR EVELYN WOOD Says:

"Regarding the infantry marching in the recent manœuvres, it was the best seen during my command at Aldershot. Many officers availed themselves of the tonic and reconstituent properties of the well-known Mariani Wine, the most certain as well as the most palatable method of inducing resistance to fatigue."
From "The London Sketch."

MAX O'RELL,
The Renowned Writer and Lecturer, Writes:

Your Vin Mariani is positively marvellous; one glass put me on my feet; one bottle made a new man of me.
Yours gratefully, MAX O'RELL.

ALL DRUGGISTS.
PARIS: 41 Boulevard Haussman. LONDON: 83 Mortimer Street.

MARIANI WINE is invaluable at this season of the year, when, owing to trying climatic conditions, the system is especially susceptible to attacks of debility and prostration.

VIN MARIANI (MARIANI WINE) has stood the test of thirty-five years' trial. It has written endorsements from more than 8000 American physicians, in addition to having received cordial recommendations from royalty, princes of the Church and of the State, and many notable personages.

MARIANI WINE is a tonic prepared upon careful scientific principles. It contains absolutely no injurious properties. It gives power to the brain, strength to the entire nervous system, firmness and elasticity to the muscles, and richness to the blood. It has been aptly described as a promoter of good health and longevity.

MARIANI WINE is specially indicated for General Debility, Weakness from whatever causes, Overwork, Profound Depression and Exhaustion, Throat and Lung Diseases, Consumption, Malaria and La Grippe.

MARIANI WINE is an adjuvant in convalescence and a powerful rejuvenator. For Overworked Men, Delicate Women, Sickly Children it Works Wonders. Taken with cracked ice, it relieves Summer Prostration quickly and effectually. It soothes, strengthens and sustains the system.

To those who will kindly write to MARIANI & CO., 52 West 15th Street, New York City, will be sent, free, book containing portraits with endorsements of Emperors, Empress, Princes, Cardinals, Archbishops, and other interesting matter.

AVOID SUBSTITUTIONS.
MONTREAL: 28-30 Hospital Street.

Trade No 4711 Mark

Captol

(REGISTERED)

The Only Dandruff Cure

The Captol Hair Tonic is a new and invaluable discovery made by the well-known authority on diseases of the scalp, Dr. P. J. Eichhoff, Professor of Dermatology, Elberfeld, Germany.

Captol completely eradicates scurf and dandruff in 10 to 14 days, and is a sure preventive of baldness. (See DeutscheMedicin, Wochenschrift, 1897, No. 41.)

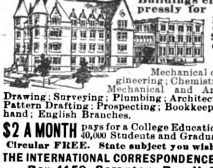
Experience has shown that all other specifics recommended for these purposes have proved failures.

SOLE U. S. AGENTS,
MÜLHENS & KROPFF, . . NEW YORK.

A Leather Lesson

Thick leather isn't always durable. Thin leather isn't always comfortable. Oily leather isn't always waterproof. Dear leather isn't always best. Low price leather isn't always cheap. Vici Kid is always reliable. This is the reason it is fast superseding all other leathers. Vici Kid is the only leather that repels the cold, yet absorbs no heat. It is the only leather free from oil, yet impervious to water. It is the only leather soft enough for comfort, strong enough for any kind of wear.

VICI KID



makes the most beautiful shoes for women, the most comfortable shoes for men, the most durable shoes for children (all colors). The genuine never varies in quality, no matter where you get it. Genuine Vici Kid is made only by R. H. Foerderer. To insure getting it and not an imitation, ask your dealer for Foerderer's Vici Kid. Vici Leather Dressing makes all shoes look better and wear better.

Ask your dealer for it. A book about buying, wearing and caring for shoes mailed free.

ROBERT H. FOERDERER, Philadelphia.

EDUCATION BY MAIL

Thousands have been helped to better pay & positions through our system of instruction

Buildings erected expressly for this purpose at a cost of $225,000

Courses of Steam, Electrical, Mechanical or Civil Engineering; Chemistry; Mining; Mechanical and Architectural Drawing; Surveying; Plumbing; Architecture; Metal Pattern Drafting; Prospecting; Bookkeeping; Shorthand; English Branches.

$2 A MONTH pays for a College Education at Home. 40,000 Students and Graduates.

Circular FREE. State subject you wish to study.

THE INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
Box 1159, Scranton, Pa., U. S. A.

Harper's Catalogue

Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

He is a Public Benefactor Who provides the people With a pure stimulant.

OLD DEARBORN RYE

Bottled in bond, supplies this long-felt want. Sold by all leading dealers. Prescribed by all leading physicians. Write for circular and prices.

W. P. Squibb & Co., Lawrenceburgh, Dearborn County, Ind., Distillers

THE CELEBRATED

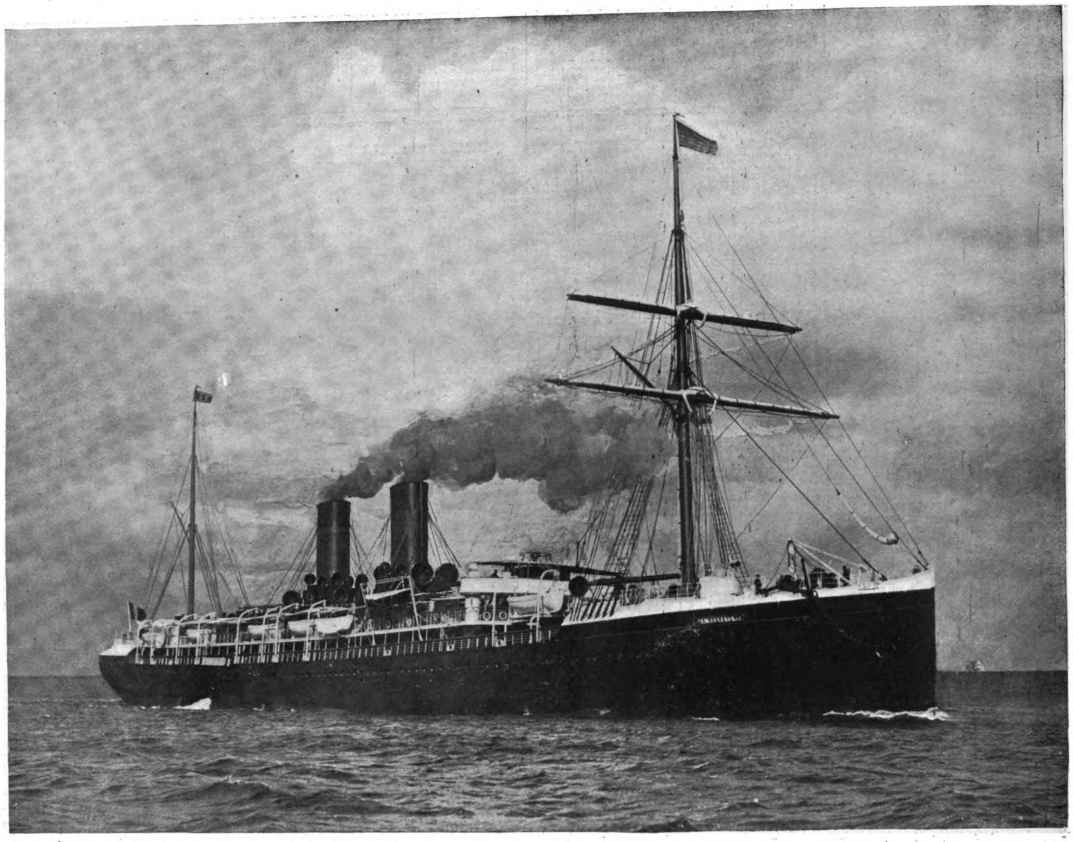
SOHMER

Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade. Our name spells—

S—O—H—M—E—R

New York Warerooms SOHMER BUILDING Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.



* Immediately upon landing at Juragua Mines, near Baiquiri, the American flag was carried by members of the First Volunteer Cavalry—"Rough Riders"—to the Spanish fort at the top of the hill overlooking the entire fleet of transports, four hundred feet above the sea. Chief-Trumpeter C. W. Platt stood upon the old stone breastworks with the flag, and when it was unfurled every steam-whistle in the fleet of transports was let loose, and every throat in the army yelled enthusiastically.

Later the flag was raised to the top of the abandoned fort, which had been perforated by one of the shells during the bombardment.—Extract from Mr. Bengough's Letter.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"LA BOURGOGNE," OF THE COMPAGNIE GÉNÉRALE TRANSATLANTIQUE, SUNK IN COLLISION WITH THE BRITISH SHIP "CROMARTYSHIRE," OFF SABLE ISLAND, JULY 4, WITH A LOSS OF 565 LIVES OUT OF 725.—[See Page 698.]

(Continued from page 699.)

coast-line, and the ship floating alone in a little bay that curved like a horseshoe shorewards. And we kept on waiting. Other transports gathered; the lifting mist showed a long pier stretching into the bay and loaded with tram-cars, and the frame houses of a little mining-town—Baiquiri. Flames shot up from the town—the Spaniards were burning up the property that might be of value to us. The war-ships steamed lazily in. Natty, self-important little steam-launches began to sputter through the bay, towing a train of landing-boats, each manned by two jolly Jackies in white—and still we waited. The captain of the Indiana, it was said, had sent word that there was important work ahead to make the landing safe. In the middle of the forenoon and down towards Santiago a herd of maddened bulls began to bellow out in the Cuban hills. Firing had begun, and General Kent was making a feint of landing in another little bay at another little coast town—Juragua. Below that point still another bombardment was going on to keep the Dons guessing. Meanwhile the Jackies and middies and naval cadets were busy, and landing-boats stuffed with slouch-hats, blue shirts, and bristling gun-muzzles were being towed into position behind a little launch, in which stood the colossal figure of Lawton, upright and ready to lead the way. But just a moment, please.

To the right of the bay loomed a foot-hill, shaped like a huge grave, with one end steep from the sea, covered thickly on the sides with trees, terraced with palisades, and pointed on top by a Spanish block-house, the conical roof of which caught the sun like brass.

At the foot of this the boats must land, and there was no telling what game the Spaniard was playing under cover on that still hill, and up the quiet ravine on the other side, nor what the card he held up his sleeve. So the New Orleans, the ex-Brazilian cruiser, went ahead to investigate. As she passed the transport a megaphone shouted, "Three cheers for the army!" and the Jackies waved and cheered, while the doughboys crowded on the forward deck, and clinging to the rigging, waved and cheered back mightily. A little later the New Orleans gave a deep, hoarse cough as a signal, and a puff of smoke from her starboard side was quickly answered by a cloud of smoke high on the hill where her shell burst. At once the Castine and the Annapolis began to clear the throats of their guns. The little Vixen barked a note of sharp inquiry; the tug Wompatuck, with all the pride of a recruit at his first target practice, barked too, and all were fused into an angry chorus. At first they searched that hill, smoke belching from the ships like the spray spouting along the coast, and smoke forming into little clouds and rising on the hill as mist forms and rises there after a rain.

The shells whistled over the hill, screamed through the woods over the gray palisades, or crashed into dark cave-

ADVERTISEMENTS.

YACHTSMEN AHOY!!

Cushions and Mattresses which will not absorb moisture are a luxury and the delight of yachtsmen.

"PERFECTION"
Air Cushions and Mattresses
are always dry. Never become musty. Are perfect life-preservers in case of accident.

Our cushions and mattresses can be deflated and rolled into small compass. Free illustrated catalogue gives full information. Write

MECHANICAL FABRIC CO.,
Air-Goods Department, Providence, R. I.

Gold Seal
Champagne

Best Natural Sparkling Wine produced in America.

Pronounced by Connoisseurs as a Superior Article for Household Consumption.

For Sale by all leading wine dealers and grocers, or at the cellars,

URBANA WINE CO., Urbana, N.Y.

Also a full line of well-ripened and pure Sweet Catawba, Dry Catawba, Pure Sherry, Clarets, and Brandies.

If Fishes Could Read

Our catalogue they wouldn't be caught. It tells everything "catching" for the modern Isaak Walton.

If not sold by your local dealer, we will mail samples of

PFLUEGER'S
"Luminous" Bait

for either trout, bass or muskallonge for 50 cts. in stamps. Illustrated catalogue free.

The Enterprise Mfg. Co., Akron, O.

A "positive action" is one that cannot be deranged by carelessness or accidents. It is found only in the

Veeder
CYCLOMETER

DUST PROOF
WATER PROOF
POSITIVE ACTION

CATALOGUE FREE

VEEDER MFG. CO. HARTFORD CONN.

THE MANUFACTURERS OF

STANDARD PRICES
CRESCENT BICYCLES
SOLD BY AGENTS EVERYWHERE

were the first to establish a standard price for high-grade wheels. The result is

For Adults $50, $75
Juveniles $20, $25, $30
Price and Quality Guaranteed.

Unapproached Popularity
Unapproached Sales

Art Catalogue, with "Care of the Wheel," FREE.

WESTERN WHEEL WORKS
CHICAGO NEW YORK

HARPER'S CATALOGUE

thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AUXILIARY CRUISER "ST. PAUL" REPULSING THE SPANISH TORPEDO-BOAT-DESTROYER "TERROR" OFF SAN JUAN DE PUERTO RICO, JUNE 22.

DRAWN BY H. REUTERDAHL FROM DESCRIPTIONS AND SKETCHES BY CAPTAIN CHARLES D. SIGSBEE, U.S.N., COMMANDING "ST. PAUL."

Original from PENN STATE
Digitized by Google
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

like spots under the rocks—bursting with rage that nothing could be found, and spitting smoke and dust like demons. By-and-by a humorous gunner or two took that shining mark on the peak of the hill—the silent block-house—and a howling imp of a shell whirled closer and even closer, until the mark was lost in a cloud of smoke. Then how Jackie and doughboy roared! The house seemed to have been swept into the air; but there it stood, still impudent and shining, when all was clear again. It was a close shot, however, and that gunner needed but one more trial; but there was better work for him now; and besides, that house was needed for a better purpose than ruin. At sunset the little Vixen, steaming closer, had sent a casual messenger into a dark ravine on the other side of the hill, and had made a find. Spaniards broke from it like partridges from a cover, and every gun was turned on them. A few insurgents, who had been waiting for this near by, joined in the fusillade, and the Spaniards—three hundred of them—fled. Whether any were killed is not known yet, but a wayward shell found its way among the Cubans and gave two of them slight wounds. The way was clear now, and General Lawton steamed in and landed his men without the firing of a shot.

It is late in the afternoon now, and the hard-working Jackies have been piped to supper. To the right of the town I can see a short line of insurgents drawn up, perhaps for picket duty for the night. From the harbor every eye turns curiously upward to the block-house high above them. Two men are in plain sight near it—Cubans, Spaniards, or what not nobody in the harbor knows. One of them climbs to the roof, and the other hands him up something. Then a yell breaks from every throat, and a whistle, shrill or hoarse, from every craft in the harbor. Old Glory is fluttering against a bank of low-hung clouds. The stars and stripes are loose to winds from the mountain and winds from the sea. Just now they stream steadily in a wind from the sunset, as though they were ready to be borne and planted, where they soon will be—over Santiago.

JOHN FOX, JR.

OFF SANTIAGO.

June 26.

SINCE the Vesuvius joined the fleet she has been in the habit of throwing a few charges of guncotton into the defences of Santiago almost every night, going in quite close, and firing with an accuracy that has wrought great execution to the enemy's works.

On Wednesday night she landed a shell on Cay Smith that struck a storehouse and completely annihilated it, the force of the explosion tearing a great hole in the earth, and producing a tremendous and deafening report that could be heard a long distance.

The day following this successful shot a Spanish soldier was captured in the woods and brought in. He had run away from Santiago, and frankly stated that though he had been nearly starved, and in danger of getting killed by the shells of the American ships that were liable to drop in on them at any time, yet he had not thought of running away until the Americans began throwing earthquakes into the forts, when he became thoroughly convinced that the best thing he could do was to escape from such a dangerous neighborhood. From the ships the Spanish can be seen, after one of these bombardments, digging in the heaps of sand and dirt thrown up by exploding shells and loading into carts the bodies of the dead. What their losses have been is a matter of conjecture, but certainly they have been considerable.

On Wednesday, while the troops were preparing to land at Baiquiri, the coast was thoroughly shelled in that neighborhood, and as far west as the batteries beyond Santiago. The Texas, in front of the heavy western battery, which has been her station all along, was struck by a 6.6-centimetre shell, that penetrated the forward compartment on the gun-deck and exploded, killing one man and wounding eight. There are four 6-pounder rapid-fire guns in this space, none of which was in action; but the crew of each were at their stations, and nearly every man was struck by the pieces of flying shell.

Effect of 6.6-Centimetre Shell on unarmored Section of "Texas," piercing 1¼ inches of Steel, killing one and wounding eight Men.

Deck Stanchion smashed by same Shell.

The ship is not armored in this section, except against small rapid-fire guns, the total thickness of the sides being 1⅝ inches; the outer plating, one inch thick, was cut through with clean sharp edges, the inner and thinner plate being bent back in an irregular shape, as if it had been the cover of a tin can.

A deck stanchion in the path of the projectile was cut through, but the upper and lower parts were left standing. The shell must have exploded right here, and a man standing near was terribly burned by the flame. The whole compartment filled with dense smoke and a suffocating odor of escaping gas. A hawser coiled on a spool that reached to the deck above was knocked to pieces. The force of the explosion made a great dent in the ship's side opposite to the hole made by the shell in entering. The side frames and deck beams adjoining were bent and twisted, and the deck cut with great gashes. It seems remarkable that more men were not killed outright; as it is, all will probably recover, except possibly the man who was burned, who is very badly injured. All the wounded, with the exception of one man, who was not badly hurt, were taken up to Guantanamo and put on the Solace.

When the poor fellow who was so badly burned was being bandaged up he asked the doctor, in a faint voice, "Was that a Dago shell or a premature explosion, doctor." When told that it was a Dago shell, he said, "Then it's all right." The man who was killed was F. R Blakely, an apprentice just passed his twenty-first year; his term of service had recently expired, and he had re-enlisted. He was buried at sea that evening, in the deep waters off Santiago, and the funeral service was read for the first time in the fleet since coming here.

Launches from the Marblehead and Dolphin have been busy searching the upper channels at Guantanamo for mines, and so far ten have been taken up and put where they can do no harm.

The Texas struck one, and got it on board, where it remains as a trophy. These mines were put down by German engineers, some as recently as April, 1898. All are contact mines, but none apparently in perfect order, for they failed to explode when bumped by the propellers of the Marblehead and Texas. The cable from Guantanamo to Mole St. Nicholas has been repaired, and is now working night and day under government supervision. The newspaper men hasten there to file their bulletins, and it seems quite "United States" to have a cable-office so handy. The office is a little box of a place twelve feet square, built of corrugated iron and lined with wood. It is right on the beach near Camp McCalla, and has a couple of shot-holes through it for additional ventilation, and as souvenirs of the arrival of the marines.

Guantanamo Bay might be in the immediate neighborhood of New York, from its appearance nowadays, crowded with colliers, transports, war-ships, and despatch-boats. At night lights shine out from the ships; the music of an accordion or a harmonica, played by some sailor to liven up the hours, comes over the water, and the murmur of voices and other concomitants of the piping times of peace. The war-ships are silent and watchful; the Marblehead still guards the entrance of the bay, and turns her search-light on any approaching craft, and from time to time on the dark shores. All is quiet in Camp McCalla; the marines turn in early, and only an occasional hail from a sentry tells that some there are not sleeping.

Submarine Mine struck and picked up by U.S.S. "Texas" in Guantanamo Bay.

The landing of the troops at Baiquiri was accomplished under difficulties. The wind stirred up quite a sea both days, and the cutters and launches jumped about a good deal, giving the soldiers a drenching of spray if they escaped a ducking in the surf which rolled in on the beach. There is a big iron pier there, but only one steamer at a time could lie alongside, and there was no landing-place worth the name save the beach. Two men were drowned on Wednesday, and several horses were also lost; but considering the size of the undertaking, it was handled with great success. Launches and cutters from the fleet were pressed into service, and the sailors had all the hard work they wanted in managing their overloaded boats. We have a good many more skilled boatmen in the service now than when they began the task, and the value of such sharp training cannot be overestimated.

A good many of the horses were put overboard and allowed to swim ashore, the bugles calling them in with the musical water-call. With one or two exceptions, all got ashore safely. One poor beast got confused by the multitude of boats and headed out to sea; he was having a hard time in the rough water, and was apparently giving out, when finally a boat was lowered and succeeded, after a struggle, in getting the tired animal turned toward the land. Hundreds of soldiers were watching the little drama from near-by transports; they all gave a ringing cheer when the rescue was accomplished. It was a pretty and natural exhibition of the soldiers' ready sympathy, if it was only a poor army horse in the midst of so many exciting incidents. A big ship passed near us, the men lined up ready to go ashore, boats swarmed alongside, and the band struck up "There'll be a hot time in the old town to-night!"

CARLTON T. CHAPMAN.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

(Continued from page 683.)

week ago to-day. Here, as at El Caney, it was a question of capturing trenches and block-houses before attaining the town itself. The advance was made up a steep clearing, and the enemy, firing only too accurately, did not yield until fairly driven out of the trenches by a final rush "as though our men intended to catch them with their hands." Equal courage was shown by the Seventy-first New York, with the Sixteenth and Sixth regulars, in their charge uphill upon another seemingly impregnable position, which they carried, though at a terrible sacrifice. At four o'clock in the afternoon a block-house near the San Juan River was taken by the Ninth Cavalry, the "Rough Riders," and the First and Tenth Cavalry; then San Juan itself fell before the Sixteenth and Thirteenth Cavalry, the Seventh, Ninth, Tenth, and "Rough Riders." For some of our men it was the second and for others the third charge of the day, uphill and against an enemy fighting with a last-trench desperation. At Aguadores, on the coast east of Morro, the fortifications were shelled by the New York, Suwanee, and Gloucester.

Saturday, July 2.—Determined efforts to retake San Juan were made. The enemy was repulsed with great loss. General Vara del Rey, who commanded the Spanish force at El Caney, has been killed. He was second in command to General Linares, who has been disabled by a wound. Next in succession is José Toral. Four batteries, advanced to more favorable positions, threw shells into Santiago, and aided the movement of troops under General Lawton to extend our lines north of the city. Colonel Escario arrived at Santiago with about four thousand men to re-enforce the garrison.

Sunday, July 3.—The situation is stated in a despatch from General Shafter to Secretary Alger, which is, in part, as follows: "My lines completely surround the town [Santiago] from the bay on the north of the city to a point on the San Juan River." Another despatch includes interesting correspondence:

To the Commanding General of the Spanish Forces, Santiago de Cuba:

SIR,—I shall be obliged, unless you surrender, to shell Santiago de Cuba. Please inform the citizens of foreign countries and all women and children that they should leave the city before 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. R. SHAFTER, Major-General U.S.A.

His Excellency the General Commanding Forces of United States, San Juan River:

SIR,—I have the honor to reply to your communication of to-day, written at 8.30 A.M., and received at 1 P.M., demanding the surrender of this city, on the contrary case announcing to me that you will bombard the city, and that I advise the foreign women and children that they must leave the city before 10 o'clock to-morrow morning. It is my duty to say to you that this city will not surrender, and that I will inform the foreign consuls and inhabitants of the contents of your message. Very respectfully,

JOSÉ TORAL, Commander-in-Chief, Fourth Corps.

The Commanding General Spanish Forces, Santiago de Cuba:

SIR,—In consideration of the request of the consuls and officers in your city for delaying carrying out my intention to fire on the city, and in the interest of the poor women and children, who will suffer very greatly by their hasty and enforced departure from the city, I have the honor to announce that I will delay such action solely in their interest until noon of the 5th, provided during the interval your forces make no demonstration whatever upon those of my own. I am, with great respect, your obedient servant, W. R. SHAFTER,

Major-General U. S. A., Commanding.

Admiral Cervera's fleet, leaving Santiago Harbor and attempting to pass our war-ships stationed off the coast at that point, was destroyed. Despatches from Admiral Sampson and Commodore Watson follow:

The fleet under my command offers the nation as a Fourth of July present the destruction of the whole of Cervera's fleet—not one escaped. It attempted to escape at 9.30 this morning. At two the last ship, the Cristóbal Colon, had run ashore sixty miles west of Santiago, and has let down her colors. The Infanta Maria Teresa, Oquendo, and Vizcaya were forced ashore, burned, and blown up within twenty miles of Santiago. The Furor and Pluton were destroyed within four miles of the port. Our loss, one killed and two wounded. Enemy's loss probably several hundred from gun-fire, explosions, and drowning. About 1300 prisoners, including Admiral Cervera. The man killed was G. H. Ellis, chief yeoman of the Brooklyn.

SAMPSON.

At 9.30 to-day Spanish squadron, seven in all, including one gunboat, came out of Santiago in column, and was totally destroyed within an hour, excepting Cristóbal Colon, which was chased 45 miles to westward by the Commander-in-Chief, Brooklyn, Oregon, and Texas, surrendering to Brooklyn, but was beached to prevent sinking. ...

WATSON.

Press despatches add that the flag-ship New York had gone eastward to Siboney, where Admiral Sampson held a conference with General Shafter, but returned in time to join in the chase of the Colon. Extraordinary gallantry, according to all accounts, was shown by Captain Wainwright, commanding the converted yacht Gloucester.

Monday, July 4.—Admiral Cervera is quoted, in a despatch to the New York Herald, as saying to the correspondent of that paper to-day, "I received orders twice from Madrid to leave Santiago Harbor and go to Havana .... and I gave the order for my fleet to dash forth to almost certain destruction."

Tuesday, July 5.—Refugees from Santiago who arrived at Kingston, Jamaica, to-day, say that opinion is divided in regard to surrendering the city, the archbishop with many of the inhabitants and some of the soldiers wishing to yield, while Linares and the higher officers declare they will "burn the city to the ground first."

The demand for surrender of Santiago was repeated, and again rejected. The truce was extended.

Despatches from the front give our losses at Santiago as follows: Killed, 16 officers and 339 men; wounded, 1252. The returns are still imperfect.

Wednesday, July 6.—In exchange for prisoners captured by our forces, the Spanish authorities released Hobson and his seven companions who sunk the Merrimac in the channel of Santiago Harbor.

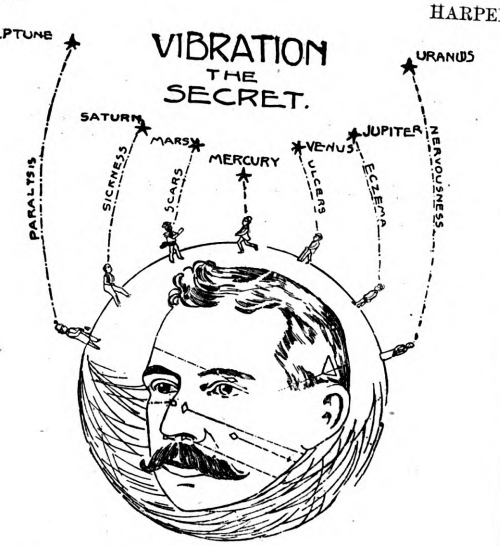
Despatches from Gibraltar and London state that Camara's squadron has been recalled to protect the Spanish coast.

Thursday, July 7.—A despatch received to-day by Secretary Long from Admiral Dewey says, under date of July 4: "The United States troops have been landed, and have been comfortably housed at Cavité. Insurgents still active. Aguinaldo proclaimed himself President of the revolutionary republic on July 1."

President McKinley signed the Hawaiian annexation resolution.



Nelson A. Miles, Major-General commanding the United States army, left Washington for Santiago, viâ Charleston.

Extensions of the armistice have been accorded—first, that there might be an opportunity for non-combatants to leave Santiago; and second (from Wednesday until Saturday), that the Spanish commander might communicate with his government in regard to the demand for surrender. Meanwhile our lines have been strengthened, siege-guns and mortar-batteries are in position, re-enforcements are on the way, and at Washington there has been discussion of plans for co-operation between army and navy.

Friday, July 8.—A despatch from Madrid states that General Correa, Minister of War, has received from General Toral, commanding at Santiago, the important communication (referred to under date of July 7) in relation to the surrender of the city. Toral says, after giving the terms of General Shafter's demand, that he has communicated with Captain-General Blanco, and warned all foreigners, who are now almost the sole inhabitants, and he adds, "It is necessary to remember that we are short of provisions, and that the troops have endured three years' campaigning."

Congress adjourned.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE GREATEST SUCCESS OF THE AGE!

50,000 Books Sold in One Week. One Agent Sold 14,000.

BE YOUR OWN ASTROLOGER AND PHYSICIAN.

Send to JOHN H. WOODBURY, D. I., for his most useful and valuable little "KEY TO HEALTH," enabling you to cast your own Horoscope and that of your friends, also to be your own Diagnostician.

Vibration is the great secret to all ills of mind and body. The Planets act directly upon the physiological condition of the people. If you have a strong influence from Saturn you may have trouble with the eyes, deafness, consumption, while Neptune sometimes causes paralysis. Uranus gives one nervous attacks, and Mercury high fevers.

To treat all of these various ailments one must be prepared to diagnose according to the vibratory law. This little Book is "Multum in Parvo." It contains many instructive points, and rare bits of curious Literature; such as the jewels and talisman that are lucky for you, that should be worn by you according to your Birthday.

It also contains the language and sentiments that are spoken in the deep though voiceless eloquence of Flowers.

Instructions for casting your Horoscope; how to tell your own fortune; advising you what enterprise to undertake; what companions to cultivate; what business to follow; what dangers threaten you; what snares to avoid; how to secure congenial companion for life, and avoid unhappy marriages; what accidents and misfortunes will befall you under your Planetary influences, and how to avoid them; to what diseases you are liable and how to ward them off, to overcome them if already contracted; and many other most useful and edifying features, making it "WORTH ITS WEIGHT IN GOLD," while affording any amount of amusement and entertainment for evenings at home in reading the Destiny of your friends.

This is arranged upon the most Scientific basis, and in accordance with the accepted authorities—the Oracles and Magi of the Orient—and the most approved Science of the Wonderful Secrets of Occultism of ancient Egypt and the Chaldeans.

These are made so plain by a movable diagram of the houses of Coelum and Zodiacal signs, Planetary Polarities and Influences, as well as the Lunar relations, that any one can comprehend it.

This little Book is unique in shape and appearance, and an ingenious device, beautifully illustrated and lithographed in six colors, and will be sent to any address upon receipt of THREE (3) REGULAR-SIZE OUTSIDE WRAPPERS OF WOODBURY'S FACIAL SOAP or 10c. in silver or stamps.

Address JOHN H. WOODBURY, D. I., 127 West 42d Street, New York City.

HEUBLEIN'S CLUB PUNCH

A SCIENTIFICALLY COMPOUNDED ARTICLE, MADE ONLY OF THE VERY CHOICEST MATERIALS, AND READY TO SERVE IN A MINUTES NOTICE; JUST THE THING FOR AN AFTERNOON TEA, EVENING-PARTY, YACHT OR PICNIC. IT MAKES ENTERTAINING EASY.

FOR SALE BY ALL DEALERS

PREPARED AND GUARANTEED BY

G. F. Heublein & Bro.

HARTFORD, NEW YORK, LONDON.

THE BEST PENS ARE

ESTERBROOK'S PROFESSIONAL PEN

THE PENS

ESTERBROOK'S

LEADING NUMBERS:

048, 14, 130, 239, 313, Al, 556.

PENS IN ALL STYLES, FOR EVERY PURPOSE.

FOR SALE BY ALL STATIONERS.

The Esterbrook Steel Pen Co.

26 John St., N. Y. Works, Camden, N. J.

NEW FICTION

A Romance of Summer Seas

A Novel. By VARINA ANNE JEFFERSON-DAVIS, Author of "The Veiled Doctor," etc. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

In the Sargasso Sea

A Novel. By THOMAS A. JANVIER, Author of "The Aztec Treasure-House," "The Uncle of an Angel," etc. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

The Hundred

And Other Stories. By GERTRUDE HALL. Illustrated by ALBERT E. STERNER and W. H. HYDE. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

NEW YORK AND LONDON

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers

Hunter Baltimore Rye

10 YEARS OLD

The American Gentleman's Whiskey

Sold at all First-class Cafés and by Jobbers.

WM. LANAHAN & SON, Baltimore, Md.

The Merit

of absolute PURITY, fine BOUQUET and moderate PRICE has brought

Great Western

to the first place in American Champagnes, and enabled it to displace the high-priced foreign wines in many homes, clubs and cafés.

The vintage offered this season is especially dry and pleasing.

Pleasant Valley Wine Co.,

SOLE MAKERS

Rheims, - N. Y.

SOLD BY

H. B. Kirk & Co., N.Y.

S.S. Pierce Co., Boston.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

A NEW POCO.

The Folding Gem.

The neatest, smallest, most carefully built of all the low-priced cameras. A marvel of compactness weighing one pound, and only an inch and a-half thick, closed. Automatically locks itself at proper focusing distance. Closes by touching a spring.

TAKES A PICTURE 4 X 5

As perfect at edges as at centre.

COMPLETE, $7.00.

ROCHESTER CAMERA CO.

43 ELIZABETH ST., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

WAR

Does not lessen the demand for

WONDERLAND '98

recently issued by the

NORTHERN PACIFIC.

This Co. is noted for this publication.

New each year in Cover, Text and Illustrations.

Those who keep their Wonderlands have now a good Library on YELLOWSTONE PARK and the Northwest.

Send six cents for it.

CHAS. S. FEE, Gen'l Pass. Agent, St. Paul, Minn.

A Tour of the Yellowstone

is a new inspiration to summer tourists. You can visit the Park on your way to the cities of the Pacific, or en route to Alaska. The scenery in America's Wonderland is unrivaled. Reached comfortably and quickly by

The North-Western Limited,

Electric Lighted

Twentieth Century train leaving Chicago for St. Paul, Minneapolis and the Northwest at 6:30 P. M. daily. Low rate tourist tickets to Helena, Butte, Yellowstone Park, Portland, Tacoma, Seattle and Alaska. Detailed information at all ticket offices.

Chicago & North-Western Ry.

The Pioneer Line West and Northwest of Chicago.

PRINCIPAL AGENCIES:

NEW YORK, 461 Broadway. BOSTON, 368 Washington St. CHICAGO, 212 Clark St.

GETTYSBURG BATTLE-FIELD.

Personally-Conducted Tour via Pennsylvania Railroad.

On Saturday, July 16, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will run a special three-day tour to Gettysburg, the Mecca of American patriotism. Leave New York 8.50 A.M.; Trenton, 10.58 A.M.; Philadelphia, 12.20 P.M. Round-trip rate, including two days' hotel accommodations and carriage drive over the battle-field—all necessary expenses—$13.50 from New York, $12.50 from Trenton, $10.00 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points. A tourist agent and chaperon will accompany the party, and Capt. James T. Long, the celebrated guide, will describe the battle at the High-Water Mark, "Bloody Angle."

HARPER'S CATALOGUE,

Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LETTING HIM DOWN EASY.

"DEAR SIR,—I return herewith the water-color picture you sent me for inspection. I like it very much, and would buy it, but my wife, who has very good taste in such things, does not want it.

"Yours truly, JOHN KASHPYLE."

To get the best results you must use the best materials.

You need expect only poor laundering with poor soap, but you will find dainty articles that have been washed with Ivory Soap restored to their original freshness with unchanged colors.

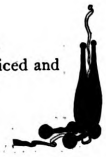
Nothing that will stand the application of plain water will be injured by Ivory Soap.

Copyright, 1896, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

ROYAL
BAKING POWDER

Imparts that peculiar lightness, sweetness, and flavor noticed in the finest cake, biscuit, rolls, crusts, etc., which expert pastry cooks declare is unobtainable by the use of any other leavening agent.

Made from pure, grape cream of tartar.



ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

Both Meat and Drink

Equally nourishing and refreshing—

Vigoral

The nutritive part of prime lean beef, delicately spiced and seasoned. The athlete's "stand-by."

Prepared in a minute, with cold or hot water.
At druggists and grocers.

Armour & Company, Chicago.

"Various Views on Vigoral" mailed free.

HARPER'S ROVND TABLE

VACATION SUBSCRIPTION
25¢
FOR THREE MONTHS

An International Magazine for Youth

Published in New York and London

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York City

Summer Resorts

LELAND'S OCEAN HOUSE, NEWPORT, R. I.
Opens June 25. Write for booklet.
WARREN LELAND, Jr., Manager.

TRADE E&W MARK
EARL & WILSON'S
LINEN
COLLARS & CUFFS
BEST IN THE WORLD.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.
Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.
A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.
Correspondence solicited.

"AMERICA'S GREAT RESORTS," 48 pages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent stamp by GEORGE H. DANIELS, G. P. A. New York Central, New York.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

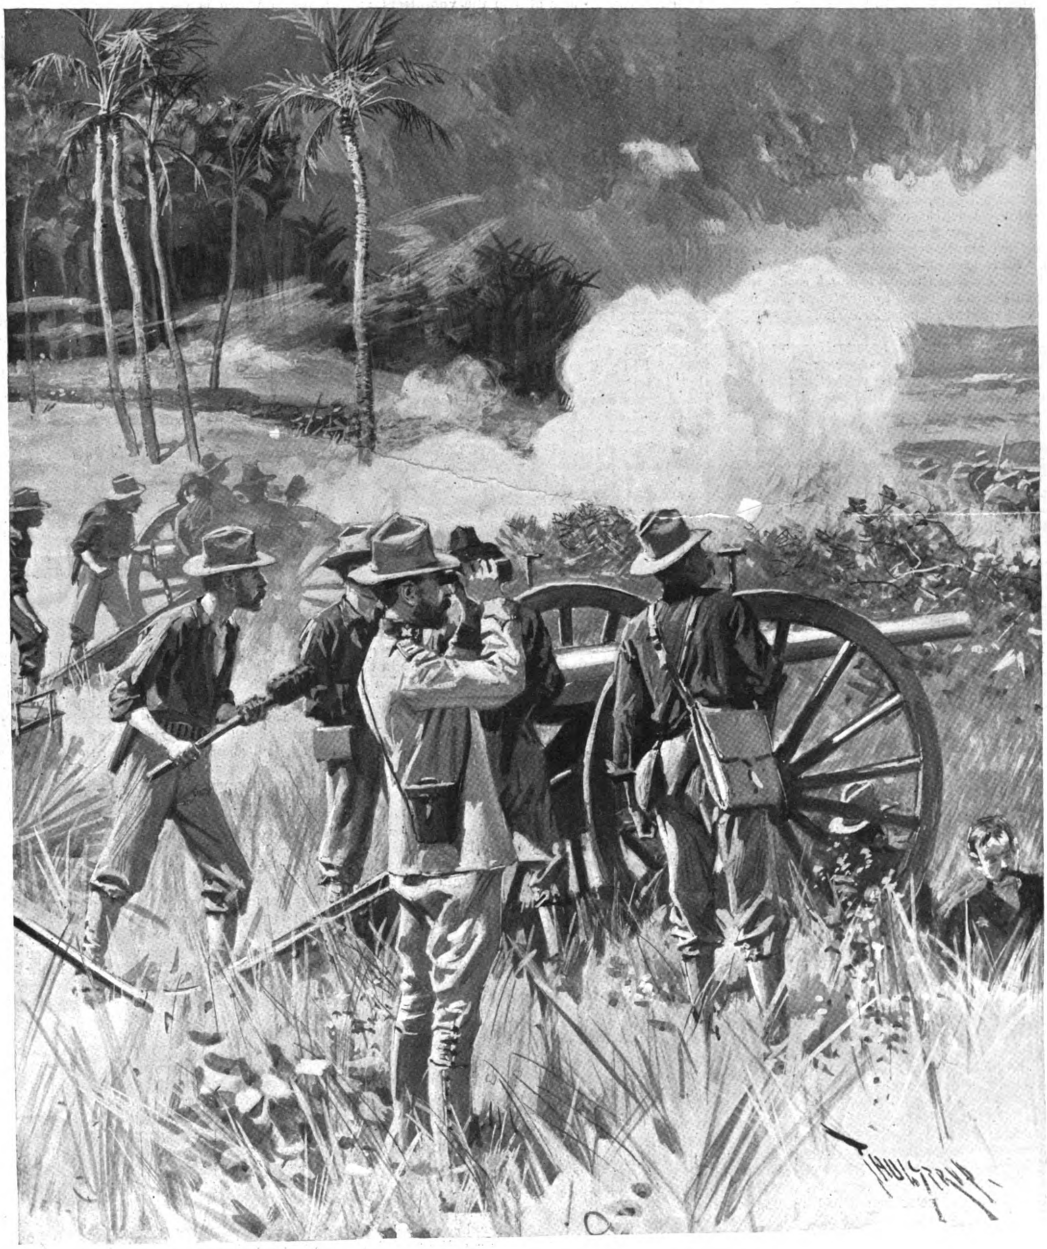
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION



VOL. XLII.—No. 2170.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 23, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS.
All Rights Reserved.

SANTIAGO DE CUBA—FIELD-ARTILLERY IN ACTION.

DRAWN BY T. DE THULSTRUP.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, JULY 23, 1898

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

This Paper will be the best Pictorial History of the War with Spain, as it was of the War of 1861. Its Special Artists and Correspondents will follow the Army and Navy, and notable Events in Washington and elsewhere will be accurately portrayed.

| ARTISTS. | CORRESPONDENTS. |
|---|---|
| CARLTON T. CHAPMAN. | JOHN FOX, JR. |
| RUFUS F. ZOGBAUM. | FRANK D. MILLET. |
| FREDERIC REMINGTON. | JOHN F. BASS. |
| T. DE THULSTRUP | O. K. DAVIS. |
| W. A. ROGERS | HAROLD MARTIN, AND OTHERS. |

Mr. FOX and Mr. REMINGTON are now with General SHAFTER'S Army, Messrs. MILLET, BASS, and DAVIS are on their way to the Philippines, Mr. HUNT is with the Cubans, and Mr. MARTIN at St. Thomas.

IT is well to record the fact that many of our Cuban allies are worse than worthless. The conduct of some of them at the time of the destruction of CERVERA'S fleet puts them outside of the pale of civilization. It will be remembered that they fired upon the escaping Spaniards, and were only prevented from murdering them by a shell from the Iowa. Since then other insurgents have declined to help the American troops to make roads, while others still have neglected to interfere with a body of marching Spaniards near Santiago.

EX-ATTORNEY-GENERAL JUDSON HARMON delivered an excellent address the other day, before the Ohio Bar Association, on the subject of territorial expansion by this country, and he uttered some phrases which are so significant, so pregnant with meaning, that we give them to our readers. After laying down the proposition that our increase of territory heretofore has been merely to make room for our people, he said: "Mere expansion is not growth, it is only swelling; we may push across the seas, but we cannot grow there. Elephantiasis is not an unknown form of national malady, and is always fatal. There are still chapters of English history to be written." And we may add that the most intelligent English statesmen, in contemplating that history, have already come to the conclusion that England's colonies are not now of advantage to England herself.

IT is greatly to be regretted that injudicious newspapers and political friends of Commodore SCHLEY are trying to make trouble between him and Admiral SAMPSON. We trust that we are not mistaken in assuming that Commodore SCHLEY disapproves of this endeavor to honor him in discrediting his commanding officer. Wild and extravagant talk about Commodore SCHLEY'S exploit at Santiago ought to stop. He has been the first, indeed, to admit that he did not plan or lead the battle or gain the victory. The alertness and readiness of the fleet were due to the vigilance and wisdom of the commanding officer, and when the enemy appeared our ships went after his ships, each largely on its own account, the captains of the Iowa, Texas, and Oregon, and WAINWRIGHT of the Gloucester, winning as many honors as SCHLEY. If there was any plan, it was made in advance by Admiral SAMPSON, so that if any one is entitled to the honors of the event it is Admiral SAMPSON. In saying this we think we are expressing the conviction and sentiment of nearly, if not quite, all the captains of the fleet. Commodore SCHLEY is in danger of being injured by his superserviceable friends of the daily press. It might possibly be to his own advantage if he were to succeed in putting a stop to the preposterous claims that have been made on his behalf, and which he himself admits to be unsubstantial. His flag-ship, the Brooklyn, it is true, received the brunt of the Spanish attack, because CERVERA had ordered her assailed because it was supposed that the Spanish ships could outrun the other vessels of our fleet. That Commodore SCHLEY is entitled to honors that will reflect on his commanding officer because he successfully repelled this attack, forcing the Colon ashore, is preposterous. He certainly would not have been held responsible if the Spanish fleet had escaped.

THE campaign in Cuba has ended gloriously by the surrender of Santiago de Cuba. We say gloriously, notwithstanding the errors and faults that marked the beginning and the conduct of it, errors and faults which have resulted in an enormous loss of life, and may be followed by the death of many good soldiers from yellow fever. We have been fortunate in the character and condition of our enemy. He was worn out, and he had ceased to be enterprising, if, indeed, he ever was that. That he was brave is a matter of course. We have been especially fortunate in the character and conduct of our regular army officers and soldiers, who bore the brunt of the fighting, and who are distinctly entitled to the honors of the campaign. We say this without in any way reflecting upon the character of the volunteers, who did their duty as well as raw troops can be expected to do it—better, indeed, than raw troops of any other country in the world. That the regulars excelled them is due to the fact that they are trained to the business of fighting, and this training, added to the character which is conspicuous also in the volunteers, and which can be most shortly and perhaps best described as American, gives us, considering the size of our regular army, probably the best fighting force in the world. If Spain does not recognize in this blow the end of the war, it is true indeed, as has been said by an English paper, that the ways of the Spaniard are beyond comprehension.

THE bids for the government bonds were opened on the 14th of July, and the result of the bidding was most satisfactory, the bidders numbering more than 300,000. The total subscriptions for the $200,000,000 of bonds that are to be issued was for $1,325,000,000. This and the other figures that we cite are, of course, not exactly accurate, but as nearly so as is possible at this writing, for the popular character of the loan, so far as the bidding can determine that, is shown by the fact that about $90,000,000 of the bonds will go to persons who subscribed for $500 or less. As the allotments will be made to the lowest bidders, all who have bid for $500 or less will get their bonds, and outside of that, to no one will more than $10,000 of bonds be issued. As a matter of course, however, these bonds will eventually make their way into the hands of large holders, who are already offering a premium for them. The faith of the large financiers in the government was shown by the fact that there were two bids each for the whole $200,000,000, and one for $100,000,000 at a slight premium. Thus the people of the United States, who govern its policy, and the financiers, who have the interests of their clients to consider, have expressed their abiding faith not only in the ability of this government to pay every obligation it enters into, but in the substantial nature of its future financial policy.

CONGRESS is not very generous in dealing out honors and rewards for meritorious services in the field. Whatever it does by way of recognition of the heroes of the war in the army and navy is either insufficient, or, so far as the navy is concerned, is at the expense of other officers of the service. The country pays nothing for these rewards. For instance, in the navy an officer who has performed a heroic deed, like that performed by HOBSON, is promoted by being advanced certain numbers—that is, he is jumped over the heads of a number of other officers and placed in front of them, thus retarding their natural promotion, and preventing, perhaps, some of them from reaching the grade of rear-admiral. It is a gain for him, of course, but it is a grave injustice to the officers whom he skips, many, if not all, of whom would have been glad of the opportunity to render the service which he rendered. Neither they nor any one else would complain of the honor done to HOBSON or his advancement, but why is it necessary that the country should make these officers pay the debt of honor which it owes? The only just method of advancing an officer like HOBSON is to promote him to the grade above, either in the staff or line, as he may prefer, and to increase that grade and every grade above it by one number, so that while he is honored no one suffers injustice. Probably this would be the course pursued if it were not for the fact that the politicians in Congress are afraid that the country is so mean that it would resent the addition of another salary to the navy list. That is all that there is to be said in favor of the present system that we know of. In the army no permanent promotion is possible under the present system of Congressional command. If a regular-army officer performs a gallant service, he may, indeed, be given brevet rank in the regular army, but that carries no additional pay, and is a very cheap kind of honor. He may also be advanced in the volunteer service; but that is only a temporary reward, for when the volunteer army goes out of service the regular officer must return to his old rank in the regular service. The fact is that while so far in this war the politicians in Congress have honored DEWEY properly, they have refused to do anything else of real value for either service, contenting themselves at the last with helping some newspapers breed trouble between Commodore SCHLEY and Admiral SAMPSON; and if the politicians are closely watched, this record which they have made with respect to the two services will continue to furnish an excellent criterion by which to judge of their patriotism.

THE special session of the Legislature of New York was needed to give legal authorization to acts of the government of the State made necessary by the war, and to provide for contingencies not foreseen at the time of the adjournment. All that could have been done in a few days, and without opposition. It is to be supposed that the Democrats in the State Legislature have laid to heart a lesson which is very familiar to reading men, but had to be learned anew by the Democrats in the present Congress. That is, the lesson that factious opposition to the conduct of a war is the surest means of political suicide. The opposition of the Democrats in Congress has been very factious. It is true that they had so much excuse for it as could be furnished by the evidence of a determination on the part of the majority to "make political capital" out of the war. To the Democratic Senators and Representatives who had for years been picking the quarrel with Spain, and offering resolutions recognizing the Cuban Republic, while steadfastly opposing any preparation for the war which such recognition would inevitably have brought, it was no doubt a grievance that the Republicans should take possession of their own particular quarrel. Nevertheless, they should have borne themselves warily even under this affliction. Particularly they should have abstained from endeavoring to cripple the army by refusing those means of increasing it which all the experts agreed upon as the best possible means. Unfortunately they took counsel not of their reasons, but of their passions, and of Mr. BAILEY of Texas. By so doing they have put themselves in the same category with the members of the Hartford Convention in 1814 and with the opponents of the annexation of Texas in 1845, and they can look forward through an interminable vista of opposition. It is not to be supposed that this awful example has been lost upon Democratic politicians operating in smaller spheres than that of the nation. The extra session would have been brief and harmonious if it had been restricted to its proper purpose.

It was the Governor who injected into it matters foreign to that purpose. The call for the extra session specified as its objects not only the appropriation of money for war expenses, and the making of provision for the votes of New York troops in the South, Cuba, the Philippines, and elsewhere—which is an object of more solicitude to the government than to the troops—but also the making of laws which should enable him, the Governor, to manage elections in the city of New York. He did not, naturally, put it quite so bluntly as this, but this is what it comes to. The pretext for this legislation is the recent reorganization by the Mayor of the Police Commission, which, very improperly, is charged with the conduct of elections in the city. It is not unlikely that that reorganization, including the appointment of a tainted chief of police, had reference to the conduct of elections, though its chief purpose is understood to have been the reopening to policemen and to Tammany politicians of sources of income which had been closed under the honest administration of the Police Board by Mr. THEODORE ROOSEVELT and his associates. In order to take the control of elections away from the local authorities, it was necessary for the Governor to recommend an evasion of the Constitution of the State. This he does not hesitate to do. There is one, and only one, redeeming circumstance in the situation, and that is the evidence it affords that the Governor and the boss, Senator PLATT, have "fallen out." The action of the Mayor in displacing the Republican member of the Police Board was at first very actively resented by the representatives of the boss. But although no official announcement to that effect has been made, it is supposed that one of the appointments to the vacancies thus made was dictated by Mr. PLATT, and that his pacification has been accomplished. The Governor's proposal to take personal charge of the elections in the city shows that he is not necessarily pacified when the boss is pacified. The whole public value of his performance lies in that demonstration, which is indeed of good augury for that majority of the people of New York which does not live by politics.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NO EUROPEAN INTERFERENCE.

THERE is some apprehension expressed in London lest the war between this country and Spain extend beyond the scope limited by the resolutions of Congress, until it shall interest and include other powers. These apprehensions are felt by our friends—by our only friends in Europe who control, or even influence, their government. On the other hand, there are on the Continent some who seem to be doing all in their power to compel an enlargement of the field of war by seeking their own aggrandizement through the defeat of Spain and the loss of her colonies. The Emperor of Germany is chief among these; indeed, his is the only government that is openly showing a disposition to interfere with this country in its conduct and conclusion of the war, although we have little doubt that he is generally sympathized with by the men of politics of the Continent, and that we are saved from greater annoyance and more imminent danger than we have yet encountered by reason of the friendship which Great Britain manifests towards us.

The pretence by which European interference in our affairs is to be excused is that as we have set up the MONROE doctrine against European interference on this hemisphere, Europe would be excusable for setting up a corresponding doctrine against us. Stated in general terms, we shall be obliged to admit the soundness of this proposition, and if we insist upon going beyond the expressed pledge which Congress voluntarily gave when we entered upon this war, and upon forcibly and unreasonably annexing the Philippine Islands, we shall be forced to abandon the MONROE doctrine. That doctrine is perhaps incompatible with the position, the duties, and the rights of an aggressive world-power. But this question is not yet raised. We have not yet come to it, and it is to be hoped that we shall never reach it. It is conceivable that, against our will, and for the perfection of the security against the future which we shall have the right to demand from Spain at the close of the war, we may be compelled to assume the government of the Philippines. We hope that this will not be a consequence of the war; but if it should, we cannot admit that we must therefore abandon our doctrine because we are driven into Asiatic or European territory by force of circumstances. In only one instance can we conceive that the MONROE doctrine must fall by reason of our annexation of Spanish territory. If we deliberately take that territory by conquest, and merely to increase our territory, we cannot consistently longer contend that Europe must refrain from taking American territory, or from making war upon an American people for the purpose of territorial aggrandizement, or to impose upon them a European government.

As matters stand, we are not engaged in a war of the character against which the MONROE doctrine is directed. We are not waging a war for the purpose of imposing our government upon a foreign people. The WEEKLY did not believe that the war should have been begun, but the country decided otherwise, and on grounds which make the war, in international law at all events, a just war. The last power to combat this proposition ought to be the very one that is showing itself most eager to interfere. If the Emperor WILLIAM will consult BISMARCK on this point, or if he will even reflect upon the revelations which the Chancellor has volunteered concerning his view of the ethical value of lying and forgery as an excuse for war, he will be forced to the conclusion that Germany will always find it difficult to declare any war entered into by another nation to be unjust. However that may be, and whatever may have been the motives of some of the politicians and newspapers that urged on the war, the people of this country, the people who are fighting and paying for the war, believe that it is a righteous contest, entered into for the cause of humanity, and while that motive governs and determines the moral character of conduct, this war will be judged a just one in the tribunal of nations. We are using the term "just war," be it understood, wholly in the technical sense of the authorities on international law, for we are inquiring merely into our international status in view of the war. We can, of course, change the character of the war by turning it into a war of conquest and aggrandizement; but we have not yet done that, and no nation has the right to assume that we shall do so. Talk of interference, then, on the ground that we are doing in the Pacific what we refuse to permit Europe to do in the Atlantic, is based upon a mistake as to the character of our war, or upon a misunderstanding of the MONROE doctrine, for that doctrine does not prohibit a European power from asserting its rights against an American people.

We have as yet given no cause for interference nor for threats of interference, and we cannot permit Europe, or any European power, to insist upon taking part in our future negotiations with Spain for peace. We are not kept out of European 'waters,' or European affairs, for that matter, by our assertion of the MONROE doctrine, nor are we to be treated as if we were a party to European complications because we are at war with a European power. We may hereafter involve ourselves in European complications if we deliberately thrust our own frontier among the frontiers of Europe in the East; but for the present we are dealing with Spain alone, and we shall insist upon settling with Spain, without the intrusion of Germany or of any other European power. When the time comes for making peace, the fate of Spain's colonies will be determined by agreement between Spain and the United States, and we shall not permit the fruits of victory to be parcelled out among non-participants in the combat as the fruits of Russia's victory over Turkey were divided by the Berlin Congress.

It has been intimated, even in this country, that the United States might well imitate the quiet and submissive example of Russia on that occasion. There seems to us to be every reason why we should do nothing of the kind. In the first place, it is not at all certain that Russia's quiescence and submissiveness were real, or that Lord BEACONSFIELD was as successful as he and his admirers supposed. Contemporaneous history teaches otherwise. In the second place, there is no analogy whatever between the relation of Russia to the rest of Europe in 1878 and the relation of the United States to continental Europe to-day. Russia had entered upon her war with Turkey for the purpose of enforcing reforms which the concert of Europe, including Russia, had vainly demanded of Turkey. Although Russia made war without consultation with her associate powers, she was, in fact, the champion of the Christian powers for the righting of the wrongs inflicted by the Sultan upon his Christian subjects. Therefore there was some reason for a consultation of the interested powers concerning the settlement of the sequences of the war. Even so, the congress was not held until Russia had formally accepted BISMARCK'S invitation, and had agreed to leave to the congress the task of revising the whole treaty of San Stefano. Moreover, the relations between the powers of Europe on the Eastern question were very close, and their common interest in it had been recognized in more than one treaty. In the case of ourselves and Spain there are no special relations or conditions, and no agreement that changes in any respect the rules of international law affecting the subject. The question is between the two powers engaged in war. When the time for peace comes the two contestants will have the right to settle their differences without interference from any other power, unless that interference shall be invited or assented to by both. If, for example, we shall insist that Spain surrender the Philippines, it would be as hostile on the part of the German Emperor if he were to take sides against our contention as it would be now if he were to undertake to prevent Admiral DEWEY and General MERRITT completing the conquest of Manila. We are sorry that we are at war; but, as we are, it is our war, and we shall insist on settling it in our own way. We cannot permit any European power to question our good faith, or to dictate what shall be our conduct towards our conquered enemy. As for that, there is nothing in our history that tends to show that we shall be anything but generous.

THE COMING QUEBEC CONFERENCE.

As the sundry civil bill, including the expense item, has become law, it is in order for the President to appoint commissioners to represent the United States at the coming conference for settling outstanding matters of dispute between this country and Canada. The time is propitious, as the evidence of mutual good feeling between both peoples and governments is unmistakable. The Canadians manifestly share Great Britain's sympathy with us, and show every indication of friendliness. If they are met in an equally friendly spirit the conference will have all those conditions precedent of success which spring from a conciliatory temper on both sides. By the necessities of diplomacy we cannot treat directly with Canada, which has not the status of an independent power; but England has, by the high character of the commissioners appointed, shown the imperial estimate of pending questions, as well as Canada's right to an important share in their determination. Lord HERSCHELL, who was Lord High Chancellor in Mr. GLADSTONE'S last two administrations, is the British member of the commission, while the Dominion is represented by Sir WILFRID LAURIER, Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT, Sir LOUIS DAVIES, and Mr. JOHN CHARLTON.

It is fortunate that the questions in dispute are to be considered at one time and in subordination to a general plan, for each of them has long been a local and separate irritant, and has been taken up apart from its relation to the general convenience of both countries. Reciprocal trade relations have been brought before Congress seven or eight times by Canadian commissioners, but under variable and conflicting circumstances; political moods and party necessities on both sides have prevented an equitable treatment of the question. The Atlantic fisheries, the Alaskan boundary, the alien labor laws, the mining regulations, and the bonding privilege have each been discussed, but have never got to the stage which left no final arrangement to be desired. All these can now be considered in their proper order and relation. It is realized by the Canadians that access to our market is indispensable to their highest commercial welfare, but it is less likely that our own people perceive the value of freer trade with the five and a half millions of our northern neighbors, and of its relative superiority and capacity for growth as compared with Central and South America. There is no comparison between the purchasing ability of the Latin Americans and the Canadians.

It is not improbable that international co-operation in the future development of the great waterways may also be considered at the conference. Not only does the reciprocal use of existing canals need readjustment, but it is clearly perceived by experts on both sides that each country can do material service for the other in the enlargement of waterways in the near future. Reports of the joint commission on this subject are emphatic and instructive. It is also gratifying that the spirit of mutual concession should have been brought to bear at a time when the need of increased markets for our exports is more urgent than ever before. The protest of the Merchants' Association of this city against the Senate committee's action in striking out the appropriation for the Quebec Conference Commission was a suggestive proof of the value our business men place upon expansion of our trade with Canada. Now is the time for better commercial relations and a general settlement of difficulties, and if the Canadians are prepared to give a fair equivalent for what they expect to get, the approaching negotiations have an excellent chance of success.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

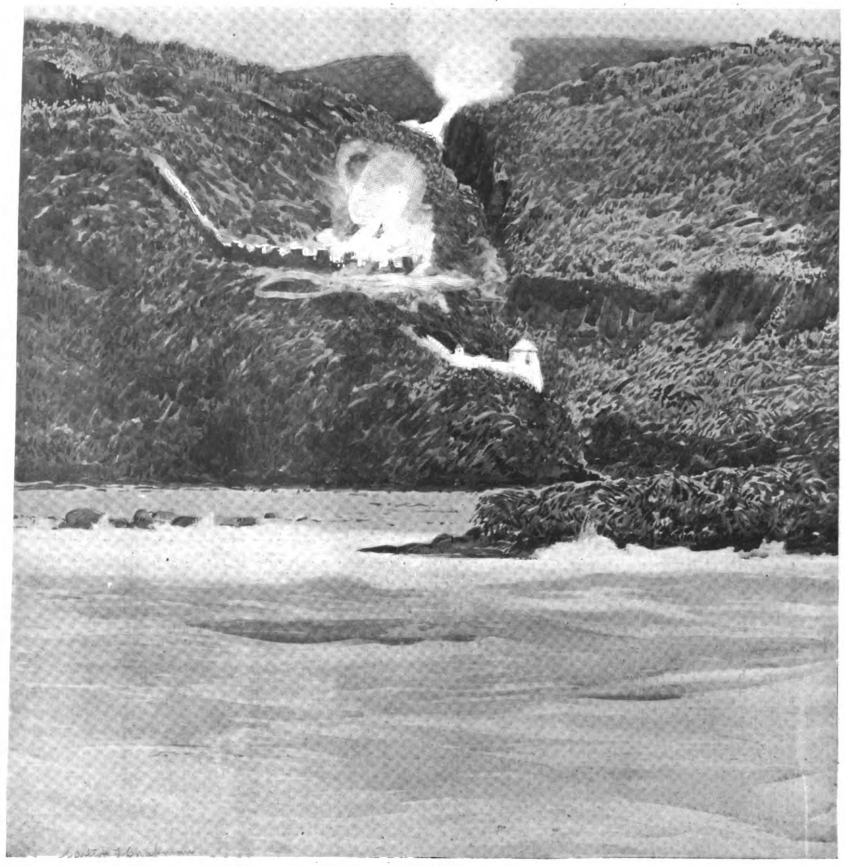
Saturday, July 9.—Major-General Miles sailed for Santiago on the Yale. With him is the Sixth Massachusetts. The Columbia accompanies the Yale, and carries the first battalion of the Sixth Illinois. The expedition numbers in all 1720 men.

Six of the war-ships of Admiral Camara's squadron have returned to Port Said on their way back to Spain.

A complete report sent by General Shafter shows our losses on July 1 and 2 to have been 1593 killed, wounded, and missing.

"There have been no propositions advanced by the Spaniards regarding Santiago that we can accept," Secretary Alger said to-night. It is understood that the Spanish commander, General Toral, after consulting with his superiors at Madrid and Havana, has suggested terms (offering to evacuate Santiago if General Shafter will permit him to depart unmolested with all his troops, arms, banners, etc.), whereas President McKinley requires unconditional surrender. General Toral made his offer to-day in a note to General Shafter, and, a despatch adds, "recommended that the terms be accepted, as no others would be satisfactory." He considerately added that any attempt to conquer the city must cost the Americans enormously in the matter of lives, for he had been re-enforced, and now had plenty of ammunition. Resistance, he said, would be long as well as strong, because, as he slyly intimated, by sending out all the poor of Santiago to be fed by the Americans, he had enabled himself to provision his garrison for an indefinite time. The truce has been extended until noon to-morrow. Six batteries of Randolph's light artillery, now arriving, will occupy positions overlooking the Spanish lines and the city before the end of next week. The distribution of troops composing our line may be roughly indicated as follows: On the right, Lawton's division (Ludlow's, Chaffee's, and Myers's brigades) and Wheeler's cavalry division (First and Tenth and Rough Riders); centre, Bates's brigade; left, Kent's brigade. It is reported that the Spaniards are digging trenches in the streets of Santiago, and otherwise preparing for a house-to-house fight.

Sunday, July 10.—At 11.30 o'clock this morning General Shafter notified the Spanish commander that by President McKinley's direction the Spanish proposition to surrender with the conditions mentioned under date of July 9 was rejected, and that the United States would accept no terms but unconditional surrender. General Toral replied in effect that he would discuss no other terms than those suggested by himself. In view of this correspondence the truce was extended until four o'clock, in fact the attack, which was intrusted chiefly to the artillery, did not begin until after five o'clock, when the Brooklyn, Texas, and Indiana, lying off Aguadores, threw shells over the cliffs in an effort to reach the city, about five miles distant and hidden from



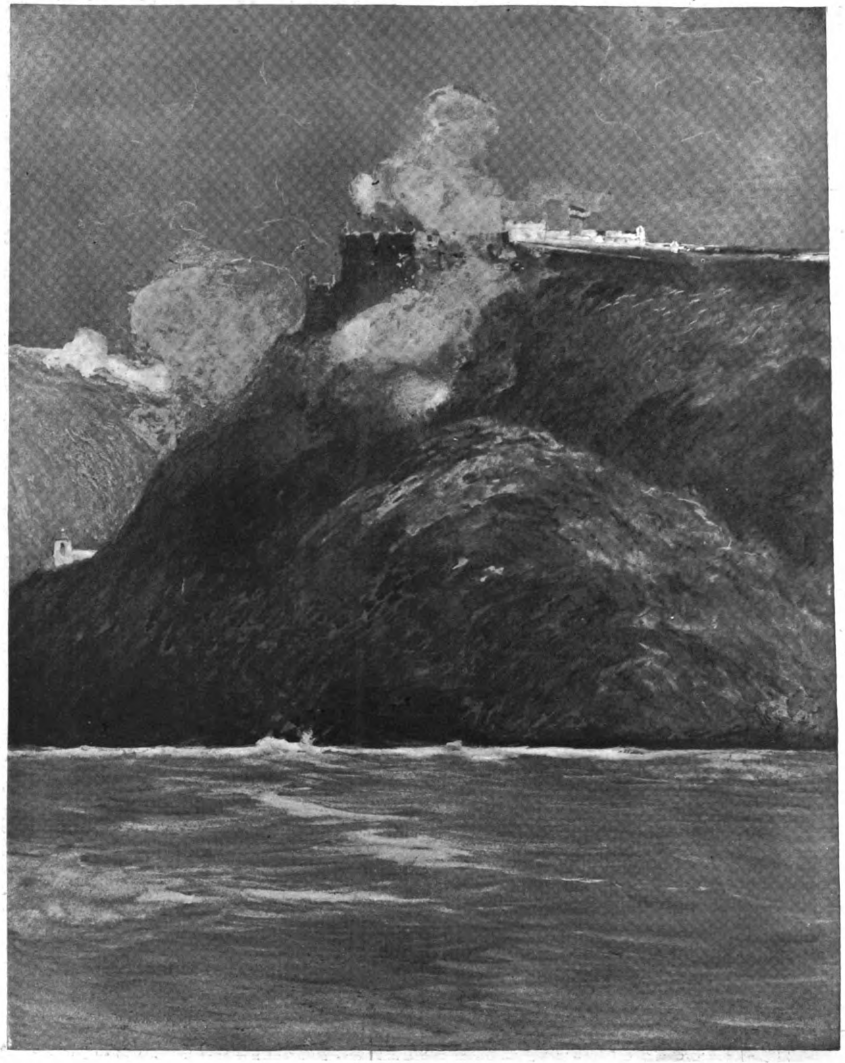
(Continued on page 711.)

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Shell from the "New York."

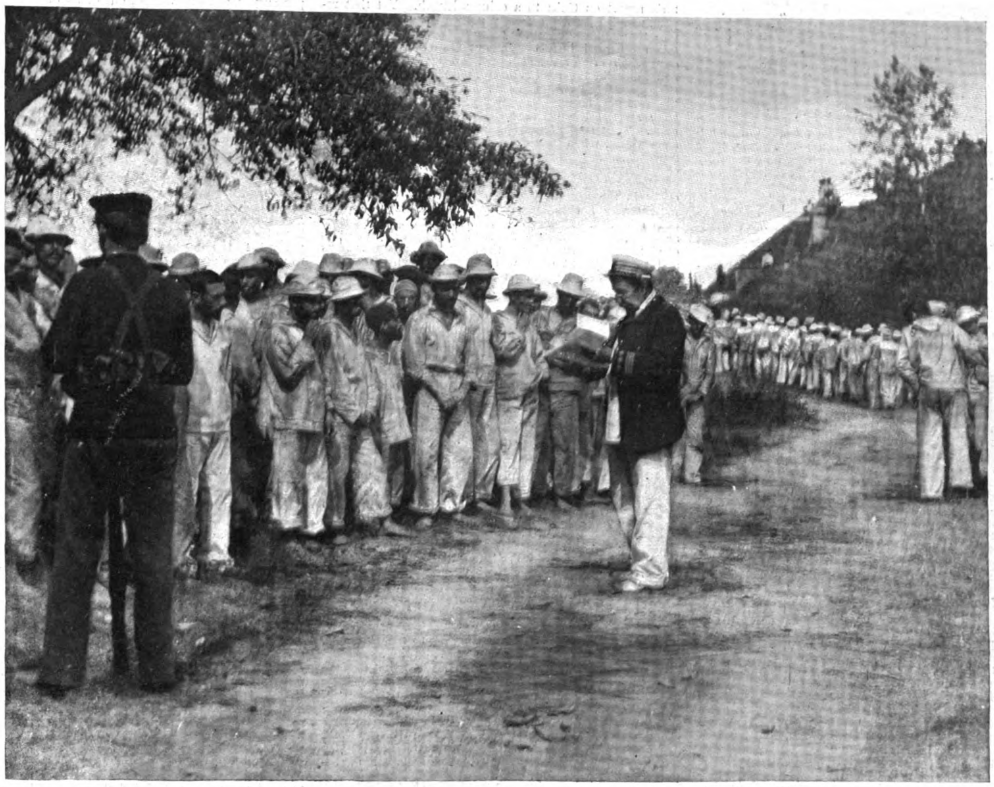


Fort. Mouth of River.

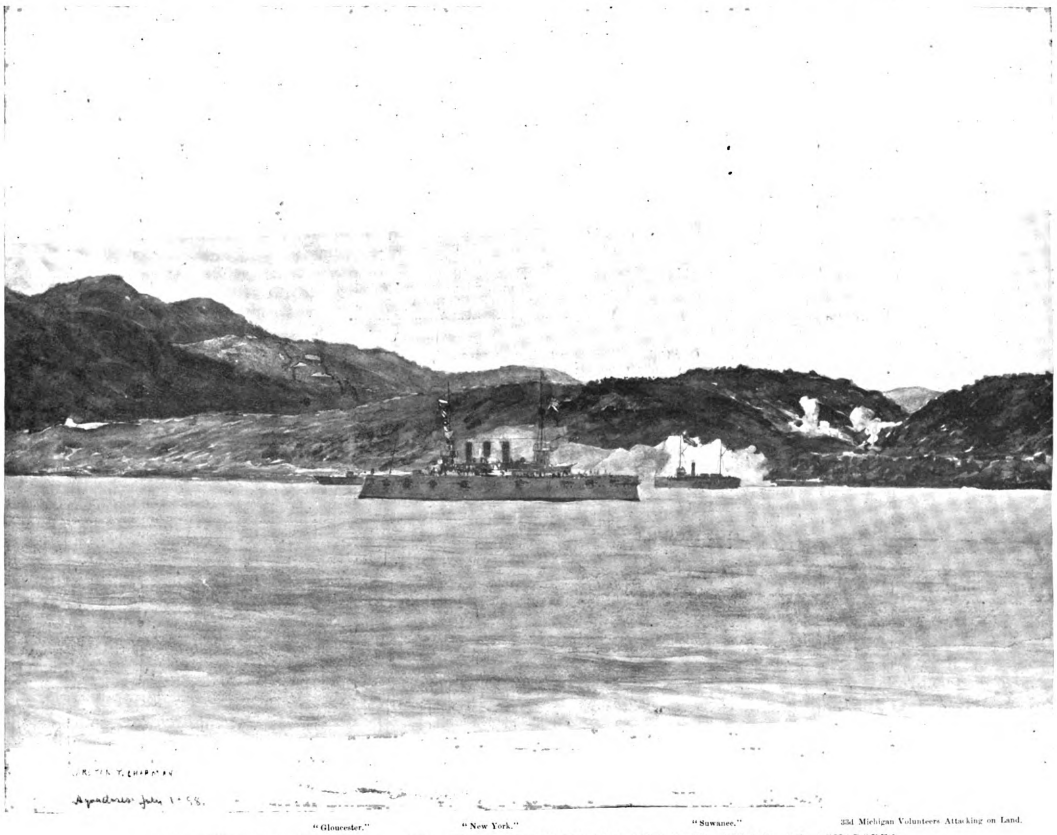
MOVING ON SANTIAGO—DESTRUCTION OF THE FORT AT AGUADORES, JULY 1.

The "Suwanee's" three splendid Shots: the first tilted the Flag-staff; the second tore the Flag in two; the third carried it away.

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.



NAVAL BOMBARDMENT OF SANTIAGO'S HARBOR DEFENCES, JULY 2.



Effect of Fire from the Fleet on Fort Morro, 6.30 A.M.

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.

Original from PENN STATE

SPANISH PRISONERS FROM ADMIRAL CERVERA'S FLEET AT SEAVEY'S ISLAND, PORTSMOUTH, NEW HAMPSHIRE.
Captain Emilio Diaz Mareau, of the "Cristobal Colon," checking off the Names of the Men of the "Vizcaya" and "Colon."

"Gloucester." "New York." "Suwanee." 33d Michigan Volunteers Attacking on Land.

THE OPERATIONS AGAINST SANTIAGO, JULY 1—COMBINED SEA AND LAND ATTACK AT AGUADORES.
Drawn by Carlton T. Chapman, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly," with Admiral Sampson's Fleet.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

WRITING in Literature of Mr. Godkin's Unforeseen Tendencies of Democracy, Mr. Henry James speaks of its author as having conducted, these thirty-five years, "the journal which, in all the American press, may certainly be said to have been—and independently of its other attributes—the most systematically and acutely observant." That means, of course, the Nation, which was started in 1864, and it certainly has been "systematically and acutely observant," however opinions may differ as to its ability to see the whole of anything, or even to see things straight. As a social and political critic, Mr. Godkin fills a conspicuous place in this country, and if he lacks anything in perspicacity or sympathy or candor, he makes it up in vigilance, and in the possession of an equipment which makes his strictures interesting even to those who most resent them, and which affords him the means for frequent and often edifying comparisons.

How far the Nation has been merged in the Evening Post, and whether it still maintains the importance that it possessed when it was the only vehicle of Mr. Godkin's deliverances, is best known to its owners. In view of its success, and of the apparent success and importance of the British weeklies that resemble it, it seems odd that it has not had more rivals in this country. Most of our more important unillustrated weeklies of general circulation began as religious papers and developed a secular side. That was the case with the Outlook and the Independent. Our literary weeklies and fortnightlies for the most part stick close to literature. One of the brightest of them, the Chap-Book, has enlarged its field, flirts a little with illustration, and seems ready to take notice of almost anything that is noticeable. But the Nation continues to be the nearest thing we have to the secular British weekly, devoted to politics, literature, art, and social questions, and with something on its mind that needs expression.

Most of us believe we have a pretty good idea of what happened in the principal fights, both on land and on sea, near Santiago, but a multitude of rumors about various little supplementary differences have been hard either to verify or to trace to any conclusion. We have been invited, first and last, to take sides in a great many highly interesting personal disputes. We have been assured that General Merritt and Secretary Alger could not agree, that the Secretary and General Miles did not work well together, that General Miles and General Shafter were mutually jealous, and that General Shafter and Admiral Sampson found co-operation very difficult. What bases of truth there may have been to any or all of these stories, and others like them, we don't know, and are not eager to learn. The war has gone on somehow, and that is what we want. We can wait till it is over before we really settle down to gossip.

When that good time comes we can afford to consider that story about the disparity of opinion between Mr. R. H. Davis and General Shafter about the conduct of affairs at Santiago. Then too we may tackle another and more serious matter, which is not so easily deferred. We have been assured that there was a disparity of sentiment between Admiral Sampson and Commodore Schley as to which of them beat Cervera's fleet. About the facts of the fight there has been no question, and it would seem to ordinary thinkers that, the facts being universally known, the equities as to glory and promotion might be left to be determined by the proper authorities. But we have been assured that Sampson suppressed Schley's message to Washington, and that the relations between Sampson and Schley were painfully strained. Also that Sampson and Schley understood each other and the situation, and were getting on well. This last report is the one we hope to see verified.

At home too, and outside of the army and navy, some nice squabbles have matured, especially, as usual, among the newspapers. The Sun says that the news of most of its rivals is inadequately based on occurrences, and in particular the Evening Sun has proclaimed that an interview with Admiral Cervera published in the New York Herald of July 11 was a lie. The Herald's story of what Admiral Sampson said to Commodore Schley also failed to win the confidence of its neighbors, while the Herald's story that Admiral Erben was relieved from command of the coast defences because he was slow in obeying the orders of the Navy Department is scornfully denied, and apparently on the best of grounds, by the Washington correspondent of the Evening Post.

The newspapers are very interesting these days, and we read them voraciously, and compare their conflicting statements with unusual attention. Since the war broke out, the rival purveyors of news in New York, where newspaper rivalry is so very keen, have been on trial under conditions unusually favorable to the recognition of good work. The information that has been wanted has been of the sort that the cleverest and most ambitious correspondents could feel professional pride in furnishing. To get it and forward it has been man's work. Blatherskite sensations haven't counted for much, and trustworthy news well presented has counted for a great deal. There are some evidences of a disposition to return to some old-time habits and methods of presenting the news. There are prosperous and successful papers in New York, quite abreast of their fellows in enterprise, which meddle very little with pictures, use moderation in their choice of types, eschew the "crazy-quilt" arrangement of the wares they offer, and seem to rely for patronage on their ability to get the news promptly and print it in convenient and readable form. Willingness and ability to spend money is not quite all there is to newspaper-making. There is something in character and the ability to command the services of honorable and trustworthy men; something too in knowing what is important and what is not, what is true and what is false, what is worth space and what may be condensed without loss. Last spring a New York newspaper of great enterprise and a high reputation for news-getting, famous for its lavish expenditures for news, cut down Senator Proctor's report on Cuba to a column-length. Yet that report, which cost it practically nothing, was news of superlative importance, worth twice the space it would have taken to print it in full. The same newspaper, the other day, when the President appointed some two hundred lieutenants in the regular army, published the names of the appointees by States as far as Massachusetts, and left the rest out, because, apparently, to print more would have marred the prettiness of the arrangement of its page. That sort of newspapering does better in ordinary times, when folks want to be entertained, than now when they want to be informed. Meanwhile every sign that the newspaper business is winning out of the hysterical stage which has affected it so seriously in the present decade is welcome. Good newspapers may not make a country great, but they will help mightily. Newspapers that are intelligent, decent, accurate, responsible, and interesting are great promoters of civilization. In so far as the competition for war news and the treatment of it when obtained brings out the strong points of the really strong newspapers it is a good thing, and a benefit to a very important business.

The Board of Aldermen of Cambridge seems favorably disposed towards a curfew ordinance providing that children under sixteen years old shall not be in the streets after half past nine in the evening unless accompanied by a parent or guardian, or furnished with a note written the same day authorizing them to be away from home. This ordinance, which has progressed so far as enrolment, has a majority of five to three behind it, and its effects are likely to be tried. Its enforcement will call for much discretion on the part of the police, and the experience that Cambridge has with it will doubtless influence the action of other New England cities. The objection is made that Cambridge is too much of a city for the ordinance to be enforced without hardship, but Cambridge is not too much of a city to tolerate a no-license law, and where a no-license law gives public satisfaction a curfew ordinance may work well too.

The Boston Transcript has been publishing long lists of liberal subscriptions to the Massachusetts Volunteer Aid Association, which seems to be very active and efficient both in sending relief and supplies to soldiers in the field and in looking after soldiers' families that are in need. On a single day (July 12) the Transcript acknowledged subscriptions for this work amounting to nearly $9000, the largest single item being $2741 63 from the Massachusetts Association Opposed to Further Extension of Suffrage to Women. Evidently the organized "antis" have a mind to show that they are not lacking in patriotism, whatever views they hold about the expediency of allowing women to vote. The Volunteer Aid Association has rooms on Mount Vernon Street, in Boston, which form a distributing centre for supplies received from tributary societies in all parts of the State. The association is fitting out a hospital-ship.

Although the Chicago papers reported that President Andrews of Brown University had refused to be any longer a candidate for the superintendency of the Chicago public schools, he has been elected. Politics seemed to have abounded overmuch in that contest. An important ground of opposition to Mr. Lane, the late superintendent, is that he introduced Republican politics into the schools, and that an influential recommendation of President Andrews was that he believed in the Chicago platform. School superintendents ought not to be chosen on account of their political leanings, and it is to Dr. Andrews's credit that a political contest for pedagogical office was distasteful to him.

A contemporary paragrapher makes the "serious complaint" that there are very few places in New York "where you can take a lady for supper at midnight without rubbing elbows with boisterous women who are not recognized in good society." That seems an amusing charge, easily met by the suggestion that the need for taking a lady out to supper at midnight must occur so rarely that the maintenance of even a few respectable late-hour restaurants should be sufficient to meet it. New York has been declared to be the easiest place in the world to get food in at night, being in that particular in strong contrast to London. A man who expects to find not only an elaborate supper for a lady after midnight, but improving society as well, seems extortionate in his expectations.

Our Cuban allies seem to be many men of many minds and various conduct; at least the reports we have of them give that impression. There is great variety about the reports. One day we hear that the Cubans fight nobly; again that they are not of much use; again that being invited to help in road-making, they refused, declaring that they were soldiers, not laborers. We have heard that they massacred Spanish prisoners, and again that that report was a lie. It is not only hard to determine what the Cubans that our troops have seen amount to, but it is hard to say also how far they are representative of what is left of the Cuban people. They seem chiefly to be skirmishers, under slight discipline, fighting every man on his own hook, interested in the American invaders, and careful to gather up clothing and other superfluities that the invaders throw away. We are told that they are starved, and again that they are well fed. Both reports are probably true, but true of different lots of Cubans. Obviously it is too soon yet to form any opinion about them.

The investigations of the loss of La Bourgogne will be followed with great interest. The impression that there was mismanagement and failure to do what was reasonably to be expected follows naturally on the stories of the survivors and consideration of the dreadful loss of life. Still, the stories of the survivors are conflicting. Murderous brutality on the part of individuals is attested beyond the reach of question, but about the conduct of the officers and crew the information informally gathered was inconclusive. The fact that all the officers of the ship were drowned except the assistant purser weighs in favor of belief in their personal gallantry at least. There are likely to be at least two investigations—the one at Halifax which began last week, and another by French authorities. Fifty per cent. of the crew were saved, ten per cent. of the passengers, and one woman out of two hundred. Those are stubborn figures, and it will be interesting to see what the investigators will make of them.

The conviction that the war on the seas is over, and that the end of war ashore is only a matter of time, seems to have released a great number of our fellow-citizens who have wanted to go to Europe, but have wished first to assure themselves as to what was going to happen. Now that most of what was due has happened, the east-bound liners are running full again, and folks who are used to spending their summers abroad have resumed their usual habits.

It will be interesting to see whether among the ultimate results of the war we shall see an increase of travel across the Pacific. Will the Hawaiian Islands attract more visitors now that they are under our flag than they have been used to? And all those other groups and archipelagoes! It happened once to this present paragrapher to navigate a good many thousand miles of the Pacific in a sailing-ship with an enlightened skipper, who abounded in narrative of maritime experience and adventure. One experience he liked to recall was of the time when he put into Guam. It was an emergency visit of some sort. He put in there for repairs or shelter or supplies, but the impression it left on his mind was one of complete tranquillity. When conditions were adverse, as when our ship battled with sou'westers for a continuous fortnight off Cape Horn, he would sigh at the profusion of discomfort and contrast it with Guam. And when things went well, and the trades carried us along up the coast for days together without pulling a rope or changing a sail, he would be reminded of Guam and the serenity of existence there. He insisted that when he retired from active life he would retire to Guam. If his feelings about it were justified, it must be an ideal place for folks to go to who have nervous prostration, or are dismantled for some reason or other, and wish to stop living for a time and let the world jog on without them. If it is to be ours, no doubt in time we shall become better acquainted with its qualities, and possibly we shall hear more of its attractions as a refuge for overwrought Americans who are not quite dead. When the Nicaragua Canal is built, and society in the Pacific looks up a little, that big ocean ought to make a charming play-ground for yachtsmen.

The Nestor of the hour is Senator Hoar of Massachusetts. When he speaks we all listen, and though he is by no means garrulous, when the occasion calls his words are ready. More than once this year his deliverances have brought solace to the faint-hearted, and renewed the confidence of the doubtful that the republic was not going on the rocks. When, in the Senate, he reviewed the situation with Spain, and declined to assent to the view that peace must be maintained at any cost, it comforted the consciences of a great many persons, who were glad to believe that a course which Senator Hoar was not ready to condemn could not be indefensible. When, the other day, he assented to the annexation of Hawaii, and expressed confidence that the consequences of it would not be so far-reaching and mischievous as the opponents of annexation had declared, that too was a great comfort, and moderated the anxieties of the disconcerted. On July 13, at Worcester, at the opening of the summer school of Clark University, he made another speech, which had also some reassuring passages. He spoke of his confidence that the country is growing better; he spoke of the present war as a war of duty, not of glory; he spoke of its effects in reuniting the North and the South, and in bringing America and Britain into closer relations. Then he turned his attention to Professor Norton's allegations that the American people are good-natured optimistic triflers, who have no fine sense of honor, and can't distinguish what is honest from what is not. He said:

> The trouble with Professor Norton, who thinks his countrymen are lacking in a sense of honor, is that there are two things he cannot in the least comprehend—he cannot comprehend his countrymen and he cannot comprehend honor. In a true philosophy the sense of honor and the sense of duty are one. Wordsworth says that "honor is but the finest sense of justice." There never was a people on earth who, in regard to the great subject of public conduct, were actuated by a finer, by a profounder, sense of duty and a clearer sense of justice than the people of the United States in this generation and at this hour.
>
> If we continue to act on the notion which inspired this war in the beginning, we shall hold a place in the solid respect of mankind such as no nation ever held before. We have but one task remaining to us, we have to do once more what Israel Putnam did in the old time—pull the wolf out of his den.

These are bold words, and comfortable. It is somewhat amazing that any one who knows Professor Norton should suggest that he cannot comprehend honor, but that he does not comprehend the American people is by no means incredible. Senator Hoar ought to know the American people and understand them. He has had every opportunity; he has known them at home, and he has met their representatives in Congress for a whole generation. If a man who enjoys his comprehensive and more or less intimate acquaintance with the United States Senate still feels that we Americans are good people, devoted to duty, and growing better, surely we ought to take such comfort as we need about ourselves, and continue to hold our heads up among the nations of the earth.

Which way is Manila—east or west? It's a toss up; but, at any rate, it was there that the largest pan of glory seems to have been set, and Dewey skimmed it. Cervera's fleet has come and gone, and great is the renown of its departure; but, after all, as the unrestricted say, "there is no discount on Dewey." What happened off Santiago was what was expected to happen—expected because of what happened at Manila. What happened at Manila was the bolt out of the blue that makes a real sensation.

So far as we can judge, we have in our navy at least a dozen captains who ought to be admirals. Those that become admirals will deserve it, as will also a good many of those who don't. Where every commander who has a chance plays it for an admiralship we are bound to conclude that there are many others who lacked only the opportunity to do the same. We must regard our navy, therefore, as an assortment of rudimentary admirals, who failed of due development only because there was not enough of the Spanish navy to go around.

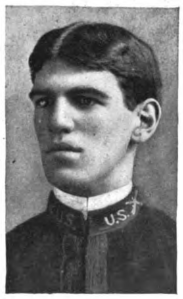
E. S. MARTIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CAPT. JOHN DRUM,
10th U. S. Infantry.

CAPT. JAMES FORNANCE,
13th U. S. Infantry.

CAPT. MAXIMILIAN LUNA,
1st Volunteer Cavalry.



1ST LIEUT. W. M. DICKINSON,
17th U. S. Infantry.

2D LIEUT. THOS. A. WANSBORO,
2d U. S. Infantry.

2D LIEUT. WILLIAM A. SATER,
13th U. S. Infantry.

2D LIEUT. CLARK CHURCHMAN,
13th U. S. Infantry.
Photograph by Pach.

2D LIEUT. E. N. BENCHLEY,
6th U. S. Infantry.
Photograph by Pach.

SERGT. HENRY ANDERSON,
2d U. S. Cavalry.
Photograph by Pennell.

SERGT. FRANK W. SCOFIELD,
71st N. Y. Volunteers.

OFFICERS AND NON-COMMISSIONED OFFICERS KILLED IN THE OPERATIONS AGAINST SANTIAGO.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

(Continued from page 707.)

view. Signals from shore announced that the shells fell short of the Spanish position. From Shafter's lines the Spanish defences outside the city wall were fired upon by our field-guns, mortars, Gatling guns, and the dynamite gun of the Rough Riders. The enemy's reply proved to be less vigorous than was anticipated. The official report states that on our side Captain Charles W. Rowell and one private were killed and four wounded.

Monday, July 11.—The First Illinois (1350 men), Eighth Ohio (1350 men), District of Columbia Infantry (915 men), and recruits numbering about 930 for regular regiments in the field are the most recent arrivals.

General Shafter's available force to-day, after counting all re-enforcements, and deducting the dead, sick, and wounded, is about 22,500 fighting-men. This is based on an estimate of 15,337 men in General Shafter's original expedition, and a little more than 10,000 in various expeditions which have gone since then, making in all 25,500 men. From this, however, must be deducted those who have fallen in the fighting thus far, and also the men confined to the hospital by sickness. The deduction is roughly estimated at 3000, leaving in round numbers 22,500 men as the fighting force of the American army before Santiago.

At six o'clock this morning the gunners in the American lines were ordered to open fire upon the Spanish defences and the city. The firing was deliberate and accurate, and the damage to property in the town is supposed to have been very great. The fleet, co-operating with the land forces, found the range by two trial shots from the New York, and then threw 106 shells, of which number 101 were effective. The distance was 8500 yards.

The town of Caimanes, northwest of the city, was occupied by our troops under General Ludlow and a force of Cubans.

Tuesday, July 12.—A despatch from headquarters to the Adjutant-General at Washington relates to the extension of our lines northwest of Santiago mentioned in the last paragraph, and contains other matter of especial interest. General Shafter says that a flag of truce has been up since two o'clock yesterday, and adds that Toral is "considering proposition for surrendering, now that I have town surrounded on the north. Lines were completed at 5 P.M. by General Ludlow right down to the bay. The line is rather thin, but will have it strengthened in the morning by General Henry, who has just arrived at headquarters. Only three or four casualties; no one killed, so far as we can learn. Expect to have two new batteries in position to-morrow. Great deal of suffering among the people who have gone out of Santiago. Am doing my best to relieve it, but not entirely successful."

Secretary Alger received a report from General Miles, stating that the latter arrived at Siboney yesterday, and had had "consultation with Admiral Sampson and with General Shafter by telephone." General Miles adds: "Troops brought from Tampa, Charleston, and New York arrived, and leaving for the front. Line of investment being extended."

A despatch filed at eight o'clock this evening says that Toral has again refused General Shafter's proposal for an unconditional surrender, "expressing himself as ready to meet an attack at any time the invading army saw fit to make one."

Wednesday, July 13.—The War Department has made public a despatch from General Shafter, in which he says, among other things: "Have had an interview of an hour and a half with General Toral, and have extended truce until noon to-morrow.... Hope for his surrender. If he refuses, I will open on him at twelve, noon, to-morrow with every gun I have...." General Miles's report to Secretary Alger reads: "At a meeting between the lines, at which Generals Shafter and Wheeler and Spanish General Toral were present, the latter claimed that he is unable to act without authority of his government, but has received authority to withdraw and surrender harbor ports, munitions of war, and eastern portion of Cuba. He urgently requests until to-morrow noon to receive an answer from his government regarding offer of our government to send his forces to Spain, which was granted." Permission to withdraw is refused by the War Department.

Word was received at the War Department that fourteen cases of yellow fever had been reported at Siboney before the destruction of the town by fire yesterday at the request of the Hospital Corps and by order of General Miles.

A third army near Santiago is perhaps more formidable than either Shafter's or Toral's—it comprises the eighteen thousand miserable refugees from the city.

An Associated Press despatch from Hong-kong, July 13 (Manila, July 9), contains the report that the German gunboat Irene, in Subig Bay, refused to permit Philippine insurgents to attack Spaniards on Isla Grande. The cruisers Raleigh and Concord having been sent to that point by Dewey, the former opened fire upon the forts—the Irene withdrawing. The Spaniards surrendered. On returning to Manila, the commander of the Irene explained that he had interfered "in the cause of humanity," and offered to hand over certain refugees to Dewey. The offer was declined. Additional particulars are contained in a despatch from Admiral Dewey to the Navy Department, received to-day: "Aguinaldo informs me his troops have taken all of Subig Bay except Isla Grande, which he was prevented from taking by German man-of-war Irene. On July 7, the Raleigh and Concord went there. They took the island and about 1300 men, with arms and ammunition. No resistance. The Irene retired from the bay on their arrival."

Thursday, July 14.—Toral has surrendered. All that we know positively as yet, in regard to the important fact and its intensely interesting circumstances, the following despatches contain:

PLAYA, July 14.

To Adjutant-General at Washington:

Have just returned from interview with General Toral. He agrees to surrender upon the basis of being returned to Spain. This proposition embraces all of eastern Cuba from Aserradero on the south to Sagua on the north, viâ Palma, with practically the Fourth Army Corps. Commissioners meet this afternoon at 2.30 to definitely arrange the terms. W. R. SHAFTER, Major-General.

PLAYA, July 14.

To Secretary of War at Washington:

BEFORE SANTIAGO, July 14.—General Toral formally surrendered the troops of his army, troops and division of Santiago, on the terms and understanding that his troops would be returned to Spain.

General Shafter will appoint commissioners to draw up the conditions of arrangements for carrying out the terms of surrender. This is very gratifying, as General Shafter and the officers and men of this command are entitled to great credit for their sincerity and fortitude in overcoming almost insuperable obstacles which they encountered.

A portion of the army has been infected with yellow fever, and efforts will be made to separate those who are infected and those free from it, and to keep those who are still on board ship separated from those on shore.

Arrangements will be immediately made for carrying out further instructions of the President and yourself.

NELSON A. MILES, Major-General of the Army.

Friday, July 15 — Spanish 4-per-cent. bonds advanced one point in the dealings in the London market, selling at 38⅝. This is taken as indicating a belief on the part of London and Paris traders that peace is in sight, and, it may be added, peace on terms not absolutely ruinous to Spain. On May 9 the price for the bonds registered in London was 29½. That was the lowest point. The ruling price at the date of the destruction of the Maine was 61.

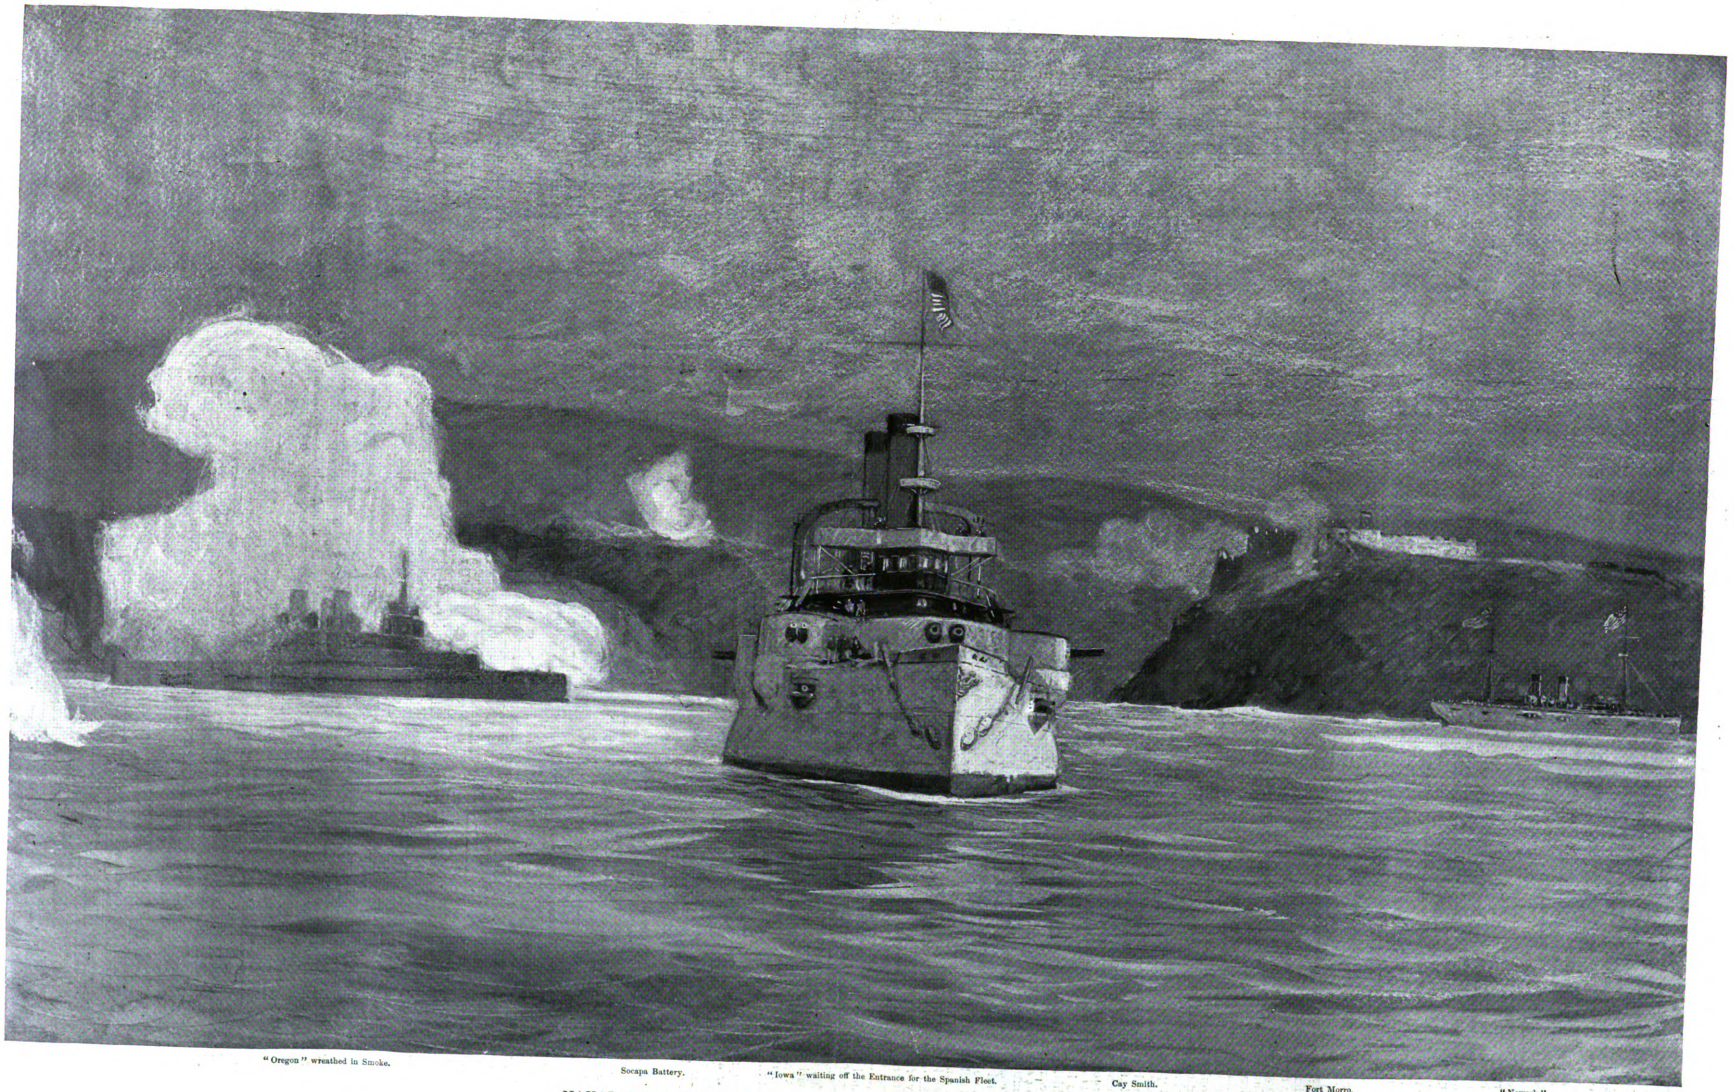
Details that seem meagre, in view of the importance of every phase of the situation at Santiago, are gathered from despatches just arriving. The truce, which was to end at noon yesterday, was prolonged at General Toral's request, communicated at half past nine o'clock, the Spanish commander suggesting the appointment of a joint commission to arrange terms. General Miles and General Shafter appointed an interview. Just before noon they rode out between the lines and met General Toral, who in the mean time had received Captain-General Blanco's authorization to capitulate. General Toral named, as commissioners to represent Spain, Robert Mason the British vice-consul, General Escarajao, and his own chief of staff. General Miles and General Shafter appointed, as our representatives, General Wheeler, General Lawton, and Captain Miley of General Shafter's staff. The terms of surrender, it is said, give us the city of Santiago, and that portion of the province of the same name east of a line drawn from Aserradero northward to Palma, and thence northeast to Sagua de Tánamo and the mouth of the Sagua River. "The Spanish captives are to be sent to Spain by the United States government. Only the Red Cross representatives are to enter the city at once; our troops not to go in until the Spanish forces leave. The Spanish officers are to keep their side-arms." This cession includes all the territory in which our forces have been active, from Aserradero to Guantanamo, and the mountainous district stretching to the Windward Passage and the Old Bahama Channel. It does not embrace the towns of Holguin and Manzanillo, garrisoned by strong bodies of Spanish regulars; but the universal opinion to-day is, beyond question, that the control of eastern Cuba has passed out of Spanish hands forever, and that this is the beginning of the end. Rumors of peace negotiations grow more persistent, although Secretary Day denies the published report that overtures of this nature from Spain have the endorsement of the English, Russian, and Japanese representatives at Washington. President McKinley, in speaking of the fall of Santiago, said: "I hope for early peace now."

Throughout the Spanish peninsula the rights of individuals as guaranteed by the constitution have been temporarily suspended by a royal decree. This means the uniform and resolute application of martial law, together with suppression of the news of disaster, until the government shall feel that the crisis has passed.

Saturday, July 16.—The good news reaches New York at ten o'clock this morning that the articles of surrender have been signed by General Toral, with authorization from Captain-General Blanco. M. W.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



THE FORWARD TURRET OF THE BATTLE-SHIP "IOWA" IN ACTION, LIEUTENANT LOUIS S. VAN DUZER, COMMANDING.
DRAWN BY H. REUTERDAHL.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NAVAL BOMBARDMENT OF SANTIAGO'S HARBOR DEFENCES, JULY 2.

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

LONDON.

June 25, 1898.

Evolution of Anglo-American friendship continues to progress. Noisy sentimentalities cease to attract the more thoughtful. Banquets are more appropriate means for the celebration of passing sentiments or for the registration of accomplished facts than for the international expression of deep feeling. The tendency of our race to solemnize emotion with food has naturally been followed in the case of the Anglo-Saxon movement. A large feast has been held to mark the friendly feeling that exists between the two countries. Several eminent personages expressed their approval and staid away. Other more or less distinguished people attended the dinner, spoke at great length, and relapsed into private life. It is not in this fashion that Anglo-Saxon unity will be realized. The best compliment that Englishmen and Americans can pay to each other is for both of them fairly to face the obstacles in the path of an English-speaking union, while individual Englishmen may do much if they make all American visitors to England understand by practical methods that in this country they are not looked on as foreigners. Glowing epithets, eloquent phrases, and tropical imagination have been lavished on the subject of a prospective alliance. The time has come to think ahead, to define the conditions and recognize the difficulties of the case, and to leave the open volume of vague generalities to habitual emotionalists. Neither courage nor sincerity is required at the present moment to scream at the top of one's voice about an Anglo-American understanding. The one really important issue is contained in the resolution of the House of Representatives favoring the annexation of Hawaii by 209 votes against 91.

The opinion of several English statesmen, not given for publication under their names, but expressed in the course of private conversation, is that America, as a whole, does not yet grasp the full significance of her colonial policy, and that the change in the great republic from a self-contained nation to one exercising sway over colonies and dependencies is scarcely appreciated as being what it is—a supreme event to be ranked with the greatest world changes of the last three centuries. It is obviously to the interests of England that America should acquire permanent interests in the Philippines, and should become a colonial power favoring the open door. If an Anglo-American alliance were to be of the nature of the Franco-Russian entente, where each party to the engagement is incessantly occupied in trying to get the better of the other, conflict, not union, would be the inevitable result. Accordingly, the best friends of America in England are not those who applaud American action merely because it is likely to benefit this country, but are rather to be found among men—disinterested and sincere—who care sufficiently for the Anglo-Saxon union to face the pitfalls and difficulties in the way. A hundred examples in the history of British empire contain valuable lessons to American statesmen. If the Americans hold the Philippines they can scarcely keep out of the coming quarrel about the "open door." It is obviously to England's more immediate interests that the States should be involved in the arrangement of a question that is more likely to be settled by the effusion of blood than by the slinging of ink. Whether such an entanglement would be to the interests of America is a matter on which Americans are the best judges. Englishmen most competent to judge do not think that the new imperial policy will, in the long-run, benefit the States.

The question of the control of the Nicaragua Canal and the mending or ending of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty is a matter of enormous importance to the United States, whether or not they abjure the fascinations of colonial empire. Once committed to colonization in Hawaii, the Philippines, and Cuba, the United States will not only be plunged into the trade and politics of the Far East, but American interests will become world-wide. The fiscal question will then have to be faced. It is futile for Englishmen to ignore it. We stand for the "open door" and for the greatest possible freedom of trade in all parts of the world. The flag of England is the flag of a trustee for all nations, for equality of opportunity, and for a fair field and no favor. The fiscal policy of the United States is at present protection in its severest form. England has no business to criticise American fiscal policy at home, but if a joint understanding with America is to be possible, substantial agreement on the subject of the "open door" and the greatest possible freedom of trade in all parts of the world is an indispensable condition to common action between the two countries. If the foundation of an American empire merely means the addition to England's competitors of a new and greater power committed to protection and exclusive dealing, the interests of England would scarcely be subserved by an Anglo-American alliance. If, however, high tariffs, coast-wise regulations, and navigation laws are abandoned by the United States in its colonial possessions, fair material for compromise on the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty already exists.

The Niger Convention with France has been signed. The arrangement now settled between the two countries is identical with that which was foreshadowed in my February letter to the Weekly. England recovers Boussa; France retains Nikki and a foothold on the upper reaches of the Niger between Say and Ilo. The prolonged negotiations have been extraordinarily difficult. The points in dispute have been fought inch by inch. While the French press, venal and half informed as it is, has consistently supported the negotiators for France, the English members of the Niger Commission have been hampered by the unwisdom of leading English newspapers. On two occasions the French negotiators were on the point of yielding to British representations, when out came a leading article in an important London newspaper declaring that "under no circumstances would England go to war with France about a swamp." French diplomacy naturally seized upon these assertions as evidence that the English negotiators were engaged in a game of bluff. Hence unnecessary friction was introduced into the discussion, which was dangerously prolonged as the direct consequence of well-meaning representatives of the peace-at-any-price party. The one point that is new in the convention is the grant to France of two trading-stations on the Niger—one at the mouth and the other near Boussa. France obtains these stations for thirty years on payment of one franc a year. Strict provisions are laid down—on paper, be it remembered—that the land so leased shall be used exclusively for the purpose of the landing, storage, and shipment of goods, and for such purposes as may be considered subsidiary thereto. The only permanent residents allowed shall be the persons employed in the charge and for the security of such goods, their families, and servants. With the experience of French good faith in West Africa, his would be a sanguine soul that concluded the perennial Niger question is dead and buried. Free-trade stipulations can be evaded by the French, as experience in the French Congo has shown. If precedent be a guide, it will not be long before the French will attempt to utilize these enclaves, as they are called, and employ them as jumping-off places for the development and extension of what French progressives consider to be the glory of France.

An example of the insularity of Frenchmen on the subject of colonial and foreign affairs is offered by the experience of Admiral Maxse, whose interest in this Niger question has been expressed in a powerful and searching examination of the whole question of Anglo-French dispute. The result of Admiral Maxse's investigations was published in the National Review, of which Admiral Maxse's son, Mr. L. Maxse, is the editor. With the view of conveying to the French public a knowledge of the facts, Admiral Maxse, who is an accomplished French scholar, translated his article into French and published it in the form of a brochure. The publication of the work was attended by extraordinary difficulties. Four Parisian publishers refused to undertake the job, although the admiral's proposals relieved them of the whole of the expense. The mere fact that the brochure was unfavorable to French pretensions frightened four leading French publishing-houses out of an undertaking profitable to themselves and involving no risk—a telling comment on the extent to which freedom of opinion to-day reigns in France. At last a publisher was found, and the brochure appeared. In a manly and outspoken preface the admiral roundly tells the French people that there is one matter upon which the English can claim superiority over their neighbors—namely, a perennial desire to know the real nature of the views of an opponent. The tone of the brochure is most courteous, and is merely an impartial statement of facts drawn for the most part from official documents or textual citations from leading French newspapers. Commenting upon Admiral Maxse's presentation of the English case, the Figaro can discover nothing but "coarse insults," "arrogant assertions without a shadow of evidence," and "calumnies." To reason with the French in their present mood is as hopeless as discussion with an angry but beautiful woman.

The treatment of their imperial inheritance in India by the democracy is notable among the perplexing problems of the day. British electors, the vast majority of whom are wage-earners, are directly responsible for 290,000,000 inhabitants of a distant empire—a burden never borne by imperial Rome in her prime or by imperial Russia to-day. The East India Loan bill, this week before the House of Commons, by which a sterling loan of £10,000,000 is proposed by the Indian Secretary, has raised questions the wise settlement of which is necessary for the continuity of the British Raj. Certain Irish and Radical members of Parliament are doing their utmost to hamper the Indian authorities by coquetting with sedition, and investing political intrigue with the dignity of constitutional agitation. If Clive and Warren Hastings had had their proceedings discussed in the House of Commons in the same spirit as that displayed by a considerable minority of the popular Chamber towards the administration of Lord Elgin, we should never have had an Indian Empire. The burden of taxation per head in India for 1898–9 is only 42 cents. When the average land revenue—there is no rent in India—is added, the amount of taxation at the present exchange value is 80 cents per head per annum. The salt tax, of which so much is made, amounts to 10 cents per head per annum. Since 1877, the year of the last great famine, canals and great irrigation works have received an extension of fourteen thousand miles, and there has been an increase of three and a quarter million acres in the land irrigated. At the present time the irrigated land in India is capable of feeding one hundred and twenty millions of the population. So-called humanitarian interests, unduly represented in the House of Commons, are distinctly modifying the relations which have hitherto subsisted between the Indian government and the legislature. India was won by the sword, is held by the sword, and if democracy is to continue the mastery exercised by the British since the battle of Plassey, Demos must recognize the reality of the fact that behind all the justice, fair dealing, and humanity of the Indian government physical force is still the dominant factor of the situation.

The House of Commons is ignorant, but supreme. Continuity of policy in India is sustained, as in Russia, by the government never going out of office. Individuals change. Party government is unknown. The governing body is subject to a process of incessant and minute alteration. The vast populations which have successively come under British rule have been accustomed to look upon the Indian government as the final authority exercising power for and on behalf of the English sovereign. The Indian bureaucracy has no equal in history, no rival among Latin, Slav, or Teutonic races. They administer with success, as well as achieve conquests. From the member of the viceroy's cabinet down to the newest and rawest acting deputy sub-assistant commissioner there is a tone of distinction among Indian civilians. Lofty aims, pure lives, unwearied toil, even justice, intellectual vigor, strong unselfishness, and ready courage are the characteristics of the thousand or eleven hundred lonely white men who carry on the administration of India. We owe the moral strength of England's position in India to the character of the officials. Conscious that they stand as representatives of their country, their responsibilities are ever before them. National hypocrisy may be imputed to England in other directions—in her drink traffic, in her sweating system, in the prevalence of betting and gambling, in the social evil, in the condition of the submerged tenth—but the government of India, more especially since the mutiny, stands upon a firm foundation of moral strength. A few officials lent by India to Egypt have transformed the valley of the Nile. English hold on Egypt and on India alike is due to the spirit that makes India at once the pride and the burden of our country, as Manila will be the burden and the pride of the United States.

Among the Indian problems clamoring for attention, the question of the population is at once the most intractable and important. Pax Britannica, by suppressing civil war, encouraging the money-lender, feeding the destitute in famine years, has increased the population by nearly one hundred millions during the present century. A great tragedy is shaping itself on the plains of India and in the valleys of the Ganges and the Indus. Under Mogul rule periodic famine so regulated the population of Hindustan as to adjust the numbers of the people to the productive capacity of the soil. Equilibrium between the numbers of the population and the average food-supply was thus roughly but firmly established. In good years the people increased. In bad years the population diminished. In the year 1800 India contained about two hundred million inhabitants. From thenceforward human life has been treated as sacred, irrespective of its quality. The people have multiplied like butterflies. Internecine war has been replaced by a universal passion for litigation. Famines engendered by humane government have been fought by the state, and in an access of unusual generosity the people of England last year contributed nearly twelve cents a head to the sufferers from the latest scourge of dearth. Those who would have died under the rough rule of the Moguls survive to a joyless and prolific existence. Pressure of population on food-supply has already destroyed, in the Ganges Valley, village arts that flourished for centuries before the introduction of law and order. Population increases after every famine, under the operation of what is known as Doubleday's law, whereby abnormal fecundity is observed to be the invariable characteristic of the half-fed. A starved peasantry escape death only to provide in their offspring material for future famine.

Men now living may see the population of India reach 400,000,000. The peninsula is destined to become nothing more nor less than a huge congested district. Before a prospect like this the currency problem, the frontier problem, the race problem, and the fiscal problem are of insignificant importance. Emigration is possible only in dozens, or at the most in hundreds. Agriculture has little margin for improvement. The Indian peasant has known his business for three thousand years. There are parts of Bengal where the population is eight hundred to the square mile, and where every individual on it lives out of the land. To irrigation and the extension of railways there is a limit. The redistribution of the population is at best a palliative; it is no remedy. Manufactures require a stable currency, and, until the silver problem is solved, the one Indian industry must continue to be agricultural. The readjustment of taxation, about which so much is said by those who do not know India, would produce no visible effect where the total taxation per head amounts to only a few pence per annum. Nobody cares to face the black outlook. On the other hand, so-called humanity to the living checks disease, stamps out the plague which would reduce the population to manageable dimensions, even though by enforcing sanitary laws India is driven to the verge of revolution, while the emaciated Ryots in the periodic famines are maintained by a paternal government. The suggestions that natural law should be allowed to assert itself or that philanthropy as a function of government should be laid aside are insupportable ideas to the great majority of the people of England and America, but it is by no means certain that unwillingness to face facts will not produce during the next half-century an Asiatic tragedy of accumulated horror which the human mind can scarcely conceive—unless some wholly unforeseen invention or political cataclysm should change the course of history.

All roads lead to Russia nowadays—even the afternoon drama. The matinée play, as a rule, is a thing to be avoided, or at best endured. Attracted by the announcement of a play by Stepniak, for the benefit of his widow, I went to the Avenue Theatre one afternoon last week with forebodings as to the nature of the entertainment. I had known Stepniak personally, and had learned something more about him in Russia than is a common knowledge here. Stepniak was regarded as a murderer in his own country. In the view of the Nihilists and their academic sympathizers here he was a hero. To have stabbed a police official in the back, however, gives to Stepniak no immunity from criticism, and his play, "The Convert," produced at the Avenue Theatre, with the scenery of "The Club Baby," and the aid of Mr. Laurence Irving, Mr. Tabor, Mr. Charles Charrington, and Mr. H. Swears, was as poor a play as a well-meaning assassin ever wrote. Two remarkable features, however, made "The Convert" interesting. Firstly, the ringing cheers evoked in a London theatre by sanguinary sentiments directed against the young Tsar recalled the fact that London is ever a centre for cosmopolitan conspiracy; and secondly, the part of Katia, the heroine, revealed to the astonished critics present a young actress, of quite extraordinary charm and great ability, of whom scarcely any one had ever heard before. The name of Miss Margaret Halstan was new to me, and nobody at the time could tell me anything about her, except that she had played understudy to Trilby in Mr. Beerbohm Tree's company. Miss Halstan's great personal attractions had less to do with her success than her rare dramatic power. To stir a matinée audience in a badly staged Russian play, written by an amateur, is no ordinary feat. The sincerity and sympathy of Miss Halstan's acting changed the part of a stagy ingénue into that of a girl visibly palpitating with the terrible reality of fate. Although Miss Halstan has gone through the theatrical mill in the provinces for two years, sheer love of art attaches her to the stage. She lives with her parents in the West End, is greatly helped in her ambitions by them, and, unless all the critics are mistaken, is destined to rise high in her profession. Her chief fault is youth. Actresses are rarely supposed to be perfect until they are grandmothers, while the average age of an ingénue at the Théâtre Français is somewhere in the neighborhood of forty. Déjazet played the jeune fille at threescore years and ten.

Arnold White.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS.*

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "THE GREAT STONE OF SARDIS," ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY A. B. FROST.

VIII.—THE BISHOP'S TALE.

THE stranger placed his broad-brimmed hat on the ground beside him, exposing a large round head somewhat bald in front, but not from age, and the rest of it covered with close-cut brown hair. His black clothes fitted him very closely, their extreme tightness suggesting that they had shrunken in the course of wearing, or that he had grown much plumper since he had come into possession of them; and their general worn and dull appearance gave considerable distance to the period of their first possession. But there was nothing worn or dull about the countenance of the man, upon which was an expression of mellow geniality which would have been suitably consequent upon a good dinner with plenty of wine. But his only beverage had been coffee, and in his clear bright eye there was no trace of any exhilaration except that caused by the action of a hearty meal upon a good digestion and an optimistic disposition.

"I am very glad," he said, looking about him at the company, and then glancing with a friendly air toward the two guides, who stood a little back of Mr. Archibald, "to have this opportunity to explain my appearance here. In the first place, I must tell you that I am a bishop, whose diocese has been inundated, and who consequently has been obliged to leave it."

"Oh!" exclaimed Mr. Archibald; and Margery looked at Mr. Clyde, with the remark:

"There! You see I was very near to it."

"I presume this statement will require some explanation," continued the man in black, "and I will make it presently. I am going to be exceedingly frank and open in all that I say to you, and as frankness and openness are so extremely rare in this world, it may be that I shall obtain favor in your eyes from the fact of my possessing those unusual qualities. Originally I was a teacher, and for a year or two I had a very good country school; but my employment at last became so repugnant to me that I could no longer endure it, and this repugnance was due entirely to my intense dislike for children."

"That is not at all to your credit," observed Mrs. Archibald; "and I do not see how you became a bishop, or why you should have been made one."

"Was your diocese entirely meadow-land?" inquired Mr. Archibald.

"I am coming to all that," said the stranger, with a smile of polite consideration toward Mrs. Archibald. "I know very well that it is not at all to my credit to dislike children, but I said I would be honest, and I am. I do dislike them—not their bodies, but their minds. Children, considered physically, are often pleasant to the view, and even interesting as companions, provided their innate juvenility is undisturbed; but when their personalities are rudely thrown open by a teacher, and the innate juvenility prematurely exposed to the air, there is something so clammy, so chilly to the mental marrow, that I shrink from it as I would shrink from the touch of any cold, clammy thing."

"Horrible!" exclaimed Mrs. Archibald.

"I am not sure," observed Margery, "that there is not some truth in that. I had a Sunday-school class for a little while, and although I can't say there was a clamminess, there was—well, I don't know what there was, and I gave it up."

"I am glad," said the man in black, "that my candor is not sinking me in the estimation of every one present; but even if it did, I am obliged to tell the truth. I do not know what would have become of me if I had not the good fortune to catch the measles from a family with whom I was spending Sunday in another town. As soon as the disease plainly showed itself upon me my school was broken up, and it was never gathered together again, at least under me. I must make my story as brief as possible, and can only say that not long after this I found myself in another town, where it became necessary for me to do something to support myself. This was difficult, for I am an indefinite man, and definiteness seems necessary to success in any line. Happening one day to pass a house with open lower windows, I heard the sound of children's voices speaking in unison, and knowing that this must be a school, I looked in, compelled entirely by that curiosity which often urges us to gaze upon human suffering. I found, however, that this was a kindergarten conducted by a young woman. Unobserved by scholars or teacher, I watched the proceedings with great interest, and soon became convinced that kindergartening was a much less repellent system of tuition than any I had known; but I also perceived that the methods of the young woman could be greatly improved. I thought a good deal upon this subject after leaving the open window. And soon afterward, becoming acquainted with the young person in charge of the children, I offered to teach her a much better system of kindergartening than she was using. My terms were very low, and she became my scholar. I soon learned that there were other kindergartens in the town, and some of the teachers of these joined my class. Moreover, there were young women in the place who were not kindergartners, but who would like to become such, and these I also taught, sometimes visiting them at their houses, and sometimes giving my lessons in a room loaned by one of my patrons. My system became very popular, because it was founded upon common-sense."

"What was your system?" asked Mrs. Archibald. "I am interested in kindergartens myself."

"My object," he answered, "was to make the operation of teaching interesting to the teacher. It struck me very forcibly that a continuance of a few years in the present inane performances called kindergartening would infallibly send to our lunatic-asylums a number of women, more or less young, with more or less depleted intellects. The various games and exercises I devised were very interesting, and I am sure I had scholars who never intended to become kindergartners, and who studied with me solely for their own advantage. It was at this time that I adopted the clerical dress as being more suitable to my vocation than any other costume, and some one having called me the bishop, the name soon became popular, and I was generally known by it."

"But what is your real name?" asked Mrs. Archibald.

"Madam," said the man, "you must excuse me if I ask you to recall your question. I have a good name, and I belong to a very good family, but there are reasons why I do not at present wish to avow that name. Some of these reasons are connected with the report that I purposely visited the family with the measles in order to get rid of my school; others are connected with the inundation of my diocese, of which I shall speak; others refer to my present indefinite method of life. There is reason to suppose that the time is not far distant when my resumption of my family name will throw no discredit upon it, but that period has not yet arrived. Do you press your question, madam?"

"Oh no," said Mrs. Archibald; "it really makes no difference; and out here in the woods a man may call himself a bishop or a cardinal or anything he likes."

"Thank you very much," said he, "and I will continue to speak in figures, and call myself a bishop."

"Where I was brought up," interpolated Phil Matlack, still standing behind Mr. Archibald, "I was taught that figures don't lie."

"My good sir," said the speaker, with a smile, "in mathematics they don't, in poetry and literature they often do. Well, as I was saying, my diocese extended itself, my revenues were satisfactory, and I had begun to believe that I had found my true work in life, when suddenly there was a misfortune. There arrived in our town three apostles of kindergartening—two of them were women, and one was a man. They had heard of my system, and had come to investigate it. They did so, with the result that in an astonishingly short time my diocese was inundated with a flood of Fröbelism which absolutely swept me away. With this bag, this umbrella, with this costume, which has now become my wardrobe, I was cast out in all my indefiniteness upon a definite world."

"And how did you get here?" asked Mrs. Archibald.

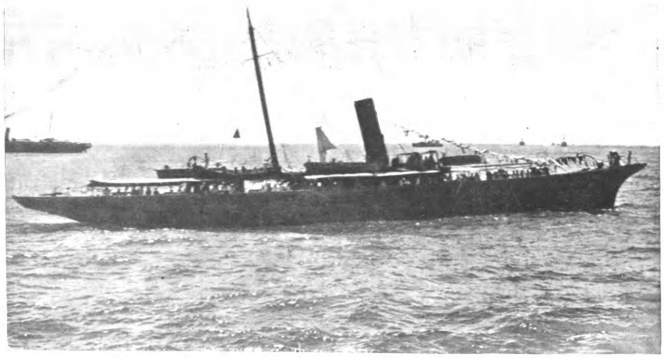
"I had heard of Sadler and his camps," said he; "and in this beautiful month and in this beautiful weather I thought it would be well to investigate them. I accordingly went to Mr. Sadler's, where I arrived yesterday afternoon. I found Mr. Sadler a very definite man, and, I am sorry to say, that as he immediately defined me as a tramp, he would listen to no other definition. 'You have no money to pay for food and lodgings,' said he, 'and you come under my tramp laws. I don't harbor tramps, but I don't kick them out into the woods to starve. For

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2167.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

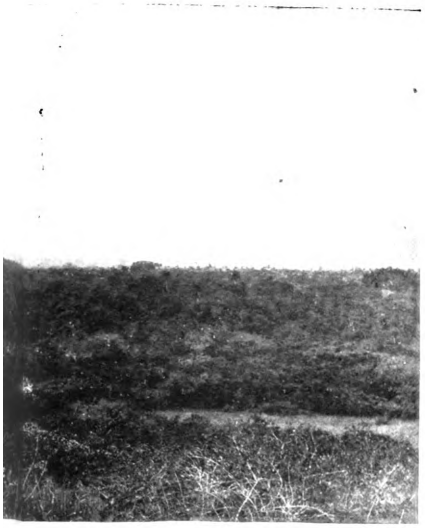
GROUP OF THATCHED HOUSES AT SIBONEY.

FIRST VIEW OF SANTIAGO FROM THE I

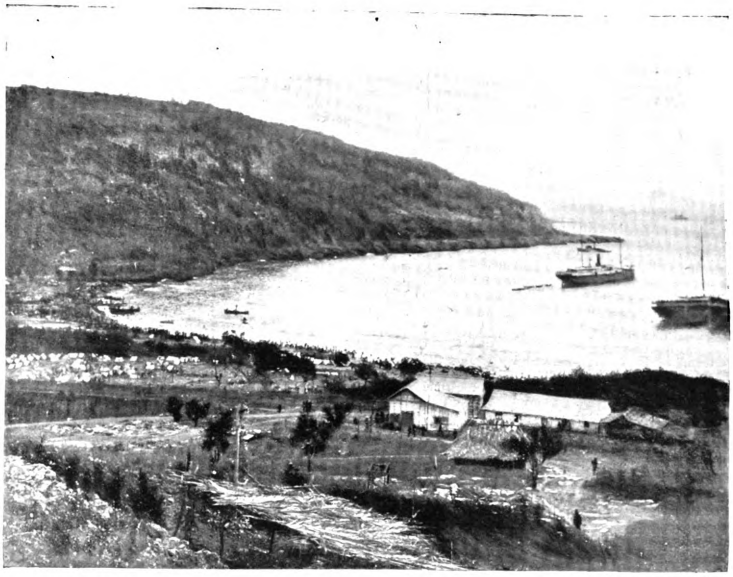


CUBAN RE-ENFORCEMENTS LANDING AT SIBONEY.

GENERAL LAWTON AT THE FRONT.



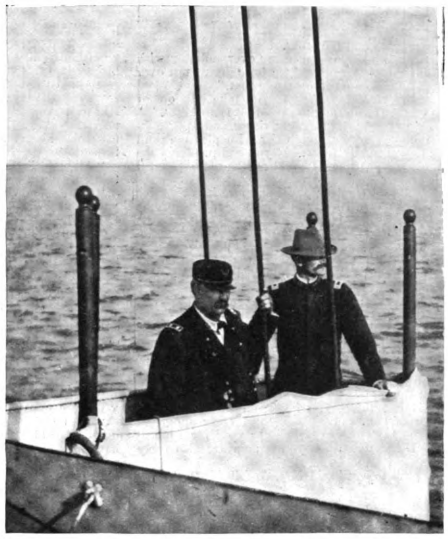
THE "GLOUCESTER" BRINGING CAPTAIN CHADWICK TO SEE GENERAL SHAFTER.



UNITED STATES TROOPS COMING ASHORE AT SIBONEY

THE INVASION OF CUBA—WITH

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



HILLS—ABOUT FIVE MILES DISTANT.

THE CAMP AT SIBONEY—TRANSPORTS IN HARBOR.

LANDING COMMISSARY STORES THROUGH THE SURF.

GENERAL SHAFTER AND LIEUT. NOBLE ON THE BRIDGE OF THE "SEGURANCA."

CUBAN SOLDIERS FROM ASERRADERO LANDING AT SIBONEY.

SWIMMING HORSES ASHORE AT BAIQUIRI.

THE ARMY BEFORE SANTIAGO.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

labor on this place I pay one dollar and a half a day of ten hours. For meals to day-laborers I charge fifteen cents each. If you want your supper, you can go out to that wood-shed and split wood for one hour.' I was very hungry; I went out into the wood-shed; I split wood for one hour, and at the end of that time I had a sufficient meal. When I had finished, Mr. Sadler sent for me. 'Do you want to stay here all night?' he said. 'I do,' I answered. 'Go, then, and split wood for another hour.' I did so, and it was almost dark when I had finished. In the morning I split wood for my breakfast, and when I had finished I went to Mr. Sadler and asked him how much he would charge for a luncheon wrapped up in a piece of paper. 'Seven and a half cents,' he said. I split wood for half an hour, and left Sadler's ostensibly to return to the station by the way I had come; but while I had been at work, I found from the conversation of some of the people that one of the camps was occupied, and I also discovered in what direction it lay. Consequently, after I had passed out of the sight of the definite Peter Sadler, I changed my course, and took a path through the woods which I was told would lead to this road, and I came here because I might just as well pass this way as any other, and because, having set out to investigate camp life, I wished to do so, and I hope I may be allowed to say that although I have seen but little of it, I like it very much."

"Now, then," said Phil Matlack, walking around the circle and approaching the stranger, "you said, when you first came here, that you were going to go, and the time has come when you've got to go."

"Very well," said the other, looking up with a smile; "if I've got there I'd better stop."

Mr. Archibald and the young men laughed, but Matlack and Martin, who had now joined him, did not laugh.

"You've barely time enough," said the former, "to get to Sadler's before it is pitch-dark, and—"

"Excuse me," said the other, "but I am not going back to Sadler's to-night. I would rather have no bed than split wood for an hour after dark in order to procure one. I would prefer a couch of dried leaves."

"You come along into the road with this young man and me; I want to talk to you," said Matlack.

"Come, Matlack," said Mr. Archibald, "don't be cruel."

"I am not," said the guide. "I am the tenderest-hearted person in the world; but even if you say so, sir, I can't let a stranger stay all night in a camp that I've got charge of."

"Look here, Matlack," exclaimed Mr. Clyde, "you haven't got charge of our camp!"

"No, I haven't," said the other.

"Well, then, this person can come over and stay with us. We have a little tent that we brought to put over the cooking-stove, and he can sleep in that."

"Very well," said Matlack; "if you take him out of this camp I haven't anything to say—that is, to-night."

"My dear sir," said the stranger, rising, and approaching Mr. Clyde, "I accept your offer with pleasure, and thank you most heartily for it. If you had proffered me the hospitality of a palace, I could not be more grateful for it."

"All right," said Clyde; "and I suppose it is time for us to be off, so I will bid you all good-night. Come along, Arthur. Come along, bishop."

The face of the last-named individual beamed with delight as he heard this appellation, and bidding everybody good-night, and thanking them for the kindness with which he had been treated, he followed the two young men.

The three walked some little distance toward Camp Roy, and then Clyde came running back to speak to Margery, who was now standing by herself watching the young moon descend among the trees. Then Mr. Raybold also stopped and came back to Margery, upon which the bishop stopped and waited for them. In about ten minutes he was joined by the two young men, and the three proceeded to Camp Roy.

"There is one thing, Harriet," said Mr. Archibald, "which I wish you would speak to Margery about. I don't want her to get up so early and go out for a morning walk. I find that those young men are also early risers."

"I will speak to her," said Mrs. Archibald; "where is she?"

"Over there, talking to young Martin," said her husband. "It isn't quite dark yet, but I think it is time we were all in bed."

"Quite time," said she. "Margery tells me that that young guide, who is a handsome young fellow, is going to teach her how to fish with flies. I wish you would sometimes take her out in the boat with you, Mr. Archibald; I am sure that you could teach her how to fish."

He smiled. "I suppose I could," he said; "and I also suppose I could pull her out of the water the first time she hooked a big fish. It would be like resting a boat on a pivot to put her into it."

"Then you don't take her," said Mrs. Archibald, decisively. "And you can't take her with you up the stream, because of course she can't wade. I don't want her to get tired of camp life, but—"

"Don't be afraid of the young men," interrupted her husband, with a laugh; "so long as there are three of them there is no danger."

"Of course I will not, if you don't wish it, Aunt Harriet," said Margery, when Mrs. Archibald had spoken to her about the early morning walks; "and I will stay in my room until you call me."

The next morning, when Mrs. Archibald was ready to leave the cabin, she did call Margery, but received no answer. Then she went to the little studio-room, and when she opened the door she found its occupant leaning out of the window talking to Mr. Clyde and Mr. Raybold, who stood outside.

"Good-morning, Aunt Harriet!" exclaimed Margery, gayly. "Mr. Clyde has brought me nearly an armful of birch bark, all thin and smooth. I am going to make a birch-bark bedspread out of it. I'll cover a sheet with these pieces, you see, and sew them on. Then I can have autographs on them, and mottoes, and when I cover myself up with it I shall really feel like a dryad."

"And here is what I have brought," said Mr. Raybold, holding up an armful of bark.

"Oh, thank you very much," said Margery, taking the mass, but not without dropping a good many of the pieces. "Of course it was kind of him to bring it," she said to Mrs. Archibald, as they left the room together, "but he needn't have bothered himself: I don't want to sleep under a wood-pile."

IX.—MATLACK'S THREE TROUBLES.

"Have you asked those two young men to breakfast again?" inquired Mr. Archibald, after examining, with a moderate interest, the specimen of birch bark which Margery had shown him.

"Oh no, indeed," said she; "they have had their breakfast. They have been telling me about it. The bishop got up very early in the morning and cooked it for them. He's a splendid cook; and he found things in their hampers that they didn't know they had. They said his coffee was delicious, and they have left him there in their camp now, washing the dishes and putting everything in order. And do you think, Uncle Archibald, that it is going to rain?"

"I do," said he; "for it is sprinkling already."

This proved to be the first bad day since the Archibald party had gone into camp, and the rain soon began to come down in a steady practised way, as if the clouds above were used to that sort of thing and could easily keep it up all day.

As there was no place under roof to which company could be conveniently invited, Margery retired to her room and set herself diligently to work on her birch-bark quilt.

Mrs. Archibald established herself in the division of the cabin which was intended to be used as a sitting and dining room in bad weather, and applied herself to some sewing and darning, which had been reserved for just such a day as this. Mr. Archibald, in a water-proof suit, tried fishing for half an hour or so, but finding it both unpleasant and unprofitable, he joined his wife, made himself as comfortable as possible on two chairs, and began to read aloud one of the novels they had brought with them.

Mr. Clyde and Mr. Raybold had considerately gone to their own camp when it began to rain, hoping, however, that the shower would be over in a short time. But the rain was not a shower, and they spent the morning on their backs in their tent, talking and smoking. Of course they could not expect the bishop to depart in the rain, so they had told him to make himself as comfortable as he could in the little kitchen tent, and offered him a pipe and a book. The first he declined, as he never smoked, but the latter he accepted with delight.

After the mid-day dinner Phil Matlack, in a pair of high hunting-boots and an oil-skin coat, came to Mr. Archibald and said that as there was nothing he could do that afternoon, he would walk over to Sadler's and attend to some business he had there.

"About the bishop?" asked Mr. Archibald.

"Partly," said Matlack. "I understand the fellow is still over there with those two young men. I don't suppose they'll send him off in the rain, and as he isn't in my camp, I can't interfere. But it may rain for two or three days."

"All right," said Mr. Archibald; "and if we want anything we'll ask Martin."

"Just so," said Matlack. "If there's anything to do that you don't want to do yourself, you can get him to do it; but if you want to know anything you don't know yourself, you'd better wait until I come back."

When Matlack presented himself before Peter Sadler he found that ponderous individual seated in his rolling chair near the open door, enjoying the smell of the rain.

"Hello, Phil!" he cried. "What's wrong at the camp?"

The guide left his wet coat and cap on the little piazza outside, and after carefully wiping his feet, seated himself on a chair near the door.

"There's three things wrong," said he. "In the first place, there's a tramp out there, and it looks to me as if he was a-goin' to stick, if he can get allowed to do it."

"Is he too big for you to bounce?" roared Peter. "That's a pretty story to come tell me."

"No, he ain't," said the other; "but I haven't got the bouncin' of him. He's not in my camp. The young men have took him in; but I expect he'll come over with them as soon as it's done rainin', for when that happens they're bound to come themselves."

"Look here, Phil," said Peter, "is he dressed in black?"

"Yes, he is," said the guide.

Mr. Sadler slapped his hand on the arm of his chair. "Phil Matlack," he shouted, "that's my favorite tramp. I never had a man here who paid his bill in work as he did. It was cash down, and good money. Not a minute of wood-splitting more or less than the market-price for meals and bed. I'd like to have a tramp like that come along about twice a week. But I tell you, Phil, he ain't no tramp. Couldn't you see that? None of them loafers ever worked as he did."

"He may not be a tramp," said Matlack, "but he's trampin'. What are you goin' to do about him? Let him stay there?"

"What's he doin' now?" asked Sadler.

"He's cookin' for those two young men."

"Well, they need some one to do it for them, and they didn't want to go to the expense of a guide. Let the parson alone for a day or two, and if he does anything out of the way just you take him by one ear and Martin take him by the other and bring him to me. I'll attend to him. What's the next trouble?"

"That's out of my camp too," said Matlack; "but I'm bound to report it. The bicycle fellow that you hired a gun to don't know the fust thing about usin' it, and the next thing you'll hear will be that he's shot his pardner, who's worth six of him."

Mr. Sadler sat up very straight in his chair and stared at the guide. "Phil Matlack," he shouted, "what do you take me for? I hired that gun to that young man. Don't you suppose I know what I'm about?"

"That's all right," said Matlack; "but the trouble is he don't know what he's about."

"Get away, man," said Peter, with a contemptuous sniff; "he'll never hurt anybody. What do you take me for? When he came to me and wanted a gun, I handed him two or three, so that he might choose one that suited him, and by the way he handled them I could see that most likely he'd never handled one before, and so I set him up all right. He's got a good gun, and all the cartridges he'll be likely to want; and the cartridges are all like this. They're a new kind I heard of last winter, and I got a case from Boston last week. I don't see how I ever managed to run my camps without them. Do you see that shot?" said he, opening one end of a cartridge. "Well, take one in your hand and pinch it."

Phil did so, and it crumbled to dust in his hand.

"When that load's fired," said Peter, "all the shot will crumble into dust. It wouldn't do to give raw hands blank cartridges, because they'd find that out; but with this kind they might sit all day and fire at a baby asleep in its cradle and never disturb it, provided the baby was deaf. And he can't use his pardner's cartridges, for I gave that fellow a twelve-bore gun and his is a ten-bore."

Phil grinned. "Well, then," said he, "I suppose I might as well make my mind easy, but if that bicycle man hunts much he'll get the conviction borne in on him that he's a dreadful bad shot."

"Then he'll give up shooting, which is what is wanted," said Sadler. "What's your third bother?"

"That young woman has made up her mind to go out in the boat by herself the very fust time she feels like it," said Matlack; "she didn't say so with her mouth, but she said it with the back of her head and her shoulders, and I want to know if that rule of yours is going to hold good this summer. Women is gettin' to do so many things they didn't use to that I didn't know but what you'd consider they'd got far enough to take themselves out on the lake, and if you do think so, I don't want to get myself in hot water with those people and then find you don't back me up."

"If you don't want to get yourself into hot water with me, Phil Matlack, you'd better get it into your head just as soon as you can that when I make a rule it's a rule, and I don't want people comin' to me and talkin' about changes. Women in my camp don't go out in boats by themselves, and it's easy enough to have that rule kept if you've got backbone enough to do it. Keep the boat locked to the shore when it ain't in use, and keep the key in your pocket, and if anybody gets it that 'ain't any right to it, that's your lookout. Now that's the end of your troubles, I hope. How's things goin' on generally in the camp?"

"Oh, well enough," said Matlack. "I thought at fust the old lady'd give out in a day or two, but I've taught her parlor-fishin', which she's took to quite lively, and she's got used to the woods. The boss he sticks to fishin' as if it was office-work, and as for the rest of them I guess they're all gettin' more and more willin' to stay."

"Why?" asked Peter.

"Well, one of them is a gal and the others isn't," replied Matlack; "that's about the p'int of it."

During Matlack's walk back the skies cleared, and when he reached the camp he found Mrs. Archibald seated in her chair near the edge of the lake, a dry board under her feet, and the bishop standing by her, putting her bait on her hook, and taking the fish off it when any happened to be there. Out in the boat sat Mr. Archibald, trusting that some fish might approach the surface in search of insects disabled by the rain. Further on, at a place by the water's edge that was clear of bushes and undergrowth, Martin was giving Miss Dearborn a lesson in fly-fishing.

"He's a mighty good fisherman," thought Matlack, looking at the young fellow as he brought his rod back from the water with a long graceful sweep, and then, with another sweep and an easy inclination of his body forward, sending the fly far out on the smooth surface of the lake, "although there ain't no need to tell him so; and I don't wonder she'd rather stand and watch him than try to do it herself."

Walking up and down near the edge of the wood were Messrs. Clyde and Raybold.

Phil smiled. "They don't seem to be happy," he said to himself. "I guess they're hankerin' to take a share in her edication; but if you don't know nothin' yourself, you can't edicate other people."

Matlack directed his steps toward Mrs. Archibald; but before he reached her he was met by the bishop, who hurried toward him.

"I shall be obliged to surrender my post to you," he said, "which will be greatly to the lady's satisfaction, I imagine, for I must appear a poor attendant after you."

"Goin' to leave us?" said Matlack. "You look quite spruced up."

The bishop smiled. "You allude, I suppose," said he, "to the fact that my hat and clothes are brushed, and that I am freshly shaved and have on a clean collar. I like to be as neat as I can. This is a gutta-percha collar, and I can wash it whenever I please with a bit of damp rag, and it is my custom to shave every day, if I possibly can. But as to leaving you, I shall not do so this evening. I have promised those young gentlemen who so kindly invited me to their camp that I would prepare their supper for them, and I must now go to make the fire and get things in readiness."

"Have they engaged you as cook and general help?" asked Matlack.

"Oh no," said the bishop, with a smile; "they are kind and I am grateful, that is all."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

THE PRAYER BEFORE BATTLE.

From sudden death, from foeman's aim;
From cowardice, from shrinking shame;
From cruel deeds without a name:
Save us, Good Lord.

From rage of animal within;
From triumph dwarfed by brutal sin;
From lawlessness mid rifles' din:
Save us, Good Lord.

From jealousy of other's deed;
From inhumanity, from greed;
From carelessness of brother's need:
Save us, Good Lord.

From memory of upturned eyes;
From shrieks of wounded, battle-cries;
From faith forgot when danger dies:
Save us, Good Lord.

GERTRUDE F. LYNCH.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ON THE MADRID SIDEWALK.

A YANKEE IN SPAIN.

XI.—AN EVENING AT THE AMERICAN LEGATION.

BY POULTNEY BIGELOW.

ILLUSTRATED WITH PHOTOGRAPHS BY THE AUTHOR.

IT was on the evening of the 22d of March, 1898, that we three homesick and leg-weary Yankees found happiness of a peculiarly Yankee kind in the family circle of General Woodford, who at that moment was our country's representative at the Spanish capital. It made us warm with thoughts of buckwheat cakes and peanut candy just to be welcomed by a good old-fashioned American "darky" butler, who made us want to hug him just because of the winsome way in which he invited us to "Walk right in here, gentlemen; de ladies is all waiting for you." If any world-weary globe-trotter wants to test the strength of that subtle thing miscalled patriotism, but more justly described by the Irishman as the love for the old sod, let that man travel on a bike for days and days in a country liable at any moment to declare war against his, never seeing a soul with whom he can exchange home news or even safely divulge his nationality.

That colored man who opened the door for us at General Woodford's deserved a pension on his return home. He cheered the heart of every American who called at the Legation, I am sure, and into the bargain has passed through all the trying times which the diplomatic tension between the two countries occasioned.

I have seen many musical triumphs in my life, but never such a one as was achieved that night by our barytone, Elwin Isham, as he threw his whole heart and rich voice into the negro song, "I want you, my honey—yes, I do," and other plantation melodies which only an American can feel and make others feel. I saw the shining face of our colored friend beaming with open mouth and eyes from behind the curtain—he was homesick for his "old folks at home," and thinking of long years ago, when he too was a happy pickaninny "rolling and kicking in the sun." He told me afterwards, while helping me on with my coat, that "Dat song did do me a powerful lot of good —'deed it did." Perhaps it is the result of early bringing up, and common to all of us who have lived at all among negroes, but I feel that our citizens of African descent are an essential part of our social life, and that if they were to disappear we should lose an important element of poetry, song, and humor in our overworked money-making world.

General Woodford is an old soldier and a hardened practitioner at the bar—two careers that ought to make a man capable of smothering his feelings. He was conquered that night, for his heart was sick with the bitterness of his daily diplomatic life, and one note from a voice that sang of the home so far away made him forget all else but his desire to know peace. He held his wife's hand, and the eyes of both were wet. I wish that Spaniards could have seen him then, to learn that Yankees too have hearts, and that it is just that quality in our nature, and not the ambition for more territory, that produces with us the popular agitation against misrule in Cuba.

There were only Americans present at this dinner; one might term it strictly a family party, for no one was present save members of the legation and their families. The general is a brave and a shrewd man. He was fighting for peace, and cheerily proclaimed that war was of course out of the question between such intelligent peoples as the Spanish and ourselves. Our visit fell between two serious events —the blowing up of an American man-o'-war in Havana Harbor, and the message of President McKinley demanding that Spain put an end to her ruinous fighting at our gates.

The Spanish press was full of wild rumors, none of them complimentary to the United States. With magnificent good-humor, General Woodford persistently corrected false statements put forward by the press, and took no notice of insulting constructions subsequently placed upon his words. He believed in a "campaign of education," and daily preached moderation. He published in the Spanish press the astounding news that he had no secrets from the Spanish people; that all his despatches received from Washington were such as might with impunity be published to the world, if the Spanish government should see fit.

TYPICAL MADRID.

So far, and General Woodford had been in Madrid since the autumn of 1897, he had not put forward seriously a single demand to the Spanish government that had not been successful. His personal relations with all his official colleagues had been satisfactory, and I believed that if war should unfortunately break out in spite of his efforts, he would leave Madrid with the personal respect of every official who had dealings with him.

The ladies of the legation felt the isolation in which they were forced to move. Their husbands had official business to transact with men accustomed to official intercourse, but they had no work to occupy them, and were in daily fear of meeting with social treatment impossible to resent, and mortifying for high-strung women to endure. Matters were so much strained while I was there that members of the diplomatic corps would not introduce Spaniards to Americans, even if they happened into the same room; it was feared that the Spanish ladies might be rude to our people. I would hesitate to repeat this had not an American member of the diplomatic body given me instances in his own experience.

This was the more to be regretted, for in many years there had not been such a good representation of our society at a foreign court as at that time in Madrid.

The house in which General Woodford had his home is one of the handsomest of the capital, comparing favorably with the Embassies of France, England, and Mexico. Unfortunately it is not the property of the United States, so that General Woodford's successor, unless he be a man prepared to spend four thousand dollars a year in rent, will have a hard time in trying to keep his social end up. A great and rich country should not allow its representatives abroad to be housed with less dignity than the agents of other powers. Besides, we should not have the archives of our different legations and embassies moving about every time the government is forced to look for new quarters.

General Woodford did not say anything to me on this matter, but other members of the legation did, to the effect that in times like those the people about our legation in Madrid and the different consulates should have been thoroughly American in speech, in blood, and in affiliation.

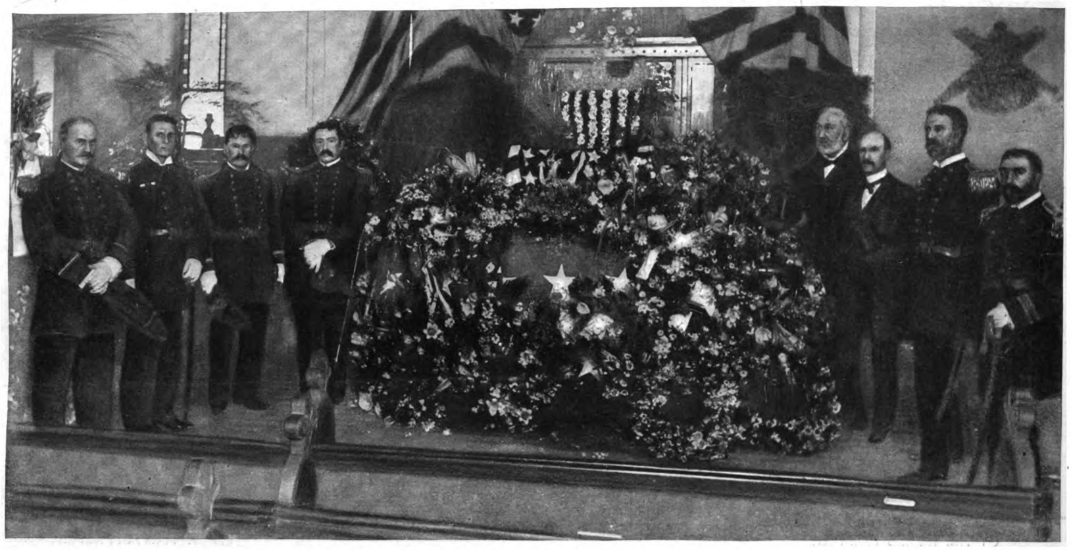
THE FAITHFUL ASS.

STREET FOUNTAIN, MADRID.

I do not know if our government ever had occasion to send confidential communications to the Madrid legation. If it did, that material came into the custody of people who were Spanish in blood and sympathy, and in such times that counts.

General Woodford spoke at some length with me about the Spanish character, which he admires highly. He regards the people as brave and courteous, and deplored the prevailing ignorance which makes it difficult to appeal directly through the press to their good sense. He told me that he discovered very little Jingoism in Spain; that it was confined mainly to the extreme military party who admired General Weyler, and to a small but noisy Parliamentary set who had little following amongst the people. As to himself, he said he felt as secure in Madrid as in any house of New York. The government kept half a dozen police in front of his door, by way of precaution, but in all other respects he lived as peacefully as he could wish.

How much of this the general believed himself, and how much he wished to believe, I could not tell. At any rate, he did not excite unnecessary alarm in those about him, and acted on the principle that it is time enough to cry out when you are hurt. To the families of his secretaries and attachés he was like a father, and his ears would have burned could he have heard a tithe of the grateful words used about him behind his back.



It was late that night when we said good-night to Mrs. Woodford and the other members of the general's household. We had danced American waltzes, had sung American songs, and talked American talk as though not likely soon to get another chance at such luxuries. The splendid suite of drawing-rooms had resounded to the exquisite tenor notes of George Devoll, and the general had paid us collectively the high compliment of saying we had done them all good by coming. We on our side remarked to one another, as we walked home that night, that if the general's family got out of us half the enjoyment that we did out of them, then we had no complaints to make.

We had brought our evening dress all the way from London for this one event; we were well rewarded.

MADRID MARKET.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE BODY OF CAPTAIN CHARLES V. GRIDLEY, U.S.N., LATE OF THE U.S.S. "OLYMPIA," LYING IN STATE AT THE UNION CHURCH, YOKOHAMA.

CAPTAIN GRIDLEY'S FUNERAL.

YOKOHAMA, June 9.

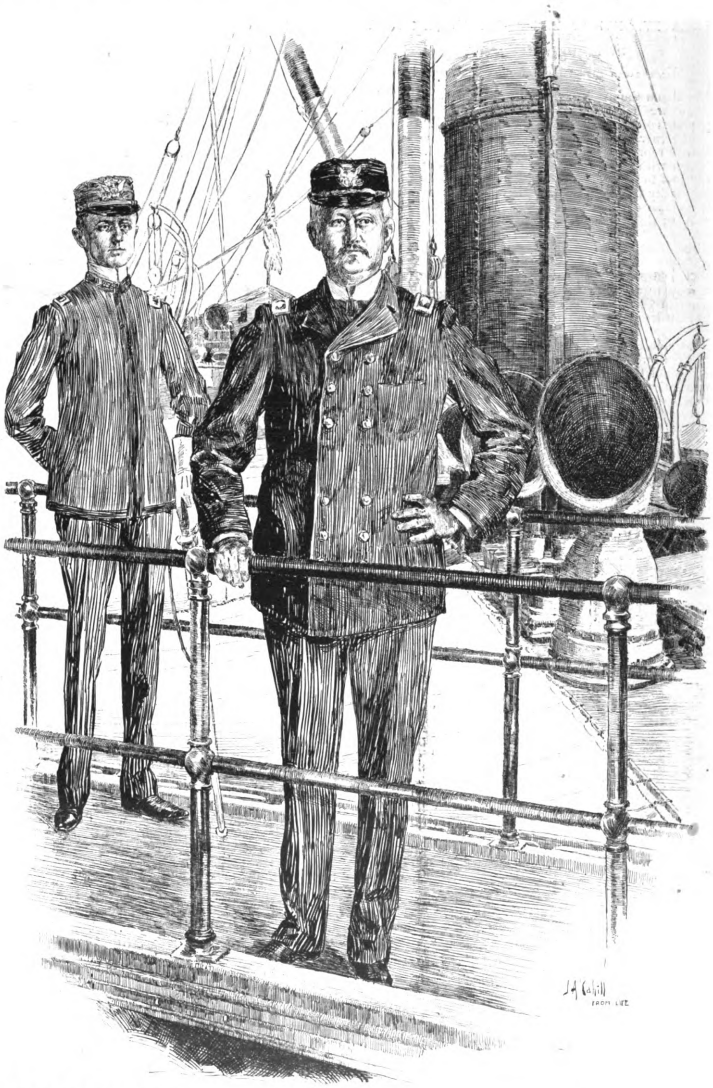
I HAVE just come from Captain Gridley's funeral. The Olympia was stationed here so long that his death is mourned as that of a friend rather than a commander. A note from Captain Gridley, on leaving, said that he would return in April. Indeed, he expected to spend the summer in these waters. There was then no shadow of the war. All morning the navy ladies were at the church assisting in its decoration. There is a detachment of the wives of the officers of the Baltimore here: Mrs. Bellows, Mrs. Price, Mrs. Freeman, Mrs. Beach, Mrs. Brayton.

It was first intended that the services should be held on the Coptic, on which Captain Gridley died. But an order from Washington that the remains be cremated changed this plan, and the services were held at the Union Church. The Captain and the officers of the Coptic escorted the body to the Hatoba, where a detachment of bluejackets carried it, covered with its pall of stars and stripes and buried beneath flowers, to the hearse. The funeral cortége consisted of a guard of honor from the Japanese cruiser Heiyuen, Minister Buck, Consul-General Gowie, Mr Miller and Mr. Nelson of the legation, the consular staff, Governor Asada of this prefecture, the Chief of Police, Marquis Gonzago de Membrini, and the Captain and officers of the Heiyuen. The pall-bearers were Lieutenant-Commander Briggs of the Baltimore, here on sick leave; Dr. Anderson of the Naval Hospital; Paymasters McDonald and Galt of the Raleigh, who came with Captain Gridley; Colonel W. M. Brown, of New York, on his way to Manila; Captain Davies of the Royal Naval Reserve; Dr. Donald Hoskyn of the British Naval Hospital. These were preceded by the Japanese town band playing Chopin's "Funeral March."

It was interesting to look over the church and to see the various types of Americans thus brought together, for Yokohama is a rallying-place for all nations. Grizzled seafaring men, smart-looking business men, sunburnt tourists, fashionable globe-trotters (men and women), sedate missionaries, professors, diplomats, and those exiles from home whose children have not yet seen the soil of their fathers. Among these were Mrs. James Stoughton, Mrs. Hurlbert and her mother, from Cincinnati; Mrs. Martin, who is a daughter of Commodore Chandler, with a beautiful anchor of white and green in her hand; Mrs. Anderson, the daughter of Captain Coffin, who has been recalled to service; Miss Case of Philadelphia.

The circumstance of Captain Gridley's death, after the brilliant victory, made the occasion doubly sad. You, at home, can scarcely realize what the fight at Manila has been to the Americans here, brought into such sharp competition with the representatives of other nations.

The burial service was read by Rev. Mr. Booth of the Ferris Seminary. And after a prayer by Dr. Cleveland, Colonel Buck and Mr. Gowie made brief addresses.



The body is to be cremated to-morrow morning, and the ashes will be taken home on the next steamer.

MARY GAY HUMPHREYS.

CUI BONO?

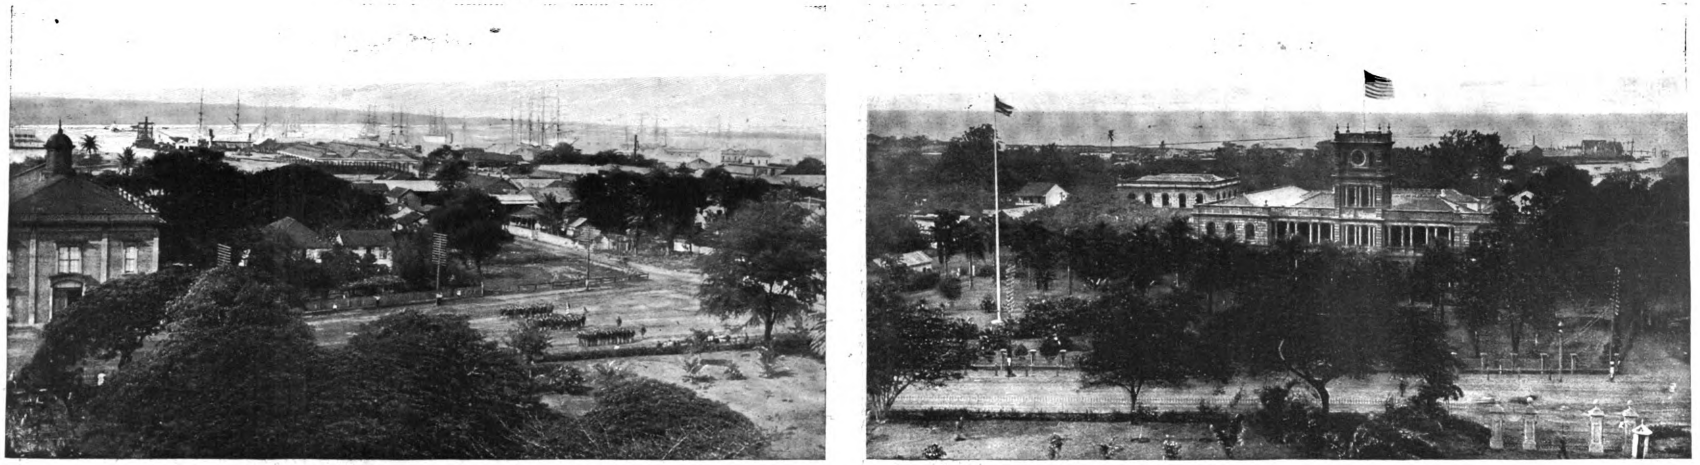
Days of disaster, war and doom,
Filling a glad green earth with gloom,
What are ye for,
Ye days of war?
What has man done, that o'er his head
Clatter and crash these bolts of dread?
Why has the sunshine gone from life?
Why has sweet peace given way to strife?
Why are the fields that once were green
Now drenched with blood of heroes seen?
Why has the sea
Risen in awful majesty,
In anger wild,
And swallowed defenceless woman and child?
What is man's sin,
That he requires such discipline?
Days of disaster, doom and war,
What are ye for?

JOHN KENDRICK BANGS.



MAJOR-GENERAL WESLEY MERRITT, U.S.A., ON THE BRIDGE OF THE "NEWPORT," JUST PREVIOUS TO SAILING FOR MANILA.—DRAWN BY J. A. CAHILL.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1898—JUST PREVIOUS TO ANNEXATION, SHOWING U. S. MONITOR "MONTEREY" AND TROOP-SHIPS ON THEIR WAY TO MANILA.

1893—DURING THE HAWAIIAN REVOLUTION, SHOWING FOREIGN WAR-SHIPS LYING OFF THE CITY, AND THE GOVERNMENT BUILDING FLYING THE UNITED STATES FLAG.

THE HARBOR OF HONOLULU, THE CAPITAL OF OUR NEW TERRITORY IN THE PACIFIC.—[See Page 726.]

Original from PENN STATE
Digitized by Google
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

IN FRONT OF SANTIAGO.

From Stephen Crane's Account of the Battle in the New York "World," July 14.

July 4.

The action at San Juan on July 1 was, particularly speaking, a soldiers' battle. It was like Inkermann, where the English fought half leaderless all day in a fog. Only, the Cuban forest was worse than any fog.

In civil life the newspapers would have called it a grand popular movement. It will never be forgotten as long as America has a military history.

A line of intrenched hills held by men armed with a weapon like the Mauser is not to be taken by a front attack of infantry unless the trenches have first been heavily shaken by artillery fire. Any theorist will say that it is impossible, and prove it to be impossible. But it was done, and we owe the success to the splendid gallantry of the American private soldier.

As near as one can learn, headquarters expected little or no fighting on the 1st. Lawton's division was to go by the Caney road, chase the Spaniards out of that interesting village, and then, wheeling half to the left, march down to join the other divisions in some kind of attack on San Juan at daybreak on the 2d.

But somebody had been entirely misinformed as to the strength and disposition of the Spanish forces at Caney, and instead of taking Lawton six minutes to capture the town, it took him nearly all day, as well it might.

The other divisions lying under fire, waiting for Lawton, grew annoyed at a delay which was of course not explained to them, and suddenly arose and took the formidable hills of San Juan. It was impatience suddenly exalted to one of the sublime passions.

Lawton was well out toward Caney soon after daybreak, and by seven o'clock we could hear the boom of Capron's guns in support of the infantry. The remaining divisions —Kent's and Wheeler's—were trudging slowly along the muddy trail through the forest.

When the first gun was fired a grim murmur passed along the lean column.

"They're off!" somebody said.

The marching was of necessity very slow, and even then the narrow road was often blocked. The men, weighted with their packs, cartridge-belts, and rifles, forded many streams, climbed hills, slid down banks, and forced their way through thickets.

Suddenly there was a roar of guns just ahead and a little to the left. This was Grimes's battery going into action on the hill which is called El Paso. Then, all in a moment, the quiet column moving forward was opposed by men carrying terrible burdens. Wounded Cubans were being carried to the rear. Most of them were horribly mangled.

The second brigade of dismounted American cavalry had been in support of the battery, its position being directly to the rear. Some Cubans had joined there. The Spanish shrapnel fired at the battery was often cut too long, and passing over, burst amid the supports and the Cubans.

The loss of the battery, the cavalry, and the Cubans from this fire was forty men in killed and wounded, the First regular cavalry probably suffering most grievously. Presently there was a lull in the artillery fire, and down through spaces in the trees we could see the infantry still plodding with its packs, steadily toward the front.

At about 2500 yards in front of Grimes's position on El Paso arose the gentle green hills of San Juan, dotted not too plentifully with trees—hills that resembled the sloping orchards of Orange County in summer. Here and there were houses, built evidently as summer villas, but now loopholed and barricaded. They had heavy roofs of red tiles, and were shaped much like Japanese, or, better, Javanese, houses. Here and there, too, along the crests of these curving hillocks were ashen streaks, the rifle-pits of the Spaniards.

At the principal position of the enemy were a flag, a redoubt, a block-house, and some sort of a pagoda, in the shade of which Spanish officers were wont to promenade during lulls, and negligently gossip about the battle.

At 11.25 our artillery reopened on the central block-house and intrenchments. The Spanish fire had been remarkably fine, but it was our turn now. Grimes had his ranges to a nicety. After the great "shout of the gun" came the broad, windy, diminishing noise of the flung shell; then a fainter boom, and a cloud of red debris out of the block-house or up from the ground near the trenches.

The Spanish infantry in the trenches fired a little volley immediately after every one of the American shells. It puzzled many to decide at what they could be firing, but it was finally resolved that they were firing just to show us that they were still there and were not afraid.

It must have been about two o'clock when the enemy's battery again retorted.

The cruel thing about this artillery duel was that our battery had nothing but old-fashioned powder, and its position was always as clearly defined as if it had been the Chicago fire. On the other hand, the Spaniards were using the best smokeless.

From El Paso to San Juan there is a broad expanse of dense forest, spotted infrequently with vividly green fields. It is traversed by a single narrow road, which leads straight between the two positions, fording two little streams. Along this road had gone our infantry, and also the military balloon.

There were two officers in the car for the greater part of the way, and there surely were never two men who valued their lives less. But they both escaped unhurt, while the balloon sank down, torn to death by the bullets that were volleyed at it by the nervous Spaniards, who suspected dynamite. It was never brought out of the woods where it recklessly met its fate.

In these woods, unknown to some, including the Spaniards, was fulminated the gorgeous plan of taking an impregnable position.

One saw a thin line of black figures moving across a field. They disappeared in the forest. The enemy was keeping up a terrific fire. Then suddenly somebody yelled, "By God, there go our boys up the hill!"

There is many a good American who would give an arm to get the thrill of patriotic insanity that coursed through us when we heard that yell.

Yes, they were going up the hill, up the hill. It was the best moment of anybody's life. An officer said to me afterward: "If we had been in that position and the Spaniards had come at us, we would have piled them up so high the last man couldn't have climbed over." But up went the regiments, with no music save that ceaseless, fierce crashing of rifles.

The foreign attachés were shocked. "It is very gallant, but very foolish," said one, sternly.

"Why, they can't take it, you know! Never in the world!" cried another. "It is slaughter!"

The Japanese shrugged his shoulders, and said nothing.

The road from El Paso to San Juan was now a terrible road. It should have a tragic fame like the sunken road at Waterloo. Why we did not later hang some of the gentry who contributed from the trees to the terror of this road is not known.

The wounded were stringing back from the front, hundreds of them. Some walked unaided, an arm or a shoulder having been dressed at a field station. They stopped often enough to answer the universal hail, "How is it going?" Others hobbled, or clung to a friend's shoulder. Their slit trousers exposed red bandages. A few were shot horribly in the face, and were led bleeding and blind by their mates.

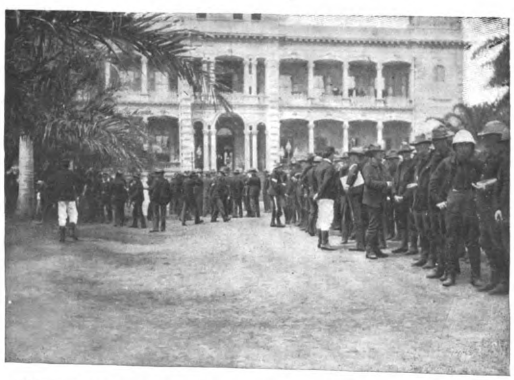
And then there were the slow-pacing stretcher-bearers, with the dying or the insensible, the badly wounded, still figures, with blood often drying brick-color on their hot bandages.

Prostrate at the road-side were many others, who had made their way thus far and were waiting for strength. Everywhere moved the sure-handed, invaluable Red Cross men.

Over this scene was a sort of haze of bullets. They were of two kinds. First, the Spanish lines were firing just a trifle high. Their bullets swept over our firing-lines and poured into this devoted roadway, the single exit, even as it had been the single approach. The second fire was from the guerillas concealed in the trees and in the thickets along the trail. They had come in under the very wings of our strong advance, taken good positions on either side of the road, and were peppering our line of communication whenever they got a good target, no matter, apparently, what the target might be.

Red Cross men, wounded men, sick men, correspondents and attachés were all one to the guerilla.

At a place where the road cut through the crest of the ridge Borrowe and some of his men were working over his dynamite-gun. After the fifth discharge something had got jammed. There was never such devotion to an inanimate thing as these men give to their dynamite-gun. They will quarrel for her, starve for her, lose sleep for her, and fight for her to the last ditch. If they ever get that gun into action again, they will make her hum.



The discomfited Spaniards, recovering from their panic, opened from their second line a most furious fire. It was first directed against one part of our line, and then against another, as if they were feeling for our weakest point, fumbling around after the throat of the army.

The American reply was in measured volleys. Part of a regiment would remain on the firing-line, while the other companies rested near by under the brow of the hill. Parties were sent after the packs. The commands knew with what other organizations they were in touch on the two flanks. Otherwise they knew nothing, save that they were going to hold their ground. They said so.

From our line could be seen a long, gray, Spanish intrenchment, from 400 to 1000 yards away, according to what part of our line one measured from. From it floated no smoke, and no men appeared there, but it was making a noise like a million champagne corks.

The army was dusty, dishevelled, its hair matted to its forehead with sweat, its shirts glued to its back with the same, and indescribably dirty, thirsty, hungry, and aweary from its bundles and its marches and its fights. It sat down on the conquered crest and felt satisfied.

"Well, hell! here we are."

TROOPS FROM THE TRANSPORTS IN FRONT OF THE PALACE, HONOLULU.

BOUND FOR MANILA.

Letter and Illustrations from our Special Correspondent with the Second Expedition.

On Board S.S. "China," June 22.

No place could be better fitted to study the evolution of the citizen into the trained soldier than this transport. We are all packed so closely together that the very proximity breeds confidences. There are on board a few companies of regulars and a large number of volunteers. The regulars are well shaken down, and the relation between officer and man has long since been settled according to the requirements of discipline. But "Jimmy Green," the American volunteer, is at present neither "fish, flesh, nor good red herring." He has lost his individuality as private citizen, and has not yet acquired the repose which comes to the trained soldier. He resembles a child which has reached the "naughty age."

He enlisted a long month ago, with the firm determination of dying for his country at some very distant period. He saw himself charging at the head of the whole army, and finally planting the flag on the walls of Manila, only to be shot down at the heroic moment. In his imagination he pictured a monument erected to his memory in his native town, unveiled with burning speeches by the village fathers. However, it is not given to every soldier to die for his country, and Jimmy Green finds war not at all the vivid succession of intense and pleasing emotions he had thought it. Quite the contrary, it means giving up most of the things that make life comfortable.

COMPANY K, 1st NEBRASKA VOLUNTEERS, CHEERING THE HAWAIIAN FLAG.

If there is one thing that he has always prided himself on, it is that he has never been bossed. Now he is ordered about and made to do that which is not only distasteful to him, but the utility of which he questions. He is required to work hard, and at night to sleep in stifling quarters, "upon uneasy pallets stretching him," kept awake by the spasmodic promptings of seasickness. When he slapped his old chum Billy, now a commissioned officer, on the back yesterday, the latter took him aside and told him he must not do so any more. And yet, with all his trouble, he does his duty without grumbling, and is really a hero without knowing it.

The only complaining I have heard is about the quantity of rations, and here the inexperience of the volunteer officer is plainly to be seen. In some way the same rations which are amply sufficient for the regulars fail to supply the needs of the men under the inexperienced management of the volunteer commissary. I see the rations every day, and must say, as they come to the volunteer, they have been rather scant. However, the volunteer commissary is learning every day. It is noticeable, moreover, that the men do not take kindly to hardtack and want too much meat.

All these family troubles are the result of our system of going to war without being prepared. The resulting difficulties and hardships cannot be avoided, and must be borne. The one adverse criticism that can with justice be made on the organization of our volunteer army is that men have been appointed or elected to positions of responsibility on account of "pull" and popularity rather than any solid qualification for their work. On this account, in some of the departments, all of the hard work falls on the regulars, and they should have the credit of it.

The volunteer officers have, perhaps, more difficulty than their men in adjusting themselves to their new positions, because their duties are more complicated. The great question with them is how to treat the private—to be intimate and yet not to lose dignity. At home in the regiment it was a matter of happy-go-lucky good-fellowship, which will hardly do in actual war-time. One officer exclaimed, the other day, "I am obliged to treat the men sharply in order to bring them into form, and I am getting more unpopular every day."

It will take time to bring about a proper relation between the man of the line and his officer, but, when once established, it will be based on a truer sympathy than

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

FIRST SUNDAY OUT FROM SAN FRANCISCO—CHURCH SERVICE ON TRANSPORT "CHINA."

exists in the armies of Europe. There is one abuse, however, which, if not put a stop to, is likely to prove detrimental to discipline. Owing to the limited number of correspondents allowed on the Philippine expedition, the newspapers of the country have hit on a plan to make Uncle Sam pay for the news they get. I am, so far as I know, the only accredited correspondent on this expedition, and yet there are on this ship alone six enlisted privates who correspond regularly with newspapers at home. These men make no secret of their business, and even go so far as to have "staff correspondent" printed in blood-red letters on their cards. The result is already making itself felt, for these men lead in the complaints which have been made. They are bound to use the press to criticise their officers. Such of the latter as have political aspirations will be afraid of becoming unpopular at home. In other words, these privates will have the power of the press back of them to resist the necessarily unpleasant part of serious discipline. The objection to officers acting as newspaper correspondents is even stronger on account of their position of trust. In no other army with which I have been acquainted are officers or men allowed to do newspaper work.

"JIMMY GREEN" ASHORE AT HONOLULU.

The regulars are not without their trouble, the chief of which seems to be that Congress, after refusing for years to pass the army reform bill, suddenly started in to reform the army at the very time when it should have been left to do its work without being handicapped with intricate changes. Experienced men were taken from each company to give a basis for the four new companies in each regiment. Not content with this, the companies were recruited up from forty-eight men to 104 or 105—the war strength. A few men might have been digested by each company in the short time given for preparation without impairing its efficiency. But an average of sixty-six raw recruits to each company certainly weakens its organic strength.

At the last moment before embarking, a new change was made in the eight regular companies of this expedition. All new recruits were left behind, and twenty-nine experienced men from other companies were added to each of the eight companies. Each company on this expedition counts seventy-five men, of whom twenty-nine are absolutely unknown to their officers, while at the beginning of the war the regular officer knew accurately the capacity of all of his men. In addition to this process of weakening dilution and unadvised changes, all the companies are without their regular quota of officers. These have been promoted to positions in the volunteer service. Some companies have only one officer, and consequently the duties of first lieutenant and second lieutenant fall on the shoulders of non-commissioned officers, who, of necessity, are not equal to the work.

I give all these details to show under what disadvantages the commanders of our forces are laboring, and it seems that, considering the difficulties, the organization and direction of these expeditions have been handled with remarkable smoothness. We carry 3500 men in four transports. In a day or two General Anderson will arrive at Manila with the first expedition of 2500 men. There are at Camp Merritt about 14,000 troops left. The transportation of 20,000 soldiers across the Pacific Ocean constitutes one of the greatest military expeditions of the age. The greatness of the undertaking can only be realized when one remembers that six weeks ago there were no troops, no equipments, and no transports ready.

With sunrise we saw the green hills above Honolulu, and very welcome was the sight to our sea-wearied eyes. A heavy mist hung over the city, which slowly lifted as

(Continued on page 724.)

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

RECIPES SENT FREE.

THE N. Y. Condensed Milk Co., New York, send free upon request a pamphlet of recipes very valuable to housekeepers. They are the proprietors of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk. Best infant food.—[Adv.]

CAN go all day without fatigue—sentiment of women who take ABBOTT'S, the Original Angostura Bitters. —[Adv.]

DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS are the most efficacious stimulant to excite the appetite.—[Adv.]

USE BROWN'S Camphorated Saponaceous DENTIFRICE for the TEETH. 25 cents a jar.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

The Improved
BOSTON GARTER
adds neatness and comfort to the wearing of
LOW SHOES
Keeps the Stocking Free from Wrinkles
DOES NOT BIND
THE Vim Grip CUSHION BUTTON CLASP
Lies Flat to the leg and cannot unfasten accidentally
SOLD EVERYWHERE
Sample Pair by Mail } Silk, 50c Cotton, 25c.
GEORGE FROST CO. BOSTON, MASS.

Distinguished Men who have praised and found comfort and delight in the Rich, Creamy, Refreshing LATHER of

WILLIAMS' SHAVING SOAPS.

Send us the names of any 2 of these men, with a 2c.-stamp to cover postage, and by return mail we will send you a sample cake of Williams' Shaving Soap.

Williams' Shaving Soaps are sold everywhere, but sent by mail if your dealer does not supply you.

Williams' Shaving Stick, 25 cents. Luxury Shaving Tablet, 25 cents.
Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10 cents. Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50 cents.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barber's), 6 round cakes, 1 lb., 40 cts. Exquisite also for toilet.

THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO., Glastonbury, Conn.
LONDON, 64 Great Russell St., W. C. SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA, 161 Clarence St.

Pepsalt...

is the best of table salt, into every grain of which is incorporated digestive substances natural to the stomach. Fill your salt-cellar with Pepsalt and use it in place of salt at your meals. If you have indigestion your stomach does not supply the necessary amount of the dissolving or digestive juices. Pepsalt taken in place of salt at your meals makes good this deficiency, as you take with every mouthful of your food a similar substance to that which is required and at the right time, and your indigestion is a thing of the past.

Send for sample in salt-shaker bottle and try it.

Price 25 cents, postpaid.

THE VAUPEL SAMARITAN CO., 45 Sheriff St., Cleveland, Ohio.

Indigestion Has No Terrors For Him That salt-shaker is filled with Pepsalt

PEPSALT CURES AND PREVENTS INDIGESTION

Olivette Relish

Made of Queen Olives, rare herbs, spices and a delicious sauce. An absolutely new and unique condiment and food combined. Tempting and appetizing. Get a jar at your grocers.
SEVILLE PACKING COMPANY NEW YORK.
EXCLUSIVISTS IN OLIVES AND OLIVE PRODUCTS.

On your Summer Outing take a box of Huyler's
Sent Everywhere by mail or express. 863 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
DELICIOUS BONBONS CHOCOLATES

He is a Public Benefactor Who provides the people With a pure stimulant.
OLD DEARBORN RYE
Bottled in bond, supplies this long-felt want. Sold by all leading dealers. Prescribed by all leading physicians. Write for circular and prices.
W. P. Squibb & Co. Lawrenceburgh, Dearborn County, Ind., Distillers

BOKER'S BITTERS
The oldest and best Specific against dyspepsia; an appetizer and a promoter of digestion.
Ask your Grocer, Liquor Dealer, or Druggist.

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.
Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.
Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(Continued from page 723.)

we entered the harbor. At the wharf a few people with a brass band had already gathered to meet us, but most of Honolulu was still asleep. Gradually it awoke and came down to the wharf. The soldiers were not allowed to leave the ship; and the people expressed disappointment, for they wished to take the soldier and regale him with the best they had, and prove that they were really worthy of annexation. Later the men were marched down a long dusty road to the sea-shore, where they all had a good swim. Between the sand-bar, half a mile out, and the shore 1000 soldiers plunged as in a huge bath-tub. All were afterwards refreshed with a good meal along great tables in the palm-filled garden of the palace, under the green canopy of lofty trees. The girls of Honolulu, in their best frocks of white muslin and bright ribbons, pounced upon the soldiers and strung wreaths of flowers about their necks. Watching the scene, I turned to an old citizen of Honolulu and asked him: "Why do you wish for annexation? You seem perfectly happy without it." He tucked his arm under mine and led me up to lunch at the officers' club, which had opened its heart and its doors wide to the American officers. He stopped me before the club door and pointed out to me a long line of polished quick-firing guns.

"Have you noticed those Maxims? The childlike native sometimes wakes up. We never know when it is coming." On the island the question of annexation is the question of the sugar interest. Take away the reciprocity treaty, and the island is lost, according to the sugar-growers.

Just so long as annexation has not taken place this danger lies before them. The island is very rich, and sugar stock pays from twenty to forty per cent. interest, but great risks are taken by the capital invested. J. F. Bass.

SANTIAGO AND CANEY.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

IN FRONT OF SANTIAGO.

July 2, 1898.

A wooded valley full of wooded hills, and marked here and there by a group of royal palms holding court high above the rolling sweep of green, runs between the coast mountains and the coast hills. Santiago sits at the foot of the valley and just under the sunset—amphitheatrical in shape, and facing the sea. On the other side of the town big spurs from the mountains, and on this side the foot-hills take the water-line for the mouth of Santiago Bay. The march, therefore, has been down this valley, and towards a daily afterglow of such divine peace and beauty that any such hell of human fire and passion as raged under it yesterday seemed out of question for a thousand years. All we have been able to see of Santiago hitherto have been long brick hospitals with Red Cross flags over them; this side of them, the little pagodalike fort of San Juan; this side of it, rifle-pits and a hill, almost vertical, opposite the spot where the road emerges from the woods, but of easier, but nowhere easy, slope to the right; at the base of this a level, green, semicircular, orchardlike little valley, and then the woods through which leads the main road from headquarters to Santiago, and which was the Lane of Death during the battle; and afterwards the way of entrance into Santiago was through the fort of San Juan. But about five miles up the valley to the right, and at the base of the coast mountains, is the quaint little red-roofed town of Caney, with a stone fort to the right of it, and a block-house, to the right, farther still. It would be just as well to take these three in on the way to Santiago to avoid being annoyed in the rear and to bag a few hundred prisoners. So the plan of the battle, so far as any mortal can make it out, seems to have been for General Chaffee to do this bagging as a sort of post-prandial (the troops went into action, however, I believe, without breakfast—certainly without coffee) amusement that would leave the division in a fine mettle to be led into Santiago by General Lawton. Meanwhile General Wheeler and General Kent were to lead their divisions up the main road and join Lawton's division for the advance into Santiago when the work at Caney was done. A battery of four guns was placed to the left, and on one of the foot-hills at a deserted hacienda called El Paso to pound San Juan, and a battery of four guns was placed to the right, and on a high knoll in the valley, to batter down the stone fort and, if necessary, to shell Caney. Both batteries began before seven o'clock, and from that hour, until the charge at four o'clock in the afternoon, there was a steady musket-fire around the block-house, stone fort, and town. The Cubans, who were attacking the block-house, lay out in the bush a mile distant, blazed away their ammunition, and blandly asked for more. General Chaffee stalked up and down his firing-line, swearing affectionately at his men, and getting a button shot from the breast of his blouse, while the men who, at dawn, were slipping through the brush for fear that the Spaniards would see them and run (!) were being potted at the ratio of one out of seven as they hugged the ground—but for all that advancing steadily. The guns had emptied the stone fort, thrown a few shells into the town, but were utterly unable to stir the Spaniards from their rifle-pits. Meanwhile Grimes had opened on San Juan from the left; General Wheeler had marched through the woods; the balloon had floated along high above the woods, directing the Spanish fire accurately to the columns advancing underneath. General Kent had advanced too, and both divisions had deployed to right and left, fighting through the chaparral as a swimmer fights his way through choppy waves, and trying to reform their hopelessly scattered troops into line under a heavy fire that was dropping more officers, in proportion, than men, and everybody was asking, "Where the hell is Chaffee?" General Chaffee was making slowly towards the stone fort about that hour, and was doubtless making up his mind that to take it he would have to do what Kent and Wheeler were forced to do at once, and that was to afford the unparalleled military spectacle of charging with flesh and blood, without preparation by proper artillery fire, and under magazine fire, against an intrenched enemy with unlimited ammunition—and twice that day this spectacle came to pass.

General Hawkins, who was left with only the Sixth and Sixteenth Infantry, saw that he must either withdraw his brigade or lead it forward, and but one of these two movements was possible for that brave old general. His trumpets sounded forward, and in the front line with his men the general himself stepped into the tall grass of that little valley of death, and made for the intrenchments on top of the vertical hill. Colonel Woods's brigade was charging at the same time to the right, and later, the "Rough Riders," who had worked their way to the front, broke through a skirmish-line of regulars, and with Roosevelt leading them on horseback, took a fortified casa to the right—Roosevelt killing a Spaniard with his pistol; and by the time that Kent and Wheeler thus held the first Spanish line of rifle-pits on the crest of the hill, Chaffee was drawing close to charge the stone fort at Caney. By four o'clock both extraordinary feats were done, and the nation should bow low before the American soldier.

There is nothing that daunts the American soldier—defective organization, deficient equipment, hen-coop life on board of transport, heat and fever of tropics, insufficient transportation, lack of food, lack of protection by artillery fire—nothing that daunts the American soldier. I have seen nothing from him but patience, cheerfulness, kindness, and affection for his stanch and dauntless friend—the officer of the line—and nothing, in return, but watchful, self-sacrificing care. There will be others to sing the deeds of the superiors, and always deeds aplenty to be sung, but I lift my voice for the plain soldier and the officer of the line. And what a pleasure it is to have it again proved that there is no better plain soldier than the American gentleman and volunteer!

The killed and wounded are near 1500, although the small bullets, the long range, and the ineffective Spanish artillery fire make it probable that the per cent. of mortality among the wounded will be small. John Fox, Jr.

THE "BOURGOGNE" DISASTER.

BY VICTOIRE LACASSE,

The Only Woman Survivor of the Wreck.

Early in the morning of July 4 I was awakened by the shrill sound of the fog-horn. Unable to sleep, I partly dressed and lay down again. About five o'clock I was startled by a terrible crash, and jumped up screaming.

VICTOIRE LACASSE.

While I finished dressing, my husband went up on deck to see what had happened. Rushing back to me, he said: "We are sinking! Hurry!" I went up half dressed; my husband rushed back to get life-preservers, and we put them on on deck, helping other ladies with theirs, as they did not seem to know how to put them on.

By that time the deck was crowded with people, all with awe-stricken faces, who were standing about, not realizing yet the full extent of the danger, and waiting in ignorance for some one to tell them what to do and where to go.

Among the passengers were several priests; one of them was going about giving a last blessing to the frightened groups of people that knelt around him, resigned to the sad fate which awaited them. The priest was calm and quiet, showing none of the emotion of the other passengers, never giving a thought to his own safety, going about without a life-preserver.

The captain was standing on the bridge, giving orders. His voice was lost in the din of the confusion; his figure stood out against the gray of the sky, and he met his fate with resignation.

Suddenly the ship gave a list on the starboard side, which made it almost impossible for us to stand on our feet. We climbed into a life-boat already filled with frightened men and women. We only staid in it a few minutes, however, as we saw they were not cutting the ropes. My husband made me jump on deck, and dragged me toward a raft on the stern. We hardly had reached it when the ship gave a last lurch to one side, and we both fell into the water near the raft. My husband swam to it, dragging me along. He climbed on it, helped me on to it almost unconscious, and I staid kneeling without a movement. The raft was soon surrounded by a crowd of swimmers, and twenty got on it.

The ship, which had at first slanted sidewise in the water, before sinking turned bow up, and went down with a tremendous noise, made by the rush of air and water. As she went down she gave a fearful roar. It was almost like a human being sinking to his death with a dying gasp.

As the water rushed back over the ship the suction caused a fearful whirlpool, which carried around in its awful turning crowds of bodies of the dead and living covering the surface of the water. The whirlpool spread, and our raft began to be dragged into it, when a piece of wreckage suddenly struck us a blow which threw us out of the course of the whirlpool, and thus got us out of danger. Around us rose cries of human voices calling and imploring for aid. Some poor creatures who were struggling with death would swim to a raft, and when they would reach it, exhausted, would be turned away, every piece of wreckage being overloaded.

The fog which had surrounded us cleared just then, the sun came out on the scene of the disaster, where

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Harper's Catalogue

Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

No. 4711. WHITE ROSE GLYCERINE SOAP.

Transparent as crystal. The strictly hygienic properties and absolute purity, as well as the refined and delicate perfume of this toilet soap, have placed it at the apex of all.

SOLD UNIVERSALLY. SAMPLE CAKE 15 CENTS.

MÜLHENS & KROPFF, U. S. AGENTS, NEW YORK

Nothing has been left undone which could be expected to make them more and more contemporaneous, more and more useful to the hour—at the same time they have a permanent value.—N. Y. Tribune.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

MAGAZINE, $4 00 a year. BAZAR, - - $4 00 a year.

WEEKLY, 4 00 a year. ROUND TABLE, 1 00 a year.

Those Fine English Tobaccos

Put up by W. D. & H. O. WILLS of Bristol, England, and famous the world over for their superb flavor and exquisite aroma, can be obtained for you by your dealer. If he will not get them, write to us for price-list of the well-known brands,

Capstan
Bird's Eye
Westward Ho
Three Castles
Gold Flake, etc.

J. W. SURBRUG, Sole Agent, 159 Fulton Street, NEW YORK.

The Prudential

INSURANCE CO. OF AMERICA

Offers THE BEST OF ALL that is good in Life Insurance.

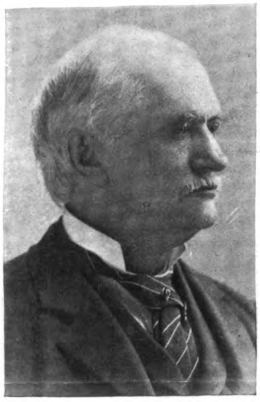
Its profit sharing policies provide for the family in time of need.

HOME OFFICE, NEWARK, N. J.

JOHN F. DRYDEN, - PRESIDENT

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE SINKING OF THE FRENCH LINE STEAMER "LA BOURGOGNE," JULY 4.

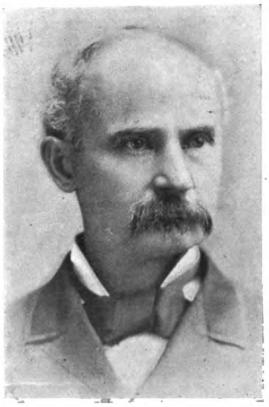


DRAWN BY T. DART WALKER FROM DESCRIPTIONS FURNISHED BY SURVIVORS.

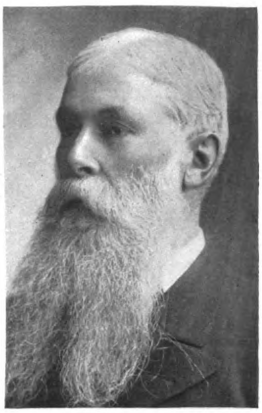
remained only a mass of wreckage, among which were three rafts and one boat, the last being upside down, with about thirty people clinging to it. Two other boats were already far away. A boat filled with women had been unfortunately struck by the funnel of the sinking ship, which caused the loss of the lives of all those in it. Another life-boat, which was filled with men and women, was cut from the davits just as the ship was going down; but it was too late, and, being overcrowded, it sank with all its human load.

For two hours no ship was sighted. It would have been impossible to pass a night on the raft, wet through, as we were partly submerged, hungry, thirsty, and faint. Suddenly a man on board of our raft called out there was a sail in sight. No one believed him at first, but we soon realized that it was truly so. This gave a new energy to us all, and we began to row in that direction. In the mean time our anxiety was terrible for fear the ship would not notice us; but a couple of hours afterwards we came in good sight of her, and realized that it was the ship which had sunk La Bourgogne, as her forward part was all crushed. After what seemed to us ages, a boat was detached and sent to our aid. One of the rafts was taken in tow, and two hours after came our turn. A rope was thrown over to our raft and attached to the forward part. But as a swell came up and raised our raft up, and lowered the boat, the rope snapped in two. Three times we tried again, and finally succeeded in being towed to the side of the Cromartyshire, where we were taken on board, exhausted and sonked through. Never did a place look so beautiful to me as the quiet cabin of this sailing-ship, with its homelike appearance of birds and plants belonging to the captain's wife.

Four hours later the Grecian was sighted and hailed. Small boats took on board the survivors of our ill-fated ship, except my husband and myself. The Cromartyshire was towed by the Grecian to Halifax, where we landed on July 6. Never did any land look to us more comforting and lovely than the banks of Nova Scotia, and we realized more than ever the horrible nightmare we had been through and our narrow escape from death.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



SENATOR MORGAN, OF ALABAMA.
Photograph by Bell.

SENATOR CULLOM, OF ILLINOIS.

CONGRESSMAN HITT, OF ILLINOIS.
Photograph by Bell.

PRESIDENT DOLE OF HAWAII.

COMMISSIONERS APPOINTED BY PRESIDENT McKINLEY FOR FRAMING LAWS FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII.

THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

I.

Two chapters in the story hold most of the plot: two periods separated by a century will take us, if we can realize them, in an instant, almost, and in a glance of the eye, to the essential and significant thing in Hawaiian history. The first period is that of the conquests of Kamehameha I., or Kamehameha the Great—as great a savage as one would have cared to know—and this period includes also the extension and maintenance of his rule as savage autocrat of the island group. And that seems only yesterday, in one way. Kamehameha's war-cloak of mamo feathers draped the bier of Kalakaua in 1891, when the body of the last of the kings lay in state. Into the second period we may gather, and gather without crowding (as three gold pieces may lie easily in a pocket), the overthrow of the monarchy, the establishment of a republic, and annexation to the United States. News of the day, as this page is written, comes in the form of a despatch telling us that the Hawaiian Islands have been attached to the Department of California, now under the command of Major-General Merriam; that orders were issued to-day assigning, for the time being, the First New York Volunteer Regiment of Infantry to the Department of California, for duty at Honolulu.

II.

When Captain Cook, seeking a northern passage from the Pacific to the Atlantic in 1778, happened upon this isolated, strangely beautiful outpost of the Western Hemisphere, he noted its attractions to good purpose, and with an enthusiasm that betrays itself in a tendency to exaggerate certain details. A year later, in the winter of 1779, he returned from Alaska, to be worshipped as a god for a time, and then to be killed by the natives, who took that emphatic means of expressing their remonstrance against the human frailties of this bluff famous navigator.

Kamehameha, a nephew of Chief (or King) Kalaniopuu, was living in Hawaii at the time, and, tradition says, was a witness of this tragedy. Now Kalaniopuu died in 1782, and in the division of his estates Kamehameha got control of two districts in the island. The assassination of his only prominent rival, the late King's son, made him lord of the remaining districts in 1791; then by force, by craft, and especially by enlisting the services of English sailors (who appear to have been delighted to do their part with fire-arms and fire-water), he became overlord of at least seven of the eight inhabited islands. This result was attained in 1810. Meantime (1792–1794) Captain George Vancouver visited Hawaii several times, with a better motive and with beneficent results, for he brought cattle and sheep, unknown before, and gifts of seeds and useful plants. Kamehameha died in 1819—not before long-continued success had proved his wisdom in holding and governing new territory (a little empire, in fact), as well as splendid talent for extending his boundaries. The total area of these eight islands is one-third greater than that of Connecticut—not a small matter to keep in hand when voyages from one island to another were made in war-canoes.

That was the heroic age of Hawaii, when its population of Kanakas was perhaps ten times as numerous as at present, and the 300,000 Kanaka men and women were physically as superb, maybe, as those distant South Sea cousins of theirs with whom Robert Louis Stevenson made us so well acquainted. Certainly no other savage or barbarian, in all the stories of all the Pacific islands, is Kamehameha's superior. The race that produced him had possibilities within itself.

But just what possibilities we shall never know. In 1891 (Kalakaua then lying in state under Kamehameha's feather cloak) only 34,436 pure Hawaiians were left, with 6186 half-castes, in a total population of 89,900. In other words, only forty-five per cent. of the total population of the country were then pure Hawaiians or half-castes, while the foreigners—Japanese, Chinese, Portuguese, and other Europeans and Americans—constituted fifty-five per cent. The census of 1896 shows a further loss for one element and gains for the other elements, as follows: Hawaiians, 31,019; part Hawaiians, 8485; Americans, 3086; British, 2250; Germans, 1432; French, 101; Norwegians, 378; Portuguese, 15,191; Japanese, 24,407; Chinese, 21,616; South Sea Islanders, 455; other nationalities, 600—total population, 109,020. So far as the pure Hawaiians are concerned, this means a decrease of 9.9 per cent. between the years 1890 and 1896. In 1832 the native population was about 130,000. It is apparent from these figures that the rate of decrease among aborigines has of late been somewhat checked, but this is inconsiderable in view of all the circumstances.

And with this statement we find that we have advanced from the beginning to the end of the century; that we are already in the midst of the second period, and know how to explain its happenings.

Liliuokalani was made Queen on the 29th of January, 1891. Two years later, when she had "announced her intention to arbitrarily promulgate a new constitution," as the report of the Committee of Safety put it, a popular uprising dispossessed her. The Hawaiian monarchical system of government was abrogated, and a provisional government was proclaimed, January 17, 1893; and at this juncture the United States cruiser Boston (Captain Wiltse), which had opportunely arrived three days before, landed a force of 162 officers and men—marines and bluejackets—with a Gatling gun and a 37-millimetre revolving gun, to protect the lives and property of American citizens. Professor Alexander, in his History of the later Years of the Hawaiian Monarchy and the Revolution of 1893, makes the very cautious statement that "the knowledge of the fact that the United States troops were on shore undoubtedly served to repress disorder, and gave the community a grateful sense of security. There was a band concert at the Hawaiian Hotel that evening, which was well attended!"

Commissioners sent to this country to ask for annexation reached Washington at the beginning of February; our minister at Honolulu assumed a protectorate February 9, and President Harrison's message of February 15 recommended annexation. Two days later an envoy of Queen Liliuokalani came to win sympathy and aid for a lost cause, and presently the governments of other nations as well were addressed in favor of her restoration. The treaty of annexation was withdrawn by President Cleveland, who sent ex-Representative James H. Blount, of Georgia, as a special commissioner to take evidence and report the actual condition of affairs (March 11). By Mr. Blount's order our flag was removed from the government building in Honolulu. On May 9 Mr. Blount was appointed Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to the Hawaiian Islands; on the 22d of August he returned to Washington; Albert S. Willis, of Kentucky, received his appointment as minister a fortnight later, and presented his credentials to President Dole, of the Provisional Government, November 7. The ardent controversy that accompanied these "moves," here so briefly stated, makes an interesting chapter by itself; it is not essential in this story, for events proved that the actual power had passed out of Kanaka hands. On July 4, 1894, the Republic of Hawaii was proclaimed, with Sanford B. Dole as President. The commercial relations of the new republic with this country were so intimate that in 1895 the United States took 99.04 per cent. of all Hawaiian exports (total value in that year, $8,474,138 15), while supplying 79.04 per cent. of all Hawaiian imports (total value in 1895, $5,714,017 54). On July 6, 1898, the United States Senate, by a two-thirds vote, passed the Newlands annexation resolution. President McKinley's signature was affixed the next day.

III.

The change wrought during the years that intervened between the apotheosis of Captain Cook and the landing of Captain Wiltse's marines should be shown with rather more detail, for it is perhaps the most perfect example that history offers of the displacement of vigorous barbarians without violence.

While Kamehameha I. lived the King was all—the strongest, bravest, and most skilful warrior; absolute master of the land, and of every life and of every product; defender also of the ancient religion. His reign extended to May 8, 1819. The first American missionaries (from Boston) arrived April 4, 1820. It has been customary to ascribe all the changes to the efforts of Bingham and Thurston and their successors, but the records will not support any such contention. Disintegration of the old system had been begun by European man-o'-war's men, who could work incredible destruction with their powder and shot. These Europeans believed that mere men were superior to the forces of nature which the Hawaiians had blindly worshipped. The Hawaiian, accordingly, learned part of an indispensable lesson from rough seamen.

Kamehameha II. publicly defied the system of "tabu" in October, 1819; the idols and their temples were burnt; and when Bingham and Thurston reached Kailaua Bay, April 4, 1820, some of the rough preliminary work had already been done. The fact seems to be, therefore, that the islanders got the seed of their new faith at a time when the old faith had been uprooted.

In 1823 Kamehameha II. (or Liholiho), accompanied by his wife and six chiefs, visited England. A few weeks after arrival the King and Queen were attacked by disease, and died. Their remains were taken back by Lord Byron (the poet's cousin), commanding the frigate Blonde.

The first treaty between the Hawaiian Islands and the United States was concluded in 1826. In the following year Roman Catholic missionaries from France arrived, but never quite succeeded in making themselves at home. In 1832 they were deported to California. Returning in 1837, they barely secured the privilege of landing; and this permission was positively withheld from other representatives of the same faith and nationality. The French frigate Artémise reached Honolulu July 9, 1839, requiring an indemnity of $20,000, and a proclamation of full religious liberty. Of course this demand was acceded to; in fact, a "declaration of rights" preceded it by a month, and an edict of toleration by several weeks.

In 1840 the first constitution was proclaimed, providing for a legislature to consist of two houses, on the English plan. Between 1840 and 1843 a series of disputes with France and England culminated in a provisional cession to England, February 25, 1843, which was declined by the government of that country. Near the close of the year a joint declaration by France and England was published, recognizing the independence of the islands, and engaging "never to take possession, either directly or under the title of protectorate, or under any other form, of any part of the territory of which they are composed."

Liberty with a French, English, and American accent was speaking to these islanders who half a century before had been slaves of a clever savage chieftain. But America was coming very near, through the settlement of California. In 1850 the suggestion of a United States protectorate was declined by our government. A constitution providing for universal suffrage in the choice of members of the lower house was adopted in 1852.

The election of David Kalakaua as successor to King William Lunalilo, in 1874, brought to the already insecure office a person whose arbitrary methods alienated his friends, and whose dishonest practices utterly destroyed the credit of the monarchy. But instead of rehearsing the scandals of his reign, we may prefer to remember that they were personal, and therefore all covered (after he had died at San Francisco, in 1891, and after the cruiser Charleston had carried his remains back to Honolulu) by the yellow-feather mantle of the founder of the dynasty—who, "when six spears were cast at once at him, caught three, parried two, and avoided the sixth by a quick movement of the body," as Vancouver relates.

Which brings us back to the point of departure.

MARRION WILCOX.

GHOSTS.

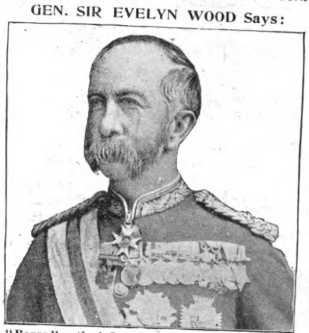
SADLY and mistily they wander
By land and sea,
I watch them roaming here and yonder
Untiringly.
They pass before me like dim seemings
Of living things,
Then melt into the faint star-gleamings
On viewless wings.

Some smile, I think, and some are weeping,
As if they knew
That passionate hearts are striving, reaping,
To crown the few;
That grief is still the lot of many,
That death alone
Is the one certain peace for any,
The one end known.

They pass before me, shadows merely,
In drifting hosts,
Holding their shrouded heads austerely—
These silent ghosts.
These ghosts whose long-forgotten voices
And sightless eyes
Remind me that nature still rejoices,
Though all life dies.

GEORGE EDGAR MONTGOMERY.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NEVER HAS ANYTHING BEEN SO HIGHLY AND SO JUSTLY PRAISED AS

VIN MARIANI

MARIANI WINE, the FAMOUS TONIC for BODY, NERVES and BRAIN.

GEN. SIR EVELYN WOOD Says:

"Regarding the infantry marching in the recent manœuvres, it was the best seen during my command at Aldershot. Many officers availed themselves of the Mariani Wine, the most certain as well as the most palatable method of inducing resistance to fatigue."
From "The London Sketch."

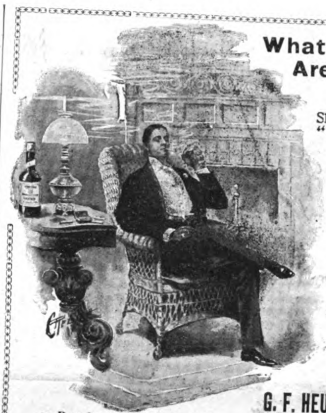
MAX O'RELL,
The Renowned Writer and Lecturer, Writes:

Your Vin Mariani is positively marvellous; one glass put me on my feet; one bottle made a new man of me.
Yours gratefully, MAX O'RELL.

MARIANI WINE is invaluable at this season of the year, when, owing to trying climatic conditions, the system is especially susceptible to attacks of debility and prostration.

VIN MARIANI (MARIANI WINE) has stood the test of thirty-five years' trial. It has written endorsements from more than 8000 American physicians, in addition to having received cordial recommendations from royalty, princes of the Church and of the State, and many notable personages.

MARIANI WINE is a tonic prepared upon careful scientific principles. It contains absolutely no injurious properties. It gives power to the brain, strength to the entire nervous system, firmness and elasticity to the muscles, and richness to the blood. It has been aptly described as a promoter of good health and longevity.



MARIANI WINE is specially indicated for General Debility, Weakness from whatever causes, Overwork, Profound Depression and Exhaustion, Throat and Lung Diseases, Consumption, Malaria and La Grippe.

MARIANI WINE is an adjuvant in convalescence and a powerful rejuvenator. For Overworked Men, Delicate Women, Sickly Children it Works Wonders. Taken with cracked ice, it relieves Summer Prostration quickly and effectually. It soothes, strengthens and sustains the system.

To those who will kindly write to MARIANI & CO., 52 West 15th Street, New York City, will be sent, free, book containing portraits with endorsements of Emperors, Empress, Princes, Cardinals, Archbishops, and other interesting matter.

ALL DRUGGISTS. AVOID SUBSTITUTIONS.
PARIS: 41 Boulevard Haussman. LONDON: 83 Mortimer Street. MONTREAL: 28-30 Hospital Street.

What Are Club Cocktails?

"A MODERN ECSTASY" is a Shakespearian definition for a "Cocktail." "Kings it makes gods, and meaner creatures kings."

Wherever good livers are found, wherever conviviality exists, even to the most remote corners of the earth, the "CLUB COCKTAIL" reigns supreme as a fashionable drink.

The "CLUB COCKTAILS" never vary; they are always the same. The secret of their perfect blend is that they are kept six months before being drawn off and bottled.

"Cocktails" that are served over the bar do not contain these indispensable qualities.

Seven Varieties: Manhattan, Martini, Vermouth, Holland Gin, York, Tom Gin, Whisky.

For sale by all first-class dealers.

39 Broadway, New York, N. Y. G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., Sole Proprietors. Hartford, Conn. London.

WONDERFUL TRIEDER BINOCULARS

½ Actual Size.

Prices Range From $44.50 to $72.50.

Have 8 to 10 times the power of the best of the old-style field and opera glasses.

Pocket size—invaluable for Army and Navy, War Correspondents, Race Meets, Regattas, Travel, and the Theatre.

Send for Descriptive Catalogue. For sale by leading jewelers and opticians throughout the United States. Among them:

New York—Theodore B. Starr, F. G. Schmidt.
Brooklyn—J. B. Hoecker, 332 Fulton St.
Chicago—C. D. Peacock, Spaulding & Co., Hyman, Berg & Co., N. Watzy, H. Borsch.
Philadelphia—Queen & Co., Bonschur & Holmes.
Washington—Franklin & Co., Moore & Leding, D. N. Walford.
Boston—Pinkham & Smith.
St. Louis—A. S. Aloe Co., Erker Bros.
San Francisco—Hirsch & Kayser.

C. P. GOERZ, 52 Union Sq. (East), N. Y. City

The Best is the Cheapest

Rae's Olive Oil is both the best and cheapest, quality considered.

The Chemical Analysis of S. Rae & Co.'s Finest Sublime Lucca Oil, made Sept. 15th, 1896, by the Ledoux Chemical Laboratory, declares it to be "unadulterated by admixture with any other oil or other substance. It is free from rancidity and all other undesirable qualities, and it is of Superior Quality and Flavor."

S. RAE & CO., Leghorn, Italy.

Established 1836.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak

We originated and patented the Kodak. We originated and registered the word Kodak. "Kodak" is our exclusive trade-mark and refers only to film cameras of our manufacture. Do not accept any other camera as a Kodak.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

Revolvers never disappoint.
15 Stockbridge St., SPRINGFIELD, - - MASS.

The Biographical Thackeray

The authorized life of Thackeray has, in accordance with his own expressed desire, never been written. His life is in his books, and Mrs. Ritchie has written, as an introduction to each volume, a memoir of the book itself. The illustrations are by the Author, Richard Doyle, George du Maurier, Frederick Walker, George Cruikshank, Sir J. E. Millais, P.R.A., Luke Fildes, R.A., Charles Keene, Frank Dicksee, R.A., and F. Barnard. Several facsimiles of manuscript are given, as well as portraits of the author, hitherto unpublished.

ALREADY PUBLISHED:

April 15: Vanity Fair. May 17: Pendennis. June 17: Yellowplush Papers, Etc.

JUST PUBLISHED:

The Memoirs of Barry Lyndon, Esq.

The Fitzboodle Papers; Catharine; Men's Wives, etc. With Sixteen full-page Illustrations by Sir J. E. Millais, P.R.A., and Luke Fildes, R.A., fourteen wood-cuts by the Author, and a Biographical Introduction by Mrs. Anne Thackeray Ritchie.

The other volumes will be issued in the following order: 5. "Sketch Books," etc. 6. "Contributions to Punch." 7. "Esmond," etc. 8. "Newcomes." 9. "Christmas Books," etc. 10. "Virginians." 11. "Philip," etc. 12. "Denis Duval," etc. 13. "Miscellanies," etc. The entire edition will be completed by April 15, 1899.

W. M. Thackeray's Complete Works. Biographical Edition. Comprising Additional Material and Hitherto Unpublished Letters, Sketches, and Drawings. Derived from the Author's Original Manuscripts and Note-books. Edited by the Author's Surviving Daughter, Mrs. ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE. 13 volumes. To be issued monthly, as far as possible in chronological order. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Uncut Edges and Gilt Tops, $1 50 per volume.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York

CHEW

Beeman's

The Original

Pepsin Gum

Cures Indigestion and Sea-sickness.

All Others Are Imitations.

MAGIC LANTERNS WANTED AND FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE. HARBACH & CO. 809 Filbert St. Phila. Pa.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1
"Aha! a great idea! Make lots of pesetas!"

2
"Don't get excited! Throw only the balls!—throw only the balls!"

3
"Caramba! They all aimed at the American and never touched him. But just see what else they hit!"

AS THEY DO IT IN HAVANA.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER

Makes delicious hot biscuit, griddle cakes, rolls and muffins.

An absolutely pure, cream of tartar powder.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

In Twenty Minutes
delicious soup may be made by using as "stock"
Armour's Extract of BEEF
instead of the old-fashioned soup-bone, and, in addition, time and fuel—and frequently temper—will be saved. The result will be a beautifully clear soup, possessed of a delightful flavor, and entirely free from grease. That instructive little book, "Culinary Wrinkles," mailed free upon application.
Armour & Company, Chicago.

Arnold Constable & Co.
Ladies' Furnishings
Shirt Waists.
Piqué, Chambray, Black Lawn, Linon.
Lawn Dressing Sacques, Dimity Wrappers,
Cambric Underwear,
Summer-Weight Corsets.
Bathing-Suits.
Broadway & 19th st.
NEW YORK.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.
Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.
Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.
A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.
Correspondence solicited.

Summer Resorts
LELAND'S OCEAN HOUSE, NEWPORT, R. I.
Opens June 25. Write for booklet.
WARREN LELAND, Jr., Manager.

TRADE E&W MARK. EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS BEST IN THE WORLD.

"Contains as much flesh-forming matter as beef."
Walter Baker & Co.'s
Breakfast Cocoa
"Has stood the test of more than one hundred years' use among all classes of people, and for purity and honest worth is unequalled." —Medical and Surgical Journal.
TRADE-MARK.
Costs Less Than ONE CENT a Cup.
Our Trade-Mark on Every Package.
WALTER BAKER & CO. Ltd.
DORCHESTER, MASS.

IT ONLY WEIGHS 10 POUNDS
Makes a small package when deflated, and can be carried anywhere by anybody.
"PERFECTION" Air Mattresses
are a modern invention for Campers and Yachtsmen—they are waterproof, never become musty—and make a most comfortable and luxurious bed. Made to fit any irregular shape of bunks or cockpit.
Send for our illustrated catalogue.
MECHANICAL FABRIC CO.
Air Goods Department, Providence, R. I.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE,
thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

Joseph Gillott's
STEEL PENS.
GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

New Edition of
WILL CARLETON'S POEMS

WILL CARLETON

Mr. WILL CARLETON has thoroughly revised his volumes of poems, correcting some trifling errors, and omitting a few poems that he does not care to have in his collected works. This edition has been set from new type, and every care has been given to make it worthy of the great popularity accorded Mr. Carleton's work in the past; and in its handier form and new dress it is sure to appeal to the large circle of his admirers.

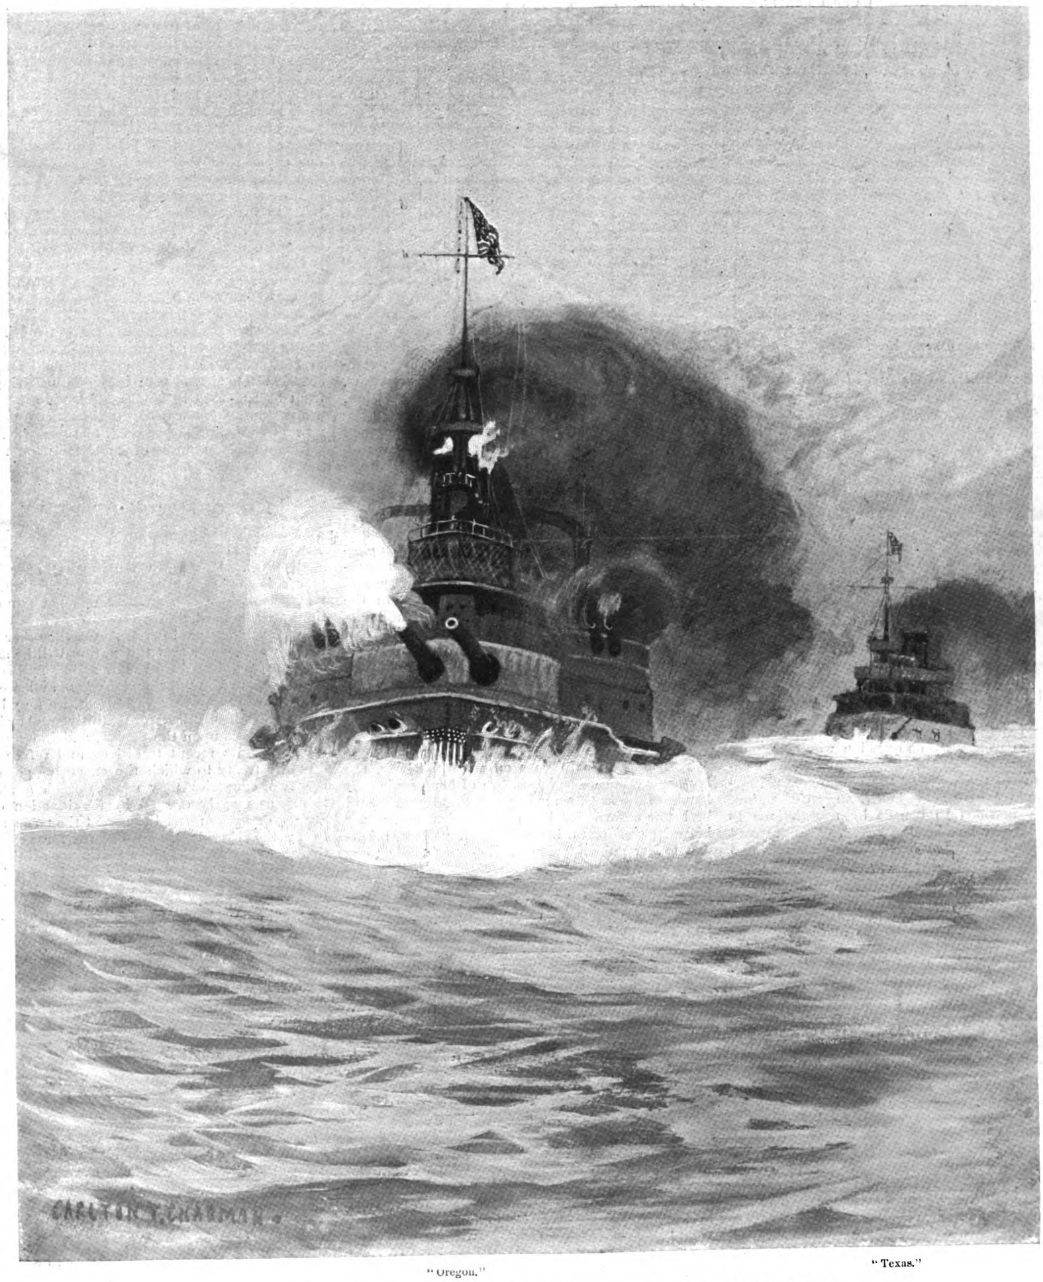
FARM BALLADS
FARM LEGENDS
FARM FESTIVALS
CITY BALLADS
CITY LEGENDS
CITY FESTIVALS

Illustrated. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25 per volume

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York and London

"AMERICA'S GREAT RESORTS," 48 pages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent stamp by GEORGE H. DANIELS, C. P. A. New York Central, New York.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



SANTIAGO NUMBER—ARMY AND NAVY—28 PAGES.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2171.
Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 30, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

"Oregon." "Texas."

AN AMERICAN BATTLE-SHIP "IN THE DAY OF BATTLE."

THE "OREGON" OVERHAULING THE "VIZCAYA" AND "CRISTÓBAL COLON" AT A 16-KNOT PACE, OFF SANTIAGO, JULY 3.

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, JULY 30, 1898

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

This Paper will be the best Pictorial History of the War with Spain, as it was of the War of 1861. Its Special Artists and Correspondents are following the Army and Navy, and notable Events in Washington and elsewhere will be accurately portrayed.

| ARTISTS. | CORRESPONDENTS. |
|---|---|
| CARLTON T. CHAPMAN. | JOHN FOX, JR. |
| RUFUS F. ZOGBAUM. | FRANK D. MILLET. |
| FREDERIC REMINGTON. | JOHN F. BASS. |
| T. DE THULSTRUP. | O. K. DAVIS. |
| W. A. ROGERS. | HAROLD MARTIN, |
| T. DART WALKER. | AND OTHERS. |

Messrs. MILLET, BASS, and DAVIS are in Manila or on their way thither, Mr. WALKER is with General MILES'S Expedition against Puerto Rico, and Mr. MARTIN at Santiago.

THE Emperor of Germany is not unfriendly to us to the point of desiring hostile relations on account of the Philippines. His former subjects who are now American citizens, in suggesting the presentation of a battle-ship by them to this country, are probably giving utterance to a sentiment more nearly like that of the people of the German Empire than is that which apparently animates the impolite officers of Admiral VON DIEDRICHS'S fleet. We have little to fear from Germany except that exasperating reports of German misdeeds at Manila may increase the desire of the American people to keep the Philippines.

THE Spaniards and Cubans of Santiago are to have a taste of American administration of the best character. President MCKINLEY, in an admirable paper, full of justice and humanity, as well as of sound sense, has laid down the law for the surrendered province. The merchants are to receive goods from all countries on payment of the lowest duties—that is, the duties heretofore charged on Spanish merchandise. The rights of persons and of property are to be respected, and the laws as they exist are to continue to be administered by the Spanish judges. The administration of the law will be under the supervision of United States army officers, and will therefore be honest—something entirely new in respect to Cuban affairs.

NEWFOUNDLAND'S wish to be represented at the Quebec conference threatens complications incompatible with the scope of the negotiations. If restricted to the discussion of closer commercial relations with this country, such representation may well be permitted; but the introduction of the west shore fishery rights question would at once cause a protest from France, and an indefinite enlargement of the work of the conference. Newfoundland has long held aloof from confederation, although anxious to benefit by negotiations to which Canada has been a party. The present disorganized condition of the island's trade and finances calls loudly for some relief, and there is little doubt that a reciprocity treaty with the United States would be welcomed on lines similar to the BOND-BLAINE treaty of a few years ago. The disallowance of that treaty by the mother-country has since been looked upon as a precedent to discourage the separate action of Newfoundland whenever interests common to that colony and the Dominion are concerned. The general question of the fisheries, apart from the west shore difficulty, is a case in point. To our government the matter is of some importance, as possibly demanding a sharper limitation of certain questions awaiting settlement, and a refusal to entertain them if likely to lead to extra-continental considerations.

THERE is a growing belief in this country that we are henceforth to play a larger part in the world's affairs than we have ever played before, and that this is true is shown clearly enough by the expansion of our foreign commerce. The old walls erected and maintained by the protectionists are breaking down before the peaceful assaults of trade. We are discovering the mutual profit of that intimate relationship which is essential to complete growth, and which cannot prosper except through peace. We say this fully realizing that commercial jealousies and colonial adventures for the expansion of commerce are accountable, more than any other cause, for the present warlike attitude of the nations of Europe, and for the danger of militarism which is threatening this country in consequence of our defeat of Spain, our occupation of her territory, and the temptation held out to us to make England's cause in China our own by undertaking the government of the Philippines. But commerce eventually will overcome war, and when that day comes a colony will be no more valuable to the mother-country than to any other power with which she can trade on equal terms, and not so valuable as to the power that can undersell the mother-country. Protected Europe may secure an expansion through the cost of war, but England has secured her territorial greatness by her liberal trade policy. We can follow her example if we will, and make the distant parts of the world our own by stimulating our commerce along the lines in which it is now flowing and expanding; or we may follow the example of Germany and France, and tax our citizens for making trade for the few, just as we have heretofore taxed them for the enrichment of our protected manufacturers. We can have profitable commerce and civilization with peace, or burdens and barbarism with war.

IT is true, as Mr. HILL asserts, that Governor BLACK'S Election Bureau bill is "based upon the assumption that the people of the city of New York are unable or unwilling to enforce the election and registration laws at their own home." Therefore Governor BLACK proposes that the State shall perform the duty which the people of the city fail or neglect to perform. But this is modern politics. The people of no community in this State—and this is true of other States, for that matter—are able or willing to perform their political duties. Their inability is due to their surrender of their political power to bosses, who are as much personal rulers as the Emperor of Germany or the Czar of Russia. CROKER is the ruler of this city, and PLATT is, or has been, the ruler in the State. These two, having come together, agreed that elections in the city should be controlled by Police Commissioners, composed of friends of the two irresponsible tyrants, each tyrant having two friends on the Commission. Mr. HILL seems to think that because the Mayor appointed these Commissioners, New York city had home-rule to that extent. Not at all, for the people of New York city had nothing whatever to do with the matter, any more than they will have to do with the Supervisor whom Governor BLACK expects to appoint. The reason why Governor BLACK wants to run elections in the city is because he is out with PLATT. He ought not to run elections here, and his measure is bad, as well as unconstitutional, but the system that he replaces, and which left the management of elections in the hands of PLATT and CROKER, was no more a home-rule feature than is Governor BLACK'S scheme, and Mr. HILL is mistaken if he supposes it to be. Home-rule means that the municipal family shall rule the household, not that one of the members of the family, like VAN WYCK, for example, shall act as the agent for absolute rulers like PLATT and CROKER.

THE longer Spain goes on with this war, the harder is going to be the future of her people. It has been the fact for many years that Spain would be better off without her colonies, because, under her misgovernment, her colonies have been a burden to her public treasury, while their commerce has been absorbed by more competent and enterprising nations. Spain has within herself resources sufficient to make her people happy and prosperous and her government stable. If she had dropped Cuba and the Philippines long ago, she would now be well advanced towards solvency, provided her statesmen had turned their attention to her economic condition. We believe she has statesmen who can do this, and who can accomplish practical results in this direction. But in order to set about it with any hope of success, peace should be established as soon as possible. Every day of this war plunges the Spaniards deeper and deeper into insolvency, and if Spain consults her feelings rather than her interest she will come out of the war eventually not only stripped of all her colonial possessions, but so burdened with taxation, so ruined in her credit—such a bankrupt, in short—that revolution is likely to be her lot for years to come, unless, for their own protection, stronger powers of the continent take her in hand, and either divide her up or put her in the hands of a receiver. In any event, the Spanish people have already a hard road before them, and the present and succeeding generations are likely to be burdened with all the taxation that their industry and the fruitfulness of their land can bear. If peace is much longer postponed they cannot bear the burden that full payment of every debt will necessitate. We wish, for their sakes as well as for our own, that the Spanish people would insist upon putting an end to a conflict the result of which is not only inevitable, but is now seen to be inevitable by every intelligent man in Europe, including the Spaniards themselves.

THERE is a good deal of food for reflection in the commercial statistics of the country for the fiscal year which ended on the 30th of June. Notwithstanding the increase in our rates of duties, there has been a very important reduction in our public revenues from customs taxation. This, however, is a phase of our commercial system with which the country has been long familiar, and of which it is growing weary, even the manufacturers becoming accustomed to the belief that the country will not always consent to play the part of a pelican in their behalf. The growth of our export trade is the important fact of the year's statistics. Owing to the falling off in imports, or in what we ought to have expected from them, the exports are double our receipts from abroad, leaving what is called a balance of trade in our favor of $615,259,024. This is more than twice as great as the balance of 1897. How enormous the difference is may be judged from the fact that only in the years 1878, 1879, 1881, 1892, 1894, 1897, and 1898 has the balance reached $200,000,000, and in the best of the years enumerated except 1898—that is, in 1897—the balance was but $286,263,144. The actual value of our exports for the year 1898 was $1,231,311,868. Ten years before, for the year 1888, the export trade of the country was $695,954,507. Last year our exports to Africa amounted to $17,000,000 as against $3,000,000 in 1888. During the decade our exports to Japan increased from $4,000,000 to $21,000,000; to China, from $4,500,000 to $10,000,000; to Austria-Hungary, from $500,000 to $5,000,000; to Belgium, from $10,000,000 to $47,000,000; to Denmark, from $3,000,000 to $12,000,000; to the Netherlands, from $16,000,000 to $65,000,000; to France, from $40,000,000 to $100,000,000; to Germany, from $56,500,000 to $150,000,000; to British North America, from $38,000,000 to $85,000,000; to the United Kingdom, from $362,000,000 to $540,000,000. Moreover, the proportion of exports of manufactured goods is now large, being 29 per cent. of the whole. The aggregate of exports of manufactures reaches nearly $300,000,000.

THE QUESTION OF PEACE.

PEACE is within our power. It rests with this country to determine the time when the war shall cease. How and when we shall exercise the power is matter for serious consideration. We may permit Spain to understand that our conditions will be hard, and we shall continue to have war for a long time to come. On the other hand, we may assure her that the nation will be as generous to its defeated foe as our sailors and soldiers have been to CERVERA and TORAL, and we may have peace at any time. At least, we may have a cessation of hostilities; for definitive and technical peace depends upon the Senate, which may possibly follow its recent traditions and refuse to accept any treaty to which the executive powers of the two countries may agree. Such a state of things as may be created by the inaction of the Senate, or by its refusal to accept the terms agreed to by the President, may endure for years, and there may nevertheless be a real peace all the time. The President has the matter in his own hands. He may accept overtures and may conclude a treaty. If his treaty require the evacuation of any part of Spanish territory by American forces, he can carry out that requirement while the Senate is debating his treaty, or, better still, before it meets for its consideration.

The question as to the prospects of peace depends entirely upon the terms which we are to exact from Spain. If by these terms she is left with something that she will inevitably or probably lose by a continuation of the war, peace may be had very soon. If, however, our demands, if acceded to, would strip Spain of all her colonial possessions, or would humiliate her beyond endurance, she would probably continue the war for the simple reason that if she is to lose all in any event, she would prefer to lose gloriously by fighting to the death, than to give up while she still possesses soldiers and other resources. As the London Spectator says: "If the American people desire that the terms should be hard they will be hard, and, as we think, they will be too hard to tempt Spaniards to abandon their ideas as to what in the way of resistance is demanded of them by honor. There will be peace, no doubt, in the end. Indeed, when bull-dog and blood-hound meet in combat there always is peace, serene peace—for the survivor."

This question of terms is one of great and imme-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

diate importance. The determination which we reach will mean either peace or a continuation of the war, and in the continuation of the war is involved the problem of expansion. Nothing that can happen to us, we think, will go so far to make this country a colonial power like France and Germany, but not at all like England, as the continuation of the war against Spain. The passion of the people, with whom the decision ultimately rests, will be more and more inflamed by the stubborn resistance of the Spaniards, by every battle that is made necessary by such resistance, by the loss of American lives, by the piling up of war expenses, already enormous, by the interruption and depression of trade which is sure to come sooner or later. Besides, we are beginning to believe that we have been mistaken as to the character of the Cuban insurgents; that instead of being a worthy and heroic people struggling for their liberty and for self-government, their soldiers in the field at least are worthless and half barbarous, willing to take what we are ready to give for nothing, willing to stand passively and cowardly by while American soldiers are shot down in what they regard as their own cause, and eager to claim the fruits of our victories, to which they have shamefully neglected to contribute. The Spaniards whom they have shot at most eagerly were the poor victims of CERVERA's fleet as they swam ashore from their wrecked ships. On these helpless men the Cubans seem to have been willing to do murder, but when it came to fighting armed Spaniards in the open, they left that dangerous work to our troops. The war will not have to last much longer before the American people will conclude, unjustly no doubt, that these barbarians in the eastern end of the island are typical Cubans, and will make up their minds that such a people do not possess the capacity for self-government. Not much more fighting, either, will be necessary to convince a large number of Americans that the Philippines ought not to be left under the government of Spain, nor at the tender mercies of the insurgents. In a word, as the war goes on, the chances that we shall keep whatever territory we conquer are stronger and stronger.

The time has not yet passed, however, when we may make peace on the terms on which we began the war; and if we do that, our problem is settled; while if we go on until it becomes impossible or difficult to give up Cuba, or the Philippines, or Puerto Rico, or the Ladrones either to their people or to Spain, we shall be forced to face new political problems, national and international, of the gravest character. Our right to begin the war, or to intervene, as set forth by the President in his message to Congress of April 11, rested on four grounds: first, the cause of humanity; second, our duty to protect our own citizens in Cuba; third, the injury to commerce caused by the "wanton destruction of property and devastation of the island"; fourth, the menace to our peace caused by the condition of Cuba. The resolutions in pursuance of which war was declared stated that the reason for the war was "the abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than three years in the island of Cuba." They then declared that the "people of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent"; that it was the duty of the United States to demand that Spain "relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba, and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters." The resolutions then authorized the President "to use the entire land and naval force of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect." Finally Congress disclaimed, on the part of the United States, "any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty or control over the island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people."

The war was begun, therefore, for the liberation of Cuba, and the President's authority to carry it on is actually limited to the accomplishment of the task of driving Spain out of the island. That object accomplished, the professed reason for the war ceases to exist, while we are under a solemn promise to withdraw, and to leave the "government and control of the island to its people." It is true that we have a right to indemnity and to security against the future, and to that end we control Manila and shall control Puerto Rico. Moreover, it is also true that either the Spaniards or the Cubans may so change conditions that our agreement may cease to be binding in conscience. At present, however, there is every reason to insist that if peace shall be made, the stated reasons on which the war was begun cannot be honorably departed from. We must give Cuba to the Cubans, and in the Philippines we can only demand a tenancy, or a right, which shall assure us a fair indemnity for the cost of the war.

The proposition before the country is plain. Either we must make peace at once, returning to our ordinary vocations, looking after our own affairs, withdrawing from expenditures that make taxation onerous, becoming again the republic teaching the blessings of peace, or we must go on with the war. If we accept the latter alternative, we shall doubtless, in the end, assume the government of distant colonies. The people of the islands which we shall take, including Cuba, are opposed to the proposition that we shall govern them. They are unlike us, and most of them are barbarians. We will not colonize these islands, because they are tropical, and white men do not colonize the tropics. We shall be obliged to govern them without their consent. In order to do that we shall be forced to maintain a large navy and a large standing army. The cost of these necessities will be great in money, but greater still in their moral and political effect, for, with large military establishments and distant dependencies, we must have a stronger Executive than we have now, and less meddling from Congress. We must then have an Executive powerful enough to act in a question of war and peace on his own initiative, for our borders will lie next to those of the quarrelling nations of Europe. And we must consider, too, what consequences will follow in our domestic affairs when we arm the Executive with stronger powers and give to him a large army to maintain and enforce them. All these matters must be thought of at once, for if we prolong the war we shall need to change our government; if, on the other hand, we are content with our present conditions, we shall make peace as soon as we can with dignity.

JUSTICE AND "IMPERIALISM."

ZOLA has been condemned again, and sentenced. It appears that he has run away rather than undergo his sentence. He has appealed to Philip sober, to posterity, to what you will. Only he has admitted by evasion that France is in the mean while too hot to hold a courageous writer who has shown a disposition to tell the truth about a case pending in the French courts.

The American who concludes that the French courts are deliberately doing injustice for the sake of doing it would conclude rashly. French magistrates "average up" very fairly with American magistrates. There is no more popular desire in France than there is in America to do injustice, even upon a Jew, for the sake of doing it. And yet here is the case: A court martial has condemned to a punishment which is almost capital, and which to some temperaments would be more than capital, for an offence which at the most is technical. DREYFUS did not mean to betray his country for hire, and nobody any longer really maintains that he did. And yet, in order to procure the conviction of a man who is otherwise than technically innocent, the Minister of War comes into court to read into a memorandum a name that is not there, the high generals of the army come into a civil court to tell the jury what verdict it ought to find. The judges of the civil courts not only permitted but eagerly promoted this scandalous attempt to prostitute their courts from instruments of justice to instruments for the promotion of discipline in the army, and for the suppression of public criticism upon the procedures of the army.

It is very surprising, very pathetic. There must be a cogent reason for it. This reason is to be sought in the military situation of France. To tell the truth about DREYFUS, or do justice in his case, it has been said a hundred times over, would be to "compromise the national defence." Specifically, it seems that it would be to imperil the Russian alliance. The Russian alliance, in the view not only of the leaders of the army, but of the judges of the tribunals, is more important than the doing of justice between man and man.

We do not, and in the present state of the disclosures we cannot, know how much of truth there is in this view, how much the Russian alliance would be imperilled by the publication of the truth about DREYFUS, and by the permission to ZOLA to justify himself, if he can justify himself, by the production of all relevant and competent evidence. But we are bound to take notice of the predicament in which the French generals and the French judges are placed. If our own country were assailed by powerful enemies, and had but one friend in the world, we should all feel that the support of that friend was worth having at the cost of great sacrifices and of great losses, possibly even at the cost of doing grievous injustice to individuals, possibly at the loss, if we were generals or judges, of our own self-respect.

All that we are entitled to say in the presence of such a conflict is a thanksgiving that we are not subjected to such a temptation, and a prayer that we may be relieved from it. And yet is there not a party—and a very noisy and insistent party—which is bent upon taking us—a nation which has never known temptations of this kind—into the midst of them? France knows now, better than we know, the seriousness of JEFFERSON'S awful warning about "entangling alliances," but perhaps not better than we are doomed to know it. France is a militant nation by the very necessity of her existence. It is true, as BISMARCK said long ago, that she might disarm, and that Europe might disarm, if she would explicitly renounce the project of reconquering the province which Germany conquered from her a quarter of a century ago. But it is true also, as BISMARCK also said, that such a renunciation would be fatal to any French ministry, or to any individual French politician, who should venture upon making it. And so it is a national necessity that France should maintain a standing army of 550,000 men in time of peace; and it seems to be a national necessity also that the representatives of this huge force should be able to dictate the verdicts of juries, and that judges should be content to register the decrees of generals.

But the condition which is the doom of France there are a number of Americans who are insisting that we should incur, without any necessity whatever, and in mere "gayety of heart." Without question, as soon as we embark upon the policy of "imperialism," we shall be compelled to seek for alliances. In isolation we can protect our own coasts, but we cannot, in isolation, protect distant dependencies. We shall be forced to seek alliances; we shall be forced to maintain a great army. And it may very well be that in order to secure our alliances the chiefs of our great army may find it necessary to appeal to the courts to pervert themselves from ministers of justice to ministers of injustice. What a dreadful choice is this between justice and patriotism! If we incur it, we shall differ from France in that we have deliberately brought about the situation which offers such a choice, while she has had the situation thrust upon her.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

Saturday, July 16.—The conditions of capitulation submitted to our government in a despatch from General Shafter were the following: All forces and war material in the territory lying east of a line from Aserradero to Sagua, viâ Palma, are included; the United States to transport, with as little delay as possible, all Spanish troops in the ceded district to the kingdom of Spain—the troops to embark at points conveniently near their present garrisons; officers to retain their side-arms, and both officers and men their personal property; Spanish authorities to be allowed to take the military archives belonging to surrendered district; volunteers and guerillas to be allowed to remain in Cuba under parole during the present war, giving up their arms; Spanish forces to march out of Santiago with honors of war, depositing their arms at a point mutually agreed upon, to await disposition of the United States government, it being understood that the American commissioners will recommend that the Spanish soldiers be allowed to return to Spain with their arms.

General Shafter stated that the surrender included about twelve thousand soldiers "against whom a shot has not been fired," and that the number of troops to be returned to Spain was above twenty-four thousand.

The contents of General Toral's letter, dated at Santiago July 15, and beginning, "I am now authorized by my government to capitulate," had already been made known at Washington; it is therefore only necessary to add, in order to show plainly the important successive steps in these negotiations: First, that our government adhered to its original demand that the surrender should be unconditional, thus declining the commissioners' suggestion in regard to the retention of arms by the Spanish troops, and, second, that the commissioners representing Toral and the Spanish government, yielding all other points for which they had stood out, received the promise that Spanish troops (not volunteers or guerillas) should be sent from the ceded district to Spain at our expense.

Sunday, July 17.—General Shafter and General Toral, with their staffs and escorts, met at a point between the lines of the Spanish and American forces at nine o'clock this morning. The Spanish commander, with a brief statement in his own language to the effect that Santiago de Cuba—city and province—had now been delivered into the custody of the United States, offered to give up his sword, but it was returned to him. The two generals then rode through the city, the American taking formal possession, as he narrates in a despatch of this date to Adjutant-General Corbin. "I have the honor," he says, "to announce that the American flag has been this instant (12 o'clock, noon) hoisted over the house of the civil government . . . . An immense concourse of people was present, a squadron of cavalry, and a regiment of infantry presenting arms, and a band playing national airs. A light battery fired a salute of twenty-one guns. Perfect order is being maintained by the municipal government. The distress is very great, but there is little sickness in town, and scarcely any yellow fever. A small gunboat and about two hundred seamen left by Cervera have surrendered to me. Obstructions are being removed from the mouth of the harbor. Upon coming into the city I discovered a perfect entanglement of defences. Fight-

(Continued on page 754.)

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CREW OF THE "OREGON" CHEERING THE SURRENDER OF THE "COLON."

THE "CRISTÓBAL COLON" ON THE BEACH AT RIO TARQUINO, 48 MILES WEST OF SANTIAGO.

CAPTAIN CLARK AND ENSIGN HUSSEY ARE PLEASED AT A WELL-PLACED SHOT.

MEMBERS OF THE CREW WATCHING THE FALL OF A SHOT.

CAPT. CLARK, LIEUT'S NICHOLSON AND ACKERMAN, ENSIGN HUSSEY, ORDERLIES, AND PART OF CREW OF AFTER 13-INCH TURRET.

ON BOARD THE BATTLE-SHIP "OREGON" DURING THE CHASE OF THE "CRISTÓBAL COLON," JULY 3.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

TROOPS GOING TO THE FRONT PASSING THE SCENE OF THE BATTLE OF LAS GUASIMAS.

ON THE BATTLE-GROUND OF LAS GUASIMAS—TROOPS GOING TO THE FRONT.

GRAVES OF THE ROUGH RIDERS KILLED IN THE BATTLE OF LAS GUASIMAS.

BATTLE OF EL CANEY, JULY 1—CARING FOR THE WOUNDED ON THE FIELD.

SCENES AND INCIDENTS OF THE OPERATIONS AGAINST SANTIAGO.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JAMES BURTON, SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHER FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL SHAFTER'S ARMY.

Original from PENN STATE
Digitized by Google
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

In a letter addressed to Senator Hoar, Professor Norton says that the Senator's recent remarks at Worcester about him and his opinions, to which allusion was made in the WEEKLY last week, are based on misinformation. "You assail me," he writes, "for words which you say you have seen quoted as addressed by me to 'the youth of the university' where you and I were classmates more than fifty years ago. If you saw them thus quoted, you were led into error. No such words were addressed by me to the youth of the university. They are garbled sentences from an account in a Western newspaper of an interview with me dishonorably obtained and incorrectly reported. I did say to the youth of the university that this war with Spain was 'inglorious'; that for the accomplishment of the ends which, as a nation, we professed to seek by its means it was 'needless' and, consequently, 'criminal.'" To which Senator Hoar replies, in a letter addressed to Dr. Norton, that the opinions in question, whether literally reported or not, "are in general accord, I am sorry to say, with the sentiments I am constantly in the habit of hearing of as coming from you, both in public utterance and private speech, and of the style with which I used to be not unfamiliar when I occasionally met you." He adds: "All lovers of Harvard and all lovers of the country have felt for a long time that your relations to the university made your influence bad for the college and bad for the youth of the country. It was high time that somebody should say what I have said."

What Senator Hoar said of Professor Norton will do no harm, and may do good. When the Senator says that "all lovers of Harvard and all lovers of the country" have long felt that Dr. Norton's influence on youth was injurious, he goes too far. But it is true that a great many lovers of Harvard and of the country have thought that certain elements in Dr. Norton's influence were so deleterious as to more than counterbalance the value of that influence in other respects. It is an influence that has been potent for a generation with many of the cleverest men who have passed through Harvard college. It has been strong in kindness, in taste, and in most of the elements of civilization. Its defect in the eyes of those who have distrusted it has been that it has seemed to them to face backwards; to be a quencher of enthusiasm, an influence which disposed young men to regard themselves as citizens of a world which, on the whole, is unworthy, which saw its best days in Greece in the age of Pericles, and has had ups and downs ever since, with downward tendencies ominously noticeable at present. Ordinarily when we say a man is "not of this world," we mean that spiritual interests engross him overmuch; but if we should apply that phrase to Professor Norton we would probably mean that his world was the world of Greece and of æstheticism. We trace back our hopes for our civilization to a manger in Bethlehem, but Professor Norton's civilization has always seemed to look back regretfully, and rather hopelessly, to the Acropolis and the Parthenon. Perhaps these theories do him injustice, but whether just or not they exist.

In his letter to Senator Hoar Dr. Norton says, reproachfully: "You have seen fit, disregarding our almost lifelong relations of friendliness, to make a public attack on me of verbal severity." The implied reproach does not seem to be warranted. If Senator Hoar felt that the opinions imputed to Dr. Norton were doing harm and should be controverted, considerations of personal friendliness should not have excused him from assailing them. His age and his position made him a particularly fit person to say what he has said. Perhaps in manner he has shown some excess of zeal, but there is no trace of malignity either in his speech or in his letter, and in both he made himself clearly understood.

The average American, though he believes in the righteousness of the war with Spain, has no wish at all to humiliate Spain or do her any avoidable injury. Indeed, it is a sorrow to him that in fighting Spaniards we have to hurt them. He believes that there are multitudes of good Spaniards who hate this war far more than we do, and suffer from it immeasurably more than we can suffer. He doesn't want them to suffer any pang that can be avoided, and accordingly he reads with satisfaction of all the incidents of war in which humanity and the touches of nature that make the whole world kin show out against the background of hard knocks and distress. Here is a letter from Manila, dated "United States Ship Concord, May 4," which shows how strongly this sentiment of common human kindness, of which most of us are conscious, is felt by our brethren who are doing the actual work of this war:

> To-day I had a most grateful task in ministering to the comfort of the enemy. Two Spanish surgeons came on board of us early this morning in a little dugout, and asked to be permitted to see the Commander-in-Chief about the terrible condition of affairs at Cañacao, where the wounded are. They feared an uprising among the natives, who are largely insurgents and hate the Spaniards. They had only three days' provisions, and were suffering terribly. We did all we could for the poor fellows, who, indeed, looked the pictures of woe. Their uniforms were soiled and torn, and I took one of them into my room and let him have a good wash; he also exchanged his shirt and blood-bespattered trousers for clean ones. As the poor man glanced at my bureau and saw there the pictures of my wife and boys, tears stood in his eyes. "I also have a wife and two sons in Malaga," he said, taking from his pocket a much-worn envelope, and showing me a boyish scrawl at the end of a letter written in a delicate hand. The closing lines were: "Come home soon, dear papa. Your son, Juan." The poor man was almost overcome, and seemed helpless about Spain's prospects. He spoke of her misfortunes with deep feeling, attributing them to bigotry and ignorance. We made both surgeons comfortable in every way, and as they sat down to a good meal in the ward-room, one of them took from his pocket a crust of bread, saying he no longer needed that provision. One of these gentlemen was on the Castilla, the other on the Isla de Cuba, which latter made such a gallant resistance during the battle, exciting universal admiration. It is needless to say that they saved nothing but the clothes they stood in. When the Spaniards went on shore to the hospitals, where our sailors are on guard, our surgeon accompanied them. Everything will be done for their aid and protection which humanity can dictate.

The feeling shown by this naval officer who fought with Dewey is in interesting contrast to that noticed in a recent issue of an over-zealous newspaper (the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle), which remarked with some anxiety on a tendency to coddle Spanish prisoners of war—a tendency which it traced to the same weak-minded sentimentalism that induces some persons to send flowers to murderers under sentence of death.

Sympathy for our side in our war with Spain comes from two sources, which the reader of history will find particularly interesting. A Philadelphia newspaper, which is quoted by Dr. William Elliot Griffis (editor of the abridged edition of Motley's Dutch Republic), prints a letter from a correspondent in Rotterdam, who says that, while most of Continental Europe is inclined to sympathize with Spain, Holland stands out for the Cubans. It is apparent, from the leanings of the Dutch newspapers, that Holland has not yet forgotten Alva.

An analogous report comes from Jerusalem in the form of a copy of a prayer offered at Jerusalem on June 17, at a service in behalf of the American arms, held before a large congregation of Jews in the largest synagogue in the city. "Let Thy face shine, O God," runs this prayer, "on the young men and their leaders who risk their lives for a just cause to save the oppressed from their oppressors. But on their adversaries show Thy might. Avenge the blood of Thy servants that has been shed by a cruel nation, and crush Thine enemies for aye."

Several interesting changes are announced in the world of periodical literature. The Critic, after prevailing as a weekly for eighteen years, is to assume the shape and dimensions of a magazine, and to be issued monthly. The Chap-Book of Chicago has been bought by the Dial of the same town and ceases to exist, except so far as its presence may be detected in the Dial's inner consciousness. The Chap-Book was started in May, 1894, in Cambridge, by two Harvard undergraduates, and has been issued semi-monthly. One hundred numbers of it in all were published, and there were few dull ones, if any, in the lot. When a periodical sells out and disappears, the inference is that it didn't pay. In the Chap-Book's case a good many mourners will be ready to say, "We could have better spared some better-paying paper."

The Independent assumes magazine form (like the Outlook), but continues to be a weekly. It seems good to be in the fashion, whether the goods concerned are periodicals or millinery, and the magazine form is just now very much the fashion among the unillustrated weeklies.

A comment in the WEEKLY of July 16 about a recent disturbance at West Point which led to the third class being put under arrest gave an impression which seems to have been unjust. It is true that the third class did "holler" for Colonel Mills, the late commandant, now or recently at Santiago, but the cause of their demonstration was not a pressure of martial enthusiasm, but dissatisfaction over sundry innovations in the routine of their summer work which Colonel Mills's successor has introduced. The present commandant has made changes in tactical instruction, and has introduced practical field marches in full field equipment, reconnoissance, outpost duty, and advance-guards, in force with all arms, which has made the experiences of the present third class somewhat more laborious than those of their predecessors. Coming in from a stiff practice march on a warm morning the third class did indicate in a noisy and unauthorized manner their preference for the old way of doing things. That was insubordination, and was "mildly disciplined by the regular punishment prescribed for such an offence." It is proper to add that the practical field-work which the present commandant, Colonel Hein, has substituted for some of the drills on the plain is stated to be in line with advanced modern military methods in use in Europe, and is highly commended by competent authorities. "The work," writes an informant of the WEEKLY, "is novel and arduous, but, I believe, is thoroughly endorsed and appreciated by the cadets themselves."

Contrite acknowledgment is made of a slip in this department of the WEEKLY for July 9, which located the Tuskegee Institute in Mississippi instead of in Alabama. It is in Russell County, Alabama, twelve miles from Columbus, Georgia.

The University of Tennessee, at Knoxville, which, as lately noted, sent an unusually large proportion of its graduating class to the war, has been looking up its war record, and finds that nine of its graduates are commissioned officers in the navy and forty-six in the army—in all fifty-five, besides a good many non-commissioned officers. At least four officers who were graduates of this university are known to have been in the fights about Santiago. Two of them, Lieutenants McCorkle and Bernard, were killed, and one was wounded. The university also had three men in the battle of Manila—Lieutenant Nelson and Assistant-Engineer Delaney of the Olympia, and Lieutenant Joynes of the McCulloch.

The Chillicothe (Ohio) Leader-Gazette communicates to the WEEKLY its approval of the proposal to take the pictures of the Royal Gallery of Madrid in part payment of a war indemnity from Spain. The Leader-Gazette says, "The people of Spain prize this collection most highly, and would keenly feel its loss, so that this demand would be an exceedingly proper form of punishment for them."

But are the American people especially bent on devising proper punishments for the people of Spain? A despatch from Santiago, published in the New York Herald of July 20, represents General Shafter as saying to a Cuban emissary, who inquired if Santiago was to remain "in the hands of our enemies": "The Spaniards are not our enemies. We are fighting the soldiers of Spain, but have no desire to despoil her citizens." It seems likely that our Chillicothe neighbor will find this sentiment pretty prevalent among the Americans. We do not look upon the Spaniards as our enemies in the sense of wanting to punish them any more than we can help, and we certainly do not want to despoil the citizens of Spain. There seems no probability that the expediency of looting the Royal Gallery at Madrid will be seriously considered in this country. The statement, presumably true, that many of the pictures in it were spoils of former wars does not signify, for they were not stolen from us. The Spaniards of this generation seem to have the sins, political and social, of at least ten generations to answer for. They have enough on their hands without having special punishments invented for them.

A Michigan reader of the WEEKLY is apprehensive that "we who have done so well in the great things of this war are about to make a trifling and humiliating mistake" in our treatment of Admiral Cervera. He fears we will dine the admiral too much and throw him too many bouquets, and lionize him in a way prejudicial to our national self-respect.

It seems likely that our Michigan friend will find his fears without a basis. The admiral and all the Spanish officers who are prisoners of war are practically in mourning. Their country is in straits, and they would be in no humor to be "fêted" even if such a thing were proposed. They are likely to receive the treatment they would naturally prefer, in being well cared for, courteously used, and protected in retirement in some quiet place. As prisoners of war they would seem to be very well off at Annapolis.

It is related—the present version of the story is taken from a London newspaper—that when Alfonso XII., the late King of Spain, lay dying, he was heard to mutter several times: "What a conflict! My God, what a conflict!" He was not suffering greatly at the time, and some one asked him what he meant. The story goes that he said, "I see a conflict in the future."

It ought to be possible to verify so interesting a story if it is true, but what the dying King saw—if he did see it—was no more than was foreseen by some Spanish statesmen in full possession of health and all their faculties.

The government of Spain was warned many years ago, by faithful and distinguished servants of its own, that it could not hope to hold its colonies. A paragraph recently current in the newspapers, though not at this moment available, told circumstantially of one distinguished Spaniard, afterwards Captain-General of Cuba, who entreated the home government to prepare for the amicable separation of the colonies, and if not, at least to strengthen their defences. But the Spanish government did neither. Governments that cannot see, as a rule cannot hear either; nor has there been any recent Spanish government which, if it could have seen and heard and anticipated all that was coming, was strong enough to take such action as would have proved efficacious. Sagasta's predicament seems to be a good deal like Cervera's. He has the choice of being blown up in a harbor or of making a fight for it outside and being driven ashore. Keeping up the war in Cuba is Spain's way of applying an external blister to reduce internal inflammation. The blistering process must go on until more of the fever leaves the patient.

The Municipal Art Society of New York thinks that more suitable provision should be made for the flag which now flies from the staff on the cupola of the City Hall, and has arranged for a competition of designs for a bronze base for a standard similar to those in the piazza of St. Marks in Venice. It offers prizes of $400, $200, and $100 for the best three works submitted, the decision to be made by a jury of fifteen members appointed by the directors of the society. The designs and models must be sent to the secretary of the society (215 West Fifty-seventh Street) on or before October 15, 1898. The cost of the standard must not exceed $3000.

The society's enterprise is particularly opportune. There never was a time when the people of New York seemed more likely to value and appreciate a good base for a flagstaff than at present. There is no money actually in sight to make the base even when the design has been accepted, but the society believes that if the design has merit enough, either the city or some munificent citizen will furnish the funds to realize it in bronze.

Rear-Admiral Daniel Ammen, who died in Washington on July 12, was one of those fortunate men who find out very early in life what they want to do and spend all their days in doing it. He was born in Ohio in 1820, and was only fifteen years old when he determined, in spite of parental discouragement, to be a midshipman. An appointment was gotten for him in 1836, and after three months of study he was kept at sea nearly all the time for five years. In 1842, after examination, he became a passed midshipman, and in 1849 got his commission as lieutenant. In 1861, after a long period of almost continuous sea duty, he was in charge of the naval rendezvous at Baltimore, but applied at once for active duty. In the civil war, in command of the Sebago, he served at the capture of Port Royal, and under Admiral Du Pont in operations on the coasts of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. In command of the Monitor Patapsco he took part in the unsuccessful attempt on Charleston in April, 1863. As commander of the Mohican he took part in the capture of Fort Fisher.

After the war President Grant appointed him chief of the Bureau of Navigation, in which capacity he had the management of the surveys for a canal through Central America. He was greatly interested in that project, and was a member of the board which, after four years' study of the canal problem, reported unanimously in favor of the Nicaraguan route.

In December, 1877, he was promoted to be Rear-Admiral, and six months later, at his own request, was retired. He invented the life-raft used on American ships, and designed the ram Katahdin, the sluggishness of which he was wont to attribute to changes in her lines for which he was not responsible.

He was an intimate personal friend of General Grant, whose life he is said to have saved on some occasion when both were young men.

The intention of the Common Council of New York to put a stop to the public use of unseemly language in the streets of New York is highly creditable, and it is to be hoped that the measures taken may prove effective. The law already provides against bad language, but its requirements have been so conspicuously neglected that a revival of its force was necessary.

E. S. MARTIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LONDON.

July 9, 1898.

It is long since the Fourth of July engaged as much attention throughout the United Kingdom as it has done during the past week. While serious Englishmen were threshing out the subject at thousands of solemn dinner tables, Colonel Hay's speech at the banquet of the American Society, in proposing the toast "The Day we Celebrate," was an utterance of unusual distinction even for the American ambassador. One hundred and twenty-one celebrations of the Fourth of July have crippled the resources of the English language. Nothing new can be said in praise of the Declaration of Independence or of the great nation that to-day fills the thoughts of white men from Vladivostok to Cape Clear. Europe suffers from an obsession of the United States. When, therefore, Colonel Hay struck a deeper note than usual, every one present at the Fourth of July banquet was touched with genuine emotion. I question if there was a cynic in the room, although cynics are plentiful at the height of the London season. Less given to speech-making than some of his predecessors, the American ambassador manages to fill the eye and to touch the imagination of our people with a dignity and reserve force highly conducive to the best interests of his countrymen. Every one agreed that his speech at the Hotel Cecil reached the high-water mark of the best contemporary oratory. Colonel Hay was not merely eloquent. As spokesman for a victorious nation of seventy millions of people, he made our hearts burn within us. His speech will not be forgotten.

On July 5 an enormous Anglo-American garden party was given by Sir Francis and Lady Cook at Richmond. The news of the destruction of Cervera's fleet and the defeat of the murderers of Rodriguez was then known to every one. Members of Parliament and men of light and leading, with their families, intermingled with a great company of American citizens. I observed two Scotch members of Parliament, ordinarily very reserved men and totally unused to making advances to "perfect strangers," shyly introducing themselves to a group of American guests from St. Louis, and establishing, in the course of a few moments, a cordial Anglo-American alliance. I mention the incident as a sign of public opinion. It would not have happened a year ago.

Some of the London clubs celebrate the Fourth of July by taking steps to alter their statutes, which provide, in the majority of cases, that only British subjects are eligible for membership. This step is a practical proof of the extent to which American friendship is welcomed by conservative Britons. It cannot be said that this good feeling was merely evoked by recent American successes. Mr. Henry Norman, in the Daily Chronicle, writing from Washington, gives a wise word of warning to Englishmen. He tells us that the American people believe that the British people are eagerly seeking an alliance with them. I do not think that is the case. If Mr. Chamberlain's famous speech at Birmingham was open to criticism, not only by his political opponents, it was mainly on the ground that its tendency was to give foreign nations the impression that England was touting for an alliance. England is not suing for the protection of any one, not even for that of her own kith and kin. No one can lay down with dogmatic certainty exactly how far public opinion really goes, but so far as I can interpret the mind of England at this moment it is that she holds that a blow struck at America, or any attempt to wrest from the United States the fruits of her sacrifices in blood and treasure, should be resisted by England precisely as though it were struck at herself. Beyond that point public opinion does not pass—at least to-day. The Fourth of July dinner in London on Monday night was by far the most remarkable celebration of Anglo-American amity that has ever taken place in this country. There is an absurd rumor from Windsor that George III. turned in his grave on the last anniversary of the disintegration of the empire—for which his dull Teutonic obstinacy was mainly responsible—being celebrated in the presence of British bishops and British members of both Houses of Parliament. Lord Dufferin and the Marquis of Ripon have both held the greatest offices under the crown, and they belong to opposite sides of politics. When Lord Dufferin and Lord Ripon interchange compliments with the American ambassador in mutual consciousness of the functions of the Atlantic cable, the project of a steady understanding between the two nations stands on a firm foundation. To push the friendship into premature partnership would end it. Solid amity engendered by mutual interests and cemented by common dangers, rather than the fleeting bliss of an international honey-moon of the Franco-Russian type, is the goal at which wise men on this side of the Atlantic are consciously aiming.

During a recent visit to Portsmouth I have had the opportunity of hearing the views of some of our naval and military authorities on the subject of recent achievements of American arms. Lieutenant Hobson's feat is naturally that which most strikes the imagination of naval men. Surprise was expressed that the operation of countermining was not resorted to at Santiago. On board the series of vessels known as the Vernon (the torpedo establishment at Portsmouth) a working model is shown of an apparatus intended for the same purpose as that for which the Merrimac was sunk by Lieutenant Hobson and his gallant companions. This apparatus enables a vessel, without a soul on board, to be controlled from the flag-ship. Her engines are started and stopped by electricity. Her steering-gear is operated by the same means; and at a given point, within a radius of about two and a half miles, the engines are stopped and the ship herself sunk by touching a key on board the flag-ship, which explodes a charge of guncotton. Naval men at Portsmouth are curious to know whether the American navy is provided with this device.

The admiration and interest manifested in the destruction of Admiral Cervera's fleet are indescribable. Our naval officers look upon it as a splendid achievement, reflecting inexpressible credit on the officers and men of the blockading squadron. The practical immunity from the effects of Spanish fire by Admiral Sampson's fleet is considered as eloquent testimony to the design and construction of the American ships. It is believed that the vogue of the battle-ship will be greatly enhanced by the teachings of the battle off Santiago, and that naval problems left unsettled by the engagement at Yalu will now be elucidated. The fine gunnery traditional in the American navy has been maintained, and to perfect training in fire discipline is the victory largely due. Such is the crushing disparity between the naval capacity of the two nations that it is believed that if the Spanish fleet had been manned and fought by American officers and crews, and Admiral Sampson's squadron led by Admiral Cervera and his officers and men, the loss of life on the American side might perhaps have been greater, but the result would have been the same. If proof were needed, it is supplied by the gallant action of the Gloucester, commanded by Lieutenant Wainwright. Wainwright's failure to observe his admiral's signal is Nelsonic. The opinion of the professional experts coincides with that of hard-worked lieutenants of the Channel squadron. It is that the American navy, both as regards personnel and matériel, is now as near perfection as skill, courage, practice, and discipline can attain, and is quite as good as the best in the world. It may be interesting to add that this result is ascribed partially to the freedom from political interference enjoyed by the fleets of the United States. These views, which are general, were not expressed for publication, and therefore possess such value as attaches to unpremeditated and sincere appreciation. German comment on Commodore Schley's victory is acidulous, but since the achievements of the German navy are still on the knees of the gods, the acerbity of Teuton observations may be borne by Americans with equanimity. The German Emperor is not the type of man to be trusted with battle-ships. In the interests of humanity, it is a pity that he has contracted a taste for colonies. The Germans will have a bitter awakening when they learn that their colonial aspirations will lead to nothing so long as the pickelhaube system of administration is adopted. The German navy is a danger-point.

While touching on naval matters I may mention that the British Admiralty has given an order for two torpedo-boat-destroyers the specification of which provides for a speed of thirty-five knots an hour. The "catchers" in question are to be engined by a rotary motor on the turbine principle invented by the Hon. Charles Algernon Parsons, a son of the late Lord Ross, whose name will always be identified with the great telescope which he erected at his Irish residence, Birr Castle, in King's County. The officers and men of the United States ship Brooklyn will remember how, at the naval review at Spithead in 1897, the Turbinia, a little launch of about forty tons, engined on the rotary system, attracted the attention of the whole fleet by the phenomenal pace at which she dashed up and down the line between the British battle-ships and the foreign men-o'-war—among which was the unlucky Vizcaya. In the opinion of Mr. Parsons, the inventor, the principle is not only applicable, but can be utilized with greater facility, in the case of large ships than in that of small.

With regard to the military side of the campaign, sympathy is felt with General Shafter for apparently being subject to constant cable instructions from Washington. The lesson of England's wars, great and small, has borne in upon our rulers the necessity for choosing as commander the best man available, supplying him with what he wants in the way of materials and men, giving him a free hand, and then holding him strictly responsible for the results. The extraordinary difficulty of General Shafter's task is fully appreciated on this side, and the spirit displayed by the troops landed on a tropical shore in the worst season, after being cooped up on board ship, is the most remarkable exhibition of dauntless courage, physical stamina, and soldierly instincts that the world has seen for a long time past. The march from Baiquiri to Santiago recalls some of the conditions of Havelock's march to Lucknow, but it must be confessed that the difficulties in General Shafter's path were even greater than those of Havelock.

The epoch-making exploit of Commodore Schley has somewhat obscured the brilliancy of the feat accomplished by General Shafter's force. Military criticism agrees that the advance on Santiago was, under the circumstances, hazardous to the point of rashness, and that nothing but the magnificent material under his command would have brought General Shafter through. The Rough Riders' combat in the jungle against unseen foes, and their final success, are ranked among the finest things recorded in military history. It is amusing to note the changed tone of the German newspapers, obviously inspired by compulsory recognition of the fact that America is as great in war as in peace.

Much speculation has been aroused by the sudden announcement of the Admiralty that the naval manœuvres which have been held annually during the past eleven years will not take place. The reason given by Mr. Goschen, the First Lord of the Admiralty, is that it is inadvisable to decrease the stock of steam-coal held in reserve, having regard to the fact that the strike or lockout in South Wales might possibly spread to the non-associated collieries from which the royal navy has latterly been mainly supplied. To countermand the manœuvres owing to want of coal seemed to be so extraordinary a statement on the face of it that, although the excuse was accepted without demur in the House of Commons, I at once proceeded to South Wales to investigate the facts for the benefit of HARPER'S WEEKLY. If, as I now know, want of coal was not the real reason for annulling the customary naval manœuvres, then the true cause of the change is probably political, and therefore interesting to readers of the WEEKLY.

Coal suitable for the British navy has been produced in the Taff Valley for marine use since 1848, and is unrivalled for its special purpose, although Japanese and the Pocahontas coal of Virginia are respectable competitors. Its smokeless character, the small quantity of ash, and great steam-producing power are the chief characteristics of this famous coal. This steam-coal is a necessity to the British navy, but to get it to the surface requires peculiar skill and training. Mr. Goschen pointedly omitted to refer to the possibility of obtaining coal of equal quality from other collieries in South Wales. During my recent visit to the coal districts of South Wales, in which I saw the South Wales and Monmouthshire miners' committee, and the representatives of several employers, together with impartial persons not a few, I found complete unanimity in the opinion that there was no necessity to annul the manœuvres so far as an adequate supply of steam-coal is concerned. Supposing 40,000 tons to be the quantity required in order to enable the Admiralty to hold the manœuvres, this quantity could have been supplied by three weeks' extra output from one colliery not affected by the strike. The normal output of the Cambrian mine is about 18,000 tons a week, but at the present time upwards of 4000 men are employed at the mine, working double shift, and they have worked double shift since the middle of April. The extra output of the Cambrian colliery under the present circumstances is about 12,000 tons a week—that is, 30,000 tons weekly in all. There is no danger of the non-associated mines coming out on a strike. The contributions of the men at work are necessary for the maintenance of the men on strike. No difficulty would be experienced even now in obtaining the amount of coal required to hold the naval manœuvres without trenching upon the stock accumulated by the Admiralty. The advance of wages asked for by the men merely means an advance of twenty-five cents a ton on coal. If the Admiralty bought 40,000 tons for the manœuvres, the extra cost to the country involved in respect to the rise in wages would be $10,000—not a very large proportion of the sum of nearly $125,000,000 to be spent on the navy during the current year. It is thus clear that, whatever may be the real reasons for the postponement of the naval manœuvres, the want of coal is not one of them.

Notwithstanding all the denials received from Berlin and elsewhere in regard to any contemplated coercion of America in respect to the final disposition of the Philippine Islands, naval opinion inclines to believe that the assembling of a British fleet of overwhelming strength in home waters is not without meaning. The view at Portsmouth is that if a flying squadron comprising sixteen first-class battle-ships had been suddenly collected much attention would have been attracted all over the world. By the simple process of annulling the manœuvres and uniting the Channel and Reserve squadrons for practice, the desired object was achieved. If the manœuvres had been held, the various ships would have been separated, and possibly sent to a distance, and would certainly not have been available at a moment's notice—as is now the case. The advertisement of a great British fleet of battle-ships at Copenhagen also has its good points. It is intended to send the Channel and Reserve squadrons there during the Tsar's visit to Denmark.

The loss of the Bourgogne and the conduct of a portion of the crew recall to mind the struggle at the fire at the charity bazar in the Rue Jean Goujon in May of last year, which resulted in the safety of many men, the death of the Duchesse d'Alençon, the Comtesse de Mun, and scores of other distinguished ladies. The fact that one woman was saved from the Bourgogne is regarded here as tolerable evidence that passengers, at all events, are safer on board ships manned by English-speaking crews. The demoralization of France is shown by the ignoble struggle for life. The officers of the ship, including Captain Deloncle, seem to have preserved their reputation; at all events, they went down with the ship. But the fatal absence of self-control in time of stress and peril, and of the discipline which preserved the Rough Riders in their march through the Cuban jungle, is at the root of the decadence of France, and is the condemnation of Rousseau and the other makers of French ideals.

The final struggle for the possession of Khartoum is discussed with eager interest. The Khalifa has intrenched himself on the left bank of the Nile, on a plain covered with stones so white that in the moonlight it glistens like snow. The great final fight between the Dervishes and the Sirdar's troops is to come off at this place, which is called Kerreri, if the Khalifa is to get his way. The ideas of the Khalifa, however, may not be those of Kitchener. There is reason to believe that the Dervish leader will get another surprise. The trade of prophet in the Sudan has not lately been a prosperous one. It is feared that the loss of life in the final assault will be far greater than at the battle of the Atbara. General Gatacre, commanding the division of British troops, has in his force several men and boys trained at the Gordon Boys' Home, established to keep green the memory of General Gordon. General Gatacre writes to the chaplain of the Boys' Home to say that he shall make a point of seeing that those Gordon boys who may be under his command at the time of the assault shall get early into Khartoum. Most of them, however, are bandsmen or drummers, and the general says, with much point, that "if we have to take the place some bayonets must go in first."

The taking of Khartoum will only be the end of one act in the drama of establishing the "open door" at the source as well as at the mouths of the Nile. The French are already at Fashoda. The Russians are understood to have succeeded in poisoning the mind of Menelek, the Abyssinian Emperor, against England; and it is possible that new developments may take place which will put into the shade any difficulties hitherto experienced from the Khalifa. The English resident at the court of Menelek is now in London, but nothing is allowed to leak out as to the real state of our relations with Abyssinia. The treaty signed by Menelek and her Majesty's envoy at Adisabbaba, on the 14th May, 1897, was a one-sided instrument. Article 6 provided that Menelek was to do all in his power to prevent the passage through his dominions of arms and ammunition to the Mahdists, whom he declared to be the enemies of his empire. There is no reason to believe that the Ethiopian monarch has interpreted this article with any pedantic regard to scrupulous good faith. It is, of course, the object of Russia and of France to stir up hostility against England wherever they are able to do so. It is, however, ominous for the future peace of the world that the great task of opening up the heart of Africa to the commerce of all nations should be impeded by illicit intrigues between the powers which aspire to the leadership of the civilized world and barbarian blackamoors.

ARNOLD WHITE.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

71st N. Y. VOLUNTEERS IN THE SPANISH INTRENCHMENTS ON SAN JUAN HILL—BLOCK-HOUSE IN BACKGROUND.

71st N. Y. VOLUNTEERS DIGGING NEW INTRENCHMENTS AT FORT SAN JUAN.

SCENE FROM SAN JUAN FORT, WHERE THE BIG BATTLE TOOK PLACE, SHOWING CAMP OF 71st N. Y. VOLUNTEERS.

THE GROUND OVER WHICH OUR TROOPS CHARGED TO TAKE THE BLOCK-HOUSE ON THE HILL.

SAN JUAN HILL AND FORT. CHARGED AND CAPTURED BY OUR INFANTRY, UNSUPPORTED BY ARTILLERY, JULY 1.

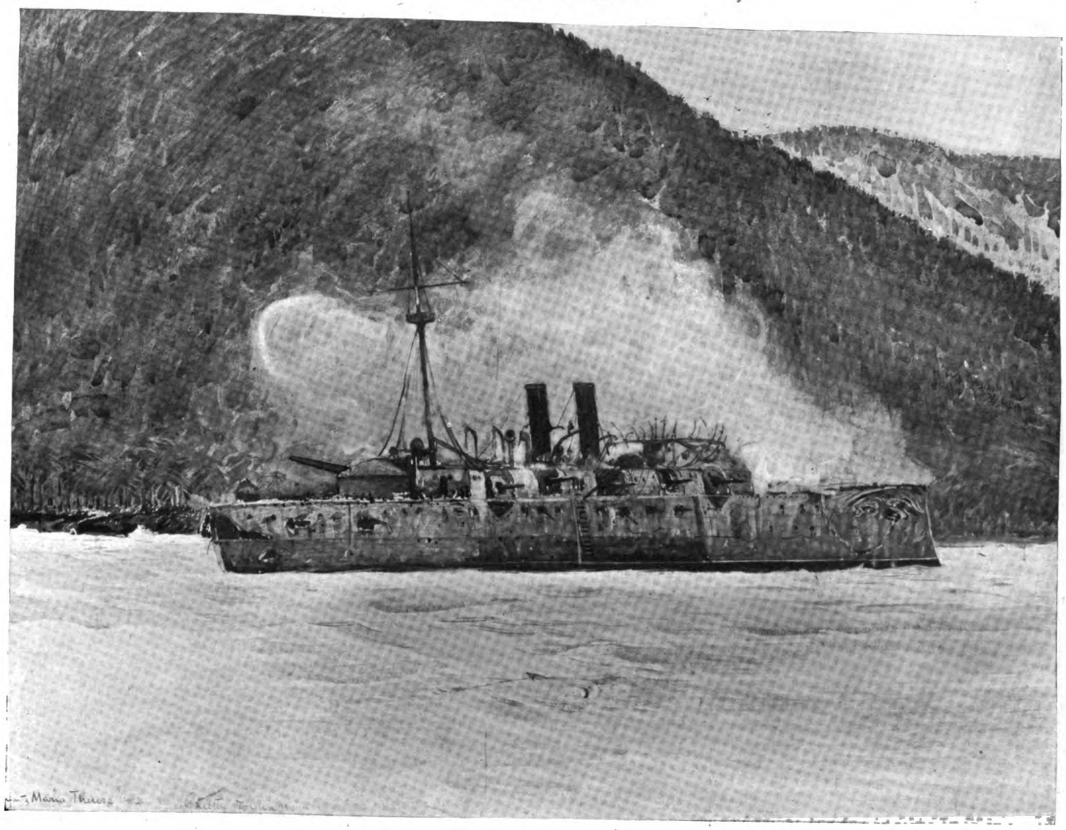
PHOTOGRAPHS BY JAMES BURTON, SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHER FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL SHAFTER'S ARMY.

Original from PENN STATE

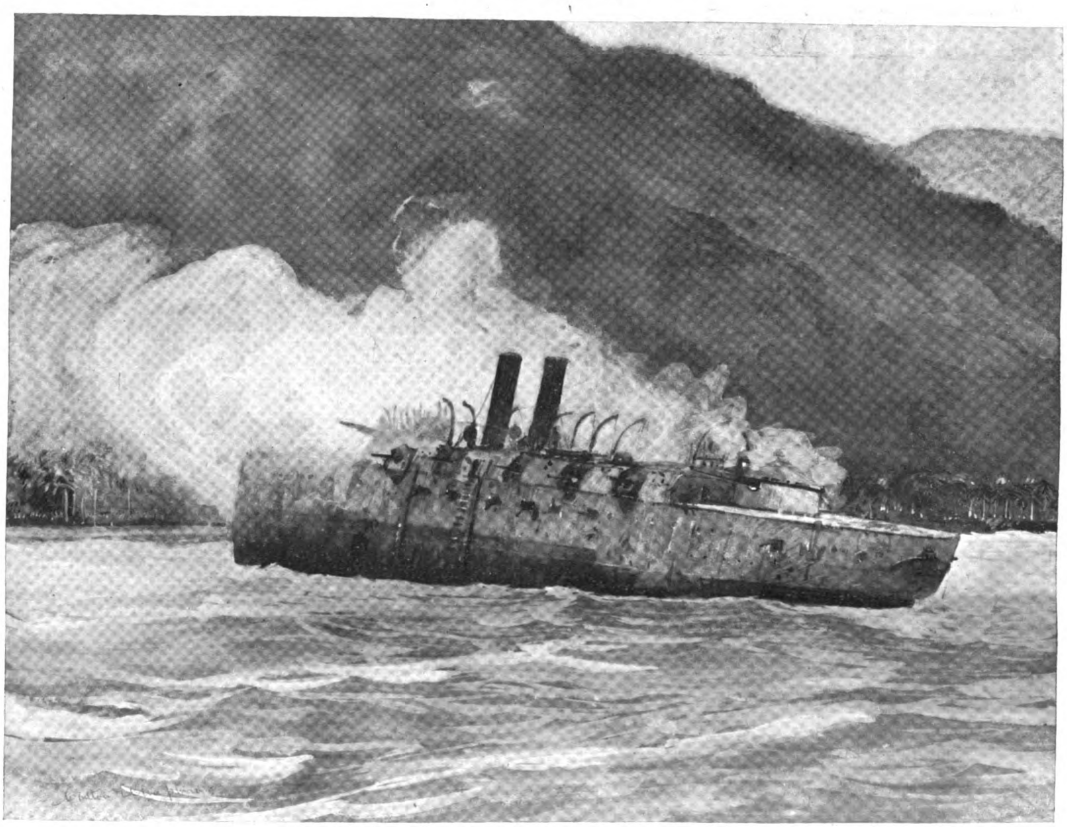
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

THE ROUGH RIDERS' DYNAMITE GUN. SERGEANT BORROWE IN COMMAND.



9TH U. S. INFANTRY DIGGING NEW INTRENCHMENTS, AND STRENGTHENING THEM WITH SAND-BAGS.



IN THE TRENCHES ON SAN JUAN HILL AFTER THE BATTLE OF JULY 1 AND 2.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JAMES BURTON, SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHER FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL SHAFTER'S ARMY.

Original from PENN STATE

"INFANTA MARIA TERESA."

"ALMIRANTE OQUENDO."

THE DAY AFTER THE BATTLE—VESSELS OF ADMIRAL CERVERA'S FLEET ASHORE AND AFIRE, JULY 4, 1898.

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.

"The 'Infanta Maria Teresa' was struck thirty-three times above water by the guns of our ships, and the 'Almirante Oquendo' sixty-six times above the water-line. There are many other shot-holes in both vessels, which cannot be counted in the present sunken condition of the ships."—Extract from Mr. Chapman's Letter.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

WITH THE FLEET OFF SANTIAGO.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

Ensenada de los Altares, Tuesday, June 28.

Ensenada de los Altares is the picturesque name of a little cove about six miles from Santiago, and fronting the tiny village of Siboney, on the line of the railroad running from Baiquiri, three miles farther east, to Santiago. The railroad, which was built to carry coal and iron ore from Baiquiri into Santiago, is owned and controlled by Americans, and they have at Baiquiri a large iron pier, on which the cars are run to load vessels when the weather permits their lying in so exposed a harbor.

The hills around Baiquiri and immediately back from the shore are marked with mine-cuttings, and long shoots like toboggan-slides run down their steep sides, by which the ore is sent at a rapid rate to the shore-level, where it can be loaded into cars. These mines are valuable property, as the ore obtained, combined with other grades, produces the finest kind of steel. The railroad runs along the shore out of Santiago, crossing an iron bridge at Aguadores and another one at Siboney, from where it runs inland to Baiquiri. A steep-sided, square-topped, rugged hill separates these two villages along the seafront, and east of Baiquiri are several of these peculiar bluffs in succession, looking exactly like sections of the Palisades of the Hudson, and suggesting an ideal place for a man who wanted to isolate his front yard from all intrusion. The railroad at the foot of the Santiago plateau, and running close to the water, reminds one of those along the banks of the aforesaid Hudson. There is a block-house on the top of the bluff east of Baiquiri, which rises almost perpendicularly above the iron pier and cluster of houses. Along the shore and in the lower range of hills inland these block-houses are dotted every mile or so, and have hitherto been occupied by Spanish soldiers. Here the resemblance to anything American ceases. The railroad is American, the cars and engines. You can tell by looking at them, and there are the makers' names, familiar enough, with New York or New Jersey as their hailing-place; we have ridden behind those kinds of locomotives often enough, and look at them with a jar of homesickness.

But the high rolling hills, untilled and desolate, with here and there scattered houses and tangled growths of wild vegetation, are suggestive of an inhospitable and foreign land.

Tall palms grow near the sandy beach in these little coves, but dirty shanties with unkempt and uncared-for surroundings set them off, and leave you wondering why these people never took more trouble to live up to what nature had provided as an example, for the white beach and the tall clean trees made these places beautiful to begin with.

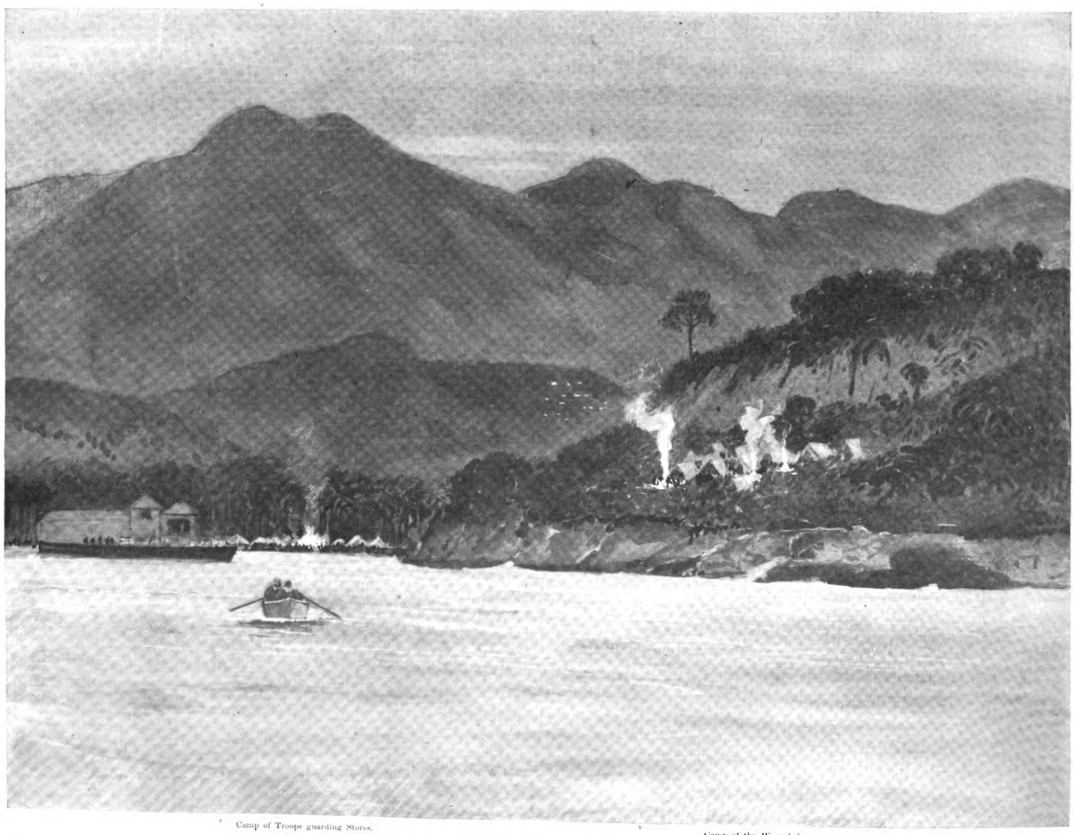
For a month we have cruised up and down the coast here, and passed frequently close to these two little places. We saw the Spanish flag flying from numerous block-houses, but never a sign of activity or a train running. They stopped, presumably, when the war began.

To-night, however, in this little cove of Altares, there is quite a change. The railroad is running as far as Baiquiri, and the engines puff about and ring their bells as if glad of the change. A track has been laid down on the beach, and they are moving off army stores—piles of yellow-pine boxes stored here temporarily. The two locomotives here were well rusted and uncared-for, but they were soon got going again by the soldier-boys. The bridge over the little valley stream was still there, but it was too good to be true. So a dummy car was given a good push and started over, and sure enough the bridge had been cut in two; but that was quickly repaired, and it is as good as ever to-night. Off the beach and moving about out at sea are a dozen or more transports: lighted up at night, they make a brilliant and comfortable scene. It is long since we have seen any lights on ships but signal-lanterns that flash for an instant and disappear. Boats are moving to and from the shore, and the work of putting supplies and troops ashore still goes on. There is quite a surf on the curving beach, and in spite of an extemporized pier, landing is a difficult matter, and is liable to include a ducking as part of the excitement. Lumber is piled up on the beach, and will be soon converted into a permanent and sufficient landing-stage.

The buildings along the railroad track to the west of the beach have been converted to temporary use as a hospital and headquarters. The railroad round-house and car-sheds are also occupied by the troops, while the Cubans have taken possession of the buildings farther back, at the foot of the hill, which are far more comfortable and clean-looking. Some of them, covered with vines and surrounded by oleander-trees in full bloom, are really pretty.

Along the track for a quarter of a mile are cars filled with coal that have been peacefully side-tracked until they should be needed. Just why the Spaniards did not set fire to so valuable a prize seems hard to discover.

Buildings are scattered along the steep hill-side, and a block-house is perched nearly at the top. The path or trail that leads up and on to Santiago has been worn in the past day or so into a respectable-looking road. Files of men are constantly going and coming up and down, and heavy baggage-wagons, drawn by six or eight army mules, jolt over the ruts and bumps.



We have come to call this place Thunder Bay, from the frequent and drenching showers that come down with a wild rush off the hills and blot out everything in a gray veil of rain. It is more like standing under a big shower-bath than anything in the nature of rain I have experienced before. Out at sea, a half-mile away, the sun may be shining brightly, but every big cloud that drifts near these hills is ready with a burden of water that is spilled out without warning. Then the sun comes gayly out, and everything steams for an hour and dries up in the heat—all but the roads, that are puddles of mud and water, and in the low places never dry up. Up at Guantanamo the inland hills are usually veiled in rain, but it has not yet rained to speak of at Camp McCalla, and that means a great deal to the good health and comfort of the men in camp.

To-day the Thirty-third Michigan Volunteer Regiment was landed, and portions of the First and Sixth Cavalry, the men scrambling out of the boats upon the little wet dock, taking good care to keep their guns dry, if they got wet themselves. Fully half of the Michigan boys, it seemed to me, went in for a swim at once, and splashed about in the surf and rain like a lot of schoolboys playing hookey. Except for a guard to protect the stores, of which there is nearly a million dollars' worth on hand, the troops are moved as rapidly as possible to the front. Those arriving to-day are camped along the railroad track, their white tents gleaming in the moonlight, and the light of their camp-fires bringing out in relief the groups of moving figures. Until taps are sounded the shore scene is a brilliant kaleidoscope of light and shade framed in the black shadow of the hills and gilded by soft moon and pale star light.

Most of the men who were wounded in the fight of Friday last have been put on board the Olivette. Those not so seriously injured are kept in the old whitewashed shed used as temporary hospital: it is a poor place enough, and is crowded too. When the wounded began to come in, which was not till late in the day, the surgical force was totally unprepared for the sudden demands made upon it, and many of the men had to wait for hours to have their wounds properly dressed. Now, however, things are getting in shape. Large hospital-tents will be set up to-morrow, and the men moved to more comfortable quarters.

Aguadores, July 1, 1898.

Early this morning the army began a general attack on Santiago, moving in three divisions. The Thirty-third Michigan, forming a portion of one command, was sent up the railroad to the Aguadores bridge. A train made up of twenty-seven coal-cars and two cabooses was used in transporting the regiment, the first division leaving Siboney at three o'clock in the morning. The second portion did not arrive until after nine o'clock, when it came up, pushed by two locomotives, the men filling every particle of space in the cars. They immediately formed, and marched along the shore to a point near the mouth of the river, and then pushed inland through the dense thicket of undergrowth and low trees. On the hill-side west of the river is an old fort with heavy masonry walls, low towers, and turrets, that zigzag up the hill and form one of the outposts of the city a few miles away. Farther up the deep ravine, and commanding both sides of the river which connects the sea with the inner harbor of Santiago, is a masked battery of rapid-fire guns. Both these defences have been repeatedly shelled by the ships, and this morning the New York, Suwanee, and Gloucester were stationed immediately off the mouth of the river, commanding both batteries. The water is deep close in, and the Suwanee, particularly, went in within a biscuit's toss of the shore, on which a considerable surf was beating. The railroad crosses the ravine and river here on a long iron trestle, with a block-house at either end, and winds up the valley, which makes an abrupt curve inland. The sides, very high, steep, and rocky, are difficult of access, and the men among the dense foliage at the bottom were unable to see their enemy until Camp of Troops guarding Stores. Camp of the Wounded.

TWILIGHT AT SIBONEY, JULY 7.

Drawn by Carlton T. Chapman, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly" with Admiral Sampson's Fleet.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ENTRANCE TO SANTIAGO HARBOR, JULY 7.

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.

"The Spaniards attempted to sink the 'Reina Mercedes' in the channel Monday night, July 4, but under the fire of the guns of our ships she ran ashore, and lies as shown in the drawing."

well under their fire. Signal-men were posted on the side of the hill, and as soon as the troops were disposed out of the line of fire from the ships the New York hoisted the danger-flag, and signal was made to open fire on the fort and masked battery.

A large Spanish flag was flying over the old fort, and the red and yellow stood out in brilliant contrast against the green and gray of the hill-side.

The New York began firing soon after nine o'clock, and the Suwanee and Gloucester joining in, the smoke soon became too dense to admit of accurate work. Accordingly the signal to fire with deliberation was made, and after that it became slow but very beautiful target practice. The New York, firing straight up the ravine at the location of the masked battery, succeeded in landing at least one eight-inch shell fairly in the works, and the mass of reddish dust that flew up in the air contained guns, men, and all sorts of débris. Several shots had been landed in the old fort, knocking a corner of the lower wall off, and dumping a mass of crumbled rock and dust down the hill-side.

The signal had been made to cease firing, when the Suwanee asked for permission to destroy the flag that still waved over the abandoned fort. Permission was given to knock it down if she could do it "in three shots."

The Suwanee opened fire immediately with one of her four-inch guns, the first shot striking the base of the flag-staff, tilting it over, and sending the dust flying. We had supposed there was no one in the fort, but the flag-staff certainly straightened up again, and a second shot followed, which went through the flag and tore a big rent in it. There it hung in the smoke and dust for a minute or two; then a final flash and roar, and flag-staff and flag disappeared in the dust, the staff cut fairly in two by a splendid shot. We felt like cheering this, as it certainly was perfect shooting. Lieutenant Victor Blue sighted the gun, and deserves another feather in his cap. Captain Delahanty has made the Suwanee famous in the fleet for his daring and efficient work, and the little gunboat has a ready-for-a-fight look about her that is admirable. Delahanty hoists a flag, when he goes into action, that is half as big as his ship, and looks the largest flag in the fleet.

During the lulls in the firing we heard several volleys ashore, but could see no smoke. As the Spanish use smokeless powder entirely, it is hard to locate their position, and it is an unpleasant feeling to hear or see bullets dropping around you and not know where they come from.

A squad of men came out of the woods soon after the volley-firing began, carrying a Red Cross flag, and helping the wounded back to the train that remained waiting on the track.

Fire from the battery had killed two and wounded several before the New York's eight-inch gun put an end to its service for that day. The Michigan men were under fire for the first time, but they behaved splendidly, and it was not their fault that the movement, being a feint, played but an unimportant part in the day's fighting.

OFF SANTIAGO, July 2, 1898.

This morning at 5.30 the fleet began bombarding the fortifications of Santiago. In the hard fighting which lasted all day yesterday the army captured and held the outposts of the city on the west, north, and east, and it only remained for the navy to destroy the heavy guns on the south to make the work of investment complete. Of course the ships in the harbor are to be reckoned with, but it is almost a certainty that Cervera will be forced to fight his way out or to destroy the city by his own shells in attempting to drive out the army. So we were in an expectant mood when the ships drew in and opened fire. The morning was brilliant with sunlight, and great domes of white clouds floated above the hills, that shone in tints of green and gray, with deep shadows of ravines streaking their rugged sides. The sea flashed back the glowing sunlight, and rose and fell in long swells to the deep roll of the tide.

Off the entrance to the harbor, and almost under Morro, lay the Iowa, grim and silent, her guns swung out, but holding their fire for the possible appearance of the Spanish fleet. On a staff just east of the great round sentinel tower of Morro flew a new and bright red and yellow flag, flapping its folds against the background of the old gray walls.

Morro had been spared while Hobson and his men were there, but now that they have been removed, the picturesque beauty of the old castle could not save it, and many tons of old gray rock were tumbled from its turrets and towers and sprinkled down the hill-side. Shot after shot struck the walls without doing any perceptible damage. The smoke wreathed about the old pile, and clouds of heavy dust spurted up and hung in a thick mass wherever a shot struck.

The weight of fire, as hitherto, was directed against the western battery on the hill top, and shell after shell exploded within the works or immediately in front of them, driving the Spanish away from the guns, and silencing them for a time, as usual. None of their shots struck the ships, or, so far as I could see, anywhere near them, going mostly far out to sea. We were lying off Morro, and were surprised to hear a shell scream over our heads and drop in the water a little way beyond. Whether that was a chance shot from one of our ships or a wild effort from the battery was hard to tell. There were several colliers and transports lying out beyond us, and they all moved away as quickly as possible, but no more shots came in that direction.

There is a general feeling of contempt for the Spanish gunners among the men in the fleet, and they seem unable to sight their guns with anything like accuracy; and any shots that have struck have been purely accidental, as the following ones are away wide of the mark.

The Oregon did some fine work this morning, lying off the harbor entrance to the westward, where she got the range of Cay Smith, and sent shell after shell with splendid aim into that stronghold. While our ships are firing rapidly they are almost completely enveloped in smoke, and the effect as it blows along the water and floats away against the green hills is very beautiful.

At half past seven the ships drew off, getting a last shot, as usual, from the Spanish, who return to their guns as soon as the ships cease firing. The position of Santiago, properly defended by skilful gunners, would be almost impregnable from the sea, the high hills and narrow channel making it difficult for an attacking force; but the guns at present are so badly handled that our ships move about with impunity; even the little mosquito fleet sail up and down where they choose, and are never fired on, for fear of the ready answer from the battle-ships, that rarely get out of range.

SIBONEY, July 2.

"The Spaniards called us Yankee pigs; now they call us Yankee devils because we don't stop for their guns." This is what a trooper of the Sixth Cavalry said to me today. He was walking about with his coat thrown over his shoulders, and no shirt; the doctors had cut that off in dressing a wound in his shoulder, to which he seemed happily indifferent as he talked vividly about the fight and what our boys had done, paying many compliments to the volunteers, and declaring that the charge of the Light Brigade was not more fine than the charge up the hot hill to take the Spanish intrenchments.

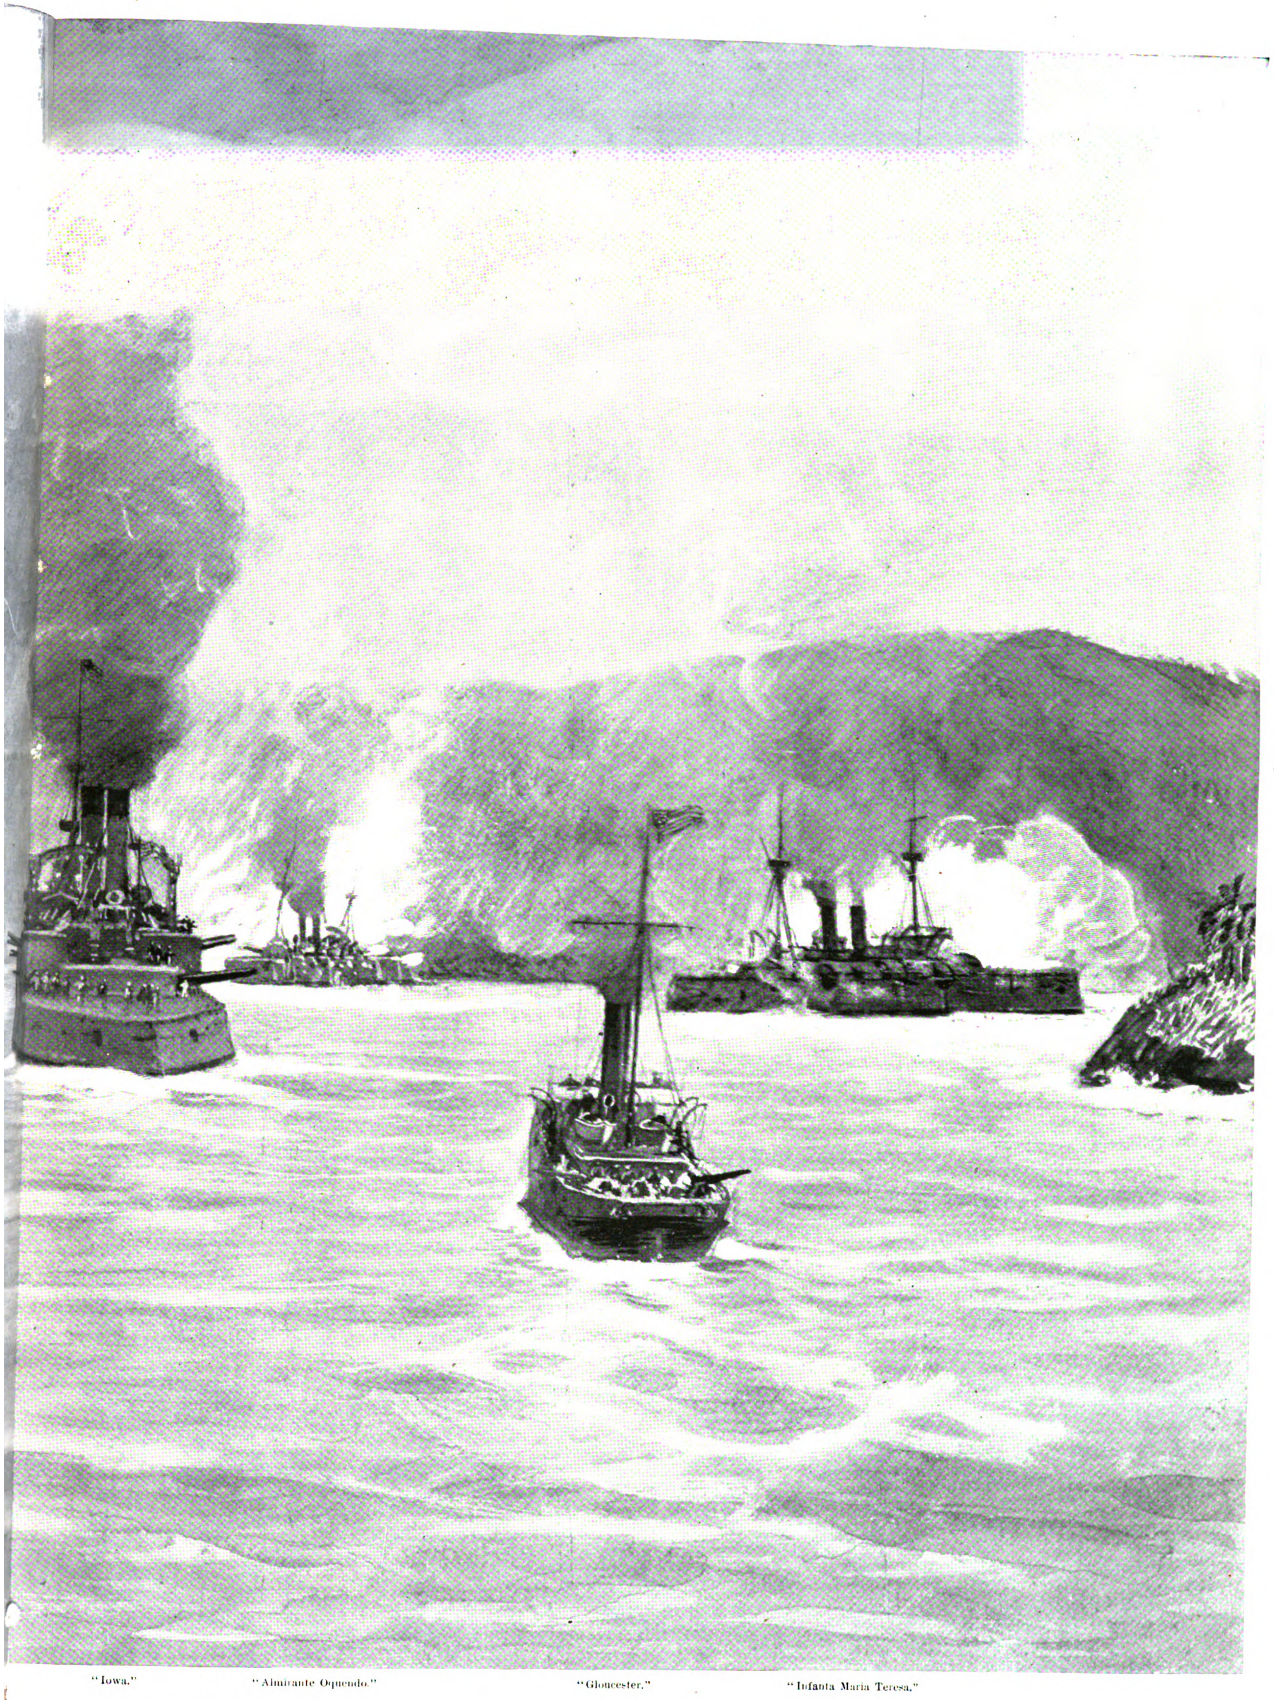
I talked with many men of different regiments, many of them badly wounded, and just unloaded out of a springless wagon after a ride of nine miles over rough rutty roads. You would suppose they would not want to talk, but the spirit of enthusiasm and pride in what they had done was too great to keep back, and they wanted to tell all about it. Not one of the hundreds who were coming in had any time to groan or complain, and it was fine to see the patience and courage exhibited on all sides.

The doctors and nurses in the hospital were working like beavers, cutting off arms and legs and dressing wounds, and still the wounded came in by dozens to be taken care of and given a place to lie down and rest. Dirty and bedraggled they were, with torn clothes, and hasty bandages put on at division hospitals at the front. Jokes were exchanged and good-nature prevailed, though it seemed as if it might be well worn out of them under such circumstances. "Hello, Bill! Where'd you get hit?" "In the head. Look at my hat." And, sure enough, two big holes in it, and a bad bloody-looking pate underneath tied up in a temporary bandage. One big trooper of the Tenth wanted me to draw his picture, and he smiled under a big white bandage around the top of his black head.

A great many men were wounded in the head, and there were any quantity of hats that had holes through them, but there were many more poor fellows who had to be lifted out of the wagons and carried off on stretchers to the care of the hard-worked doctors.

The courage and patience these men showed, not only in the field, but in being brought in and left, in a forgotten sort of way, at the hospital doors, struck me very forcibly as one of the noble attributes of the American sol-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



"Cristobal Colon." "Texas." "Vizcaya." "Oregon."
"Brooklyn."

THE NAVAL BATTLE OF SANTIAGO—DESTRUCTION O

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST

This Drawing represents the state of Affairs about Forty Minutes after the Fight began. The "Maria Teresa" and "Oquendo" have just

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ADMIRAL CERVERA'S FLEET, SUNDAY MORNING, JULY 3.

OR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.

n Ashore, the "Iowa" and "Gloucester" remaining by them, while the other American Vessels continue in Pursuit of the "Vizcaya" and "Colon."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

dier, who is not only fearless in battle, but patient in suffering. It was a first fight for most of them, but they behaved like veterans, and after it was over they asked about their friends and for news from home, took their wounds as an every-day matter, and bubbled over with pride in the service. The country may well be proud of such soldiers.

Sunday, July 3, 1898.

Admiral Cervera's famous Cape Verd fleet is no more! Sunk, burned, utterly destroyed, it has passed into history, and one more great victory stands to the credit of the American navy. Once more the victor's laurel must be placed on the brow of the American sailor, and new names added to the list of famous naval commanders who have won battles for the nation.

Sunday dawned, a beautiful and calm day, with the ships in their usual stations, saving the Massachusetts and Suwanee, that had gone to Guantanamo for coal. About nine o'clock the New York signalled "disregard the actions of flag-ship," and steamed off toward Siboney, where Admiral Sampson intended to have a consultation with General Shafter. This left Commodore Schley in command of the station, and the usual routine of Sunday inspection was about to begin, when the smoke of Cervera's ships was observed, and the call to general quarters and clear ship for action sounded through the fleet. An officer on the bridge of the Texas first observed a column of smoke going straight up in the breathless air behind the wooded hills which shut in the harbor. This was followed by several other columns of smoke, and then a quartermaster reported that the Spanish ships were under way. At first it was thought that they were moving up the harbor, but at 9.35, by the Texas's time, the first of the fleet showed around the western hill, and, followed closely by the others, came out and turned to the westward. The Infanta Maria Teresa, flying the flag of Admiral Cervera, headed the line, followed by Vizcaya, Cristóbal Colon, Almirante Oquendo, and torpedo-boats Furor and Pluton.

The Gloucester, Lieutenant-Commander Richard Wainwright, has been stationed off Morro lately, and was cruising about in her usual position just east of the channel as this formidable armada passed out. The crew simply held their breath and watched it. But the Spanish ships paid no attention to the little cruiser, holding their fire for bigger game. When the torpedo-boat destroyers appeared, however, the Gloucester, which had cleared for action, and was ready with her small battery, promptly attacked them with every gun she could bring to bear.

The land to the westward of Morro curves in slightly, forming a long shallow bay, like the curve of a bow. At the western end the Brooklyn was stationed, and straight, like the string of the bow, went the Spanish ships right for the Brooklyn. Our ships were in position from east to west as follows: next to the Gloucester, but farther out, were the Indiana, Oregon, Iowa, Texas, Brooklyn, and Vizcaya; the last-named moved immediately outside to give the Brooklyn room.

None of the ships had a full pressure of steam up, and as the Spanish fleet moved swiftly out, it looked for a minute as if they had a fair chance of getting away. Smoke poured from their funnels, and they were evidently doing their best to get a good start of their watchful foes. Neither the Iowa nor Indiana was in a condition to make very good time, nor did they, especially the Indiana, get as close in to the fight as they would have wished; but the Oregon, Texas, and Brooklyn moved rapidly in to head off the enemy, and they were immediately engaged by all our ships. The Iowa, not being able to use her forward turret, swung around to bring her after twelve-inch guns to bear, but soon afterward got her forward turret working again, and opened fire with her forward and starboard broadside guns. The deep-sea torpedo-boats, or destroyers, as they have been called so often, were the first to suffer from the fire of our ships. A shell from one of the Iowa's big guns tore the whole stern off the Furor, and both boats were struck repeatedly by the fire of the Iowa and Indiana. The Gloucester then attacked both at once, being between them, and firing from both sides, while the torpedo-boats answered back with their rapid-fire guns. But this did not last long. They got perhaps three miles from the harbor entrance when the Furor, in a sinking condition, showed a white flag, and was promptly boarded by a boat from the Gloucester. After some lively work they took off her few surviving men and a big cat, the ship's mascot, who was rescued from the water. An attempt was made at first to save the vessel, but she was too far gone, being cut to pieces, and nearly all her crew dead on her decks or below. The sight was a sad one enough, but there was no time to help, and the boat had not been gone five minutes when the Furor blew up and sank in 2000 fathoms of water. The Pluton meantime, equally damaged, had succeeded in getting close inshore, where she sank, her bow just showing out of water.

While this was going on, the Brooklyn was standing the brunt of the fire from the four Spanish ships. The Maria Teresa headed straight for the Brooklyn, with the evident intention of ramming her; the Brooklyn avoided this by clever manœuvring, and poured in such a deadly fire from her 8-inch and 5 inch rapid-fire guns as completely to worst the Maria Teresa, and she headed toward shore, flames bursting from her forward and after hatches. The Oquendo and Vizcaya were hotly engaging the Brooklyn at this time, while the Colon changed her position inside of the other Spanish ships, holding her fire, and doing her best to get away. At five minutes past ten o'clock the Texas and Oregon were coming into close range, and joined the Brooklyn in her unequal fight. The Iowa also was approaching, pouring in an effective fire at long range.

The Teresa having dropped out of the fight, the Oquendo took her place, with the possible intention of sacrificing herself in giving the Vizcaya and Colon a chance to escape; both these ships started off at 10.30, cutting inshore from the Brooklyn and Oregon, and heading straight down the coast. The Brooklyn and Oregon having practically finished the Oquendo, left her to the mercies of the following ships, and started after the Vizcaya and Colon, followed by the Texas, that, now coming up at a good speed, fired a few shots into the Oquendo, which was on fire and headed toward shore, and then kept on after the others.

Then began a splendid chase. The Colon was rated a 19½ knot armored cruiser, the finest ship in the Spanish navy; the Vizcaya, a 21-knot ship, with two 11-inch guns, was supposed to outclass the Brooklyn and New York, with their 8 inch guns and 19-knot speed. The Oregon, a 15-knot battle-ship, was not classed as a speedy vessel, or able to catch a fast cruiser. Just here, however, the Oregon proved herself a wonder and the pride of the American navy. She had passed the Texas early in the action, doing twelve or thirteen knots, and cut inside of her to get at the foe, firing splendid shots with her first and secondary batteries. But now was her opportunity. The Brooklyn, keeping outside of the two fleeing ships, was firing from her forward 8-inch turret-guns and starboard broadside guns, and getting her speed up to 16½ knots, was rapidly overhauling her enemy; but without the help of the Oregon it is possible that the Colon at least might have gotten away. But the Oregon was coming up at a 16-knot gait, smoke and flames pouring from her funnels, and the water piling in huge cascades about her bows and rolling out in long lines of white on either side. From her forward turrets sheets of flames burst at intervals, and her 13-inch guns were sending their shells around the Vizcaya, while the Brooklyn, nearly abeam, was hammering her with rapid fire that simply drove the Spanish to cover and soon sent the Vizcaya in for the land. She was run ashore at Aserradero, seventeen miles west of Santiago, completely wrecked and on fire. A torpedo in the forward tube exploded, tearing a great hole in her bow, and wrecking her completely. The Iowa followed up and received the surrender of the ship, and took off the survivors and a number who had gotten ashore.

The Colon, meanwhile, having a good start, was doing her best to get away. Her speed, according to her captain, was at one time 17½ knots; but she could not keep this up, and the heavy shells of the Oregon falling about her and beyond her, while the Brooklyn pounded her with her rapid fire, gradually forced her inshore, and at 1.20 P.M. she ran her bows on the beach at Rio Tarquino, forty-eight miles from Santiago entrance, fired a lee gun, and hauled down her flag. She was practically uninjured; but the Spaniards, having surrendered, treacherously opened her water-valves, pounded out dead-lights, threw overboard the breeches of the guns, and injured the ship in every possible way before her captors could get aboard.

Captain Cook had a boat called away at once, and the men tumbled in just as they were, half naked, blackened with smoke and powder. The crew swarmed out of the suffocating depths of the ship and crowded the deck, cheering and dancing for joy. Captain Cook cautioned his men, as they came alongside the captured ship, not to show any signs of triumph or embarrass their enemy in any way, so in silence the men pulled up to the gangway, and were watched by a motley crowd who filled the ports and looked down from the decks of the Cristóbal Colon. Some one shouted out, "Bravo, Americanos," and the crew echoed it, "Bravo, Americanos," and the Brooklyn men shouted back, "Bravo, Españoles." The cabin and ward-room tables of the Colon were covered with wine bottles and glasses, and many of the crew had been filling themselves with "Dutch courage" also. So they were in a state of indifference as to what happened. The captain of the Colon asked on what terms he must surrender his ship, and Captain Cook informed him promptly an unconditional and immediate surrender must be given, and his terms were acceded to in an instant. The Colon did not have her two big 10-inch turret guns in place, and in fact they had never been put on the ship; but the ten 6-inch and six 4.7-inch guns, with her ten 6-pounder and ten 1-pounder rapid-fire guns, made her an extremely powerful ship, and every effort should be made to get her off the beach and into service again. The boat from the Brooklyn went alongside the Colon at 1.40, and soon after two o'clock the Texas and Vizcaya arrived, the Oregon having followed the Brooklyn closely in. The New York did not arrive until three-quarters of an hour after the Colon had grounded.

The Resolute soon came up from Santiago to report sighting a Spanish cruiser, and the Brooklyn was sent off after her, and again the tired men went to their guns. The cruiser turned out to be the Austrian Maria Teresa, however, and the Brooklyn had her chase for nothing. The 525 men on the Colon were placed on board the Resolute, together with some of the officers, those of higher rank being placed on board the New York and Vizcaya, the New York, Texas, and Oregon remaining by the prize until late at night.

Admiral Cervera and many of his officers and men were rescued by the Gloucester and transferred to the Iowa. They lowered boats from the Maria Teresa, and also jumped overboard to swim ashore or to float in on bits of wreckage. The admiral, in his under-clothes, was trying to escape on a raft which his own son, a lieutenant, was endeavoring to push ashore. Our boats saved many from a watery grave, all being in a perfectly destitute condition. The admiral was received with honors when he came on board the Iowa, and heartily cheered by the crew. The Oquendo had suffered more than any of the other ships, and her captain committed suicide when his ship ran ashore. Many of her crew got ashore, and were attacked by the Cubans until warned by our ships to desist. About 300 men from Vizcaya, Oquendo, and Teresa succeeded in getting away and into Santiago that night.

The Iowa took off many from the Vizcaya, and the three ships were left to their fate, flames pouring from their hatches, and the magazines finally exploding, finishing their destruction.

The Spanish loss was four fine ships, two deep-sea torpedo-boats, 600 men killed, and 1300 prisoners. Our loss was one man killed, George H. Ellis, chief yeoman of the Brooklyn, who had his head taken off by a solid shot. Several men were wounded on the Brooklyn, and one on the Texas. The Brooklyn was struck forty times, one 6-inch shell going through her side on the gun deck forward, smashed through an ash-shoot, pierced through the deck, and coming up again a foot or so beyond it, broke beams, and, exploding, sent pieces clear across the ship without injuring any one, which is marvellous good luck. The Texas was struck three times, one shell going through the chart-house, another through the lower part of her smoke-stack, driving smoke down into the fire-rooms and setting fire to the ship—damage that was quickly remedied.

Admiral Cervera stated, the day following, that his plan had been to strike for the Brooklyn and sink her, believing that the battle-ships could not catch his ships. His designs were frustrated, however, by the quick movements of our ships and by the rapid and accurate fire that did such damage as completely to bewilder and confound his men, who were unable to cope with such brilliant work.

The Colon's speed averaged only 13⅞ knots, and when the Oregon overhauled her the captain's chagrin was unbounded. To be chased by a battle-ship and beaten was adding insult to injury; and, in fact, it did seem incredible that the Oregon could develop such speed.

The honors of the day, while shared by the entire fleet, must belong particularly to the Oregon, Brooklyn, and Texas, and their brave officers and crews, who proved themselves worthy to wear the mantles of the heroes who have made famous the American navy in time past.

CARLTON T. CHAPMAN.

SANTIAGO AND CANEY.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

II.—THE FIRST SHOT.

July 2, 1898.

A STRAY solid shot, or a stray shell that did not explode, dropped into the bushes about twenty yards from the path just after I left headquarters at daybreak for the battle-field. There were creeks to wade, the road was muddy, the sun was hot, and I carried a heavy roll. On the brow of a hill I struck a reserve regiment, standing silent and waiting in the mist and dew along the road where they had camped, and a little farther on was a high knoll, from which the first American shell was to give the signal for the conflict of the day. The hill had been cleared of bushes, the four guns unlimbered and thrown into position against Caney, the caissons drawn to the rear, the horses gathered into the bushes to one side, and officers, aides, and correspondents walked the length of the hill, or stood in groups watching with field-glasses the red town, the stone fort to the right, and the block-house to the right of it, or took shelter by-and-by in the shade of a mango-tree that was heavy with yellow fruit. While everybody spoke in a quiet voice and nobody laughed or jested, nobody was as solemn as the occasion seemed to me to demand. One of those guns was to fire presently, and it was not going to be a salute, nor a sunset gun, nor a Christmas or Fourth of July explosion. It would be loaded with a shell, and was to be aimed at living men, and was meant to kill somebody. Moreover, it might be answered, and a Spanish shell might come back at once and kill somebody on our hill. So when a Spanish column of cavalry was sighted in a lane near Caney, and Captain Capron said, "Give 'em a shell, boys," and artillery-man No. 5 ran to the caisson and got from No. 4 a long little knotty-looking white sack, and something that looked like a country schoolmaster's quart bottle of ink with a red throat and the point of a cartridge, and then ran back to the gun and put this shell into a round glistening hole, and No. 1 stuffed the bag of powder after it, rammed it home, and shut the round little steel door, and the gunner took from a leather case at his hip something that looked like a brass thermometer, fixed it on the gun, and began sighting through it, depressing the gun by means of a wheel-screw with one hand in front of him, and motioning with the other behind him to No. 3 to move the trail to right or left, and finally when No. 2 sprang to the left, leaning away from the gun and slightly forward, and the other artillerymen took rigid positions—my heart was beating high, and I was moving a step or two backwards, surprised and somewhat ashamed that everybody else seemed to be nonchalant and unafraid. Perhaps I was the only one on the hill who did not know that there was no artillery in Caney to answer. When I did learn it, I too became nonchalant and unafraid.

"Fire!"

The man with the lanyard gave a quick jerk. There was a cap explosion at the butt of the gun, a bulging white cloud from the muzzle, the trail bounced from its shallow trench, and the wheels whirled back twice on the rebound, and the shell was hissing through the air as iron hisses when a blacksmith thrusts it red-hot into cold water. You could hear that awful hiss so plainly that you seemed to be following the shell with your naked eye; you could hear it above the reverberating roar of the gun up and down the coast mountain; hear it until six seconds later a puff of smoke answered beyond the Spanish column where the shell burst. Then in eight seconds—for the shell travelled that much faster than sound—the muffled report of its bursting struck our ears, and all that was left of the first shot that started the battle was the thick sunlit smoke of the gun sweeping off through the brush, and the little mist-cloud of the shell rising slowly upward beyond the Spanish column, which seemed not to know that any harm was possible and near.

No harm seemed near, indeed, for the shells went wide; but the first shot started the ripping of cloth, the far-away rumble of wagons over cobblestones, or softened stage-hail and stage-thunder all around block-house, stone fort, and town. At first it was a desultory fire, like the popping of a bunch of fire-crackers that have to be relighted several times, and we could hear the hiss of the bullets even that far away; but at times the fire was as steady as the sputter of a Gatling gun that I heard later in the day. But the powder was smokeless, and we could see nothing other than the straw hats of the little devils in blue, who blazed away from their trenches around the fort, and minded the shells bursting over and around them as little as though they had been bursting snowballs. For the 3.2-inch guns had turned from the Spanish column, after it had ridden quietly out of sight, to the fort, and, with the exception of one gun, the shooting was at first very wild. One shot tore a hole through the wall, then another; another brought down the flag; others tore up the earth at the base of the fort, and the fort was soon silenced. But the rifle-pits were as active as ever, and after throwing a few shells into the town the battery ceased firing. Grimes's battery was thundering to the left of El Poso, the balloon was moving towards Santiago, and I made for the left field of battle. At the road the first wounded man appeared, between two supporting soldiers—Colonel Patterson of the Twenty-second. The brave old soldier had walked in a mile with a bullet through his groin.

"Well," he called, cheerily, as he was being laid down under the mango-tree, "I'm the first victim."

And such was the spirit of all the men, whether fighting, inactive and suffering from wounds, or close to the last agony.

JOHN FOX, JR.

July 19.—A note just received from Mr. Fox informs us that the conclusion of this account of the battle of July 1 and 2 was lost between the front and Siboney. Mr. Fox is unfortunately too ill from exposure to rewrite it at present.—EDITOR.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS.*

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "THE GREAT STONE OF SARDIS," ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY A. B. FROST.

X.—A LADIES' DAY IN CAMP.

TWO days after the rainy day in camp Mr. Archibald determined to take the direction of affairs into his own hands, so far as he should be able. Having no authority over the two young men at Camp Roy, he had hitherto contented himself with a disapproval of their methods of employing their time, which he communicated only to his wife. But now he considered that, as they were spending so much of their time in his camp and so little in their own, he would take charge of them exactly as if they belonged to his party. He would put an end, if possible, to the aimless strolls up and down the beach with Margery, and the long conversations which that young woman had grown to be so fond of, held sometimes with both young men, though more frequently with one. If Clyde and Raybold came into the woods to lounge in the shade and talk to a girl, they could go to some other camp to do it. But if they really cared to range the forest, either as sportsmen or lovers of nature, he would do his best to help them; so this day he organized an expedition to a low mountain about two miles away, taking Matlack with him as guide, and inviting the two young men to join him. They had assented because no good reason for declining had presented itself, and because Phil Matlack earnestly urged them to come along and let him show them what a real forest tramp was like. Before his recent talk with Peter Sadler, Phil would not have dared to go out into the woods in company with the bicycle man.

The two ladies were perfectly willing to remain in camp under the charge of Martin, who was capable of defending them against any possible danger; and as the bishop had agreed to take charge of Camp Roy during the absence of its occupants, Mr. Archibald planned for a whole day's tramp, the first he had taken since they went into camp.

When Martin's morning work was done he approached the shady spot where the two ladies had established themselves, and offered to continue his lessons in fly-fishing if Miss Dearborn so desired. But Miss Dearborn did not wish to take any lessons to-day. She would rest and stay with Mrs. Archibald. Even the elder lady did not care to fish that morning. The day was hot and the shade was grateful.

Martin walked away dissatisfied. In his opinion, there had never been a day more suitable for angling; this was a day which would be free from interruptions, either from two young fellows who knew nothing about real game-fishing, or from Matlack, who always called him away to do something when he was most interested in his piscatorial pedagogics. This was a day when he could stand by that lovely girl, give her the rod, show her how to raise it, wave it, and throw it, and sometimes even touch her hand as he took it from her or gave it back, watching her all the time with an admiration and delight which no speckled trout or gamy black bass had ever yet aroused in him, and all this without fear that a gentleman out on the lake might possibly be observing them with the idea that he was more interested in his work than the ordinary guide might be supposed to be. But luck was against him, and Martin, who did not in the least consider himself an ordinary guide, walked up and down in moody reflection, or grimly threw himself upon the ground, gazing upward at the sky—not half so blue as he was—but never walking or resting so far away that he could not hear the first cry from her should snake, bear, dragon-fly, or danger of any kind approach her.

To the ladies, about half an hour later, came the bishop, who, newly shaved and brushed, wished them good-morning, and offered his services in any manner which might be desired. If Mrs. Archibald wished to fish by the side of the lake, he was at her service; but Mrs. Archibald did not care to fish.

"This is a most charming day," said the bishop, removing his hat; "but I suppose it is more charming to me because it is my last day here."

"And so you are really going to go?" said Mrs. Archibald, smiling.

"I suppose you think I am not likely to get there," said he; "but really I have staid here long enough, and for several reasons."

"Sit down," said Margery, "and tell us what they are. There is a nice little rock with some moss on it."

The bishop promptly accepted the invitation and seated himself. As he did so, Martin, at a little distance, scowled, folded his arms, and slightly increased the length of his sentinel-like walk.

"Yes," said the bishop, brushing some pine leaves from his threadbare trousers, "during the time that I have accepted the hospitality of those young gentlemen I feel that I have in a great measure repaid them for their kindness, but now I see that I shall become a burden and an expense to them. In the first place, I eat a great deal more than both of them put together, so that the provisions they brought with them will be exhausted much sooner than they expected. I am also of the opinion that they are getting tired of eating in their own camp, but as I make a point of preparing the meals at stated hours, of course they feel obliged to partake of them."

"By which you mean, I suppose," said Mrs. Archibald, "that if they had not you to cook for them they would be apt to take a good many meals with us, as they did when they first came, and which would be cheaper and pleasanter."

"I beg, madam," said the bishop, quickly, "that you will not think that they have said anything of the sort. I simply inferred, from remarks I have heard, that one of them, at least, is very much of the opinion you have just stated; therefore I feel that I cannot be welcome much longer in Camp Roy. There is also another reason why I should go now. I have a business prospect before me."

"I am glad to hear that," said Mrs. Archibald. "Is it a good one?"

"I think it is," said the bishop. "I have been considering it earnestly, and the more I fix my mind upon it the greater appear its advantages. I don't mind in the least telling you what it is. A gentleman who is acquainted with my family and whom I have met two or three times, but not recently, possesses a very fine estate some thirty miles south of this place. He has been in Europe for some time, but is expected to return to his country mansion about the end of this week. It is my purpose to offer myself to him in the capacity of private librarian. I do not think it will be difficult to convince him that I have many qualifications for the situation."

"Has he so many books that he needs a librarian?" asked Margery.

"No," said the bishop; "I have no reason to suppose that he has any more books than the ordinary country gentleman possesses, but he ought to have. He has a very large income, and is now engaged in establishing for his family what is intended to become, in time, an ancestral mansion. It is obvious to any one of intelligence that such a grand mansion would not be complete without a well-selected library, and that such a library could not be selected or arranged by an ordinary man of affairs. Consequently, unless he has a competent person to perform this duty for him, his library for a long time will be insignificant. When I shall put the question before him, I have no doubt that he will see and appreciate the force and value of my statements. Such a position will suit me admirably. I shall ask but little salary, but it will give me something far better than money—an opportunity to select from the book marts of the whole world the litera-

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2167.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ture in which I delight. Consequently, you will see that it is highly desirable that I should be on hand when this gentleman arrives at his estate."

With a look of gentle pity Mrs. Archibald gazed at the smooth round face of the bishop, flushed with the delights of anticipation and brightened by the cheery smile which nearly always accompanied his remarks. "And is that your only prospect?" she said. "I don't want to discourage you, but it seems to me that if you had some regular business—and you are not too old to learn something of the sort—it would be far better for you than trying to obtain the mythical position you speak of. I see that you are a man of intelligence and education, and I believe that you would succeed in almost any calling to which you would apply yourself with earnestness and industry. You must excuse me for speaking so plainly, but I am much older than you are and I do it for your good."

"Madam," exclaimed the bishop, radiant with grateful emotion, "I thank you from the bottom of my heart for what you have said. I thank you for your appreciation of me and for the generous motive of your words, but, to be frank with you, I am not suited to a calling such as you have mentioned. I have many qualities which I well know would promote my fortunes were they properly applied, but that application is difficult, for the reason that my principal mental characteristic is indefiniteness. When but a little child I was indefinite. Nobody knew what I was going to do, or how I would turn out; no one has since known, and no one knows now. In whatever way I have turned my attention in my endeavors to support myself, I have been obstructed and even appalled by the indefiniteness of the ordinary pursuits of life. Now the making of a private library is in itself an indefinite occupation. It has not its lines, its rules, its limitations. But do not think, kind lady, that I shall always depend upon such employment. Should I obtain it, I should hold it only so long as it would be necessary, and it may be necessary for but a little while. Do you care to hear of my permanent prospects?" said he, looking from one lady to the other.

"Certainly," said Margery; "we would like to hear all you have to tell."

"Well then," said the bishop, folding his arms and smiling effusively, but with a gentle curbing of his ordinary cheerfulness, "I will inform you that I have an uncle who is a man of wealth and well on in years. Unfortunately, or fortunately it may be, this uncle greatly dislikes me. He objects so strongly to my methods of thought and action, and even to my physical presence, that he cannot bear to hear me speak or even to look at me, and the last time I was in his company, about four years ago, he told me that he would leave me a legacy on condition that he should never hear from me or see me again. He promised to make the proper provision in his will immediately, but declared, and I know he will keep his word, that if he ever received a letter from me or even saw me or heard my voice he would instantly strike out that clause. I appreciated and respected his feelings, and accepted the condition. From that moment I have not written to him, nor shall I ever write to him, and I shall never go near him so long as he is alive. As I said, he is of advanced age, and it is impossible that he can long survive. When his demise takes place my circumstances will, I believe, be satisfactory."

"Did your uncle say how much he would leave you?" asked Mrs. Archibald.

"No, madam," returned the other, "he did not, but I feel sure that the sum will be measured by his satisfaction in knowing that his existence is entirely freed from me."

"Really," said Mrs. Archibald, "there is nothing about you so indefinite as your prospects."

"And it seems horrible to me," said Margery, "to be hoping that some one may die in order that you may be better off, and as you want money so much, you must hope that your uncle will die."

The bishop smiled and rose. "And now," said he, "I suppose I must go to prepare the dinner at Camp Roy. There is nobody there to eat it but myself, but I have assumed the duty, and it must be performed. Good-morning. By your leave, I shall look in upon you again."

Mrs. Archibald had a mind to ask him to stay and dine with them, but having noticed an unfriendly expression on the face of Martin when his gloomy walk brought him in her direction, she thought it would not be wise to do so.

XI.—MARGERY TAKES THE OARS.

AFTER dinner Mrs. Archibald prepared herself for a nap, the most delightful thing she could think of during the warm hours of such a day. Margery, after seeing the elder lady comfortably disposed in the shady sitting-room of the cabin, went out of doors with no doubt in her mind as to what would be for her the most delightful thing to do. She would take a row on the lake all by herself.

She went down to the boat, which was partly drawn up on the beach and fastened to a heavy stake. But when she reached it she was disgusted to find that the chain was secured to the stake by a padlock. The oars were in the boat, and she could easily have pushed it into the water, but she could not set it free without the key to the padlock.

"I do believe," she exclaimed, "that the will of that horrid Mr. Sadler is like gas. It goes everywhere, even to the tops of the houses and under the beds." But she did not give up her intention. She tried to detach the chain from the boat, but finding this impossible, she thought of going for Martin. Perhaps he might have a key. This idea, however, she quickly put aside. If he had a key, and gave it to her, she might get him into trouble, and, besides, she did not believe that he would let her go alone, and in any other way she did not wish to go. Standing with her pretty brows knit, and one heel deep in the soft ground into which she had stamped it, she heard approaching footsteps, and turning, saw the bishop. He came forward with a buoyant step.

"Is there anything I can do for you, Miss Dearborn?" he said. "Do you wish to go out on the lake? Do you want some one to row you?"

"Yes and no," said Margery. "I want to go out in the boat, and I don't want anybody to row me. But that chain is fastened with an abominable padlock, and I cannot launch the boat."

"One of your guides is here," said he. "Perhaps I can get a key from him."

"No, no," said Margery, quickly; "he must not know about it. There is a Sadler law against it, and he is employed by Sadler."

"It is very securely fastened," said the bishop, examining the lock and chain. "It is the work of the guide Matlack, I have no doubt. But, Miss Dearborn," said he, with a bright smile, "there is a boat at Camp Roy. That is not locked, and I can bring it here in twenty minutes."

"No," said Margery; "I don't want that boat. I've seen it. It is a clumsy old thing, and, besides, it leaks. I want this one. This is just the kind of boat I want to row. It is too bad. If I could get off now there would be nobody to hinder me, for Martin is washing the dinner dishes, or doing something of that kind, and whenever he does house-work he always keeps himself out of sight."

The bishop examined the stake. It was a stout little tree trunk driven deep into the ground and projecting about five feet above the surface, with the chain so wrapped around it that it was impossible to force it up or down. Seizing the stake near the top, the bishop began to push it backward and forward, and being a man of great strength, he soon loosened it so much that, stooping, he was able to pull it from the ground.

"Hurrah!" exclaimed Margery. "It came up just like pulling a tooth."

"Yes," said the radiant bishop; "the good Matlack may be very careful about fastening a boat, but I think I have got the better of him this time; and now I will put the stake, chain and all, in the bow. That is the best way of disposing of them. Are you sure that you prefer going alone? I shall be delighted to row you if you wish me to."

"Oh no," said Margery; "I am just wild to row myself, and I want to hurry and get off for fear Martin will be coming down here."

"Are you sure you understand rowing and the management of a boat?" he asked.

"Oh yes," she replied, "I can row; of course I can. I will get in, and then you can push off the boat."

"Allow me," said the bishop. But before he could reach her to help her, Margery had stepped on the side of the boat and was about to seat herself.

"If you will take the seat next to the stern," said the bishop, holding the boat so that it would be steady, "I think that will be better. Then the weight of the stake in the bow will put the boat on an even keel."

"All right," said Margery, accepting his suggestion and seating herself. "Now just wait until I get the oars into the rowlocks, and then you can push me off."

"Which way do you intend to row?" asked the bishop.

"Oh, I shall go down toward the lower end of the lake, because that way there are more bushes along the banks and Martin will be less apt to see me. If I go the other way I will be in plain sight of the camp, and he may think he ought to do something—fire a gun across my bows to bring me to, may be, as they do at sea."

"Hardly," said the bishop; "but let me advise you not to go very far from the shore, so that if you feel tired you can come in easily, and if you will allow me I will walk down the shore in the direction in which you intend to row."

"Oh, I am not going to get tired," said she. "I could row all day. It is splendid to be in a boat all by myself and have the whole management of it. Now please push me off."

With some reluctance, but with a sincere desire to make the young girl happy, which could not be overcome by prudence—at least by such prudence as he possessed—the bishop, with a strong steady push, sent the boat well out on the surface of the water.

"That was beautifully done," Margery called back to him. "Now I have room enough to turn around without any trouble at all."

She turned the boat about with its bow toward the lower end of the lake, but it was not without trouble. "I have not rowed for a good while," she said, "but I am getting used to the oars already. Now then, I'm off," and she began to pull with a strength which, had it been suitably paired with skill, would have made her an excellent amateur oarswoman. But the place of skill was supplied by enthusiasm and determination. Once or twice an oar slipped from the rowlock and she nearly went over backwards, and several times one of the blades got under the water with the flat side up, so that she had difficulty in getting it out. She raised her oars much too high in the air, but she counterbalanced this by sinking them very deep into the water. But she got on, and although her course was somewhat irregular, its general trend was in the direction desired.

The bishop walked along the bank, keeping as near to the water as he could. Sometimes masses of shrubbery shut off all view of the lake, and then there would be an open space where he would stop and watch the boat.

"Please keep near the shore, Miss Dearborn," he called; "that will be better, I think, and it is certainly more shady and pleasant than further out."

"I know what you mean," cried Margery, pulling away in high good-humor; "you think it is safer near the shore; but I am not going to row very far this time, and after a little while I may pull the boat in and rest for a time before starting back," and then she rowed on with renewed energy.

The next time the bishop was able to hail the boat, it was at a point where he was obliged to push his way through the bushes in order to see out upon the lake.

"Miss Dearborn," he called, "I think you are a great deal too far from shore, and you must be getting very tired and hot. Your face is greatly flushed. I will hurry along and see if I can find a good place for you to stop and cool yourself."

"I am all right," cried Margery, resting on her oars. "I get along very well, only the boat doesn't steer properly. I think it is because of the weight of that stick in the bow. I suppose I could not get rid of it?"

"Oh no!" cried the bishop, in alarm; "please don't think of it! But if you touch shore at the first open space, I think I can arrange it better for you."

"Very good," said she; "you go ahead and find such a place, and I will come in."

"If you touch shore," said the bishop to himself, "you don't go out again in that boat alone! You don't know how to row at all."

The bishop ran a hundred yards or more before he found a place at which a boat could be beached. It was not a very good place, but if he could reach out and get hold of the bow, that would be enough for him. He was strong enough to pull that boat over a paved street.

As he looked out over the water he saw that Margery had progressed considerably since he had seen her last, but she was still further from shore than before.

"Row straight toward me!" he shouted. "Here is a fine landing-place, cool and shady."

She looked around and managed to turn the boat's head in his direction. Then she rowed hard, pulling and splashing, and evidently a little tired. She was strong, but this unusual exercise was a trial to her muscles. Perhaps, too, she felt that the bishop was watching her, and that made her a little nervous, for she could not help being aware that she was not handling the oars as well as when she started out. With a strong pull at her right oar to turn the boat inland, she got her left oar tangled between the water and the boat, so it seemed to her, and lost her hold of it. In a moment it was overboard and floating on the lake.

Leaning over the side of the boat, she made a grasp at the oar, but it was too far for her to reach it; and then, by some spasmodic movement of the other oar, the distance was increased.

The bishop's face grew pale. As he looked at her he saw that the distance between her and the oar was increasing, and now he understood why she had progressed so well. There was a considerable current in the lake which had carried her along, and was now moving the heavy boat much faster than it moved the oar. What should he tell her to do? If she could put her single oar out at the stern, she might scull the boat; but he was sure she did not understand sculling, and to try it she would have to stand up, and this would be madness.

She now took the other oar from the rowlock, and was about to rise, when the bishop shouted to her.

"What are you going to do?" he cried.

"I am going to the stern," she said, "to see if I cannot reach that oar with this one. Perhaps I can pull it in."

"For Heaven's sake, don't do that!" he cried. "Don't stand up, or the boat will topple, and you will fall overboard."

"But what can I do?" she called back. "I can't row with one oar."

"Try rowing a little on one side, and then on the other," said he. "Perhaps you can bring the boat in that way."

She followed his suggestion, but very awkwardly, and he saw plainly that she was tired. Instead of approaching the shore, the boat continued to float down the lake.

Margery turned again. "Bishop," she cried, "what shall I do? I must do something, or I can't get ashore at all."

She did not look frightened; there was more of annoyance in her expression, as if she thought it impertinent in fate to treat her in this way, and she would not stand it.

"If I had thought of the current," said the bishop to himself, "I would never have let her go out alone, and she can't be trusted in that boat another minute longer. She will do something desperate." So saying, the bishop took off his hat and threw it on the ground. Then he unbuttoned his coat and began to take it off, but he suddenly changed his mind. Even in that wilderness and under these circumstances he must appear respectable, so he buttoned his coat up again, and hastily took off his shoes, and, without hesitating, walked into the water until it was above his waist, and then calling to Margery that he was coming to her, he began to swim out into the lake. He did not strike out immediately for the boat, but directed his course toward the floating oar. Turning his head frequently toward Margery, he could see that she was sitting perfectly still, watching him, and so he kept on with a good heart.

The bishop was a powerful swimmer, but he found great difficulty in making his way through the water, on account of the extreme tightness of his clothes. It seemed to him that his arms and legs were bandaged in splints, as if he had been under a surgeon's care; but still he struck out as well as he could, and in time reached the oar. Pushing this before him to the boat, Margery took hold of it.

"You swim splendidly," said she. "You can climb in right here."

But the bishop knew better than that, and worked his way round to the stern, and after holding on a little while to get his breath, he managed to clamber into the boat.

"Was the water very cold?" said she.

On his replying that it was, she said she thought so because he seemed stiff.

"Now, Miss Dearborn," said he, "I have made the stern seat very wet, but I don't believe you will mind that, and if you will sit here I will take the oars and row you in."

"Oh, I think I can do that myself," said Margery. "I am rested now, and I am ever so much obliged to you for getting my oar for me."

Under almost any circumstances the bishop could smile, and now he smiled at the ridiculousness of the idea of Margery's rowing that boat back against the current, and with him in it.

"Indeed," he said, "I must insist. I shall freeze to death if I don't warm myself by exercise." So, reaching out his hand, he assisted Margery to the stern, and seating himself in her place, he took the oars, which she had drawn in.

"I don't see why I could not make the boat go along that way," said she, as they began to move steadily toward the camp. "And I believe I could do it if people would only let me practise by myself; but they always want to show me how, and I hate to have anybody show me how. It is funny," she continued, "that you seem so very wet all but your collar. That looks as smooth and nice as if it had just come from the laundry."

The bishop laughed. "That is because it is gutta-percha," he said, "intended for rough use in camp; but the rest of my habiliments were not intended for wet weather."

"And you have no hat," said she. "Doesn't the sun hurt your head?"

"My head does feel a little warm," said he, "but I didn't want to row back to the place where I left my hat. It was not a good landing-place, after all. Besides," he said to himself, "I never thought of my hat or my shoes."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

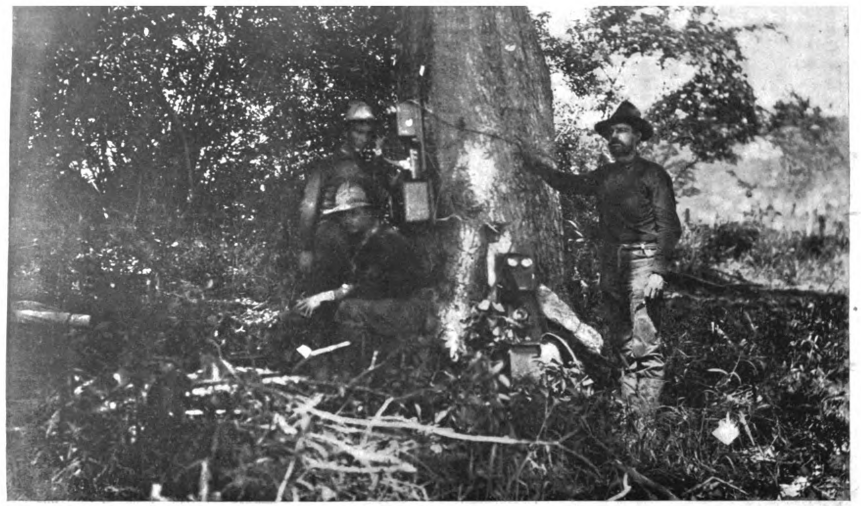
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LIGHT ARTILLERY MOVING TO A NEW POSITION.

SAN JUAN HILL—PORTION OF THE LINE HELD BY THE 9TH U. S. INFANTRY.

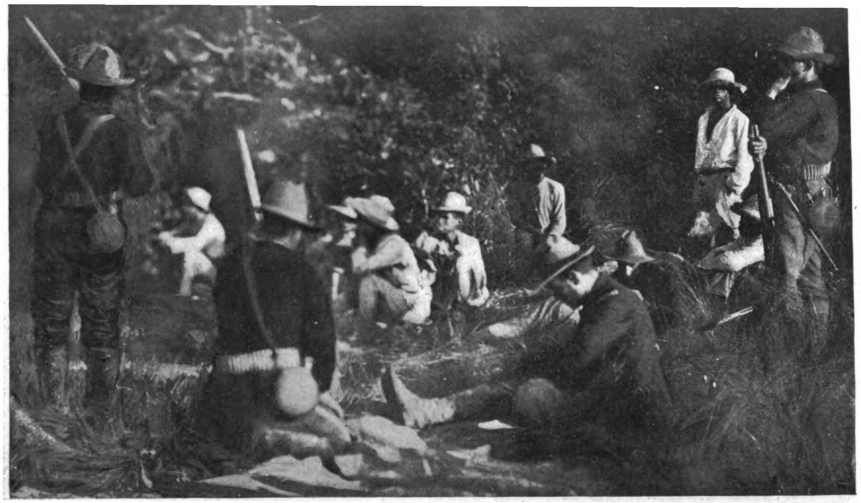
HEADQUARTERS 3D BRIGADE, 1ST DIVISION, LIEUTENANT-COLONEL EWERS, SAN JUAN HILL.

GENERAL WHEELER'S HEADQUARTERS, SAN JUAN.



AFTER THE BATTLE OF SAN JUAN, JULY 1 AND 2.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JAMES BURTON, SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHER FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL SHAFTER'S ARMY.



Original from PENN STATE
Digitized by Google
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

ENGINEER CORPS PUTTING UP A FIELD TELEPHONE.

THE SPANISH PRISONERS EXCHANGED FOR HOBSON AND HIS MEN.

INCIDENTS IN THE OPERATIONS AGAINST SANTIAGO.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JAMES BURTON, SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHER FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL SHAFTER'S ARMY.

Original from PENN STATE

MULE-TRAIN WITH AMMUNITION AND SUPPLIES.

WAGON-TRAIN WITH COMMISSARY STORES.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE BATTLE-GROUND OVER WHICH OUR TROOPS FOUGHT THEIR WAY ON JULY 1.

THE 7TH U. S. INFANTRY FORMED LINE HERE BEFORE THE FINAL ASSAULT.
Empty Cartridge-Cases in Foreground.

BLOCK-HOUSE AND FORT DEMOLISHED BY OUR ARTILLERY.

THE BATTLE-FIELD OF EL CANEY.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JAMES BURTON, SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHER FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL SHAFTER'S ARMY.

ENGINEER CORPS PUTTING UP A FIELD TELEPHONE.

INCIDENTS IN THE OPERATIONS AGAINST SANTIAGO.

THE SPANISH PRISONERS EXCHANGED FOR HOBSON AND HIS MEN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ANSWER.

"The Whelps of the Lion answer him."
—Recent anonymous poem in English paper.

THE old lion stands in his lonely lair;
The noise of the hunting has broken his rest;
He scowls to the Eastward: tiger and bear
Are harrying his jungle; he turns to the West;

And sends through the murk and mist of the night,
A thunder that rumbles and rolls down the trail;
And tiger and bear, the quarry in sight,
Crouch low in the covert, and cower and quail;

For deep through the night-gloom, like surf on a shore,
Peals thunder in answer, resounding with ire;
The hunters turn stricken: they know the dread roar:
The whelp of the lion is joining his sire.

THOMAS NELSON PAGE.

WITH THE ROUGH RIDERS AT LAS GUASIMAS.

I.

June 25, 1898.

LA GUASIMA is a tree that bears nuts and has low wide-spreading boughs, from which it is easy to swing a noose. Therefore the Cubans use it for the fattening of pigs and the hanging of criminals. Where a spur of La Gran Piedra mountains joins a curving ridge of foot-hills, about five miles from Baiquiri, and the road starts on a gentle downward slope into Santiago, this tree thickly covers ridge, spur, and point of contact. There American met Spaniard yesterday in the first battle on Cuban soil, and therefore the first fight is called Las Guasimas. There was another fight of Las Guasimas in the ten years' revolution in the seventies. Gomez remembers that battle, for it made him famous. The Rough Riders, for the same reason, will remember the fight of yesterday. The Spaniard will remember both: in one he lost a thousand men; in the other he learned the temper and marksmanship of the American soldier—regular and volunteer. "The Americans do not fight like other people," said the Spaniard. "They advance under a heavy fire, when by the rules of civilized warfare they should give way." Therefore the Spaniard, rather than wrestle longer with such an ignorant barbarian, gave way himself, and printed at Santiago that with four thousand men he had held back the whole American army. That at least is the word brought through our lines by the poor starving devils who were allowed to leave Santiago—that at Santiago there might be fewer mouths to feed—and come out and trade yellow mangoes for the hardtack of the advancing soldiers. As a matter of fact, the Americans engaged were 244 from the First United States Cavalry, and 220 from the Tenth United States Colored Cavalry—loss 8 killed and 17 wounded; and 500 of the Rough Riders, whose casualties were 9 killed and 46 wounded. How many the Spaniards were is not known, the highest estimate so far being 4000—which estimate came through refugees from Santiago—the lowest being 1500. Thirty-nine dead Spaniards were found after the fight, according to General Wheeler's report, and six wagon-loads—so the Cubans say—of wounded were carried into Santiago.

CAPT. A. M. WETHERILL,
6th U. S. Infantry. Killed in the Attack on San Juan.

There has been much criticism of that fight, especially from the regulars, among whom there is not a man who does not give it the highest praise. The zeal of the regulars and Riders led them too far beyond the reach of the commanding general. They were caught in an ambush. The end did not justify the means; the position could have been gained with less loss—perhaps with no loss; the Spaniards might have been cut off in the rear, surrounded, and annihilated by the forces already landed, if they had been allowed to come up before the fight began. The moral effect gained, if good and great, was lost through inability to follow it up, and the subsequent inactivity for want of rations, several days—all of which is problematical, a question distinctly with two sides, and not to be settled finally except by future developments and the word of the Spaniard at Santiago when he is ours. But, all granted, for the sake of argument, what then? Who remembers a military mistake when there is a deathless ideal of courage under it? I imagine the Riders would prefer a reprimand for being too far in front to one for being too far behind. As for the moral depression of the Spaniard, the fight of Las Guasimas left the way open to the picket-line around Santiago, along a road that is practically a narrow defile through rough country and impenetrable brush, where ambush is possible every hundred yards, and where a thousand Spaniards, say some of our officers, should be able to hold back the whole army. It is fair to presume that the Spaniards could have blocked our way at any good position along the road if they had been able to hold their own at Las Guasimas.

As for getting caught in an ambush, the Americans knew where the enemy was, and were flushing him as a pointer flushes a quail; so the theory, if true, only adds another advantage to the already perfect stronghold of the Spaniard, and another branch to the laurels the Riders won for dislodging him with such an inferior force. If there had been more Americans attacking, it is fair to suppose that there would have been more killed, as it is sure that more Spaniards would have been left on the field. Besides, the fight, after all, was only a skirmish, and the loss was small; but neither fact matters at all. The fight was a perfect exhibition of dauntless courage. So let critical lips be dumb. Let Old Glory and the flag of the one star wave together, and wave long and high. And from American and Cuban, to regular and Rider, with one throat—and for the Rider let it be opened wide—Hail!

II.

The stars and stripes were on the way to Santiago long before they streamed from the first captured Spanish block-house at the first landing-place at Baiquiri. Before General Chaffee was ashore General Lawton had a line of battle formed, Cossack outposts thrown out, and the flag was fluttering up the valley towards Santiago, rapidly, as were the Spaniards rapidly. That night he had it planted over Siboney. Being the last correspondent ordered ashore, I followed in the wake of the army—forty-eight hours late.

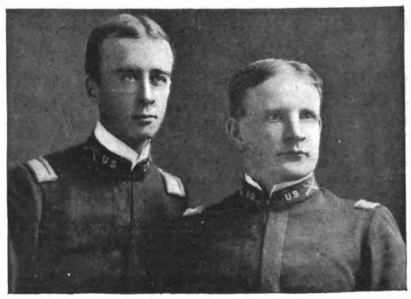
It was hot, very hot, but the road was a good hard path of clean sand, and now and then a breeze stirred, or a light cool rain twinkled in the air. At that hour the Rough Riders were charging a blazing Spanish line of battle, and, far in the rear, and all unknowing, I walked through strange plants, strange flowers, strange trees, to the music of strange birds, with nothing to see that was familiar except sky, mountain, running water, and sand, nothing homelike to hear but the twitter of swallows and the whistle of quail. Cactus, cocoanut-trees, guava-bushes, Guinea grass that is good for fodder, mangoes, mammonsilios, wild lemon, and over all the trembling crown of royal palm. And the birds! Judios—black birds with a strange oval tail—Jews, so called because they go in flocks, have a cry of complaint, are easy to thrive, and bear the aggressive beak of the chosen; the toti, his cousin, with all his traits and half his length; the hermit tocoloro, the French soldier of the tropics, with a body that is red and wings that are blue; the brilliant iridescent tiny colibri—fly-bird in English, oiseau-mouche in French—the spotted pitirre, that seemed to have the same spite against the buzzard that our bee-martin has for the crow; the bijirita, whose claw is raised against every other wing in the air (Spaniard calls Cuban, for that reason, bijirita); and the sparrow gorrion, which the Cuban calls Spaniard, because he is imported from another land and an unwelcome guest. There were no flowers—they are gone now until others come in July—except one flower that, like the Spanish flag, has a yellow heart and a border of blood; and, about a burnt hacienda, and emphasizing its desolation, a big bush of brilliant flamboyants and rioting vines of pale red corallelo—"little coral." Poetic and interesting as it all was overhead, however, that path underfoot was no road for a hard-drinking man to travel. There were too many hideous things crawling across the road and rustling into the cactus—spiders with snail-houses over them; lizards with green bodies and yellow legs, and green legs and yellow bodies; hairy tarantulas that are said not to be poisonous; and hideous land-crabs standing three inches from the sand, and watching you with hideous little eyes as they shuffled sidewise into the bushes. Moreover, I was following the trail of an army by the signs in its wake—the débris of the last night's camp: cans, bits of hardtack crackers, bad odors, by-and-by odds and ends that the soldiers discarded as the sun got warm and the pack heavy—drawers, under-shirts, coats, blankets, knapsacks, an occasional gauntlet or legging, bits of fat bacon, canned meats, hardtack—and a swarm of buzzards in the path, in the trees, and wheeling in the air—and smiling Cubans picking up everything they could eat or wear.

This I was taking in when the Riders were fighting their way forward, foot by foot, and making the charge that won the day.

"Cease firing and advance!"

No wonder the Spaniards ran—they must have thought that the superb nerve of that charging line had the muscles of the whole army supporting it close behind.

At a big spring I was overtaken by two men. One had a smooth face that suggested subdued temptations, and the other called him, I thought, "captain." The one was a trooper, but the other, the smooth-faced man, was a chaplain. He wore a six-shooter, handled it with loving familiarity, said he asked no odds of any man, could settle a Spaniard at fifty paces, did not mean to be taken by surprise, and therefore, mounted on a mule as high as a dromedary, he carried his "gun" drawn, and almost wept next morning when his colonel told him that the articles of war forbade him to carry a weapon; and yet he was a man of the cloth, from Arizona, and to the Rough Riders—chaplain. The chaplain was much disturbed when we first heard of the fight of Las Guasimas, and groaned in genuine distress when he was told that the adjutant had seen Colonel Wood fall, and had got from his lips a dying message to his wife. The rumors were so thick, conflicting, and wild, however, that we were not sure there had been any fight at all. But by-and-by we met a white man on foot with his arm in a sling. Then came, on a litter, a negro with a shattered leg; then another with a bullet through his throat, and another and another. On horseback rode a sergeant with a bandage around his brow—I could see him smiling broadly fifty yards ahead—and the furrow of a Mauser bullet across his temple and just under his skin. After him we passed a camp of insurgents, little, thin, brown fellows, ragged, dirty, shoeless—each with a sugar-loaf straw hat, a Remington rifle of the pattern of 1882, or a brand-new Krag-Jorgensen donated by Uncle Sam, and the inevitable and ever-ready machete swinging in a case of embossed leather on the left hip. They were very young and very old, and were wiry, quick-eyed, intelligent for the most part, and in countenance vivacious and rather gentle. There was a little creek next, and climbing the bank of the other side, I stopped short, with a start, in the road. To the right and on a sloping bank lay eight gray shapes muffled from head to foot, and I thought of the men I had seen asleep on the deck of the transport at dawn. Only these were rigid, and I should have known that all of them were in their last sleep but one, who lay with his left knee bent and upright, his left elbow thrust from his blanket, and his hand on his heart. He slept like a child.



Beyond was the camp of the regulars who had taken part in the fight. On one side stood General Young, who himself had aimed a Hotchkiss gun in the fight—covered with grime and sweat, and with the passion of battle not quite gone from his eyes; and across the road soldiers were digging one long grave. Half a mile further, on the top of the ridge and on a grassy sunlit knoll, was the camp of the Riders, just beyond the rifle-pits from which they had driven the Spaniards. Under a tree, to the right, lay another row of muffled shapes, and at once I walked with Colonel Wood to the hospital, a quarter of a mile away. The path, narrow, thickly shaded, and dappled with sunshine, ran along the ridge through the battle-field, and was as pretty, penceful, and romantic as Lovers' Walk now is at White Sulphur. Here and there the tall grass along the path was pressed flat where a wounded man had lain. In one place the grass was matted and dark red; near by was a blood-stained hat marked with the initials "E. L." Here was the spot where Hamilton Fish fell, the first victim of the fight; there brave young Capron was killed. A passing soldier bared his left arm and showed me three places between his wrist and elbow where the skin had merely been blistered by three separate bullets as he lay in front of Capron after the latter fell. Farther on lay a dead Spaniard with covered face. A buzzard flapped from the tree over him as we passed beneath. Beyond was the open-air hospital, where were two more rigid human figures and where the wounded lay.

That night there was a clear sky, a quarter-moon, and an enveloping mist of stars, but little sleep for any, I imagine, and but restless battle-haunted sleep for all. Next morning followed the burial. Captain Capron was carried back to the coast. The rest were placed side by side in one long broad trench, with their feet to the east. In the bottom of the grave was a layer of long thick green cool leaves of Guinea grass, and over the brave fellows were piled the green plumes of the royal palm as long as the grave. At the head of the trench stood the chaplain; around it, the comrades of the dead; along the road straggled a band of patient ragged Cubans, and approaching from Santiago a band of starving women and children for whom the soldiers gave their lives. No man could ask a braver end, a more generous cause, or a kindlier grave—a soldier's death, a brother's freedom, and a last resting-place in leaves and white sand.

"Nearer, my God, to Thee," sang the soldiers.
And the tragedy of Las Guasimas was done.

III.

Everybody has perfect faith in the American regular, and knows what he can and what he will ever do. General Young did, then, what the nation knew he would do, and his negro troopers fought bravely and well. But the interest of the fight would centre in the gallant conduct of Roosevelt's Rough Riders—or Wood's Weary Walkers, as they were dubbed at Tampa after their horses were taken from under them—even if they had not borne the brunt of the fight. Never was there a more representative body of men on American soil; never was there a body of such varied elements; and yet it was so easily welded into an effective fighting-machine that a foreigner would not know that they were not as near brothers in blood, character, occupation, mutual faith, and long companionship as any volunteer regiment that ever took the field. The dominant element was the big-game hunter and the cowboy, and every field-officer and captain had at one time or another owned a ranch. The majority came from Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Indian Territory, though every State in the Union was represented. There were graduates of Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Princeton, Cornell, University of Virginia, of Pennsylvania, of Colorado, of Iowa, and other Western and Southern colleges. There were members of the Knickerbocker Club of New York and the Somerset of Boston, and of crack horse organizations of Philadelphia, New York, and New Jersey. There were revenue officers from Georgia and Tennessee, policemen from New York city, six or eight deputy marshals from Colorado, half a dozen Texan Rangers, and one Pawnee, several Cherokees and Chickasaws, Choctaws and Creeks. There were men of all political faiths, all creeds—Catholics, Protestants, and Jews. There was one strapping Australian and one of the Queen's Mounted Police, though 90 per cent. of all were native-born Americans. And athletes a plenty—Wrenn, who twice saved America the tennis championship over England, and Larned, the second-best player in the land; Goodrich, the captain of Harvard's crew in '97, and Bull, who rowed on that crew; Dean, the best quarter-back in Harvard's history, and Greenway, the best end in the history of Yale; Channing and Church, who played football at Princeton; Hollister the runner and Waller the high-jumper of Yale; Stephens the polo-player, and Ferguson and Thorpe, the members of Roosevelt's old polo team at Oyster Bay; and besides these, who were all troopers, Lieutenant Devereux, who played good football at Princeton, and Lieutenant Woodbury Kane, who did the same at Harvard, and who helped win his commission washing

2D LIEUT. JOS. N. AUGUSTIN, JR., 24th U. S. Infantry. Killed in the Attack on San Juan.

2D LIEUT. JOHN A. GURNEY, 24th U. S. Infantry. Killed in the Attack on San Juan.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google dishes on a cooking detail for a New Mexico outfit, and washing them, as a superior said, "d——d well."

And more: Sergeant McElhinny, the Louisiana planter, who has an island of his own; Captain Jenkins of South Carolina, son of the Confederate general; Captain O'Neill, ex-mayor, ex-sheriff, and hunter of Indian and white desperado, populist and free-silver man; Captain Llewelyn, who carries four bullets in his body; Captain Luna, who demanded at Tampa that he should be permitted to go to the front and show his loyalty because he was the only man of pure Spanish blood holding a commission in the American army; Sergeant Darry, who was Speaker of a Lower House and Gold Democrat candidate for Congress; Heffner, who, though shot mortally, got Colonel Roosevelt to give him his gun, and, propped against a tree, kept firing until the line went forward; and Lieutenant Thomas, whose father fought in the civil war, whose grandfather was killed in the Mexican war, who had two grandfathers in the war of 1812, three grandfathers in the war of the Revolution, while the fourth was Patrick Henry—all these were citizens of New Mexico. Lastly, there was Captain Capron, who fell—the fifth from father to son in the United States army, a captain of Indian scouts, an expert in Indian sign-language, and a great hunter. There were no laggards in that little struggle. Marshall, the correspondent, kept with the advancing line, taking notes as he advanced, and when shot through the spine kept on writing his "story" between periods of unconsciousness and spasms of pain. Caspar Whitney stood near a Hotchkiss gun and took the fire as coolly as any regular under General Young. Colonel Roosevelt picked up a rifle and led his men on a charge across a space where he thought they needed encouragement; and Richard Harding Davis gave the good service of an officer in the beginning, and afterwards took the gun of a wounded man and fought with the rest.

Such were the men who fought the good little fight of Las Guasimas, and would to Heaven I had been with them! And so, once more, to the Riders, one and all—Hail!

IV.

June 30.

Quiet, modest, forceful Colonel Wood moves on Santiago to-morrow in command of a brigade. Roosevelt's Rough Riders go as Roosevelt's in fact as well as in name. Colonel Roosevelt has made his word of peace good in war. JOHN FOX, JR.

LIEUTENANTS GURNEY AND AUGUSTIN.

WE publish in this issue a picture of Lieutenants John A. Gurney and Joseph N. Augustin, Jr., officers of the regular army, who were killed in the charge up San Juan Hill, July 1. They were graduates of West Point of the class of '95, and they were only boys.

Lieutenant Augustin was born in New Orleans in 1874; Lieutenant Gurney, in Hart, Michigan, in 1872. They entered the Military Academy together in 1891, and were graduated together in 1895. At the time of his death young Augustin had been married less than a year. Gurney was graduated near the head of his class; he was the president of his class, and one of its best loved men, and Augustin had as many good traits as he.

A most pathetic feature in the fate of these two young men is the strong affection that existed between them. They were chums during the four years at West Point; they went into the same regiment, the Twenty-fourth Infantry, so as to be together. When they went together to Santiago they arranged with each other that if one were killed the other should break the news. They fell together. In the charge, when every officer in Gurney's company was struck, Gurney and Augustin were killed. The picture of them is from a photograph which they sat for together only a short time ago.

Certainly all good, kind people owe these brave young men a thought for the happy and hopeful lives they laid down for their duty on San Juan Hill. WILLISTON FISH.

HOW THE "OREGON" CHASED THE "COLON."

BY THE SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" ON BOARD.

ON this ship the first call for quarters, 9.25 A.M., had just sounded, and all hands were in their best clean white, and the decks all straightened up for Sunday inspection. The officers of the deck noticed the masts of a ship moving inside the harbor, but no one thought of it seriously, because Sunday was looked upon as a day of rest, and during the month we have been blockading no shots have been fired on that day. But as these masts kept coming in sight, we quickly went to quarters, and ran up the signal, "The enemy is escaping."

When the alarm-gongs rang, the people belowdecks all thought, "Well, somebody has pushed the button for 'general quarters' by mistake," but nevertheless the ship was ready for action in an instant, and all hands were thrilled with a glad excitement to see that Cervera was going to make a dash with his twenty-knot squadron and give us a fight, after all.

Captain Clark ordered one of the marines to fire a 6-pounder at the entrance to call attention to our signal, and I can assure you that our ships were not long in answering.

Well, out came the Spanish ships, described to Captain Clark in a cipher despatch to Rio Janeiro from the Navy Department, which, when translated, read thus:

Four armored cruisers, heavy and fast.
Three torpedo-boats, sea-going class.
Beware!

This was the cream of the Spanish navy, which we supposed to be after our ship when we ran up the coast of South America, and cheer after cheer went up when we saw that there was to be a real fight at last.

We commenced a rapid fire, which was kept up during the whole engagement, and was only broken by a howl of delight when a good shot was fired, or by yells when a torpedo-boat could be seen through the smoke. But the reports of the 6-pounders soon interrupted the latter.

As soon as they got out of the harbor, Cervera took enough time to form his fleet, and then steamed to the "four bells." The Iowa, Texas, and Brooklyn were west of us, but we soon passed all but Commodore Schley's flag-ship, and with forced draught joined in the chase.

The New York, Massachusetts, Newark, and New Orleans were, so far as the Spaniards could see, out of the fight, so they most likely thought that if they could escape the battle-ships they would have only the Brooklyn to contend with. But they had not counted on the Oregon, which, with the Brooklyn, outstripped all our fleet, and gained steadily on the flying enemy.

We kept up a continuous fire on the nearest ships, and, as they headed inshore one after the other, paid no attention to them, except to send a parting shot from our after-guns to "boost" them along a little faster.

Finally only the Vizcaya and Cristóbal Colon were left. We had given the Oquendo and Maria Teresa some pretty hard knocks, and, as the remainder of the fleet were "dusting along" right merrily far astern, we left the ships we had disabled to their tender mercies.

We concentrated our fire on the Vizcaya, about 3000 yards on our starboard bow; the Brooklyn was well off-shore of us, on our port bow, sending shot after shot into the unfortunate ship. Finally the Vizcaya too made for the beach, and with a cheer we sped on after the Colon. For a few moments we did not fire, but finally opened on her at a range varying from 9500 to 8500 yards with the forward 13-inch and 8-inch turrets.

Finally we were gratified to see that the Cristóbal too was making for the shore, about 50 miles to the westward of Santiago. She hauled down her colors at 1.12, and afterwards ran aground on a shelving gravelly beach. At 1.30 we slowed down, and with the Brooklyn ran near the prize.

The Brooklyn, being senior ship, sent a boat aboard to receive her surrender, while we ran near, keeping everything ready in case she should open fire again. The New York and Texas, which had been hull down to the eastward, finally came up, with the Resolute and Vixen, and preparations were made immediately to transfer prisoners and to attempt to save the ship.

On the Oregon the most intense enthusiasm prevailed. As other ships dropped astern it became more and more exciting, so that it was almost impossible to keep the men clear of the decks and behind armor. They insisted upon lining up on the forecastle and on top of the turrets, as the pictures will show; and when all of our ships were out of signal-distance we could look back on the Vizcaya and Oquendo, which we ran on the beach, and congratulate ourselves on being on a 16.5-knots battle-ship. The Oregon, by-the-way, has the name of "Yankee Devil" or "Bull dog" among the Spaniards.

When the Colon was run on the beach the Spanish took the time used in making official visits to open all sea-connections and to break the valve-stems so that she would founder. The breech-plugs of most of the guns were thrown overboard, and everything possible was done to disable the ship. All of her crew had been very liberally supplied with liquor, so that they were hors de combat in more senses than one; the officers looked rather forlorn, but the men were happy and contented. The ship was bountifully supplied with provisions, there being five cows on the forecastle, to say nothing of flour and beef in the fore-hold.

Having done what we could to save the ship, our prize-crew all left her before midnight. She was slowly settling; and after the New York, by a very skilful piece of seamanship, pushed her further up on the beach, she was left to her fate. In the morning we saw that she was listed heavily to starboard and resting easily on good bottom, so we steamed slowly towards Santiago.

On the way back we passed the cruisers that had been run ashore; most of them were afire, and it certainly was sad to see such fine ships going to ruin. However, we paid them back for the Maine, with interest, so we were happy to give such good news to our countrymen for the Fourth.

The Cristóbal Colon was magnificently furnished in her officers' quarters. Silver plate galore, cut glass, statuettes, silk hangings, and other finery were there in profusion.

It was demonstrated yesterday that torpedo-boats have only a small chance in the daytime, and that wood-work is very dangerous. But that is nothing new.

ALLIANCE.

Editor "Harper's Weekly":

Reading a Seattle paper on Sunday, while my ship, the James Nesmith, of New York, was loading coal at Union Bay, B. C., for St. Michaels, I got in a sentimental mood, and composed the following lines, not intending to have them printed. The other American captains insisted on having them sent to HARPER'S WEEKLY, so I hereby send them.

Yours, respectfully, Captain C. H. MCLEOD.

YOU'VE used us well, John Bull, we'll own,
Far better than we thought,
When all the world we faced alone
And Cuba's freedom sought.
You've showed your hand as well befits
The glorious fighting race,
That in its zenith proudly sits
In honor's chiefest place.

And we have read the signs, John Bull,
And feel the sweeping tide
That makes the hearts of nations full
While battling side by side.
There is a Providence that rules
In all affairs; it swells
Beyond the wisdom of the schools—
And then, it's blood that tells.

And so, while England touches strings
With no uncertain sound,
The Yankee drops all meaner things,
To meet on common ground.
When Anglo-Saxon can attack,
With hands across the sea,
The Stars and Stripes and Union-Jack
Can set the whole world free.

The thin red line that never yields,
The hearts of oak that dare,
Could face the foe on any field
If Yankees, too, were there;
Could dare a frenzied world in arms
'Mid shot and bursting shells,
And answer Europe's wild alarms
With loud triumphant yells.

Your hand, John Bull, your honest hand;
There'll nevermore be war
Between two nations that must stand
For righteousness and law.
Our jealousies have passed away,
The times we fought are done,
And grandly proud we stand to-day
Like father and his son.

And soon the world will hear a song
In every plain and valley,
As resonant it rises strong,
While millions join the rally.
And "Yankee Doodle" will awake
Your English meadows green,
While Yankee tongues from sea to lake
Will sing "God Save the Queen."

C. H. MCLEOD.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

GAIL BORDEN
EAGLE BRAND CONDENSED MILK.

IN 1856 Gail Borden introduced condensed milk, and from small beginning an enormous industry has resulted. The product of tens of thousands of cows is required to supply the demand for this superior infant food. No other equals it.—[Adv.]

"BLUE MONDAY" made bright with ABBOTT'S—The ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA BITTERS—as a spirit revivifier. Good stomach makes light heart. Get only ABBOTT'S. —[Adv.]

LADIES are greatly benefited by Dr. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS, the South American Tonic. —[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Arnold Constable & Co.
Hosiery.
Plain and Fancy Lisle-Thread, Silk, and Cashmere Hose and Half-Hose.
Summer Underwear.
Cartwright & Warner's
Celebrated Underwear.
for Children, Ladies, and Gentlemen.
Broadway & 19th st.
NEW YORK.

BRASS BAND
Instruments, Drums, Uniforms, Equipments for Bands and Drum Corps. Lowest prices ever quoted. Fine Catalog, 400 Illustrations, mailed free. It gives Band Music & Instructions for Amateur Bands.
LYON & HEALY, 17 Adams St., Chicago.

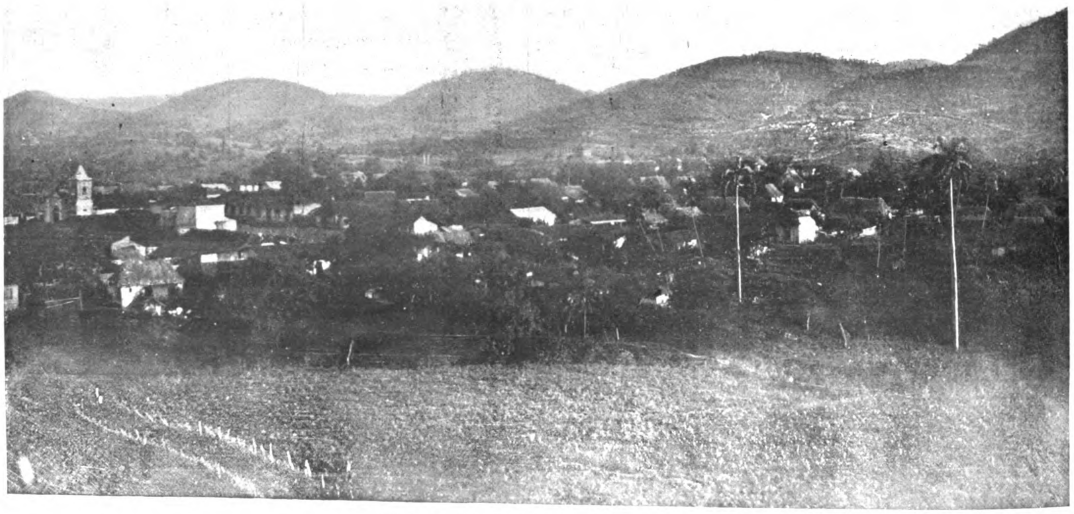
Pears'
Whoever wants soft hands, smooth hands, white hands, or a clear complexion, he and she can have both: that is, if the skin is naturally transparent; unless occupation prevents.
The color you want to avoid comes probably neither of nature or work, but of habit.
Either you do not wash effectually, or you wash too effectually; you do not get the skin open and clean, or you hurt it.
Remedy—Use Pears' Soap, no matter how much; but a little is enough if you use it often.
All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

A Leather Lesson
Thick leather isn't always durable. Thin leather isn't always comfortable. Oily leather isn't always waterproof. Dear leather isn't always cheap. Vici Kid is always reliable. This is the reason it is fast superseding all other leathers. Vici Kid is the only leather that repels the cold, yet absorbs no heat. It is the only leather free from oil, yet impervious to water. It is the only leather soft enough for comfort, strong enough for any kind of wear.
VICI KID

makes the most beautiful shoes for women, the most comfortable shoes for men, the most durable shoes for children (all colors). The genuine never varies in quality no matter where you get it. Genuine Vici Kid is made only by R. H. Foerderer. To insure getting it and not an imitation, ask your dealer for Foerderer's Vici Kid. Vici Leather Dressing makes all shoes look better and wear better.
Ask your dealer for it. A book about buying, wearing and caring for shoes mailed free.
ROBERT H. FOERDERER, Philadelphia.

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.
Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.
Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



TAKING IT EASY—A PACK-TRAIN OF OUR CUBAN ALLIES.

ARRIVAL OF COMMISSARY STORES—HUNGRY REFUGEES FROM SANTIAGO WAITING FOR UNCLE SAM'S RATIONS.

THE OLD CHURCH—REFUGEES FROM SANTIAGO LINED UP EAGER FOR THE DISTRIBUTION OF FOOD.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE TOWN OF EL CANEY.

AFTER THE BATTLE—SCENES IN AND ABOUT EL CANEY.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JAMES BURTON, SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHER FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL SHAFTER'S ARMY.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

3d Class Protected Cruiser "Gefion." 2d Class Battle-Ship "Deutschland," Prince Henry's Flag-Ship.

2d Class Battle-Ship "Kaiser," Admiral von Diedrichs's Flag-Ship. 2d Class Protected Cruiser "Irene." 2d Class Protected Cruiser "Kaiserin Augusta."

PRINCIPAL VESSELS OF THE GERMAN SQUADRON IN ASIATIC WATERS.

THE "IRENE" IS THE VESSEL WHOSE CAPTAIN ATTEMPTED TO PREVENT THE SEIZURE OF ISLA GRANDE IN SUBIG BAY.

DRAWN BY H. REUTERDAHL.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

OUR SPANISH PRISONERS OF WAR.

With Admiral Cervera and 745 of the officers and men of his late command on board, the auxiliary cruiser St. Louis arrived in the harbor of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, from Santiago, on the morning of July 10. Among the prisoners were Captain Eulate of the Vizcaya, who was wounded three times, and Captain Emilio Diaz Moreau of the Cristóbal Colon, second in command on the illfated Spanish fleet. Besides these there were about forty commissioned officers from the vessels Vizcaya and Colon.

The other Spanish prisoners from Cervera's fleet were sent to Portsmouth on the Harvard. The quarters prepared for the reception of the prisoners are on Seaveys Island, in the Piscataqua River, opposite Portsmouth.

The city lies about two miles from the sea, on the south side of the stream, which is wide and deep, and noted for its strong tides. Across the stream, on the Maine side, is the town of Kittery, and the naval station known as the Portsmouth Navy Yard.

Down stream from the navy-yard, and reached from it by a short iron bridge, is Seaveys Island, a rock-bound and rugged bit of land of 100 acres or so. At its lower end, on a point by which the tides of the Piscataqua rush fiercely back and forth, is the site of the prison camp. No better place could have been chosen for such a purpose. The land is high, and slopes gently from a sharp ridge toward the rocky shore. On the crest of the ridge, from which the land toward the interior of the island runs back in a kind of plateau, have been built the barracks of the marines guarding the camp, 240 in number. On either end of the ridge, and high above the camp, is placed a Gatling gun, each of which is manned every minute in the day. These guns are above the level of the high board fence that encloses the camp on the land side. Outside this fence there is a "dead line," which is patrolled by a sentry all the time. Inside the camp a large force of sentries pace back and forth, their rifles in the bend of their arms, ready to be thrown to the shoulder at any moment.

The prison camp consists of a number of low one-story wooden barracks and a cook-house. In the cook-house are twenty-one large ranges, on which a force of cooks prepare the food for the prisoners. Soup and bread are the staples.

The sleeping-quarters of the prisoners are comfortable, but hardly elaborate. Mattresses are put on the floors of the barracks at night, and are piled up in the corners in the daytime. Bunks will be built later. Each man has a couple of blankets. There are hooks for hammocks in the barracks, and those who prefer them, and have the money to buy them, are allowed to choose this form of bed.

The day the prisoners were landed from the St. Louis forty-seven sick Spanish sailors were taken into the Marine Hospital, and cared for by the doctors there as carefully as if they had been from the American navy. They were all suffering from fever, the result of their exposure in the water and on the beach after the battle of Santiago. The hospital is a fine brick building at the upper end of the island. Two wards, built of wood, have been added since the prisoners arrived.

As the men filed down the gangway of the St. Louis to board the landing-barge, Admiral Cervera shook many of them by the hand. He was visibly affected.

By invitation of Captain Goodrich of the St. Louis many of the commissioned officers among the Spaniards went to the landing on the tug towing the barge and witnessed the debarkation.

The Captain of the Colon volunteered to assist Captain Goodrich in checking off the names of the prisoners as they landed. But after it was over, and his men were about to be marched away to the camp over the hill from the landing-place, he embraced many of the begrimed and unkempt sailors in the line and wept.

Winfield M. Thompson.

WITH THE BLOCKADING FLEET.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

U. S. Flag-ship "San Francisco," off Havana, July 8, 1898.

We woke up this morning to find ourselves lying, with scarcely any motion, about eight miles off Havana. There is hardly a ripple on the waters, and a breeze laden with lotus drowsiness is lazily fanning the ship. The white city of Havana looms in the distance, and with a glass one can easily distinguish houses and the frowning forts of Morro. But both sea and sky are so suggestive of peace that it is hard to imagine that we are engaged upon a blockade, standing guard over that distant city, and ready to fire upon any ship that comes or goes without warrant. Off to starboard the auxiliary cruiser Prairie floats upon the still waters, "as idle as a painted ship upon a painted ocean," and close upon our port is the Monitor Amphitrite.

The latter recalls humorous memories to a group of young officers sitting fanning themselves upon the poop-deck of the San Francisco, and they chant in a rhythmic chorus,

> O Perry Garst, so high and mighty,
> Tell us true, and tell us right,
> Is that ship the Am-phi-trí-te,
> Or do you call her Am-phi-tríte?

Lieutenant-Commander Perry Garst was at one time the head of the department of English at the Naval Academy, and this was a problem in pronunciation that used to be laid before him in poetical form.

A French protected cruiser, the D'Estaing, has come quietly in, and lies about a mile astern, but I cannot find out what her mission is, and she does not seem to excite any particular interest or concern, and not even a discussion has arisen concerning the correct pronunciation of her name.

A little while ago the cruiser Montgomery, one of the blockading fleet, ran alongside within a hundred feet or so. She was hungry for news, and had not heard of Sampson's victory. So the chief incidents of that great fight were wigwagged to her, and when the news had been translated and given out, loud and enthusiastic were the cheers that arose. It did seem to my unsophisticated mind that the news might have been conveyed with greater speed and ease by simply having it called out, as the Montgomery was within easy hearing distance, and the day was so still that you could hear the whir of a flying-fish's wings—but then this is merely a landlubber's point of view. A sailor probably prefers to make mystic signs with a flag to lifting his voice rudely and hoarsely across a hundred feet of sea. Besides, the flag method of conveying intelligence is infinitely more poetic and picturesque.

The San Francisco left Key West yesterday evening at six o'clock. She is still the flag-ship of Commodore Howell, who has been placed in command of the blockading squadron off the northern coast of Cuba, succeeding Commodore Watson. Besides the San Francisco, three ships of the former Northern Patrol Squadron are engaged upon this blockade—the Prairie, the Badger, and the collier Southery. Altogether there are fifteen ships in the squadron—so many Cerberuses jealously guarding the gates to the capital city of Cuba. But the only sop that can be thrown to these watchers must come in the form of shot, and woe unto any ship that tries this game! I have seen little flags twenty inches square perforated at a thousand yards, and God save any larger mark!

Yesterday I spent part of the day at the convent hospital at Key West, listening to stories of the great landbattle about Santiago, from the mouths of wounded men. The evening before, the hospital ship Iroquois had come in to Key West, bearing 312 wounded and sick men. Most of these men were convalescing and able to walk about, though some of them limped painfully, and others had arms in slings, while others still were laid out upon cots in the hospital.

The hospital was formerly a health resort for ailing nuns of a Canadian order, but it lately has been placed by the order at the disposal of our government, and a number of trained nurses have been sent down to take care of wounded and disabled soldiers.

I found several of Roosevelt's Rough Riders among the wounded. To them the fight had been particularly hard; for, as they said, they had enlisted as a cavalry, not as an infantry regiment, and most of them were entirely unused to marching. They had been so boomed in the papers, however, that pride kept them from backing out under any conditions, and so they bravely burned their bridges and left their horses behind them. From their descriptions, the march through a thick jungle filled with huge cacti in a hot and enervating climate must have been a terrible one. Now soaked by heavy rains, now blistered by the sun, they marched on, subjected to galling volleys from enemies in ambush. Smokeless powder gave the Spaniards a terrible advantage; for the Rough Riders—dead-shots as most of them are—could see nothing to shoot at. They could not form more than four abreast at any time, owing to the narrowness of the pathway, and often they were obliged to proceed in single file.

Altogether this attack upon Santiago has been extraordinary in the annals of war. Men with rifles in their hands, and undaunted courage in their hearts, have performed a work which artillery alone should have attempted. But though the soldier evidently knew that some one had blundered, he went bravely on and did his whole duty without flinching.

I was told that the medical attendance was entirely inadequate. The doctors worked like beavers, but there were not enough of them. Some of the wounded were obliged to wait over a day before their needs could be attended to. On the hospital-ship Iroquois there was no ice, and the water was warm, so I was informed, and unfit to drink. Fresh meat or fresh vegetables without ice are out of the question in a hot climate. Why cannot some ship-loads of ice be sent down to the hospital-ships? But there are doubtless many pertinent questions to be asked; some might call them impertinent questions.

A few hours before the Iroquois came in, about four thousand troops started for Santiago in six transports, under a convoy composed of the Machias, Wilmington, and Leyden. Great enthusiasm prevailed upon the transports as they pulled out, and cheer after cheer rolled over the waters. May the country for whose sake these men go forth to battle so gladly look well after them should the hour of trouble come!

Henry Collins Walsh.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

(Continued from page 731.)

ing as the Spaniards did the first day, it would have cost five thousand lives to take it. Battalions of Spanish troops have been depositing arms since daybreak in the armory, over which I have [placed a] guard...."

A man to be reckoned with, the Archbishop of Santiago, was the most conspicuous figure among those who were present at the reception held at the Governor's palace, where the civil Governor and other officials of the city and province met the American commander. After the ceremony of raising and saluting our flag and taking over the city, the American officers returned to their camp. In the course of the day our troops also took possession of Morro Castle and the batteries at the mouth of the harbor; mines in the channel were removed or exploded; the Red Cross steamer State of Texas, passing the sunken Merrimac and Reina Mercedes, made her way towards the city; refugees crowding back to their homes found that order had been re-established—by conquest—and was to be maintained. As between the American and Spanish soldiers, there were manifestations of good feeling, but already a note of discontent is heard from the insurgents, who have had to play minor parts to-day or be omitted altogether, and who resent Shafter's decision not to displace the Spanish civil officials at present.

The second military expedition from San Francisco arrived at Cavité, Manila Bay. General Anderson now has 6000 troops under his command.

Monday, July 18.—A letter from President McKinley to Secretary Alger contains directions to the "military occupant" at Santiago, with a full statement of the general principles to be observed in the government of that city and the ceded district. Some of the specially significant passages follow: "We come not to make war upon the inhabitants of Cuba, nor upon any party or faction among them, but to protect them in their homes, in their employments, and in their personal and religious rights.... The judges and other officials connected with the administration of justice may, if they accept the supremacy of the United States, continue to administer the ordinary law of the land, as between man and man, under the supervision of the American Commander-in-Chief. The native constabulary will, so far as may be practicable, be preserved.... While the rule of conduct of the American Commander-in-Chief will be such as has just been defined, it will be his duty to adopt measures of a different kind if unfortunately the course of the people should render such measures indispensable to the maintenance of law and order. He will then possess the power to replace or expel the native officials in part or altogether, to substitute new courts of his own constitution for those that now exist, or to create such new or supplementary tribunals as may be necessary.... All public funds and securities belonging to the government of the country in its own right, and all arms and supplies and other movable property of such government, may be seized by the military occupant and converted to his own use. The real property of the state he may hold and administer, at the same time enjoying the revenues thereof, but he is not to destroy it save in the case of military necessity. All public means of transportation, such as telegraph lines, cables, railways, and boats belonging to the state, may be appropriated to his use, but unless in case of military necessity they are not to be destroyed. All churches and buildings devoted to religious worship and to the arts and sciences, all school-houses, are, so far as possible, to be protected; and all destruction or intentional defacement of such places, of historical monuments or archives, or of works of science or art, is prohibited, save when required by urgent military necessity.... While it is held to be the right of the conqueror to levy contributions upon the enemy in their seaports, towns, or provinces which may be in his military possession by conquest, and to apply the proceeds to defray the expenses of the war, this right is to be exercised within such limitations that it may not savor of confiscation. As the result of military occupation, the taxes and duties payable by the inhabitants to the former government become payable to the military occupant, unless he sees fit to substitute for them other rates or modes of contribution to the expenses of the government. The moneys so collected are to be used for the purpose of paying the expenses of the government under the military occupation, such as the salaries of the judges and the police, and for the payment of the expenses of the army. Private property taken for the use of the army is to be paid for, when possible, in cash at a fair valuation, and when payment in cash is not possible receipts are to be given. All ports and places in Cuba which may be in the actual possession of our land and naval forces will be opened to the commerce of all neutral nations, as well as our own, in articles not contraband of war, upon payment of the prescribed rates of duty which may be in force at the time of the importation."

Despatches from Havana and London: "Seven American war-ships bombarded Manzanillo (the most important place in the southwestern portion of Santiago province) this morning. Three steamers of the Mendez line were set on fire. Several gunboats that were in the harbor were stranded."

A despatch to the Sun from Cavité, vid Hong-kong, says that after the Irene incident in Subig Bay "some correspondence took place between Admiral Dewey and Admiral Diedrichs, the German commander, the result of which has been a better understanding."

Tuesday, July 19.—The destruction of the Spanish steamship Santo Domingo by the auxiliary gunboat Eagle near Cape Francés, Cuba, July 12, was reported by the Nashville at Key West to-day. The Santo Domingo, a vessel of 5400 tons, was laden with grain and cattle for Havana, and was well armed. The Eagle was formerly the yacht Almy.

The first troops for Puerto Rico, numbering 6200 men, embarked from Tampa last night and to-day.

The United States transport Seneca, with sick and wounded soldiers, who had suffered greatly from lack of proper accommodations, medical attendance, and supplies, arriving at New York Harbor, was detained at Quarantine.

Wednesday, July 20.—The contract for transporting to Spain the officers and men surrendered by General Toral was awarded to the Compañia Transatlantica Española.

General Leonard Wood, formerly colonel commanding the Rough Riders, has been appointed military Governor of Santiago, succeeding General Chambers McKibbin, who filled the office temporarily, and who now resumes command of his brigade.

General Garcia has resigned his position as commander of the insurgent forces in eastern Cuba, and has withdrawn his troops from the neighborhood of Santiago. His letter to General Shafter, explaining his action, is a resentful statement of grievances: neither he nor his officers were invited to be present at the ceremonies on the occasion of taking over the city; the Spanish authorities have been left in power; the most unfavorable views of the motives and conduct of his army are entertained by the Americans. That is the substance of his letter, and he concludes, "I withdraw my forces to the interior."

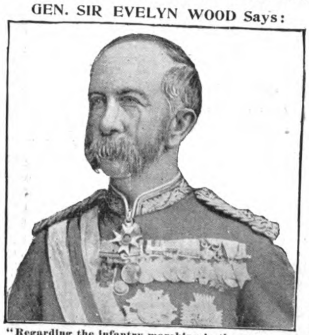
Thursday, July 21.—The following statement of our government's policy in relation to Puerto Rico, characterized as practically official, or semi-official, was made to-day:

> Puerto Rico will be kept by the United States. That is settled, and has been the plan from the first. Once taken, it will never be released. It will pass forever into the hands of the United States, and there never has been any other thought. Its possession will go towards making up the heavy expense of war to the United States. Our flag, once run up there, will float over the island permanently.

A despatch of this date from General Miles says: "We have Massachusetts, Dixie, Gloucester, Cincinnati, Annapolis, Leyden, and Wasp, with Yale and Columbia. We expect to sail at three o'clock." The war-ships mentioned convoy the transports taking the main body of the military expedition to Puerto Rico. Sailing from Guantanamo to-day, General Miles's command should reach Puerto Rico early next week, or about the same time as the detachment which left Tampa last Monday. Other detachments are also under way. Two of the three vessels carrying General Wilson's division (First, of the First Army Corps) and General Ernst's brigade left Charleston last night, and General Schwan's brigade is sailing from Port Tampa to join the invading force off the coast of Puerto Rico.

Friday, July 22.—A despatch from General Anderson at Manila says: "Aguinaldo declares dictatorship and martial law over all the islands. The people expect independence."

M. W.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NEVER HAS ANYTHING BEEN SO HIGHLY AND SO JUSTLY PRAISED AS

VIN MARIANI

MARIANI WINE, the FAMOUS TONIC for BODY, NERVES and BRAIN.

GEN. SIR EVELYN WOOD Says:

"Regarding the infantry marching in the recent manœuvres, it was the best seen during my command at Aldershot. Many officers availed themselves of the tonic and reconstituent properties of the well-known Mariani Wine, the most certain as well as the most palatable method of inducing resistance to fatigue."
From "The London Sketch."

MAX O'RELL,
The Renowned Writer and Lecturer, Writes:

Your Vin Mariani is positively marvellous; one glass put me on my feet; one bottle made a new man of me.
Yours gratefully, MAX O'RELL.

MARIANI WINE is invaluable at this season of the year, when, owing to trying climatic conditions, the system is especially susceptible to attacks of debility and prostration.

VIN MARIANI (MARIANI WINE) has stood the test of thirty-five years' trial. It has written endorsements from more than 8000 American physicians, in addition to having received cordial recommendations from royalty, princes of the Church and of the State, and many notable personages.

MARIANI WINE is a tonic prepared upon careful scientific principles. It contains absolutely no injurious properties. It gives power to the brain, strength to the entire nervous system, firmness and elasticity to the muscles, and richness to the blood. It has been aptly described as a promoter of good health and longevity.

MARIANI WINE is specially indicated for General Debility, Weakness from whatever causes, Overwork, Profound Depression and Exhaustion, Throat and Lung Diseases, Consumption, Malaria and La Grippe.

MARIANI WINE is an adjuvant in convalescence and a powerful rejuvenator. For Overworked Men, Delicate Women, Sickly Children it Works Wonders. Taken with cracked ice, it relieves Summer Prostration quickly and effectually. It soothes, strengthens and sustains the system.

To those who will kindly write to MARIANI & CO., 52 West 15th Street, New York City, will be sent, free, book containing portraits with endorsements of Emperors, Empress, Princes, Cardinals, Archbishops, and other interesting matter.

ALL DRUGGISTS. AVOID SUBSTITUTIONS.
PARIS: 41 Boulevard Haussman. LONDON: 83 Mortimer Street. MONTREAL: 28-30 Hospital Street.

SUMMER HOLIDAYS

with plenty of sport and exercise bring fatigue. In all outings their exertions are delightfully refreshed by a pure tonical stimulant.

Hunter Baltimore Rye

Old, Mellow, and Delicious.
Reinvigorates and Restores.

The Purest Type of the Purest Whiskey.

Eau de Cologne No. 4711

The most pungent, exhilarating and refreshing Perfume. Used by persons of refinement. Imported into America for three-quarters of a Century. Be sure to get "No. 4711," which is the standard in all civilized countries.

MÜLHENS & KROPFF, N. Y., U. S. AGENTS.

We refund your money any time within 60 days.

This will enable you, without risk, to test
THE "PRACTICAL" TROUSERS HANGER AND PRESS.

A device which keeps Trousers "Smooth as if Ironed," and enables a closet arrangement which gives maximum convenience and twofold capacity. Each garment separately get-at-able.

Our 52-page descriptive booklet (free on request) tells you what other people think of our device. It contains facsimile reproductions of letters from customers sending us duplicate orders—the strongest kind of endorsement—and the names of over 1500 well-known gentlemen who have in use one or more of our $5.00 sets.

The Five-Dollar Set consists of 6 Practical Trousers Hangers and 3 Practical Closet Rods—sent express prepaid on receipt of price. The closet shown is fitted with a $5.00 set. It meets the average requirements. Single Hangers, Trousers, 75c. each. Single Rods, price, 25c. For $1.00 we will send, prepaid, one Hanger and one Rod, and afterward, if wanted, the remainder of the set for $4.00.

PRACTICAL NOVELTY CO., 431 Walnut St., Phila., Pa.

When You Buy Your '98 Bicycle

Buy the Popular Wheel—The CRESCENT—Sold at Fair, Fixed Prices

STANDARD PRICES
CRESCENT BICYCLES
SOLD BY AGENTS EVERYWHERE

For 1898 are thoroughly up-to-date, and guaranteed by manufacturers of Unquestioned Financial Responsibility.

A good point to remember in selecting a wheel.

Art Catalogue, with "Care of the Wheel," FREE.

WESTERN WHEEL WORKS
CHICAGO NEW YORK

As Delightful to Drink as it's easy to make.

Fill bowl with ice, pour contents of bottle over same—it's ready for use. For a delicious Claret Cup, add one pint of good Claret to one quart of Club Punch. Fruits in season may be added.

For an afternoon tea, evening party, yacht, or picnic, it makes entertaining easy. For sale by dealers. Prepared and guaranteed by
G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., Hartford, Conn.; New York; London.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

Wherever shown—Nashville—Brussels—everywhere; with experts and with riders, only one result, highest awards to the

Veeder CYCLOMETER

DUST PROOF
WATER PROOF
POSITIVE ACTION
CATALOGUE FREE

VEEDER MFG. CO. HARTFORD CONN.

HELP YOURSELF

to a better position, a better salary, by securing a technical education. Our method leads to sure success. Complete courses in

ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING

Steam, Mechanical or Civil Engineering; Mathematics; Chemistry; Mining; Mechanical or Architectural Drawing; Surveying; Plumbing; Architecture; Metal Pattern Drafting; Prospecting; Book-Keeping; Shorthand; English Branches

TAUGHT BY MAIL

Circular free. State subject you wish to study
Estab. 1891. 45,000 students and graduates.
The International Correspondence Schools,
Box 1159 Scranton, Pa.

$2.00 a Month

STUDY MEDICINE By Mail

Spare moments sufficient. Diplomas given. Suggestion, Hydropathy and Osteopathy. $2 to $10 daily at home or traveling. Either sex. Particulars free. Address, National Institute of Science, H. Y., 78 Masonic Temple, Chicago.

Summer Resorts

LELAND'S OCEAN HOUSE,
NEWPORT, R. I.
Opens June 25. Write for booklet.
WARREN LELAND, Jr., Manager.

LONG BEACH
Long Island
LONG BEACH HOTEL
INN AND COTTAGES
Finest Beach and Bathing
near NEW YORK CITY
Cuisine and Service Unsurpassed

45 minutes from New York via L. I. R. R. Express trains and unexcelled Railroad service. Accommodations for Bicycles.

LIBERAL RATES FOR SEASON GUESTS
Long-distance telephone No. 23.A, Long Beach.
A. E. DICK, Proprietor.

THE BEST PENS ARE
ESTERBROOK'S
PROFESSIONAL PEN

PENS

ESTERBROOK'S
LEADING NUMBERS:
048, 14, 130, 239, 313, Al, 556.
PENS IN ALL STYLES, FOR EVERY PURPOSE.
FOR SALE BY ALL STATIONERS.
The Esterbrook Steel Pen Co.
26 John St., N. Y. Works, Camden, N. J.

CHICKEN

NOVEL MEXICAN DELICACY.

Minced chicken, highly seasoned with Mexican spices, and wrapped in corn husks. Unique, delightful. At grocers, or ½ pound can mailed for 10¢ in stamps. Booklet sent on request.

TAMALE
ARMOUR PACKING CO.
DEPARTMENT H
KANSAS CITY, MO. U.S.A.

Readers of Books

who wish to know what are the valuable publications of the week in America, England, and on the Continent will read

LITERATURE

A Weekly Journal of International Literary Criticism

W. D. HOWELLS and HENRY JAMES alternate in contributing the "American Letter." "The Portrait Supplements" of eminent men of letters will be a welcome addition to the libraries of

Lovers of Books

10 Cents a Copy $4 00 a Year

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York City

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LEFT-HANDED ORIGINALITY—NOT HIS IDEA OF A JOKE.

There is nothing the particular person selects more carefully than the soap he or she uses, and rightly so, for much discomfort results from the use of impure soaps.

Ivory Soap is made of vegetable oils which are soothing to the skin. It can be used as often as necessary, without causing chapping or roughness.

IVORY SOAP IS 99 44/100 PER CENT. PURE.

Copyright, 1896, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

"ALL HANDS." Pictures of Life in the United States Navy.

By RUFUS F. ZOGBAUM, Author of "Horse, Foot, and Dragoons." Large 4to, Cloth, Ornamental, Colored Top, $5 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York and London

ROYAL

The absolutely pure

BAKING POWDER

Highest of all in leavening strength.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

Armour's Extract of Beef

"has that rich, beefy flavor."

For preparing soups, sauces, gravies, etc. "Culinary Wrinkles" gives many ways of using Extract. It's mailed free for the asking.

"Culinary Wrinkles" may be had for the asking—gives 50 ways for using Extract.

ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

War or Peace?

Inflammation means war in the delicate, sensitive skin or mucous membrane.

POND'S EXTRACT,

externally or internally, brings peace in a moment. Try it for sunburn, chafing, sore eyes, sore feet, mosquito bites, stings of insects, bruises and all pains. The genuine is manufactured and bottled solely by the Pond's Extract Company at their own factory.

STEVENS RELIABLE POCKET RIFLES.

A Combination Rifle and Pistol.

10-inch barrel. Globe and peep sights. Nickel-plated detachable rest. Weight with rest only one pound. Made to take the .22 long-rifle cartridge.

A perfect summer companion.

A rifle chambered for this cartridge will also take the C.B., .22 short and .22 long cartridges.

Price, complete, $8.25.

Where dealers do not carry STEVENS RIFLES in stock, we will send, express charges prepaid, on receipt of price.

Send for our new eighty-page catalogue, describing our full line and containing special information.

J. Stevens Arms & Tool Co., P. O. Box 210, CHICOPEE FALLS, MASS.

Next to floating on a cloud

For absolute comfort and convenience in CAMPING or YACHTING

"PERFECTION" AIR MATTRESSES AND CUSHIONS

are important requisites—they are waterproof, light, and convenient—can be deflated and rolled into small compass. Desirable for hospital or home use.

Free illustrated catalogue tells all about them.

MECHANICAL FABRIC CO., Air-Goods Department, Providence, R. I.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co., BANKERS.

ESTABLISHED 1873.

2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.

Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.

Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.

A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.

Correspondence solicited.

TRADE E&W MARK EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS BEST IN THE WORLD

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

| | |
|---|---|
| MAGAZINE, | $4 00 a Year |
| WEEKLY, | $4 00 a Year |
| BAZAR, | $4 00 a Year |
| LITERATURE, | $4 00 a Year |
| ROUND TABLE, | $1 00 a Year |

"AMERICA'S GREAT RESORTS," 48 pages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent stamp by GEORGE H. DANIELS, C. P. A. New York Central, New York.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

IMPORTANT ILLUSTRATED ARTICLE FROM MANILA.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2172. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 6, 1898. TEN CENTS A COPY. FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.

"Cristóbal Colon." "Brooklyn."

"THE STAR-SPANGLED BANNER."

THE BAND OF THE BATTLE-SHIP "OREGON" ON THE FORWARD 13-INCH-GUN TURRET CELEBRATING THE VICTORY, IMMEDIATELY AFTER THE SURRENDER OF THE "CRISTÓBAL COLON," JULY 3.

DRAWN BY W. A. ROGERS, FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, AUGUST 6, 1898

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

This Paper will be the best Pictorial History of the War with Spain, as it was of the War of 1861. Its Special Artists and Correspondents are following the Army and Navy, and notable Events in Washington and elsewhere will be accurately portrayed.

| ARTISTS. | CORRESPONDENTS. |
|---|---|
| CARLTON T. CHAPMAN. | JOHN FOX, Jr. |
| RUFUS F. ZOGBAUM. | FRANK D. MILLET. |
| FREDERIC REMINGTON. | JOHN F. BASS. |
| T. DE THULSTRUP | O. K. DAVIS. |
| W. A. ROGERS | HAROLD MARTIN, |
| T. DART WALKER. | AND OTHERS. |

MESSRS. MILLET, BASS, and DAVIS are in Manila or on their way thither, MR. WALKER is with General MILES'S Expedition against Puerto Rico, and MR. MARTIN at Santiago.

GENERAL SHAFTER showed a wise moderation and a just appreciation of SYLVESTER SCOVEL when he declined to try the latter for his journalistic outbreak, and contented himself with metaphorically kicking him out of the lines. Equally commendable was his arrest and expulsion of the yellow correspondents who endeavored to stir up angry feelings against the surrendered Spaniards, and to sell their disreputable sheet, by sticking up posters in Santiago calling upon the passers-by to "remember the Maine." Vigorous doses of equal and exact justice liberally administered would be a wonderful cure for the yellows.

GENERAL SHAFTER'S position towards GARCIA and the Cubans is dignified and correct. The war is between the United States and Spain, and the Cubans are not to be considered until it is ended. Eventually the government may be turned over to them in accordance with the promise which we have made. But in the mean time Spain's rights must be recognized, and especially must Spanish people and property be protected from Cuban plunderers. Even if the Cubans were worthy of respect, General SHAFTER'S attitude would be right, but, as a matter of fact, they have shown themselves entirely unworthy of special consideration. Our troops are reported, doubtless correctly, as ashamed of their allies.

WE are inclined to think that Mr. HILL is too much of a statesman to control the Democratic party of New York. He has theories about currency, the tariff, our foreign policy, the constitutionality of laws, and even civil service reform. It is true that his views are generally those which he thinks will please the "boys" rather than those which satisfy his own intellectual processes, but the Democrats of New York do not recognize fine distinctions, and are coming to regard their ancient wire-puller as a "doctrinaire." When a modern New York Democrat begins to talk about anything but the "stuff," he at once becomes an object of suspicion. He appears like an educated man, an independent, a mugwump. MURPHY and CROKER and Boodle are good enough for New York Democrats, and these will control the party convention this year, and will throw away any opportunity which PLATT'S rule may have given the decrepit organization. If Mr. HILL wants his leadership restored, he must stop writing about the constitutionality of the BLACK election dodge and all other "hifalutin" notions, and confine himself strictly to business, as "NED" MURPHY and "DICK" CROKER do.

IT is perfectly true, as suggested by the Outlook, that this country cannot conduct the government of such a dependency as the Philippines would be in accordance with the principles of the Declaration of Independence. The Outlook is not a Republican party journal, and may therefore be entitled to the belief that despotic government is better for some kinds of people than self-government, although, in our opinion, any American who believes that our republic can wield absolute rule over alien people is getting ready to agree that democracy is a failure. There are, however, Republicans, men who, for party reasons, turned over the Southern States to "negro domination," who are now equally sure that there may be some rule better than that of self-government for such savages as those of the Philippines and that we can administer it. We are not disposed to dispute the general proposition with these advocates of democratic despotism, but we are quite sure that a mixed government, such as they advocate—viz., self-government for ourselves and a despotism for islanders of the sea—would prove a disastrous failure, and that there would be great danger to the democratic part of it. Democracy, we insist, is not capable of maintaining a despotic rule over alien peoples, but the advocates of Philippine annexation are now confessing that, if we take the islands, we must rule them ourselves without regard to the wishes of their people.

SPAIN has at last asked for peace. Naturally the Queen Regent chooses the French ambassador as the medium through which she appeals to the President for terms. France has been Spain's friend. Spain has had enough of war, and is in deep distress. She has practically no navy left. She cannot begin to pay the interest on her indebtedness and maintain the forces necessary to carry on even an unsuccessful war, being already nearly a year in arrears to her troops in Cuba. There is nothing but gloom in her near future, and absolutely no hope whatever for her unless peace is made. The Queen Regent and the SAGASTA government have been deterred from asking for peace, on account of conditions at home. It is true that the commercial classes favor peace, for peace is the breath of their nostrils, and that the people at large are described to be callous and indifferent, morally and mentally benumbed. The army, however, has insisted on fighting to the last, and it is from fear of the army that the government has refrained from making overtures. Now that the Carlists are threatening, and Don CARLOS is apparently making his way to the frontier, Spain has her domestic enemies actually on her back, and needs peace more than ever—needs it absolutely if the present dynasty is to be maintained. As for ourselves, we have certainly had enough of war, victors though we are. Enough American lives have been sacrificed for the ungrateful Cubans, and enough American money has been expended for the furtherance of the ends of the Jingoes. We have got out of the war all the good that can be obtained from it, and we have had enough of evil and sorrow. The longer the war goes on, the greater will be the evil and the deeper will be the sorrow—also the more widespread will be the corruption that always attends war. "Let us have peace," as General GRANT said—as all real soldiers always say when honor is satisfied and the objects of a war have been attained. And in making peace let us be generous.

IT is not for the purpose of self-laudation that the WEEKLY recalls the fact that it was the first journal to ask justice for the regular army from the daily newspapers that were giving all the honors of the war to the volunteers, even the honors that the regulars were winning, but for the purpose of saying that the daily newspapers have done better by the army since then, and to show how keenly alive are the faithful public servants of the army to evidences of appreciation. In proof of this we give the following extracts from personal letters written to the editor of HARPER'S WEEKLY by officers of the regular army. One writes:

> Why is it? Three of the West Point graduates who have only been out since April have fallen, either killed or wounded. Not a word to their memory in the papers. It is pleasing and gratifying to know that at least one paper appreciates what the army is to the country, and is willing to give them credit for what they do; and it is earnestly hoped that now and then a word of praise or some mention of a heroic deed may be read from the pages of HARPER'S.

And another says:

> Let me thank you on behalf of many officers of the regular army for the action of your paper in showing the real part played by the regulars in the series of battles in the vicinity of Santiago. I can assure you that, although only regulars, we appreciate the praise which, until given by HARPER'S, was as carefully omitted in the New York papers toward us as it was lavishly given to the three volunteer regiments which were fortunate enough to be at the front.
>
> Somewhat slowly, since your article, has come a recognition that the (about) twenty regular regiments present did at least the duty, expected of course, of professional soldiers.

We trust that these letters, written as they are from full hearts, will convince the daily newspapers that regulars love justice and appreciate recognition of the services which they willingly render to the country. Certainly they can reap little honor besides kind words. Even professional rewards of a permanent character cannot be won by our soldiers as they are won by the soldiers of other countries. At the best, honors gained on the field of battle are temporary, and the most valuable of them go to volunteers.

THE reports of Admiral SAMPSON, Commodore SCHLEY, and the captains of the squadron are clear and convincing accounts of the splendid fight which ended in the destruction of CERVERA'S fleet. They show, as Admiral SAMPSON said:

> When all the work was done so well, it is difficult to discriminate in praise. The object of the blockade of CERVERA'S squadron was fully accomplished, and each individual bore well his part in it—the commodore in command of the second division, the captains of ships, their officers and men.

And Commodore SCHLEY says that the "victory seems big enough for all of us." In the presence of this fine spirit, the politicians and newspapers that have sought to make trouble by offering exceptional honors to SCHLEY in depreciation of SAMPSON ought hereafter to remain silent. It is clear enough that each ship fought on its own account its full and gallant fight, and that the fleet was prepared because SAMPSON had maintained his watchful guard of the harbor. One fine incident of the fight is brought out by these reports—the heroism displayed by officers and men in their efforts to save the lives of the Spanish officers and sailors from the burning wrecks. Speaking of this, Admiral SAMPSON said:

> This rescue of prisoners, including the wounded, from the burning Spanish vessels was the occasion of some of the most daring and gallant conduct of the day. The ships were burning fore and aft, their guns and reserve ammunition were exploding, and it was not known at what moment the fire would reach the main magazines. In addition to this a heavy surf was running just inside of the Spanish ships. But no risk deterred our officers and men until their work of humanity was complete.

We cannot omit, either, Captain EVANS'S splendid tribute to his men:

> The officers and men of this ship behaved admirably. No set of men could have done more gallant service. I cannot express my admiration for my magnificent crew. So long as the enemy showed his flag they fought like American seamen, but when the flag came down they were as gentle and as tender as American women.

And Captain CLARK of the Oregon said, speaking of his ship's company:

> I feel that they rendered meritorious services to the country, and while I cannot mention the name of each officer and man individually, I am going to append a list of the officers, with the stations they occupied, hoping that this may be of service to them should the claims of others for advancement above them ever be considered.

And so in such deeds and words, civilization, humanity, generosity, and their kindred virtues shine through the smoke of battle, and reveal the nobility of our fighting brother.

THE SANTIAGO CAMPAIGN.

IT is too early to say positively that the Santiago campaign will fully justify itself, although there can be no doubt that very much of value has come out of it already, while much more is well within the possibilities. Good may even come out of the evils and weaknesses which accompanied and marked the preparation of the army, its transportation, and its glorious triumph, if Congress will consent to be impressed by the lessons which are manifest to every intelligent observer of the campaign, and will act upon them with the same unselfish dutifulness and devotion to the country which have animated the officers and the soldiers and sailors of the army and navy. That the campaign is immediately successful, that its direct object has been attained, is, of course, the obvious fact in favor of its conception and its conduct, but more than this has been gained, and we are especially glad of the opportunity to recognize the merits of the campaign, since we were convinced that it set out without that due preparation which time did not permit the administration to make, and at a season of the year which is full of danger, especially to unseasoned men, from the most dreadful of tropical diseases. That these reasons against the departure of the expedition in the summer existed, and were strong, is now shown to be true by the unnecessary discomforts from which the men have suffered, and from the breaking out of yellow fever in the ranks of the regular army. But we shall not now indulge our sympathies, which may, indeed, only call forth a bluff expression of patriotism and indifference to hardships from the safe and luxurious fastness of the War Department building at Washington. The most important question at present is as to the military and political value of the capture of Santiago.

Besides the success of the expedition, which was made possible by the co-operation of the navy, the country has, as we have said, other results of the campaign to be grateful for. First of all, we have discovered the enormous value of the regular army, its absolute trustworthiness.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

This is due not only to the skill and education of the officers, but to the confidence felt in them by the rank and file, and to the excellent training which the men have received. West Point and the army have paid the whole cost of their maintenance in this campaign, and it is to be hoped that the politicians, with whom, in the end, rests the fate of these admirable institutions, will realize the fact that the war has demonstrated the essential value of the highest order of education and of training for the military establishment. We do not speak now of the high courage and devoted patriotism which have been manifested by our land and naval forces—courage and patriotism which have called forth encomiums from foreign observers and students of the military art. American courage has spoken for itself and needs no eulogist. It was the common characteristic of both the regular and the volunteer. If any one lacked it before El Caney or on the heights of San Juan, it was because his presence there was not entirely voluntary. But the great virtues besides mere courage that shone forth in the splendid charges by which those points were captured, charges that at the moment were declared by foreign officers to be foolish and impossible, were the coolness of the regular officers, their unselfish solicitude for their men, and the devotion and confidence of the latter, the belief that they were being conducted through the hail of Spanish bullets in the wisest manner. We have in mind the testimony of a volunteer soldier who did his duty at San Juan, and who, unable to find his own officers, joined the regulars in their bloody march up the now famous hill. So moved was he by the moral influence of the regular officers over their men, he says, that the moment he found himself with them he no longer felt alone, but as if under a guiding and protecting power that had his welfare and safety in mind and at heart. And this splendid confidence, which was his by association, as it was his temporary comrades' by training, strengthened his nerves and steadied his hand and step. It is of enormous value to the country to have learned this of its fighting force, not only because it makes us sure of our officers and soldiers, but because it increases our regard for American citizenship and for American institutions, which have made such men as these possible.

This is the great moral gain of the campaign, and that we are able to count this precious gain is due to the fact that by reason of a badly planned movement, for which, we understand, no officer was responsible, the fight was one of regimental and line officers and of their men, in some instances of men without officers. To these simple and dutiful Americans was the victory, and from these we receive an inspiration which even now seems to have changed the spirit of the nation, to have made it more proud of itself. If the stimulus of pride and self-respect be lasting, we may expect to find the people demanding of their civil servants the same unselfish and self-sacrificing patriotism which led their servants with the colors through tropical jungles and up the heights at Santiago in the face of almost certain death, and, under the ungrateful system established and clung to by our politicians, with no hope of reward save the consciousness of duty done and the gratitude of private fellow-citizens.

There are other gains, to be sure. The administrative force of the army, which is the creation of Congress and of influential politicians, has been weak, but American enterprise, ability, and tireless industry have accomplished wonders. The army was not ready to start from Tampa. It still lacks the uniforms for the tropics that it ought to have had before going aboard the transports. There was too large a proportion of raw men in the ranks. There was, and is, no powder of the right kind. There was a dangerous lack of horses and artillery. The men had too little to eat, and their food was not of the proper kind. Above all, there was a cruel disregard of the comfort and welfare of the sick and wounded. The want of medical preparation and the consequent suffering of the troops were criminal. But a great deal was actually accomplished, and nearly all the preparation for transportation was made after the declaration of war. The regulars, as they were before the new recruits joined, were ready to move at once. Some of them, especially the regiments on the Pacific coast, did move in an incredibly short time after receiving their orders. The credit for this readiness, however, is due to officers of the line, and not to any civilian, or to a staff hampered and limited in every way by politicians. Finally, we have the material gains of the campaign, the eastern end of Cuba, the city and harbor of Santiago, the prisoners taken from Blanco's force, the guns, and the ammunition. We have also the opportunity to show both the Cubans and the Spaniards the advantages of decent and honest government. If now the victory will induce a speedy peace, the campaign at Santiago will vindicate itself. That is the one gain which will excuse the undertaking before complete preparation for it was made, and the needless sacrifices, including the deaths from yellow fever, few or many, that were the consequences of lack of such preparation. If peace comes before November, the Santiago campaign will be justified. But otherwise it will not be, because all the other gains, moral and material, might have been had after the rainy season at a much smaller cost to the army.

From the evils and weaknesses that have attended the triumph, one great lesson has been learned—that Congress is unfit to control the military force, and that it ought not to exercise the war power unless it is also willing to make ready for war. The condition of the defences of the country when war was declared was disgraceful to the war power. Six weeks after the war broke out New York Harbor was so defenceless that almost any fleet could have entered it. Now that this condition of affairs is over, and the harbor is thoroughly protected, it can be safely revealed that some weeks after war broke out the forts in New York Harbor had so small a supply of ammunition that the newly recruited artillerymen could not be drilled in gun practice. The country had been drifting towards war for a year or more, and Congress had done nothing to make ready for it. If the war had been declared against any other European power than Spain, we fear that the country would have been greatly humiliated. We owe our victory not only to the virtues of our own troops, but to the weaknesses and military vices of our enemy. For our own condition of unpreparedness Congress is entirely to blame, and the effect of Congressional control of military matters is also lamentably shown in the disposition of civilians in authority at Washington to interfere with soldiers in the field. If our politicians learn the lesson of their own folly from what has happened, if they can be induced to appreciate the narrowness of our escape as a consequence of that folly, again the Santiago campaign will not have been in vain. But if they do not learn this lesson, then nothing remains but an early peace, compelled by General Shafter's success, to serve as an excuse for this too early campaign in the tropics, in winter clothes, with insufficient food, without necessary war material or transportation, without sufficient medical supplies against yellow fever, and Spanish infantry armed with Mauser rifles and supplied with smokeless powder.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT FOR GOVERNOR.

Nothing could be more interesting than the commotion that has been raised by the mention of the name of Theodore Roosevelt as the Republican candidate for Governor of New York. The mention is the more exasperating to the Republican politicians because their violent objections to it are none of them such as can be avowed. The nomination of Mr. Roosevelt for Governor would be as unobjectionable from the point of view of party politics as from that of public service. His numerous and persistent and pugnacious efforts for political reform have all been made "within the party." Nobody pretends that he ever supported a Democratic candidate or a Democratic measure. He was a Republican member of the Legislature a good many years ago. Not quite so long ago he ran a deliberately losing race as the Republican candidate for the Mayoralty of New York, although his sanguine disposition blinded him, after he had actually entered it, to the certainty of failure. This is the kind of party service that is held, according to the strictest political casuists, to constitute a "claim"—as the fact that the candidate is away fighting the battles of his country, and doing nothing whatever to promote his own candidacy, is held to constitute an availability. The evident fact is that Mr. Roosevelt is a "good Republican," and that he has "served up" to the Governorship. There is no producible or available reason why he should not be nominated.

The real objection is one that cannot be produced. It is that, good Republican as he is, Mr. Roosevelt's Republicanism ceases when it becomes incompatible with common honesty. He was not a good Republican as Civil Service Commissioner because the acceptance of that office imposed upon him the necessity of laying aside his partisanship while he was in it. He was not a good Republican as a Police Commissioner of New York for the same reason. He did not understand bipartisanship as a means to "deals," and he took no account whatever of the "political faith" either of an applicant for appointment or promotion or of a violator of the law. The impetuosity and gusto with which, in enforcing the laws, he moved along the line of most resistance constitute his principal political weakness. For they made it appear to be his belief that the chief end of a Police Commissioner was to prevent a German from gaining access to beer on Sunday. But the Republican politicians cannot openly allege that as a reason against his candidacy either. For the law, which was expressly drawn to prevent the drinking of beer on Sunday, was a "good Republican" law. If its friends and supporters expect that in practice the enforcement of it could be tempered by political considerations, they will not have the face to make their expectation a cause of offence against the Police Commissioner who enforced it against all saloon-keepers and all drinkers alike.

In addition to his other claims, Mr. Roosevelt has the distinction of the only new "war record" within reach of the Republican party of New York. His service as Assistant Secretary of the Navy was, in the judgment of those best qualified to judge, highly creditable to himself and highly useful to the country. That service does not constitute so much of a "war record" in the eyes of conventions, and possibly of voters, as his subsequent service in the field, though it may well be questioned whether it was not of much more national importance. However that may be, it will hardly be disputed that the First Volunteer Cavalry has shown that it constitutes the most efficient fighting force of raw men, or rather of a raw regiment, that has ever been assembled. If it be true that it was got into trouble by the inexperience of its officers, it was got out again by its own tenacious courage as well as by the help of a regiment of regulars; and in courage there was no deficiency or difference among officers or men. The assemblage of this unique body could hardly have been managed except through the personal influence and energy of Mr. Roosevelt. And if even this feat is less important than what he might have done if he had remained at his desk in the Navy Department, and continued to kindle the enthusiasm of his chief, the fact that he has been risking his skin in Cuba constitutes a more obvious claim upon his party than any term of possibly more useful but less showy work in a bureau.

The real and unproducible reason why the Republican politicians object to the nomination of Mr. Roosevelt for Governor is the reason why the Republicans who do not live by politics should favor it. It is that his Republicanism is limited by his honesty and his manliness. He would be of no more use to one of the factions into which the Republican party is happily split than to the other, and consequently neither of the machines "has any use" for him. A disgraceful proposition conveyed from Governor Black through Superintendent Payn would have no more attractiveness for him than a like proposition coming from Senator Platt through Congressman Quigg, and vice versa. He would doubtless make his share of mistakes. But they could not prevent him from being the most useful Governor New York has had since Grover Cleveland. That means a much larger measure of public usefulness than is open to him in the army.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

Friday, July 22.—At Manila the situation has several new elements of interest in addition to the declaration of a dictatorship by the insurgent leader Aguinaldo. The disembarkation of the troops of the second expedition began last Tuesday at a point two miles from the city; the attacks of the Filipinos upon the Spanish outposts have been more vigorous of late; the statement is made that Aguinaldo has been so much encouraged by his successes that he is now trying to create conditions in the islands which will necessitate the recognition of their independence by America as well as by other powers. So far as Germany is concerned, it is felt at Washington that the situation has improved, and that the observance of a strict neutrality by that nation is assured. A good deal of significance is attached to the German ambassador's friendly call at the White House this morning.

Another of the President's visitors to day was Lieutenant Hobson, who came to Washington in obedience to a letter of instructions from Admiral Sampson, to "explain the position and condition of the Cristóbal Colon," and to urge that steps be taken immediately so that "this fine ship may be saved to the United States navy." Of the other vessels that composed Cervera's fleet only the Maria Teresa will be saved.

The Navy Department has received Admiral Sampson's official statement in regard to the bombardment of Nipe yesterday. (Nipe is a port on the northern coast of Santiago province, lying between the ceded territory and Holguin, where the Spanish forces remaining in the western part of the province have their headquarters.) "The expedition to Nipe," Admiral Sampson says, "has been entirely successful, although the mines have not been removed. The Spanish cruiser Jorge Juan, defending the place, was destroyed without loss to our side. The Annapolis and Wasp afterwards proceeded to assist in the landing of the commanding general of the army and troops upon arrival at Puerto Rico."

(Continued on page 778.)

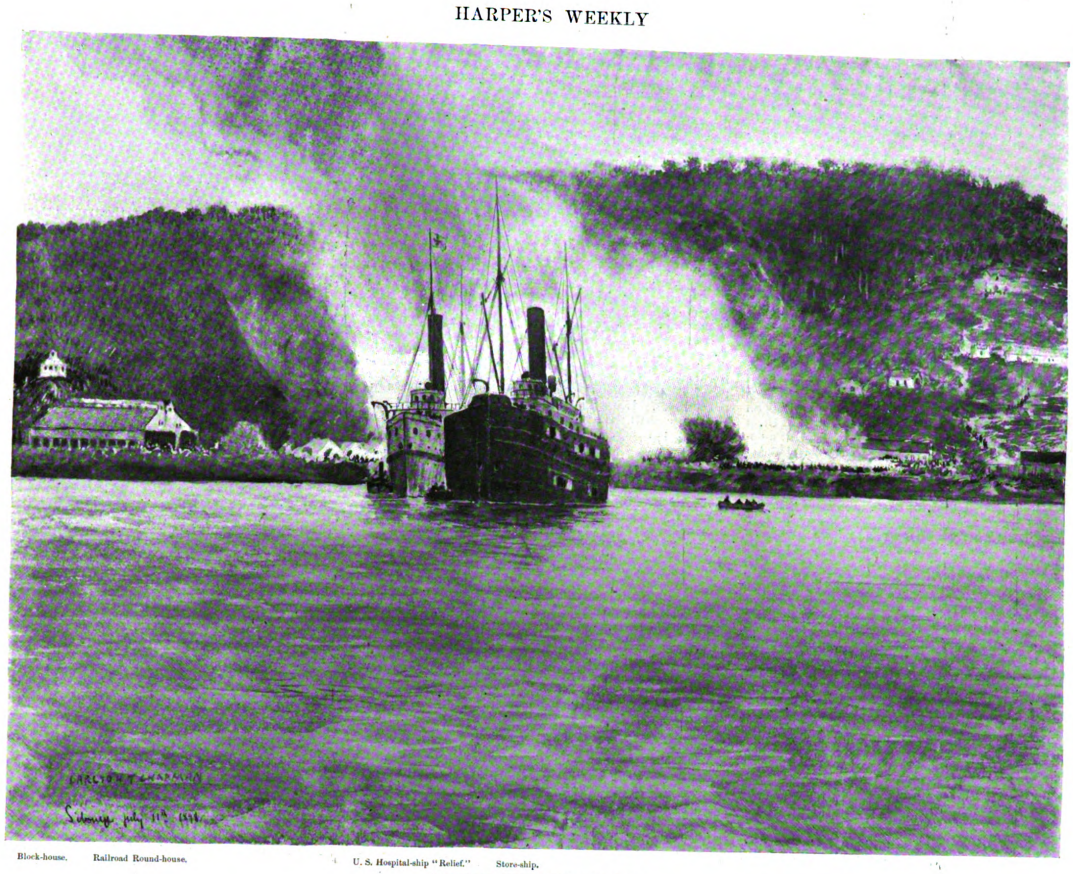
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ON THE SPAR-DECK OF THE "INFANTA MARIA TERESA," JULY 5, TWO DAYS AFTER THE BATTLE.

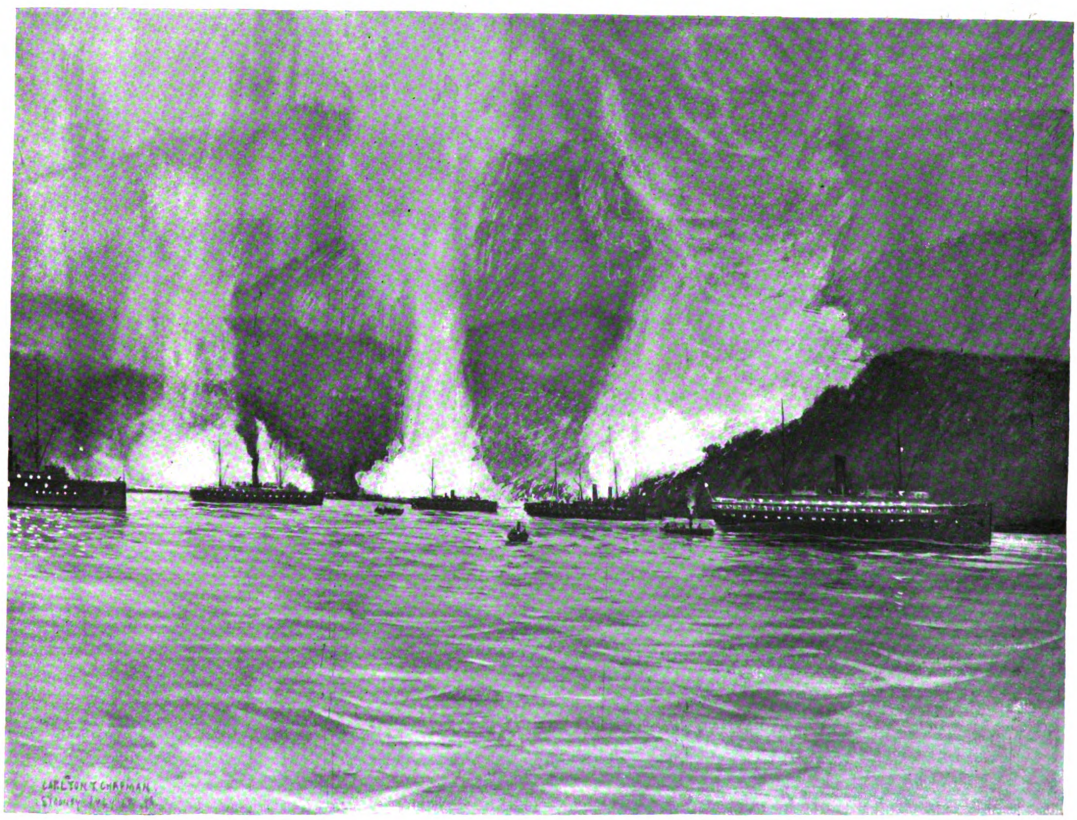
Looking Forward, Port Side. Fearfully charred Bodies lying around the Guns. Looking Aft.

"Indiana." "Brooklyn," concealing "New York," Astern, but nearer Shore.



BOMBARDING THE CITY FROM OFF AGUADORES, JULY 11.

The "Indiana," listed to Starboard by swinging out her big Guns, is firing her 8-inch Broadside.



CLOSING SCENES AT SANTIAGO.

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

STARTING THE BLAZE, JULY 11.

VIEW OF HARBOR WITH TRANSPORTS, JULY 12.

BURNING THE FEVER-INFECTED BUILDINGS AT SIBONEY.

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLEET.

All the Buildings excepting the Railway Stations and Round-house were destroyed, July 11 and 12.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

An allusion in this department of the WEEKLY to a movement undertaken by certain members of the Women's Christian Temperance Union against root-beer has brought a letter from one of the editors of a Methodist paper in Cincinnati, declaring that it is "a very cheap thing indeed to sneer at the order of the White Ribbon." "If you dare," says this gentleman, "smite the saloon and the saloon-keeper." Another letter, from Georgia, disapproves courteously, but with feeling, of a paragraph in the WEEKLY in which an opinion was expressed that the more moderate ideas of temperance reform represented by Lady Henry Somerset were preferable to the extreme opposition to drink which seems in favor with the American branch of the W. C. T. U. This latter correspondent assumes that alcohol is a poison, and that a law to prohibit traffic in it is quite as just and as far more important than the law that put down the Louisiana Lottery.

Prohibition and the fight against the saloon are subjects too big to discuss in a paragraph, but as for criticisms on movements undertaken in the name of the W. C. T. U., it may be observed that they are not inconsistent with a desire for the highest success of that organization. The W. C. T. U. has a vast amount of zeal, and its general purpose to abate the drink evil is one with which all good people must be in sympathy. But the greater its strength and the devotion of its members, the more important is it that they should be effectively used to accomplish feasible things, and not wasted on endeavors that are foolish or impracticable, or that restrain unduly the liberties of the individual. The ideal condition as to drink is not that no one should be able to get an intoxicating drink when he wants it, but that no one should want to drink to his own detriment. All that the W. C. T. U. can do to induce people to deal warily with intoxicants or eschew them altogether is likely to be useful, but the effort to abolish intoxicants altogether and root out the use of them seems so sure to fail that it appears to be time wasted.

In the WEEKLY of July 16, Mr. Poultney Bigelow says, in his "Yankee in Spain," that he cannot remember seeing a drunken man in Spain, even among the soldiers, "and Spain is the country where wine is cheaper than milk—at times not dearer than pure water." "For myself," he adds, "I believe in total abstinence from alcoholic drink, but the best way to fight alcohol is to make light wine abundant and cheap." Two inferences seem deducible from these observations of Mr. Bigelow: first, that a people may be temperate and yet be far from being ideal folks; next, that general temperance is not necessarily inconsistent with an abundant supply of cheap wine. Most of us believe that the smaller the consumption of whiskey and all spirits in this country, the better; most of us, while we tolerate beer and drink it when we choose, think not much better of it than that it is less dangerous than whiskey. Most of us believe in the reasonable regulation of the liquor traffic (especially on Sunday) and in local option, but we also believe that professed total abstinence, though expedient for thousands of individuals, is not necessary to the well-being of the mass of the people. Therefore, when the W. C. T. U. or any other organization presses total abstinence upon us as a duty, we demur; and when it urges the total suppression of the traffic in intoxicants, we are incredulous of the possibility of such an achievement, and even of its expediency if it could be done. But in so far as the W. C. T. U. teaches that alcoholic beverages are dangerous, and tries to teach people to have sense about using or avoiding them, and tries to promote such regulation of the liquor traffic as seems reasonable, we are all with it, and value its efforts.

Doubtless a good deal is done in the name of the W. C. T. U. by auxiliary societies which the controlling minds of the organization do not endorse. It is hard to believe, for example, that so important an organization should bestir itself against so feeble a thing as root-beer. It is possible that, on the principle of hitching to a star, the organization accomplishes more by undertaking the impossible and alleging the doubtful than it would if it limited its efforts to what was more clearly feasible and its allegations to what was beyond dispute. But this last possibility may be doubted, for an organization whose members make extravagant attempts and statements is apt to suffer in its reputation for sense, and so in its influence.

Few episodes of the war with Spain have made more people happy than General Shafter's gentle rebuke to yellow journalism at Santiago. It was an exceedingly mild rebuke, all things considered. We are told that when the Americans got into Santiago two representatives of the Journal proceeded to placard the town with great posters inviting folks to Remember the Maine and to Buy the Journal. This demonstration struck General Shafter as inexpedient in a captured city where every effort was being made to calm animosities and promote peace, and he had the Journal men arrested and expelled from the province, with orders not to come back.

Sylvester Scovel's exploit was so exceedingly grave that comment upon it was generally suspended until it was known what the result would be. Being hindered from taking part personally in raising the first American flag over Santiago, he resented interference with violent language, and getting no satisfaction from General Shafter, completely lost his head and tried to strike him. Instead of having him tried by court martial, General Shafter merely ordered him to be sent away. No explanation has been given of Scovel's extraordinary proceeding. It will be remembered that on the day when the Americans went into Santiago food was scarce and drink plenty. Scovel's discretion may have been upset by overindulgence in stimulants, or it is possible that he was entirely carried away by a sense of his importance as the representative of the World and lost his bearings. Persons who have had relations with the yellow journals report that the service of those periodicals affects the individuals engaged in it most curiously. It is the policy of these papers to represent themselves as centres of the universe and mainsprings of events. They represent daily that government waits on their utterances, and that nothing of importance is settled in Washington until the one-cent morning papers arrive from New York. It is said that the men who are employed to make these curious representations come in time to believe in them, and to regard the papers which they serve as sources of vast authority, and to look upon themselves as the real representatives of the people, and as persons of more actual power than members of the cabinet or generals in command. Megalomania of this strange sort may have developed in Scovel with such intensity as to carry him off his legs. His father is said to have gone to look after him, and that is well, for he undoubtedly needs competent attention. After years of superabundant means of expressing his views, what agony it must be to him now not to be able to "talk back"!

It will not grieve the Americans at home if the news is confirmed that Miss Schley, of the Paris Peace Society, who went to Madrid to make peace with the Queen-Regent, failed to get access to the Regent or any responsible authority, and was politely urged to get out of Spain. Self-constituted peace-makers who have tried to go ahead without authority have not been very fervently blessed in this war. Much as we want the war to stop, the majority of Americans will be content to have the peace negotiations conducted at Washington by our authorized representatives. If the President can't strike a bargain with Spain, we shall have to wait, and we will doubtless wait with due patience.

It will not be surprising if Dr. Benjamin Andrews, late of Brown University, should find the woollen West very much to his taste. Dr. Andrews likes to talk, and has plenty to say. Since he became Superintendent of Schools in Chicago he has made a speech at Madison, Wisconsin, in which again, as once before, he predicted a great European war, to come pretty soon, with Uncle Sam concerned in it. He calls our traditional policy of non-intervention in European matters "keeping the rôle of the hermit nation," and talks of our "taking a hand in the settlement of the Eastern question." With ideas of this sort running in his head, such a personal experience of territorial expansion as is incident to the transfer from Providence to Chicago must be grateful to his feelings.

Apropos of Senator Hoar and Professor Norton, the New York Sun accuses the mugwumps of miscellaneous depravities and futilities, and declaring that they are no longer influential at Harvard, says, "The hero of that university community is Theodore Roosevelt, and Professor Norton is only its laughing-stock."

It may be that Colonel Roosevelt is the Harvard hero of the hour, and no discreet person would venture rashly to impeach his qualifications for the place, but it is far, far from true that Professor Norton is Harvard's laughing-stock. No doubt there are plenty of Harvard men who disagree with his political opinions (though many don't), but the very reason why it was important that his views should be disputed, as they have been by Senator Hoar, is that he has been for many years, and still is, so greatly regarded in the Harvard community that his personal opinions carried exceptional weight.

For a good many years one of his courses in Fine Arts has been the most popular course of instruction in Harvard College. It was given for the last time last year. His pupils, most of them, went to him to learn about art and to absorb "culture," rather than for instruction in political ethics. They got what they went after, and got it in large measure, and however Dr. Norton's views on the character of the American people and the policy of the government may differ from theirs, they will be found to be utterly disinclined to think of him as a "laughing-stock." They will not renounce his views of the architecture of Appleton Chapel and the Fogg Museum merely because they have a better opinion than he of the qualities of the American people, and more sympathy than he has with the present war.

What, oh, what would Professor Norton think of American civilization and manners after witnessing a game of baseball as played on the grounds of the New York Baseball Club?

Mr. William Tudor, of Boston, who undertook to collect money to provide comforts and necessaries for Colonel Roosevelt's Rough Riders, announced a fortnight ago that he had money enough. The fund at that time amounted to $697.

Mr. Winthrop Chanler, who went to Cuba on the Florida to help Gomez, was shot through the arm while trying to land at Tunos de Zarza, and came home in due time to let his wounds heal. He did not come home, however, until he had been ashore in Cuba long enough to see something of the Cubans with General Gomez, and what he has found to say about them has come very opportunely to modify the pessimistic views about our Cuban allies which have lately come from Santiago. He says he found the Cuban officers with Gomez to be cultivated gentlemen, and the men of the insurgent army impressed him as being excellent fighters, though they have done little fighting for three months past, because the Spanish soldiers all stay in the towns, and the Cubans are not properly equipped to attack towns. He represents, however, that the officers with Gomez distrust the intentions of the Americans in Cuba, and believe that they simply intend to take possession of the country. After hearing from Santiago that the Cubans there are of no use, it is somewhat reassuring to listen to Mr. Chanler. Yet even he is not excessive in his praises, and though he advocates sending supplies to General Gomez, his report of the distrustfulness of General Gomez's officers seems to furnish grounds for hesitation about strengthening them overmuch. One thing is plain enough about the Cubans, whether with Garcia or Gomez—that they are sensitive, and require to be handled with patience and with much tact. It is obvious that it will take time and pains to bring the various elements of the Cuban population into such relations with one another and the rest of mankind that they will work together for good.

The reduction of the assessment on the property of Mr. William Rockefeller at Tarrytown from $2,189,555 to $343,775 is so considerable that it must afford Mr. Rockefeller very marked relief. The ways of assessors often seem past finding out, but the intentions of Mr. Michael Martin, who arranged the valuation of Mr. Rockefeller's property, as disclosed by witnesses, seem to have been no more recondite than merely to take the taxes off the poor and put them on the rich.

The discussion between Surgeon-General Sternberg and the supporters of the Red Cross as to the case of the Seneca, and the general management of the hospital service at Santiago, is something to be approached with caution. Miss Jennings, the Red Cross nurse, who came from Siboney to New York on the Seneca and did such good work on the voyage, has spoken her mind freely about the over-crowded state of the transport and the lack of supplies and fit provision for the wounded. Her facts are hard to get over, yet some things have been explained. We are told, for one thing, that the object in taking the less seriously wounded men off the Relief and sending them home on the Seneca was to make room on the Relief for the cases that were expected to result from the storming of Santiago. So far the explanation explains, but in the matter of the shortage of supplies and lack of surgical instruments the question seems to be merely who was to blame, for there was failure somewhere, and failure for which the Surgeon-General's department would seem to be responsible.

If the war lasts long enough, we shall probably see the army surgeons and the Red Cross people working together in entire harmony, and all finding plenty to do. Meanwhile one of the victories of the war, so far, was that won by Miss Barton and her accomplices in having the State of Texas at Siboney in the nick of time, and in being able to carry supplies and aid to the front in an emergency when the medical corps was overtaxed.

The Nashville American reports agitation in Trinity College, North Carolina, because Mr. Washington Duke, of the American Tobacco Factory, has proposed to give the college $100,000, but Judge Clark, a trustee, objects to receiving it because the money came from the sale of cigarettes. It does not appear whether Judge Clark's objection is that cigarettes are unwholesome or that the American Tobacco Company is a trust; but, whatever disturbs him, it seems not improper to suggest to Mr. Duke that Barnard College in New York is asking for $100,000, and would doubtless be glad to receive the whole or any part of it from him. As Mr. John D. Rockefeller has been in the past a liberal benefactor of Barnard, and has lately promised to give $10,000 towards the present fund, it may be inferred that the institution has no prejudice against the earnings of trusts; while as for cigarettes, none are used at Barnard, and neither the students nor officers of that college have any means of knowing (except by hearsay) whether they are deleterious or not. So if Trinity doesn't take Mr. Duke's money, Barnard probably would. But Trinity had better take it.

Barnard's $100,000 must be raised before October 3.

Yale has made one more step towards the possession of the rich legacy left to her by William Lampson, of Leroy, New York. On July 26 the Appellate Court at Rochester decided that the Surrogate at Leroy was right in admitting the Lampson will to probate in spite of objections made in behalf of the decedent's aunt. The estate is worth about $500,000, and nearly all goes to Yale.

The Fayerweather estate, or part of it, is still in litigation, and promises for years to come to afford relief to the necessities of able members of the bar in many States.

The relations between our fighting-men, both on sea and land, and the military and naval representatives of foreign governments who came here to inspect the fighting, seem to be exceedingly cordial. The inspectors seem to have been fully satisfied with the fighting, and the fighting-men with the inspectors. Ashore several of the foreign representatives were actually with our troops, and one hears many stories and reads many more in the newspapers about the intense interest of some of them in the performances of our soldiers, and of their solicitude for the safety of the men, and that the right thing should be done in the right way. There is a natural tendency to want the side to win which you happen to be with, and that seems to have come out strong in these foreign officers who were with our men. There are good stories in circulation about a British military observer in the fighting around Santiago, and of his ejaculations about "our boys," and what "our boys" were doing and what they ought to do. The French observer has spoken with the warmest admiration of the quality of the American soldiers as individuals, and of their remarkable "initiative," which seems to mean the capacity for fighting, each man on his own hook. The capacity of the American soldiers to see and think for themselves was remarked in the civil war. The German military representative has also been very cordial in his appreciations, and has contrived apparently to make himself exceedingly acceptable personally to the Americans with whom he has come in contact.

Napoleon's observation that a soldier could be made in three months but that it took six years to make a sailor is illustrated by the different courses that have been followed by our government in this war in providing officers for the army and the navy. There has been some little talk of favoritism and political influence in the assignment of commands in the navy, but, at the worst, Washington has only meddled in so far as to determine which of several trained officers of a rank approximately equal should be chosen for a particular service. There has been no putting in of volunteer commodores over seasoned sea-dogs. But in the army, while the regular army has been the backbone of the existing military machine, there has been a prodigious hoisting of new-made soldiers into good places, while many first-rate men whose life's work has been soldiering, and who have been long at it, have had no promotion, and little chance to win it. The sad part of it, from the regular army point of view, must be that the volunteer officers in many cases seem to be so efficient. Whatever credit or emolument of any sort there has been in our naval victories has gone to professional naval officers, but of the credit for our land fights, and of the emoluments of war, like promotion and increased pay, a very large share has gone to the volunteers.

E. S. MARTIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MANILA AND THE PHILIPPINES.

BY HON. JOHN BARRETT, LATE UNITED STATES MINISTER-RESIDENT TO SIAM.

SPECIAL COMMISSIONER FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" TO MANILA.

MANILA, the capital of the Philippines, Spain's late resourceful colony of the East Indies, in whose spacious bay Admiral Dewey's fleet is now at anchor, after winning the first naval victory of the present war, is one of the fairest, richest, and most remarkable cities of the Far East. Warmed by the rays of a tropical sun, cooled by the breezes of surrounding seas, and favored by features of climate and commerce which permit men to grow rich while they remain lazy and content, it is the ideal home of the Spanish official, merchant, or adventurer who would seek his fortune in distant colonies, but still enjoy conditions that ever remind him of his own home land.

THE LUNETA, MANILA.

As I drove leisurely round and round the beautiful Luneta, a broad circular parkway on the water's edge of Manila Bay, where, in the cool of the late afternoon and early evening, society, official and mercantile, Spanish and mestizo, turns out on dress parade to see itself, and breathe the fresh air that comes in from the broad sweep of the China Sea or down from the highlands of the interior, I could easily imagine myself in one of those sunny Spanish ports of the Mediterranean where men lead a dreamy sort of life. What a shock it must have been to the proud pleasure-lovers and old residents who had never failed to boast of Castilian prowess, or missed an opportunity to frequent the Luneta after a day's semblance of work or a long siesta, to realize that Admiral Dewey had suddenly and skilfully dropped a ten-inch shell into the very centre of this little park simply to remind them of the perils of bombardment at the hands of American gunners!

The fleet was lying several miles away, and at that hour the boulevard was deserted, but the gunner's aim was accurate, and the effect even better than if some one of the thirteen churches in the Intramures, or walled city, had been destroyed. That is what might be termed an object-lesson of war. When, later, the inhabitants, recovering from the first paralyzing fear of death and ruin, and led by curiosity, visited this scene of pleasure and target practice, and saw how the shell had landed in the heart of their promenade, like the bullet of a rifle striking the bull's-eye, they beheld grim evidence of the force and skill that had sent their proud ships, that early morning of the 1st of May, to the bottom of the bay.

I.

At this writing the American fleet is at anchor well out in the harbor, near Cavité, with the exception of the little Petrel, which is slowly cruising back and forth from the mouth of the river Pasig to the forts of Cavité, doing blockade duty. The admiral's flag-ship—the Olympia—the Baltimore, the Boston, the Raleigh, the Concord, the McCulloch, and the prize Callao are all there, ready for action if necessary, but patiently waiting for the capitulation of Manila and the arrival of troops and supplies from home. The Zaphiro, one of the transports, on which, by kind permission of Secretary Long and Admiral Dewey, I was a passenger, has gone to Hong-kong with despatches. We shall anxiously look for her return with news from the Atlantic. The officers and men of our brave squadron here had not expected that the glory of engaging in the first regular naval battle of the war would be theirs; but now that they have brilliantly and successfully done their duty, they are impatient to hear of a victory won by their comrades in home waters. They realize the possibility that another Spanish fleet may seek to recover the Philippines, and that in the fight that would result they could not hope to escape unscathed as before; but there is not the slightest suggestion of nervousness, from the admiral down to the stokers, over the issue. They have been under fire once, and they have had practice that ten years' peaceful cruising could not give them.

The criticism has been made by naval experts, mostly foreigners, that when the hour of actual battle should come the crews of our ships, from the lack of homogeneous nationality and from the presence of so many foreign-born men among them, would be lacking in that true courage and devotion which is essential to win victories. The officers of our fleet who watched the men and mingled with them through the hottest of the fight in Manila Bay are unanimous in declaring that their attention to duty and intense earnestness, even after a sleepless night, a breakfastless morning, and an unrelaxed exchange of fire beneath a burning tropical sun, was extraordinary and even beyond their expectations. So intent were they on complete victory, that they showed signs of disappointment when the admiral signalled to withdraw for breakfast after destroying the Spanish fleet and before proceeding to silence the forts at Cavité. And then what an outburst of patriotic enthusiasm and cheering when the battle was over! Old officers who had participated in all kinds of national celebrations and witnessed incidents at home and abroad that had stirred men to the heart state that they never saw so much feeling exhibited, and never were so near the point of tears themselves as when the ships, in passing, cheered one another to the echo, repeated, and cheered again until actual hoarseness forced them to unwilling silence.

II.

Turning from these reminiscences of the battle, which may yet make the Philippines an American possession, we find in this wonderful group of islands and its metropolis, Manila, subjects well worthy of study and investigation. The more that is known and seen of them, the more they please and surprise. Cuba may be rich and a land of vast opportunities, but the Philippines are richer and capable of greater development. Their location on the map of Asia is similar to that of Cuba in its relation to North America. Each lies to the southeast of the mainland and occupies a position of immeasurable commercial and strategical importance. As Cuba commands the Caribbean, so the Philippines do the South China Sea. Both are lands of sunshine and storm, of continued droughts and long rains, of sugar and tobacco, and of elements in control and rebellion that will no more unite than will oil and water.

On the north Manila is approached from Hong-kong direct; on the south, from Singapore. The former route is over a course of 640 miles, and requires about three days. The latter is longer, or about 1200 miles, and consumes six days, unless one travels on a regular Spanish liner, when the distance is usually covered in four and a half days. Fast boats can make Manila from Hong-kong in forty-eight hours or less. The transport Zaphiro, conveying the Naval Department's important messages and a few war correspondents, carried us into Manila Bay in about sixty hours, despite her splendid qualities as a roller and promoter of seasickness among those of us who were better landlubbers than sailors. Although there were moments when I did not care much whether a Spanish cruiser overhauled us or not, the hospitable natures of the commander and officers, with their stories of how the battle was fought, from the moment the fleet in pitch darkness stole into the harbor past Corregidor until the last gun at Cavité was silenced, kept me in a cheerful mood, and made me regret that I too had not been a naval officer, and so had the glory of participating in a combat that will mark an epoch in our history. Had Uncle Sam been good enough to have excused me two weeks earlier from my duties as minister to Siam, I might have at least witnessed the fight.

As one approaches the island of Luzon, the largest of the group, the coast presents a varied appearance, with numerous indentations which often afford excellent harbors or anchorages, and with alternating low and high land making here a beautiful valley and there a plain or broad plateau. Barren rocks are set off against wooded mountains, and sandy beaches slip away into green fields that climb up the hills, which in turn roll back into lofty ranges, from whose summits typhoons descend and at whose base earthquakes have their origin.

III.

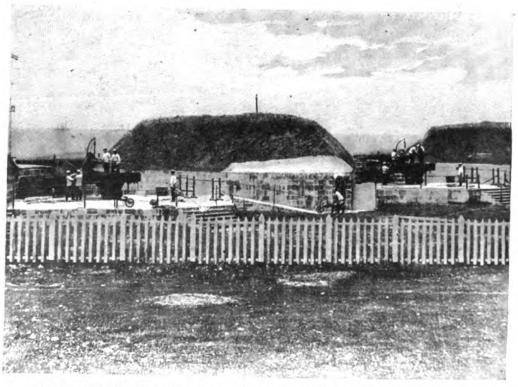
The entrance to Manila Bay is accomplished by two passages separated by Corregidor Island, which stands like a mighty sentinel challenging all who may enter. Upon it is a light-house with a revolving light that may be seen a distance of thirty miles. This light, as all others on the coast of the Philippines, was extinguished upon the declaration of war, but the navigators of the American fleet knew their way too well for the Spaniards, and kept their bearings at midnight as if it were mid-day. The guns of the Spanish forts on this island had no terrors for our ships; but if new fortifications were erected and equipped with heavy modern cannon, and the channels properly mined, no fleet in the world could pass this gateway. If Manila becomes an American possession, one of our first steps should be to fortify Corregidor Island, and thus render Manila safe from attack. I never entered a harbor that impressed me as easier of protection, and it is a source of astonishment that the Spanish government had not taken adequate advantage of this natural opportunity to defend its great colonial capital in the East.

From a few miles beyond Corregidor the bay widens with a grand sweep to the east and north. Steaming almost due northeast, we see Cavité on the right, with its own small harbor, across which, and under the forts of the town, was waiting the Spanish fleet when attacked in the early morning by our squadron. Further to the north on the rounding shore can be seen the walls and battlements of old Manila, with the tower of the observatory and the spires of the cathedral and many other churches rising above the lower level of the surrounding city. The anchorage for large vessels is about three miles from the mouth of the river Pasig, which flows through the heart of Manila, but ships drawing thirteen feet and less can cross the bar of this busy stream into the inner harbor afforded by its waters. The main bay appears like a small inland sea or a broad lagoon, and has a circumference of over one hundred miles. It is ordinarily as peaceful as a sheltered lake, but in the typhoon season waxes now and then into exceeding wrath. To escape its fury vessels then seek the lesser and more protected limits of Cavité Harbor or run out to Subig Bay, an ideal haven above Point Marivales on the north side of the entrance, which the Spanish government has for some time intended to make a naval station. From Corregidor to Manila the distance is about twenty-five miles.



Before describing Manila itself it is well to take our bearings and learn just where we are. On a fair Monday evening we said good-by to Hong-kong—England's mighty Gibraltar and commercial entrepôt of the Far East, a magnificent monument of British enterprise and an impregnable outpost of her empire—and steamed out of Kowloon Harbor, where the Zaphiro was anchored just over the line in Chinese waters beyond the limits of neutrality. Our course was almost due southeast for 640 miles. Then we stood east and northeast into Manila Bay, arriving alongside the Olympia on a Thursday morning, about sixty hours from Hong-kong. Manila itself, according to the chart, is approximately north latitude 14° 36′ and east longitude 120° 57′, on the same parallel as Nicaragua and the Barbadoes, and due south on the same meridian as Shanghai, very nearly seven thousand miles west by south from San Francisco. These points are cited in detail in view of the possibility of American occupation, when every citizen may wish to be familiar with the exact location of America's Oriental capital.

IV.

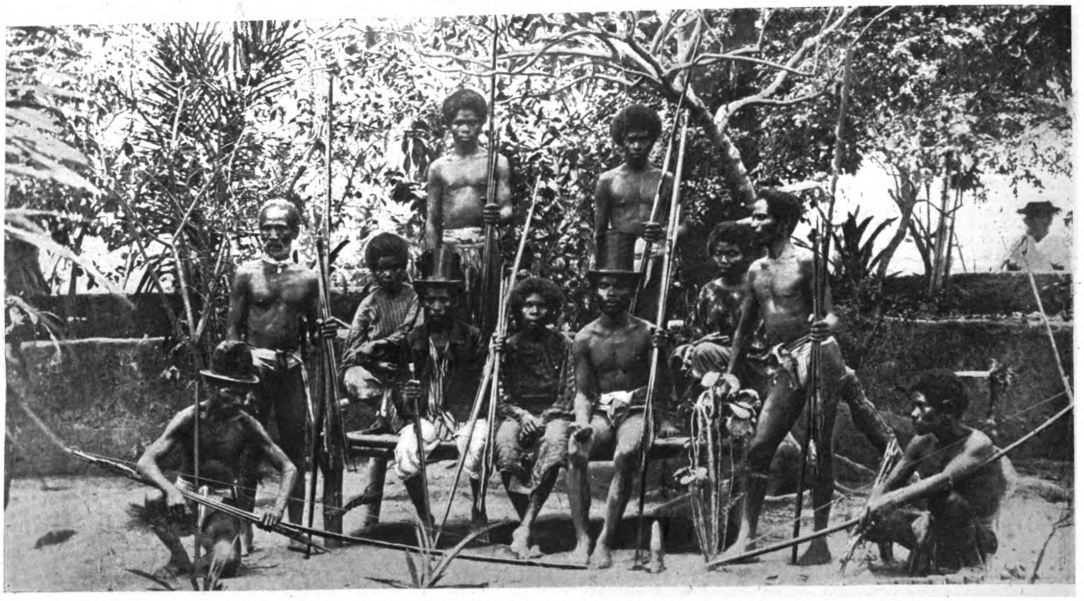
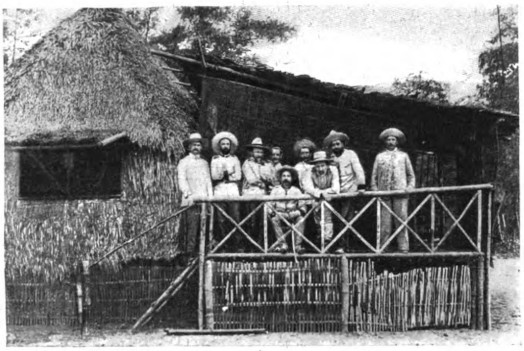
Manila is always interesting. It grows on one. The second impression is better than the first, and the third better than the second. It has its dark, unwholesome side, its tales of woe, misery, and corruption, as well as its bright and cheering features and its stories of joy, comfort, and legitimate ease. It is a metropolis of moods. To-day it is quiet as a graveyard, even sombre and intensely sad—it is a day of special masses by the holy orders. To-morrow it is as lively as Madrid when a mighty bull is to bellow his challenge to the favorite matadore, even gay and hilarious without restraint—it is a day of festivals, celebrations, and cock-fights. The latter days, however, far outnumber the former, and enable Manila to be rated the equal or superior of Saigon, France's pride of the East, and a little Paris in the jungles of Cambodia.

One can walk, ride, drive, or cycle in Manila. The principal streets are hard and fairly paved, and the main roads good, except in the middle of the rainy season, when they often become boggy. Everybody drives who can afford a pair of the wonderful little ponies and a small victoria. Large horses are not numerous and appear out of place, but more are being introduced each year. Bicycles are eventually sure of great popularity with the multitude of suburban roads or paths and the beautiful Luneta, or sea boulevard, with the long avenues reaching out to it and in other directions. I have already described this parkway, but it forms such a popular feature of life in Manila that further reference to it is not out of place. A few miles from the filth and heat of the crowded business section, and open to the bay, lighted by electricity, enlivened by the music of an excellent band, and provided with a promenade, as well as driveway, where the belles and beaux can exchange glances and words while chaperons rest on the comfortable settees, it is indeed a favorite rendezvous for all classes except the English and German communities, who have clubs of their own where they gather in leisure hours.

The new English Club is delightfully located beyond



FORT AND EARTH-WORKS, CAVITÉ, SILENCED AND CAPTURED BY ADMIRAL DEWEY.



Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CHIEF AND ESCORT OF AETAS, OR NEGRITOS, THE ORIGINAL NATIVES OF THE PHILIPPINES, LIVING IN MOUNTAINS.

HEADQUARTERS OF OFFICERS OF SPANISH ARTILLERY.

AN INDIAN RESIDENCE, BOHOL.

Don Mariana Llanera, Second in Command. Don Pedro Alejandro Paterno, Arbiter between Rebels and Spanish, Spanish Captain, Aide to Prima de Rivera. Col. Yutong. Lieut.-Col. Miguel Prima de Rivera, Spanish Officer in Charge of Rebels. Col. Gregorio del Pilar, Adjutant to Aguinaldo. Primitivo Astarcho. Col. Thomas Mascard.

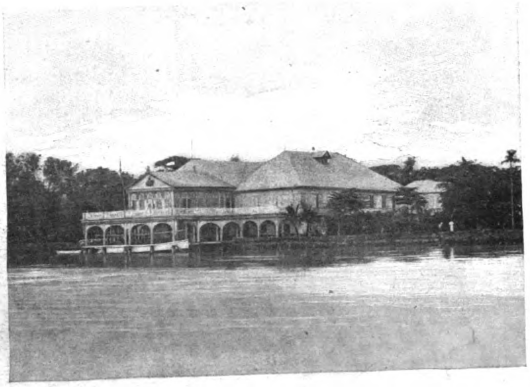
Don V. B. Guerra, Secretary to Minister of War. Brig.-Gen. Manuel Irno. Vincendan Vinegra. Emilio d'Aguinaldo, Rebel Leader. Montenegro. Benito Nativadad. Kabington.

REBEL LEADERS, AND SPANISH OFFICERS IN CHARGE OF THEIR DEPORTATION FROM THE ISLANDS.

MANILA AND THE PHILIPPINES.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SUNDAY SERVICE ON THE SPANISH CRUISER "REINA CRISTINA," DESTROYED IN THE ENGAGEMENT WITH ADMIRAL DEWEY'S SQUADRON.

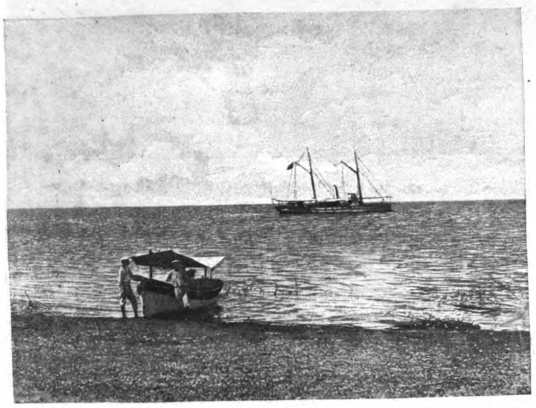


THE ESCOLTA, THE PRINCIPAL THOROUGHFARE OF MANILA.

MANILA AND THE PHILIPPINES.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the Luneta on the bay shore, and is a neat, hospitable, and well-managed institution. It has billiard-rooms, a reading-room and library, dining-room, bar-room, and accommodation for six or seven guests who may find the hotels uninviting. Facing the water, it is always cooled by the breezes and free from the noxious air of the city. On its veranda the British colony watched the great naval battle from the first to the last gun, and all agreed that it was the most spectacular and thrilling performance they had ever witnessed. When the admiral signalled the fleet to retire for breakfast, the president of the club jokingly suggested that the members invite him to tiffin with them, and direct the remainder of the battle from their veranda. An obtuse Spaniard, on hearing this, rushed off and told the governor-general, with the result that a guard of two hundred soldiers immediately surrounded the club building and demanded of each man who he was before permitting him to pass their cordon. Even the British consul had to carry "two stone" extra of dignity in order to penetrate the line of soldiery, and more than one young fellow intending to dine with a fair mestizo missed his engagement.



OFFICIAL RESIDENCE OF THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF THE PHILIPPINES, FRONTING THE RIVER PASIG.

Connected with this club is a tiffin or lunch-room annex in the business centre, where all the foreign merchants congregate between twelve and one. The Germans also have a club, which is supported by a considerable number of their countrymen. The Spanish officials, naval and military, likewise have their clubs, so that life in Manila has at least some antidotes to loneliness and dulness. These are supplemented by tennis, golf, boating, shooting, and racing clubs, which prevent monotony, provide exercise, and add to the attractions of the place.

V.

Manila's amusements are not overwhelming in number, variety, or interest, but the buoyancy of the average Spaniard requires some life and gayety to make his stay in the tropics agreeable. Business and pleasure are duly mingled in each day's routine, and needed rest and sleep to overcome the enervating effects of the tropics are not forgotten. With Englishmen, whose home life and surroundings are similar to our own, daily exercise is taken and required. Without it they could not stand the climate; and although the conditions of health in Manila, as in other cities of the hot belt, are unfavorable compared with those of the temperate zone, and men are more easily and frequently stricken with fatal illness, this adverse influence can be largely, if not completely, counterbalanced by exercise, moderation in drinking and eating, precaution against the sun in the middle of the day, and abundance of sleep, including a daily siesta. In Manila men engaged in business usually reach their offices between eight and nine; lunch comes at twelve, and work is practically suspended until two, during which interval, and after the meal, the siesta is enjoyed; work is resumed until four-thirty, when the Englishman goes for his exercise, to be followed by a visit to the club, and the Spaniard takes his chocolate, followed by a drive to the Luneta. Later come occasional dinner parties, but these are mostly confined to the different sets—the Spanish official, including military and naval, the mercantile and mestizo, and the foreigners. There is little exchange of social courtesies between the official Spaniards and foreigners, unless at formal gatherings where consuls and heads of large firms are invited. The usual dinner hour is eight. Calls are seldom if ever made, except among the closest friends, after that, but are confined to the short period of the late afternoon or early evening, when chocolate is served by the lady of the house. This is a most refreshing drink, characteristic of Manila, and much preferred to tea. It is prepared from the beans of the cacao-tree by the servants of each household, and much pride is taken in having only the best that can be made. If you praise a Spanish lady's chocolate you win her smiles at once.

SPANISH GUNBOAT DESTROYED BY UNITED STATES FLEET—CAVITÉ HARBOR.

The food-supply of Manila leaves much to be desired. Fresh provisions, meats, and delicacies of good quality are difficult to obtain, and the markets are limited in what they supply. Nearly everybody has the same fare, cooked in the same style. Perhaps for this reason dinner parties are not more popular. Special care must also be taken during the hotter season of the year in regard to certain kinds of fresh supplies—such as fish, fruits, and salads. Dysentery and like afflictions are always in evidence, which usually have their cause in unwholesome food. Fever easily attacks foreigners when not in good general form. The conditions of health, food-supply, and the sanitary arrangements of the city could be vastly improved if it was occupied by a government that would make needed improvements and by people that would encourage better markets. Yet I would not suggest that Manila is an unhealthy city for foreigners, nor that they suffer from a limited variety of food. No one complains particularly, and all seem to keep well and enjoy life who accept things philosophically as they find them, are cautious in regard to their habits, and do not foolishly expose themselves to the heat of the sun. Lest I fail to give the warning elsewhere, let me advise every American, whether sent to Manila as a soldier or travelling thither as a tourist, to provide himself with a large pith hat or helmet to wear during the dangerous hours of the day, from ten to four, when the rays of the sun beat down with killing force. Such headwear for out-door experience, together with an ample equipment of light white duck clothing and thin underwear, will enable a man to keep well and be comfortable at all hours.

Manila supports a theatre, uninviting in appearance, but where very good Italian and Spanish operas are heard during the cool season, which are attended on special nights by all the ladies in evening dress. Especially prominent are the mestizo girls and young women, daughters of the richer merchants, who usually wear brilliant gowns, and are blessed with bright eyes, pretty complexions, and vivacious manners. A stranger who enters pit or loge is stared at from head to foot, and if he either holds a high official position or is handsome and has plenty of money, he will soon find these stares are only the first skirmishes for better acquaintance, and even charming hospitality. If my opinion were asked of the beauty, style, and dress of the better class of Manila women, whether Spaniards or mestizos, I should speak in complimentary terms. The majority of them are well bred and educated, have good manners and carriage, and dress becomingly. There are exceptions, some of whom were quite noticeable after the declaration of war and during the first days of the siege, in their efforts to insult by act and word anybody and anything that suggested America or American; but they are calming down now, and may yet grow to like us. The Spanish women dress much the same as in Spain, and even in the hottest days wear no hats, content with the ancient and honored mantilla and an umbrella or covered landau. The average well-to-do native woman wears a satin skirt of brilliant perpendicular stripes, and a waist dress, or chemisette, without corsets, and with short wide sleeves. Over the shoulders is thrown a cloth, which stands high at the back of the neck, falls to a point behind, and is fastened décolleté to the chemisette in front.

The Spanish men and advanced mestizos and natives dress like Europeans and Americans; but there is one class that is peculiar because they wear long shirts outside of their trousers. Inasmuch, therefore, as the shirt is a prominent feature of their dress, it is often made, as is the neck cloth of the women, of a rich and rare texture of pine and hemp, woven with extraordinary skill, and possessing a delicate finish.

I have digressed from amusements to describe dress. Perhaps, in truth, that is not as inconsistent as it might first appear, but the main subject should not be dismissed without mentioning the cock-fights. So popular have they become that they are now farmed out to the highest bidder, who has an exclusive monopoly of the sport in the city or province. There are special laws enacted to cover the size and age of the cocks, and the kind of spurs and helmets they can wear. Wild excitement prevails around a pit, and betting goes on without limit when the birds are well matched. Men will rise from death-beds and soldiers shirk their watch to witness a cock-fight. Gambling goes on among the Chinese and natives to an extensive degree, but this is also farmed and regulated.

There is a series of horse or pony races each year for both gentlemen and professional riders, but I hear that, as the management has fallen into doubtful hands, the Englishmen are planning to form a new and more select organization, or Gymkhana club. Tennis tournaments come at stated intervals, while the supporters of golf, boating, riding, and cycling are increasing in number each year.

VI.

The river Pasig is the main water artery of the city, and the Escolta is the leading business thoroughfare. Before the blockade the river was thronged with myriads of craft of all kinds, small and large, steam and sail, which were coming and going. The Escolta contains the principal Spanish or European retail establishments, while the wholesale hemp, sugar, and tobacco houses are distributed through the business centre, or Binondo. Tram-cars drawn by mules that might be antiquities preserved from the days of Legaspi or Magellan, if speed is a measure of age, run or crawl along the Escolta. The Rosario is the trading centre of the Chinese, who form a large portion of Manila's population. These streets and sections are on the left as one enters the city, or to the north of the Pasig.

On the south side is the famous old city with castellated walls, heavy grim embrasures, and ancient cannon upon their grassy top—once impregnable, but now no protection against the guns of our ships. Surrounded by a double moat and approached by numerous drawbridges, it looks like the ideal abode of those mysterious men who welcome not the Americanos, and preach destruction and damnation for all who will not rise to drive out the ruthless barbarians! It is the home of cathedrals, churches, and chapels of all the many orders that have exploited the Philippines for long years.

If the United States takes full possession of the islands, a serious problem will be the separation of church from state. The ecclesiastics control the government, the finances, law, and politics of the Philippines, and the civil officers that are sent out from Spain are powerless in their hands. Even the governor-general can accomplish little without the permission and co-operation of the archbishop and heads of the different orders. It is a system of church feudalism that has no counterpart in the world. Under its cover undoubtedly the gravest misrule has gone on for centuries, until, unable to bear the yoke longer, the more independent and enlightened natives have been forced into open rebellion. The reforms demanded by the insurgents in the late insurrection were nearly all confined to the taxes exacted by the friars and to the other impositions of religious orders. There may be some redeeming features about this domination, including the education of the natives and the conduct of civilizing and advanced scientific institutions in Manila, as well as hospitals and homes for the indigent, aged, and crippled; but a continuance of the present autocratic sway cannot last long, whether the United States or Spain guards the future of the 7,000,000 inhabitants concerned.

VII.

The first of these ecclesiastics to exploit the Philippines were the Augustinians, who came with Legaspi from Spain in the middle of the sixteenth century. They have been followed by the Franciscans, Dominican Fathers, Religious Devotees, the Society of Jesus, and finally the Capuchins. The Society of Jesus has charge of the famous Meteorological Observatory, where typhoons are discovered and analyzed with the skill of a chemist working on a favorite compound. They also direct the SPANISH TROOPS HEARING MASS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS.*

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "THE GREAT STONE OF SARDIS," ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY A. B. FROST.

XII.—THE BISHOP ENGAGES THE ATTENTION OF THE GUIDES.

WHEN the boat touched the shore Margery ran to the cabin to assure Mrs. Archibald of her safety, if she had been missed.

The bishop was sticking the stake in the hole from which he had pulled it, when Martin came running to him.

"That's a pretty piece of business!" cried the young man. "If you wanted to go out in the boat, why didn't you come to me for the key? You've got no right to pull up the stakes we've driven down. That's the same thing as stealing the boat. What's the matter? Did you tumble overboard? You must be a pretty sort of an oarsman! If the ladies want to go out in the boat, I am here to take them. I'd like you to understand that."

As has been said before, the bishop could smile under almost any circumstances, and he smiled now, but at the same time his brow wrinkled, which was not common when he smiled.

"I am going down to the shore to get my hat and shoes," he said, "and I would like you to come along with me. I can't stand here and talk to you."

"What do you want?" said Martin.

"Come along and see," said the bishop; "that is, if you are not afraid."

That was enough, and the young man walked behind him until they reached the spot where the bishop had taken to the water. There he stopped, and explained to Martin all that had happened.

"Now," said he, "what have you got to say?"

Martin, now that he knew that the bishop had plunged into the water for the sake of the beautiful Margery, was more jealously angry than when he had supposed he had merely taken her out to row.

"I haven't anything to say," he answered, shortly, "except that parsons had better attend to their own business, if they have any, and let young ladies and boats alone."

"Oh, that's all, is it?" said the bishop, and with a quick step forward he clutched the young man's arm with his right hand, while he seized his belt with the other, and then with a great heave sent him out into the water fully ten feet from the shore. With a splash like a dropped anchor Martin disappeared from view, but soon arose, his head and shoulders above the water, where he stood for a moment, spluttering and winking and almost dazed.

The bishop stood on the bank and smiled. "Did you fall overboard?" said he. "You must be a pretty sort of a boatman!"

Without replying, Martin began to wade ashore.

"Come on," said the bishop; "if you can't get up the bank, I'll help you."

But Martin needed no help; he scrambled to the bank, shook himself, and then advanced upon the bishop, fire in his eye and his fist clinched.

"Stop, young man," said the other. "It would not be fair to you if I did not tell you that I am a boxer and a heavy weight, and that I threw you into the water because I didn't want to damage your face and eyes. You were impertinent, and I am satisfied, and the best thing you can do is to go and change your clothes before any one sees you in that plight. You are better off than I am, because I have no clothes to change with." And so saying, he sat down and began to put on his shoes.

Martin stood for a moment and looked at the bishop; he thought of Margery and a possible black eye, and then he walked as fast as he could to his tent to get some dry clothes. He was very wet, he was very hot, he was very angry, and what made him more angry than anything else was a respect for the bishop which was rising in him in spite of all his efforts to keep it down.

When Mr. Archibald and his party came back to camp late in the afternoon, Margery, who had already told her story to Mrs. Archibald, told it to each of the others. Mr. Archibald was greatly moved by the account of the bishop's bravery. He thoroughly appreciated the danger to which Margery had been exposed. There were doubtless persons who could be trusted to sit quietly in a little boat with only one oar, and to float upon a lake out of sight and sound of human beings until another boat could be secured and brought to the rescue, but Margery was not one of these persons. Her greatest danger had been that she was a child of impulse. He went immediately to Camp Roy to see the bishop and express his gratitude, for no matter how great the foolish good-nature of the man had been, his brave rescue of the girl was all that could be thought of now.

He found the bishop in bed, Mr. Clyde preparing the supper, and Mr. Raybold in a very bad humor.

"It's the best place for me," said the bishop, gayly, from under a heavy army blanket. "My bed is something like the carpets in Queen Elizabeth's time, and this shelter-tent is not one which can be called commodious, but I shall stay here until morning, and then I am sure I shall be none the worse for my dip into the cold lake."

As Mr. Archibald had seen the black garments of the bishop hanging on a bush as he approached the tent, he was not surprised to find their owner in bed.

"No," said the bishop, when Mr. Archibald had finished what he had to say, "there is nothing to thank me for. It was a stupid thing to launch a young girl like that out upon what, by some very natural bit of carelessness, might have become to her the waters of eternity, and it was my very commonplace duty to get her out of the danger into which I had placed her, and this, my dear sir, is really all there is to say about the matter."

Mr. Archibald differed with him for about ten minutes, and then returned to his camp.

Phil Matlack was also affected by the account of the rescue, and he expressed his feelings to Martin.

"He pulled up the stake, did he?" said Phil. "Well, I'll make him pull up his stakes, and before he goes I've a mind to teach him not to meddle with other people's affairs."

"If I were you," said Martin, "I wouldn't try to teach him anything."

"You think he is too stupid to learn?" said Matlack, getting more and more angry at the bishop's impertinent and inexcusable conduct. "Well, I've taught stupid people before this."

"He's a bigger man than you are," said Martin.

Matlack withdrew the knife from the loaf of bread he was cutting, and looked at the young man.

"Bigger?" said he, scornfully. "What's that got to do with it? A load of hay is bigger than a crowbar, but I guess the crowbar would get through the hay without much trouble."

"You'd better talk about a load of rocks," said Martin. "I don't think you'd find it easy to get a crowbar through them."

Matlack looked up inquiringly. "Has he been thrashing you?" he asked.

"No, he hasn't," said Martin, sharply.

"You didn't fight him, then?"

"No, I didn't," was the answer.

"Why didn't you? You were here to take charge of this camp and keep things in order. Why didn't you fight him?"

"I don't fight that sort of a man," said Martin, with an air which, if it were not disdainful, was intended to be.

Matlack gazed at him a moment in silence, and then went on cutting the bread. "I don't understand this thing," he said to himself. "I must look into it."

XIII.—THE WORLD GOES WRONG WITH MR. RAYBOLD.

THE next morning Mr. Archibald started out very early on a fishing expedition by himself. He was an enthusiastic angler, and had not greatly enjoyed the experience of the day before. He did not object to shooting if there were any legitimate game to shoot, and he liked to tramp through the mountain wilds under the guidance of such a man as Matlack; but to keep company all day with Raybold, who, in the very heart of nature, talked only of the gossip of the town, and who punctuated his small talk by intermittent firing at everything which looked like a bird or suggested the movements of an animal, was not agreeable to him. Clyde was a better fellow, and Mr. Archibald liked him, but he was young and abstracted, and the interest which clings around an abstracted person who is young is often inconsiderable, so he determined for one day at least to leave Sir Cupid to his own devices, for he could not spend all his time defending Margery from amatory dawdle. For this one day he would leave the task to his wife.

That day Mr. Raybold was in a moody mood. Early in the morning he had walked to Sadler's, his object being to secure from the trunk which he had left there a suit of ordinary summer clothes. He had come to think that perhaps his bicycle attire, although very suitable for this sort of life, failed to make him as attractive in the eyes of youth and beauty as he might be if clothed in more becoming garments. It was the middle of the afternoon before he returned, and as he carried a large package, he went directly to his own camp, and in about half an hour afterward he came over to Camp Rob dressed in a light suit, which improved his general appearance very much.

In his countenance, however, there was no improvement whatever, for he looked more out of humor than when he had set out, and when he saw that Mrs. Archibald was sitting alone in the shade, reading, and that at a considerable distance Harrison Clyde was seated by Margery, giving her a lesson in drawing upon birch bark, or else taking a lesson from her, his ill-humor increased.

"It is too bad," said he, taking a seat by Mrs. Archibald without being asked; "everything seems to go wrong out here in these woods. It is an unnatural way to live, anyhow, and I suppose it serves us right. When I went to Sadler's I found a letter from my sister Corona, who says she would like me to make arrangements for her to come out here and camp with us awhile. Now that suits me very well indeed. My sister Corona is a very fine young woman, and I think it would be an excellent thing to have two young ladies here instead of one."

"Yes," said Mrs. Archibald, "that might be very pleasant. I should be glad for Margery to have a companion of her own sex."

"I understand precisely," said Raybold, nodding his head sagaciously; "of her own sex. Yes, I see your drift, and I agree with you absolutely. There is a little too much of that thing over there, and I don't wonder you are annoyed."

"I did not say I was annoyed," said Mrs. Archibald, rather surprised.

"No," he answered, "you did not say so, but I can read between the lines, even spoken lines. Now when I heard that my sister wanted to come out here," he continued, "at first I did not like it, for I thought she would be some sort of a restraint upon me; but when I considered the matter further, I became very much in favor of it, and I sent a telegram by the stage telling her to come immediately, and that everything would be ready for her. My sister has a sufficient income of her own, and she likes to have everything suited to her needs. I am different. I am a man of the world, and although I do not always care to conform to circumstances, I can generally make circumstances conform to me. As Shakespeare says, 'The world is my potlle, and I stir my spoon.' You must excuse my quoting, but I cannot help it. My life work is to be upon the stage, and where one's mind is, there will his words be also."

Mr. Raybold was now in a much more pleasant mood than when he came to sit in the shade with Mrs. Archibald. He was talking; he had found some one who listened and who had very little to say for herself.

"Consequently," he remarked, "I ordered from Mr. Sadler the very best tent that he had. It has two compartments in it, and it is really as comfortable as a house, and as my sister wrote that she wished a female attendant, not caring to have her meals cooked by boys, a very flippant expression, by-the-way, I have engaged for her a she-guide."

"A what?" asked Mrs. Archibald.

"A person," said he, "who is a guide of the female gender. She was the wife of a hunter who was accidentally shot, Sadler told me, by a young man who was with him on a gunning expedition. I told Sadler that it was reprehensible to allow such fellows to have guns, but he said that they were not as dangerous now as they used to be. This is because the guides have learned to beware of them, I suppose. This woman has lived in the woods and knows all about camp life, and Sadler says there could not be a better person found to attend a young lady in camp. So I engaged her, and I must say she charged just as much as if she were a man."

"Why shouldn't she," said Mrs. Archibald, "if she is just as good?"

To this remark Raybold paid no attention. "I will tell you," he said, "confidentially, of course, and I think you have as much reason to be interested in it as I have, why I came to view with so much favor my sister's coming here. She is a very attractive young woman, and I think she cannot fail to interest Clyde, and that, of course, will be of advantage to your niece."

"She is not my niece, you know," said Mrs. Archibald.

"Well," said he, "it is all the same. 'Let it be a bird wing or a flower, so it pleases'—a quotation which is also Avonian—and if Clyde likes Corona he will let Miss Dearborn alone. That's the sort of man he is."

"And in that case," said Mrs. Archibald, "I suppose you would not be unwilling to provide Margery with company."

"Madam," said the young man, leaning forward and fixing his eyes upon the ground, and then turning them upon her without moving his face toward her, "with me all that is a different matter. I may have occasion later to speak to you and your husband upon the subject of Miss Dearborn."

"In which case," said Mrs. Archibald, quickly, "I am sure that my husband will be very glad to speak to you. But why, may I ask, were you so disturbed when you came here, just now? You said the world was going wrong."

"I declare," said he, knitting his brows and clapping one hand on his knee, "I actually forgot! The world wrong? I should say it was wrong! My sister can't come, and I don't know what to do about it."

"Can't come?" asked Mrs. Archibald.

"Of course not," said he, all his ill-humor having returned. "That fellow, the bishop, is in our camp in Clyde's bed. Clyde foolishly gave him his bed because he said the cook-tent was too cramped for a man to stay in it all day."

"Why need he stay?" asked Mrs. Archibald. "Has he taken cold? Is he sick?"

"No indeed," said Raybold. "If he were sick we might send for a cart and have him taken to Sadler's, but the trouble is worse than that. His clothes, in which he foolishly jumped into the water, have shrunken so much that he cannot get them on, and as he has no others, he is obliged to stay in bed."

"But surely something can be done," said Mrs. Archibald.

"No," he interrupted, "nothing can be done. The clothes have dried, and if you could see them as they hang up on the bushes, you would understand that that man can never get into them again. The material is entirely unsuitable for out-door life. Clyde proposes that we shall lend him something, but there are no clothes in this party into which such a sausage of a man could get himself. So there he is, and there, I suppose, he will remain indefinitely; and I don't want to bring my sister to a camp with a permanently occupied hospital bed in it. As soon as I agreed to Corona's coming I determined to bounce that man; but now—" So saying, Mr. Raybold rose, folded his arms, and knit his brows, and as he did so he glanced toward the spot where Margery and Clyde had been sitting, and perceived that the latter had gone off, probably to get some more birch bark; and so, with a nod to Mrs. Archibald, he sauntered away, bending his steps, as it were accidentally, in the direction of the young lady left alone.

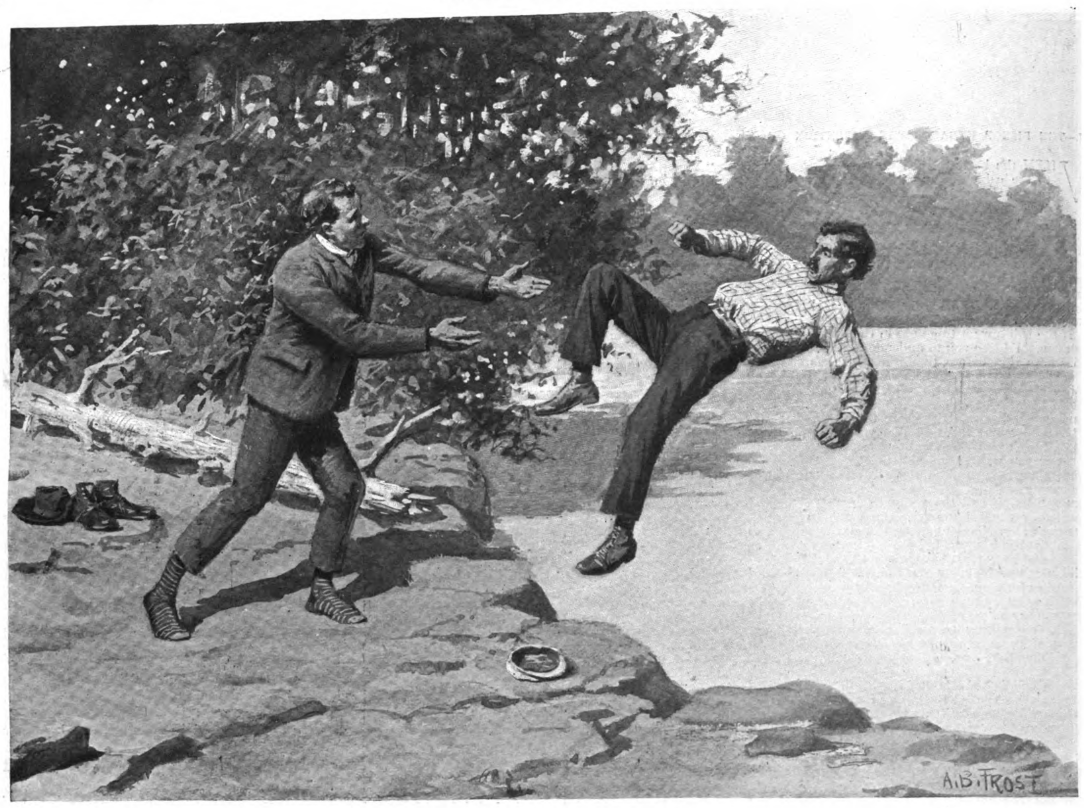
When Mr. Archibald heard that evening of the bishop's plight and Raybold's discomforture, he was amused, but also glad to know there was an opportunity for doing something practical for the bishop. He was beginning to like the man in spite of his indefiniteness, so he went to see the bedridden prelate who was neither sick nor clerical, and with very little trouble induced him to take a few general measurements of his figure.

"It is so good of you," said the delighted recumbent, "that I shall not say a word, but step aside in deference to your conscience, whose encomiums will far transcend anything I can say. You will pardon me, I am sure, if I make my measurements liberal. The cost will not be increased, and to live, move, and breathe in a suit of clothes which is large enough for me is a joy which I have not known for a long time. Shoes, did you say, sir? Truly this is generosity super-eminent."

"Yes," said Mr. Archibald, laughing, "and you also shall have a new hat. I will fit you out completely, and if this shall help you to make a new and a good start in life, I shall be greatly gratified."

"Sir," said the bishop, the moisture of genuine gratitude in his eyes, "you are doing, I think, far more good than you can imagine, and pardon me if I suggest, since you are going to get me a hat, that it be not of clerical fashion. If everything is to be new, I would like everything changed, and I am certain the cost will be less."

"All right," said Mr. Archibald. "I will now make a list of what you need, and I will write to one of my clerks, who will procure everything."



When Mr. Archibald went back to his camp he met Raybold, stalking moodily. Having been told what had been done for the bishop's relief, the young man was astonished.

"A complete outfit, and to him? I would not have dreamed of it; and besides, it is of no use; it must be days before the clothes arrive, and my sister wishes to come immediately."

"Do you suppose," exclaimed Mr. Archibald, "that I

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2167.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"'OH, THAT'S ALL, IS IT?' SAID THE BISHOP."

am doing this for the sake of your sister? I am doing it for the man himself."

When Mr. Archibald told his wife of this little interview they both laughed heartily.

"If Mr. Raybold's sister," said she, "is like him, I do not think we shall care to have her here; but sisters are often very different from their brothers. However, the bishop need not prevent her coming. If his clothes do not arrive before she does, I am sure there could be no objection to her tent being set up for a time in some of the open space in our camp, and then we shall become sooner acquainted with her; and if she is a suitable person, I shall be very glad indeed for Margery to have a companion."

"All right," said Mr. Archibald; "let her pitch her tent where she pleases. I am satisfied."

XIV.—THE ASSERTION OF INDIVIDUALITY.

It was a week after her brother had sent her his telegram before Miss Corona Raybold arrived at Camp Rob, with her tent, her outfit, and her female guide. Mrs. Archibald had been surprised that she did not appear sooner, for, considering Mr. Raybold's state of mind, she had supposed that his sister had wished to come at the earliest possible moment.

"But," said Raybold, in explaining the delay, "Corona is very different from me. In my actions 'the thunder's roar doth crowd upon the lightning's heels,' as William has told us."

"Where in Shakespeare is that?" asked Mrs. Archibald.

Mr. Raybold bent his brow. "For the nonce," said he, "I do not recall the exact position of the lines." And after that he made no more Avonian quotations to Mrs. Archibald.

The arrival of the young lady was, of course, a very important event, and even Mr. Archibald rowed in from the lake when he saw her caravan approaching, herself walking in the lead. She proved to be a young person of medium height, slight, and dressed in a becoming suit of dark blue. Her hair and eyes were dark, her features regular and of a classic cut, and she wore eye-glasses. Her manner was quiet, and at first she appeared reserved, but she soon showed that if she wished to speak she could talk very freely. She wore an air of dignified composure, but was affable, and very attentive to what was said to her.

Altogether she made in a short time an extremely favorable impression upon Mr. and Mrs. Archibald, and in a very much less time an extremely unfavorable impression upon Margery.

Miss Raybold greeted everybody pleasantly, even informing Matlack that she had heard of him as a famous guide, and after thanking Mr. and Mrs. Archibald for their permission to set up her tent on the outskirts of their camp, she proceeded to said tent, which was speedily made ready for her.

Mrs. Perkenpine, her guide, was an energetic woman, and under her orders the men who brought the baggage bestirred themselves wonderfully.

Just before supper, to which meal the Raybolds and Mr. Clyde had been invited, the latter came to Mr. Archibald, evidently much troubled and annoyed.

"I am positively ashamed to mention it to you, sir," he said, "but I must tell you that Raybold has ordered the men who brought his sister's tent to bring our tent over here and put it up near her's. I was away when this was done, and I wish to assure you most earnestly that I had nothing to do with it. The men have gone, and I don't suppose we can get it back to-night."

Mr. Archibald opened his eyes very wide. "Your friend is certainly a remarkable young man," said he, "but we must not have any bad feeling in camp, so let everything remain as it is for to-night. I suppose he wished to be near his sister, but at least he might have asked permission."

"I think," said Clyde, "that he did not so much care to be near his sister as he did to be away from the bishop, who is now left alone in our little shelter-tent."

Mr. Archibald laughed. "Well," said he, "he will come to no harm, and we must see that he has some supper."

"Oh, I shall attend to that," said Clyde, "and to his breakfast also. And, now I come to think of it, I believe that one reason Raybold moved our tent over here was to get the benefit of his sister's cook. The bishop did our cooking, you know, before he took to his bed."

That evening Miss Raybold joined the party around the camp fire. She declared that in the open air she did not in the least object to the use of tobacco, and then she asked Mr. Archibald if their two guides came to the camp fire after their work was done.

"They do just as they please," was the answer. "Sometimes they come over here and smoke their pipes a little in the background, and sometimes they go off by themselves. We are very democratic here in camp, you know."

"I like that," said Miss Raybold, "and I will have Mrs. Perkenpine come over when she has arranged the tent for the night. Arthur, will you go and tell her?"

Her brother did not immediately rise to execute this commission. He hoped that Mr. Clyde would offer to do the service, but the latter did not improve the opportunity to make himself agreeable to the new-comer, and Raybold did the errand.

Harrison Clyde was sitting by Margery, and Margery was giving a little attention to what he said to her and a great deal of attention to Corona Raybold.

"More self-conceit and a better-fitting dress I never saw," thought Margery; "it's loose and easy, and yet it seems to fit perfectly, and I do believe she thinks she is some sort of an upper angel who has condescended to come down here just to see what common people are like."

Corona talked to Mr. Archibald. It was her custom always to talk to the principal personage of a party.

"It gives me pleasure, sir," said she, "to meet with you and your wife. It is so seldom that we find any one—" She was interrupted by Mrs. Perkenpine, who stood behind her.

The she-guide was a large woman, apparently taller than Matlack. Her sunburnt face was partly shaded by a man's straw hat, secured on her head by strings tied under her chin. She wore a very plain gown, coarse in texture, and of a light blue color, which indicated that it had been washed very often. Her voice and her shoes, the latter well displayed by her short skirt, creaked, but her gray eyes were bright, and moved about after the manner of search-lights.

"Well," said she to Miss Raybold, "what do you want?"

Corona turned her head and placidly gazed up at her. "I simply wished to let you know that you might join this company here if you liked. The two men guides are coming, you see."

Mrs. Perkenpine glanced around the group. "Is there any hunting stories to be told?" she asked.

Mr. Archibald laughed. "I don't know," he said, "but perhaps we may have some. I am sure that Matlack here has hunting stories to tell."

Mrs. Perkenpine shook her head. "No, sir," said she; "I don't want none of his stories. I've heard them all mostly two or three times over."

"I dare say you have," said Phil, seating himself on a fallen trunk a little back from the fire; "but you see, Mrs. Perkenpine, you are so obstinate about keepin' on livin'. If you'd died when you was younger, you wouldn't have heard so many of those stories."

"There's been times," said she, "when you was tellin' the story of the bear cubs and the condensed milk, when I wished I had died when I was younger, or else you had."

"Perhaps," said Miss Raybold, in a clear, decisive voice, "Mr. Matlack may know hunting stories that will be new to all of us, but before he begins them I have something which I would like to say."

"All right," said Mrs. Perkenpine, seating herself promptly upon the ground; "if you're goin' to talk, I'll stay. I'd like to know what kind of things you do talk about when you talk."

"I was just now remarking," said Miss Corona, "that I am very glad indeed to meet with those who, like Mr. and Mrs. Archibald, are willing to set their feet upon the modern usages of society (which would crowd us together in a common herd) and assert their individuality."

Mr. Archibald looked at the speaker inquiringly.

"Of course," said she, "I refer to the fact that you and Mrs. Archibald are on a wedding-journey."

At this remark Phil Matlack rose suddenly from the tree-trunk and Martin dropped his pipe. Mr. Clyde turned his gaze upon Margery, who thereupon burst out laughing, and then he looked in amazement from Mr. Archibald to Mrs. Archibald and back again. Mrs. Perkenpine sat up very straight and leaned forward, her hands upon her knees.

"Is it them two sittin' over there?" she said, pointing to Margery and Clyde. "Are they on a honey-moon?"

"No!" exclaimed Arthur Raybold, in a loud, sharp voice. "What an absurdity! Corona, what are you talking about?"

To this his sister paid no attention whatever. "I think," she said, "it was a noble thing to do. An assertion of one's inner self is always noble, and when I heard of this assertion I wished very much to know the man and the woman who had so asserted themselves, and this was my principal reason for determining to come to this camp."

"But where on earth," asked Mr. Archibald, "did you hear that we were on a wedding-journey?"

"I read it in a newspaper," said Corona.

"I do declare," exclaimed Mrs. Archibald, "everything is in the newspapers! I did think that we might settle

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CAPTAIN CAPRON'S BATTERY IN ACTION BEFORE EL CANEY, JULY 1.
The Second Shot carried away the Flag on the Block-house.
Photograph by William Dinwiddie.

9TH INFANTRY FIRING IN THE RAIN, FROM INTRENCHMENTS, AT FORT SAN JUAN, JULY 9.
Photograph by James Burton.

BEFORE SANTIAGO—PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN UNDER FIRE.

down here and enjoy ourselves without people talking about our reason for coming!"

"You don't mean to say," cried Mrs. Perkenpine, now on her feet, "that you two elderly ones is the honeymooners?"

"Yes," said Mr. Archibald, looking with amusement on the astonished faces about him, "we truly are."

"Well," said the she-guide, seating herself, "if I'd staid an old maid as long as that, I think I'd stuck it out. But perhaps you was a widow, mum?"

"No, indeed," cried Mr. Archibald; "she was a charming girl when I married her. But just let me tell you how the matter stands," and he proceeded to relate the facts of the case. "I thought," he said, in conclusion, turning to Matlack, "that perhaps you knew about it, for I told Mr. Sadler, and I supposed he might have mentioned it to you."

"No, sir," said Matlack, relighting his pipe; "he knows me better than that. If he'd called me and said, 'Phil, I want you to take charge of a couple that's goin' honeymoonin' about twenty-five years after they're married, and a-doin' it for somebody else and not for themselves,' I'd said to him, 'They're lunatics, and I won't take charge of them.' And Peter he knows I would have thought that and would have said it, and so he did not mention the particulars to me. He knows that the only things that I'm afraid of in this world is lunatics. 'Tisn't only what they might do to me, but what they might do to themselves, and I won't touch them."

"I hope," said Mrs. Archibald, "that you don't consider us lunatics now that you have heard why we are here."

"Oh no," said the guide; "I've found that you're regular common-sense people, and I don't change my opinions even when I've heard particulars; but if I'd heard particulars first, it would have been all up with my takin' charge of you."

"And you knew it all the time?" said Clyde to Margery, speaking so that she only could hear.

"I knew it," she said, "but I didn't think it worth talking about. Do you know Mr. Raybold's sister? Do you like her?"

"I have met her," said Clyde; "but she is too lofty for me."

"What is there lofty about her?" said Margery.

"Well," said he, "she is lofty because she has elevated ideas. She goes in for reform; and for pretty much all kinds, from what I have heard."

"I think she is lofty," remarked Margery, "because she is stuck-up. I don't like her."

"It is so seldom," Corona now continued, "that we find people who are willing to assert their individuality, and when they are found I always want to talk to them. I suppose, Mr. Matlack, that your life is one long assertion of individuality."

"What, ma'am?" asked the guide.

"I mean," said she, "that when you are out alone in the wild forest, holding in your hand the weapon which decides the question of life or death for any living creature over whom you may choose to exercise your jurisdiction, absolutely independent of every social trammel, every bond of conventionalism, you must feel that you are a predominant whole and not a mere integral part."

"Well," said Matlack, speaking slowly, "I may have had them feelin's, but if I did they must have struck in, and not come out on the skin, like measles, where I could see them."

"Corona," said her brother, in a peevish undertone, "what is the good of all that? You're wasting your words on such a man."

His sister turned a mild steady gaze upon him. "I don't know any man but you," she said, "on whom I waste my words."

"Is assertin' like persistin'?" inquired Mrs. Perkenpine at this point.

"The two actions are somewhat alike," said Corona.

"Well, then," said the she-guide, "I'm in for assertin'. When my husband was alive there was a good many things I wanted to do, and when I wanted to do a thing or get a thing I kept on sayin' so; and one day, after I'd been keepin' on sayin' so a good while, he says to me, 'Jane,' says he, 'it seems to me that you're persistin'.' 'Yes,' says I, 'I am, and I intend to be.' 'Then you are goin' to keep on insistin' on persistin'?' says he. 'Yes,' says I; and then says he, 'If you keep on insistin' on persistin' I'll be thinkin' of 'listin'.' By which he meant goin' into the army as a regular, and gettin' rid of me; and as I didn't want to be rid of him, I stopped persistin'; but now I wish I had persisted, for then he'd 'listed, and most likely would be alive now, through not bein' shot in the back by a city fool with a gun."

"I do not believe," said Mrs. Archibald to her husband, when they had retired to their cabin, "that that young woman is going to be much of a companion for Margery. I think she will prefer your society to that of any of the rest of us. It is very plain that she thinks it is your individuality which has been asserted."

"Well," said he, rubbing his spectacles with his handkerchief before putting them away for the night, "don't let her project her individuality into my sport. That's all I have to say."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

PHOTOGRAPHING UNDER FIRE.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

SAN JUAN, July 8, 1898.

JULY 1 will forever be a memorable day in American history. On that day the United States army, under General Shafter, stormed and took, after several hours' fighting, the two Spanish strongholds El Caney and San Juan. I was with the Seventh United States Infantry, of General Chaffee's brigade, which took El Caney. The brigade consisted of the Seventh, Twelfth, and Seventeenth regiments. On Thursday evening, June 30, about five o'clock, the brigade received orders to march. We were taken away up into the mountains, through paths that permitted our advancing only in single file, and were ankle-deep with thick black mud, into which our feet stuck at every step, making the climb up the mountain-side a very laborious one.

We reached a nice field of grass, and went into camp just as darkness was coming on. No tents were allowed to be erected, nor were any fires lighted, the men and officers having to lie on their shelter-tents on the damp ground and go to sleep "coffeeless." It was a strange, impressive scene, this camp on the eve before the battle, men gliding about ghostlike and silent, scarcely speaking above a whisper. All commands were given quietly, and perfect order was preserved.

At five o'clock next morning, July 1, just as daylight was driving the moon and stars from the cloudless sky, the camp was quietly aroused, and within thirty minutes the field was clear, and the brigade on the march once more, plodding through the thick mud.

At seven o'clock we heard a gun from one of the batteries on a distant hill boom forth what seemed like a challenge hurled at the Spanish fortifications, but it was almost eight o'clock before our brigade became engaged.

As we were marching along, listening to the music of the far-off artillery and rifles, we were suddenly halted, the men being ordered to throw off their packs and advance as quickly as possible. Within five minutes we were in the midst of a heavy shower of bullets from the Mauser rifles of the Spanish, and between two fires—one from a small block-house on our right, the other from the strong stone block-house at El Caney, immediately in front of us.

The men were at once ordered into cover and opened fire, and almost before I realized what had happened I found myself, for the first time in my life, under fire, right up in front, on the firing-line of the Seventh Regiment.

I suppose every one has a different sensation when for

6TH INFANTRY IN THE CREEK-BED OF SAN JUAN, JULY 1,
Where the Bullets were cutting the Branches from the Trees in a steady Shower.
Photograph by William Dinwiddie.

LIEUT. MILEY, AIDE-DE-CAMP TO GENERAL SHAFTER,
Under a fearful Fire, cautioning the Men to be cool and brave as they crossed the bloody Angle of San Juan River.
Photograph by William Dinwiddie.

BEFORE SANTIAGO—PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN UNDER FIRE.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the first time he finds himself with bullets whistling around him on all sides, yet seeing nothing, only hearing them as they rush by, crashing through the leaves and twigs on their deadly errand; but in my own case the seriousness and danger of the situation did not strike me until I heard several heavy thuds near me, and, on looking around me, saw some of our men on the ground, dead or wounded. Then it came home to me that this was war in earnest, and I found myself wondering if I should be the next—whether I should be killed or merely wounded, and where I should be hit. But this feeling rapidly wore off, and I soon became so accustomed to the rattle of the bullets that I began to take no notice of them at all, and even the sight of dead and wounded failed to move me. But I shall never forget my feelings when I first heard the bullets sink into the heads or bodies of those that fell. Some were killed instantly, and sank with scarcely a groan, some with a curse, and others with the name of God on their lips, whilst most of the wounded swore terribly at the Spaniards, and at their bad luck at being stopped so early in the day, and so unable to see the battle through; but every one was brave and patient, some of the wounded having to lie two or three hours before they were attended to, owing to the great lack of surgeons and medical attendants. Litter-bearers were conspicuous by their absence, soldiers having to leave their companies to take their wounded comrades to the rear. The few surgeons worked like Trojans, and were unremitting in their care of the wounded. Meanwhile the firing was fast and furious, bullets falling all around like hailstones, and one found one's self wondering why many more were not shot down.

The troops were calm and brave, following and advancing step by step, as their officer called upon them. General Chaffee was a towering example of what a man and a soldier should be in battle; he was here, there, and everywhere, ordering, commanding, beseeching, and imploring in turn. What did he care that he was walking round in open space exposed to the enemy's fire? He was commanding the brigade and had a duty to perform, and nobly he did it.

The small block-house which I have mentioned had now been silenced, and was in possession of our troops, and gradually we were closing in on the large one, the firing being as heavy as at the commencement. Presently the artillery, which had moved into a good position at closer range, dropped a few shells into the fort, the brigade drew closer and closer, and at about half past one the Twelfth Regiment charged and captured it, taking about one hundred prisoners.

The brigade had won a great victory. It had been opposed by an enemy in intrenchments and shooting through loop-holes in a block-house and a fort, and had lost a large number of men, the Seventh being the greatest sufferer in this respect.

Although I was thus on the first firing-line, and many men were wounded and killed all about me, as you will see by my photographs [published in last week's number], I found it impossible to make any actual "battle scenes," for many reasons—the distance at which the fighting is conducted, the area which is covered, but chiefly the long grass and thickly wooded country. JAMES BURTON.

AFTER THE GREAT SEA-FIGHT.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

OFF SANTIAGO, July 7.

THE 4th of July off Santiago was a rough, boisterous day, a fresh southeast wind whipping up a lively sea. The fleet drew closer together, and at twelve o'clock fired a salute of 21 guns in honor of the day. For it was truly a day to celebrate, and there was great rejoicing among all, forward and aft, for a great victory and providential escape from harm; for it seemed nothing less than a miracle that the storm of shot and shell that swept over our ships on the day before should have done so little damage.

There was great enthusiasm among the transports and the troops at Siboney, and when the Brooklyn left the fleet and passed by, bound up to Guantanamo for coal, she was greeted as a conqueror. The value of the rapid-fire gun is now established beyond all question as one result of this engagement. The testimony of the Spanish officers and the marks on the ships themselves show the havoc wrought by the steady rain of projectiles from the handy quick-firing guns. The deadly broadsides from the Brooklyn had practically decided the fate of the Maria Teresa and Oquendo before the Oregon and Texas completed their destruction. The Texas fired only eight shots from her 12-inch guns, but used her secondary battery with great effect. The Oregon is said to have fired 1776 shots, mostly at the fleeing Vizcaya and Colon, and to her belongs in a large degree the credit for their finish. The Oregon also fired the first and last shots, the first being a warning shot from a 6-pounder, fired when the Spanish fleet came in sight, followed by signals, which were made on all the ships almost at the same moment, the Oregon immediately opening fire, and moving in to engage the enemy, as did all the ships in line.

Both the western and eastern batteries opened fire on our ships, but they did no damage, and were taken no notice of during the fight.

Those who knew the navy best were not surprised at the result, nor at the cool judgment and accurate firing which won so complete a victory in so short a time. It seems remarkable, however, and is quite another matter, that so few were injured. In view of this event, the alarm caused by the appearance of the Vizcaya in New York Harbor last spring seems rather ludicrous, the amount of damage threatened by such a vessel on a warlike errand being out of all proportion to the childish tales set in motion at that time, and believed by a great many people. As a matter of fact, our four smaller cruisers could have taken care of the Vizcaya had her firing been as inaccurate as it was on Sunday, the 3d. Nor can guns on any ships of the present type be elevated to be effective at anything like the distance supposed. The batteries at Santiago have had a great advantage in this respect over our ships. High above the sea, one plunging shot striking the deck of a vessel would make terrible havoc if fairly delivered, while the fire from the fleet, striking short of the batteries or going over, would do and did but little harm, except by chance, and a close view of the heavy western battery shows it to be in good shape after repeated bombardments.

Monday night, the 4th, the search-lights of the fleet disclosed a vessel coming out of the harbor at Santiago, and fire was immediately opened upon her.

The Spanish attempt was plainly to sink the vessel in the channel, but under the fire of our guns her crew became confused and got her on shore, bows on, where she swung around with her stern pointing toward Morro, and broadside on to one of the water batteries. In this position two twelve-inch shot from the Texas struck her fairly abeam, fire and smoke bursting out from the effect of the shells. The Indiana also struck home with several well-directed shots, when the Reina Mercedes, for such she proved to be, heeled over and sank, her upper deck being about flush with the water, and her spars and smoke-stacks showing from quite a distance.

The Mercedes lies quite near the sunken Merrimac, whose masts and smoke-stack show above the water, but neither obstructing the channel, which, however, is narrowed considerably.

At the first opportunity we went down to see the Infanta Maria Teresa and Oquendo, which lie in a little cove a few hundred yards apart, both bows on to a hard sand beach, at the foot of high hills that come down to the sea less steeply than usual, and are separated from the water by a stretch of flat, low, grass-grown land adorned with tall cocoanut-palms. The two beaches, neither more than 300 yards in length, are separated by a bluff of precipitous rock. High and gloomy hills to the north shut in the view, while the heavy ground-swell rolls in its heavy voice against the shore. This cove, five and one-half miles from the entrance to Santiago, was most opportune for the two hard-pressed ships, as the usual coast-line is steep, rocky, and it would be impossible for ships or men to have survived for a minute the thundering breakers.

Smoke still poured from the two ships, and blew away in a thin veil against the dark hills; the surf beat along their sides, and swept in and out through the stern-ports and through shot-holes and torpedo-tubes. It was quite a climb up the tall sides of the Maria Teresa, and once in the gangway the scene that met our eyes was one of utter ruin. Bad as the ships looked from the outside, the paint all burned off, or hanging in folds where the water had cooled its farther progress, guns slewed every which way, and wire rope and tackle hanging over the side in wild disorder, the scene on deck was so much worse as to leave one speechless with dismay.

The spar-deck was nothing but an array of twisted sagging iron beams, set with copper bolts that had held the deck-planking, and now stuck up in ragged rows or bent over as the fire had left them. Around some of the broadside 5-inch guns bits of deck still remained and smouldered, sending up wreaths of pale blue smoke. Around the guns and scattered about between the smoke-stacks and ventilators were charred bodies that gave out an unpleasant odor. The forward military mast had fallen, mixed up with guns, davits, and iron plates, on the starboard side. The bridge was a mass of twisted iron and brass. Smoke-stacks and ventilators sagged, and some of the latter had fallen down entirely. There was a great hole where the magazines had been, forward and aft; they had exploded from the bottom up, in the line of least resistance, ripping the deck beams away entirely, so you could look down to the bottom of the ship, where the water swashed around. The iron deck aft was bent and twisted and buckled under the weight of the big turret and 11-inch gun. The main-deck, made of iron plates, still remained, and was covered with ashes and débris fallen from above. The forward part of the ship was full of dead, and was too hot to admit of much investigation. Sailors from the Texas swarmed over the vessel while we were there, and brought up from below rifles, cutlasses, and souvenirs of all sorts. One man had a hat full of silver money that had melted and stuck together. The hammock nettings were full of burned tin boxes that had held canned food, wine-bottles and such litter were scattered about, and from forward and aft were brought many books of a doubtful character.

There were 33 shot-holes visible above the water, and as the ship had settled aft many were hidden there by the water.

It will be possible to get the ship off, no doubt, as her hull below the water-line is comparatively uninjured, and she rests easily on the sloping beach. All her boats were gone and the davits swung out; the remaining boat-falls swayed back and forth in the wind with melancholy creaks.

The Oquendo is much more badly damaged; her keel is broken, her masts gone; she is completely gutted by fire and riddled with shot, 66 distinct holes being counted in her sides and upper works, and in her bow a ragged hole big enough to drive an ox-team through. The Vizcaya is in about the same condition as the other ships, the guns, minus breach-blocks, being about the only part of value remaining. Pontoons have already been sent from New York to raise the Cristóbal Colon, and it is hoped to get her off, her injuries being slight.

All our ships look somewhat rusty, and now that there is no necessity for guarding the port of Santiago, they will go, one by one, to Guantanamo and recoal and repaint. The ships designated for Watson's squadron are already there, engaged in preparations for immediate departure.

AGUADORES, July 11.

Sunday afternoon the Brooklyn, Texas, and Indiana began shelling the city of Santiago, taking stations off Aguadores and firing by compass at a distance of six miles. The day was rainy, and heavy clouds hung over the land, the sea streaked with rain squalls. The firing was deliberate, and the echo of the exploding shells reverberated like heavy thunder among the hills. This morning the New York, Brooklyn, and Indiana resumed the bombardment, firing in all 101 shots. Signal-men on shore kept the ships informed of the result of their firing, wigwag signals passing back and forth constantly, the signal-men ashore being in communication with the front by telephone. The Brooklyn, right near us, used her 8-inch guns, the heavy projectiles sailing over the hills and exploding with loud reports.

Most of the inhabitants had left the city, nearly 20,000 refugees having fled to El Caney, utterly destitute, and fighting for food like wolves, the condition of those remaining in the city being most deplorable, having neither food nor water, the half-starved and desperate soldiers plundering everything they could lay their hands on.

Monday afternoon General Miles arrived on the Yale, and the work of destroying the tumble-down buildings at Siboney began—a job that should have been done before the troops landed at all. Fires lit up the picturesque harbor that night, and continued during next day. A fever-camp has been established, and a strict quarantine against Siboney is now in force. The roads to the front are almost impassable, the mud being knee-deep, and the daily downpours of rain making them daily worse. So it is a difficult matter to get sufficient food to the front. The rain here is so violent as to nearly drown one, and it comes down without warning off the high hills, usually late in the afternoon, so it is impossible to get dried off before the night with its chilling dew comes down.

CARLTON T. CHAPMAN.

"PUT UP THY SWORD INTO HIS SHEATH."

WITH folded arms, my Country, speak thy will.
Clean be those hands of thine from smirch of trade.
Let the sheathed sword hang idle. They persuade
The baser course who, not content to kill,
Would carve out cantles of the spoil, and fill
The sacred edge of that victorious blade
With stain of plunder. Never was there made
The sword that could be knife and weapon still.

Thou sawest God's Angel at the anvil stand
And forge the steel. He smote it blow on blow.
Wrathful he seemed; yet ever from above
He stooped, the while, and swiftly dipt the brand
In tears, yea, tears; that he might make thee know
How vain were vengeance unannealed by love.

WILLIAM REED HUNTINGTON.

THE "GLOUCESTER'S" FIGHT.

FROM A PRIVATE LETTER BY ASSISTANT-ENGINEER ANDRÉ MORTON PROCTER, OF KENTUCKY.

ON BOARD U.S.S. "GLOUCESTER."

IT was Sunday morning—a calm, clear, hot day.

The crews were at inspection; and had a vote been taken, not one vote in the squadron would have been cast in favor of the opinion that the Spanish would ever come out.

It was like thunder out of a clear sky.

The sight of the Spanish ships steaming out was a sensation.

Of everything that happened, that first glimpse of those black, ugly-looking ships darting past Morro, and spitting out volumes of dense red flame, leaves the strongest impression.

It was a sight which comes to very few men more than once in a lifetime.

I had the deck at the time, but had hardly time to ring full speed and put the helm over before the captain was on deck.

We were to the eastward of Morro, and one by one as the ships came out we fired at them, until the last was out.

It was then that the captain did the best thing that he will ever have a chance to do. He was as cool and deliberate as it is possible for any man to be under the circumstances. He expressed his belief that the destroyers were coming, and his intention to wait for them.

It may have been seconds; it may have been ten minutes.

The fleets were steaming to the westward, and the Gloucester was waiting for her chance. At last they came, and the Gloucester had her chance—the chance for which she had been hoping, the chance to justify her existence.

When I say the Gloucester, I mean Wainwright; he is the one hero.

The Gloucester is a fine, able ship, and her crew of officers and men are a plain, ordinary lot of humans, who did just as any other lot of Americans would have done—the best they knew how; and if they were afraid, not to show it. I was on the bridge most of the time, and my admiration of him is of the kind which cannot be expressed by the ordinary methods of language.

From that point we saw only the destroyers. The other Spanish ships and our own were forgotten as completely as if they were in another hemisphere.

The fact that we were not destroyed seems attributable to a divine Providence. They fired over us and under us, ahead of us and all around us, and we received the fire of everything in sight.

The fire of the destroyers when they first came out was terrific, but they were very soon sickened.

I will not pretend that I remember what happened with any degree of distinctness.

I was supposed to be a sort of aide to the captain. I saw things and reported things to him, but in all this time the most thoroughly lucid interval that I had was when the boats were stopped—and it was at this moment that the captain made one of his strikes. Both boats showed signs of distress about the same time; volumes of steam enveloped them, and they began to act queerly, and we thought that they were trying to return. At this time our range was six hundred yards.

Just before I had seen two Spanish ships. I examined them carefully, and reported to the captain that they were coming back. Without a moment's hesitation he ported his helm and ran for the torpedo-boats. The Spanish ships were coming on, and it seemed as if they were going to pass outside of us to seaward. For an instant things looked desperate. The Spanish Oquendo and Maria Teresa were coming back, but only, as it proved, to find a safe place to beach themselves. We ran in between the destroyers, but all was over with them. The Pluton was ashore, broken in two, and soon exploded. The Furor was in a pitiable condition—riddled, strewn with dead, burning from stem to stern; she was slowly swinging in her death struggle, her engines slowly turning over, and her helm jammed a-starboard. It is a source of satisfaction to us that we saved more men than we killed. Our efforts immediately turned from death and destruction to

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

saving souls. While the forts were still firing at us, and some of our own ships were still firing from a distance at the torpedo-destroyers, three boats left the ship. Wood, Norman, and I started out for the drowning men. I made for the Pluton, picked up a boat-load, and returned. They boarded the Furor, and found a state of things beyond description. I returned to the Pluton, and attempted to board her; but the surf was too heavy, breaking over her deck. I picked up a boat-load, and then landed in a cove near the wreck. In the mean while the other boats were picked up, and the Gloucester steamed out of sight. I tried, and finally succeeded with difficulty, in boarding one-half of the Pluton, but the surf was so heavy and she was bouncing around at such a rate that I could not see much. The mortality was not great from our fire, but large numbers were drowned. I spent some time on shore—hours, I think—for I had lost all track of time. I collected another full boat-load of half-drowned and wounded, and sent a number aboard a press-boat, and started for the ship. I captured a Spanish officer, and have his pistol. I had some difficulty in launching my boat through the surf. The Spaniards are helpless, can't swim, and afraid of the water. My officer friend I had to grab by the back of the neck and throw him into the boat. Their greatest fear was lest I should leave them on the beach. Their next greatest fear was of the water.

After a pull of four miles or so I reached the Gloucester, off the wrecks of the Infanta and Oquendo. These ships were beached, and were on fire from stem to stern. This was the Gloucester's best work, but it is not my story. I missed it by being left on the beach. The Gloucester's boats saved over five hundred lives from these burning ships, among them the Admiral and a number of officers of high rank.

It has only been since this happened that I have realized the tension that we were under on that day. Hours passed like minutes. While picking up survivors, I turned and saw the Furor settle astern, rise almost perpendicular, and sink, with as little concern as I would watch a cable-car pass.

I was ashore bareheaded for hours, overboard half a dozen times, with scarcely a feeling of fatigue. I saw some horrible sights without feeling a sensation, and passed by men who might be dead in favor of others more alive with as little concern as if they had been rabbits.

The dumb, animal-like gratitude of the men taken from the water was pitiable. They wound their arms around our men's necks, and covered them with kisses. One fellow tried it on me, but I couldn't stand it, and had to repulse him.

A DIVERTING DIARIST.*

"It is something to remember, amid the bustle and bitterness of active life, that one once had youth, and hope, and eagerness, and large opportunities and generous." There is a seriousness in this graceful admission that does not sound the note of an almost uninterrupted liveliness and humorous anecdote, which is the main quality of Mr. G. W. E. Russell's Collections and Recollections. It is an unusually diverting volume, and that is something not nearly so common as we deceive ourselves into believing the case. Its authorship is not a secret, though the book appears anonymously. It is from an Englishman, a member of the House of Commons during a great part of an active life—though, by-the-by, he is not yet among the elderly men of his day. It sketches at first hand a group of notable men with whom his political career has brought him into actual personal contact; and it sets down, either in connection with these or apart from them, more new and amusing and suggestive stories, more clever repartees, more curious phases of British social life, either new or unhackneyed, than any similar printed scrap-books have included in many years. It is, in fact, rather the scrap-book than the diary—although it is generously a bundle of reminiscences of the type figured forever in Horace Walpole's Dairy, The Greville Memoirs, Caroline Fox's Memories of Old Friends, Mrs. Byrne's Social Hours with Celebrities, and a long list of classic and recent collections. The author by no means restricts himself to things that are personal to his acquaintance and time, or that have not seen print until now. But the book contains little that has not to this generation a flavor of newness, if one takes into account the endless flood of anecdotes over which we are amused, without more than a vague remembrance of having met them earlier. The author does not always cite his anecdotes quite correctly, as witness his way of telling the famous story of "Beau" Brummel's impertinence to the lady who urged him to come and "take tea" with her. But he is terse and usually literal. In incident, in repartee, and all that belongs to brief, sketchy, and varied social reminiscence from himself or others the author has compiled an absolute treasury. He has made a free chapter arrangement that permits him to group his thousand and one stories effectively. Such titles as "Cardinal Manning" (an admirable little outline portrait), "Lord Houghton," "Lord Beaconsfield," three chapters on "Conversation," and "Flatterers and Bores," "Parliamentary Oratory," and "The Queen's Accession," suggest how the mosaic is put together. It is not without a serious value, too, in the pages where one story here and another story there point out (as will nothing but anecdote point out) the emphatic progress of modern civilization, the growth of practical morality, of decency, and of education within a couple of generations. To quote one story from such a book is a foolish license, for a reader is tempted to copy out a score of things; but, illustrating how manners, so called, have been mended in high life within decade more than a century, let one read what Lord Robert Seymour wrote of a Prince of Wales's breeding in 1788, and see how pretty an idea of fun had he and his titled circle: "Prince of Wales, Mrs. Fitz Herbert, the Duke and Dutchess of Cumberland, and Miss Pigott, Mrs. F.'s companion, went a Party to Windsor during the absence of The Family fm. Windsor; and going to see a Cold Bath, Miss P. expressed a great wish to bathe, 'this hot weather.' The D. of C. very imprudently pushed her in, and the Dut. of C., having the presence of mind to throw out the Rope saved her when in such a disagreeable State from fear and surprise as to be near sinking. Mrs. F. went into convulsive Fits, and the Dut. Fainted away, and the scene proved ridiculous in the extreme, as report says that the Duke called out to Miss P. that he was instantly coming to her in the water and continued undressing himself. Poor Miss P.'s clothes entirely laid upon the water and made her appear an awkward Figure. They afterwards pushed in one of the Prince's attendants." This was the atmosphere of the Regency to a breath—its elegance and refinement in the Court. And as to justice, temperance, and righteousness, surely the Anglo-Saxon world has improved since 1788, when there were one hundred and sixty capital offences by English laws, when burning alive was a statutory penalty for forgery, when the prize-ring was the sport of male aristocracy; when lunatics in Bedlam were kept chained in their straw over each Sunday, and left without attendance; when drunkenness was almost a rule among beneficed clergy, and school-children were taken in a body to see hangings and quarterings. Of quips and drolleries in the volume an example comes in the story of Mr. Delane, baldpated and kindly, who complained to Lord Granville that he wanted to send a wedding-present to a young lady, a Rothschild. "It would be absurd to give a Rothschild a costly gift. I should like to find something not intrinsically valuable, but interesting because it is rare." "Nothing easier, my dear fellow; send her a lock of your hair." There are twenty-six chapters in Collections and Recollections, and almost every one entertains in every page. It is dedicated, by-the-bye, to the one man, so much lamented by all who knew him, who might have made a collection of as much life and fascination—the late James Payn. The gravest day and dullest mood will pass with such cheery literature.

* Collections and Recollections. By "One who has Kept a Diary." With one Illustration. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 50. New York and London: Harper & Bros.

Advice to Mothers.—Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa.—[Adv.]

NO OTHER SO GOOD.

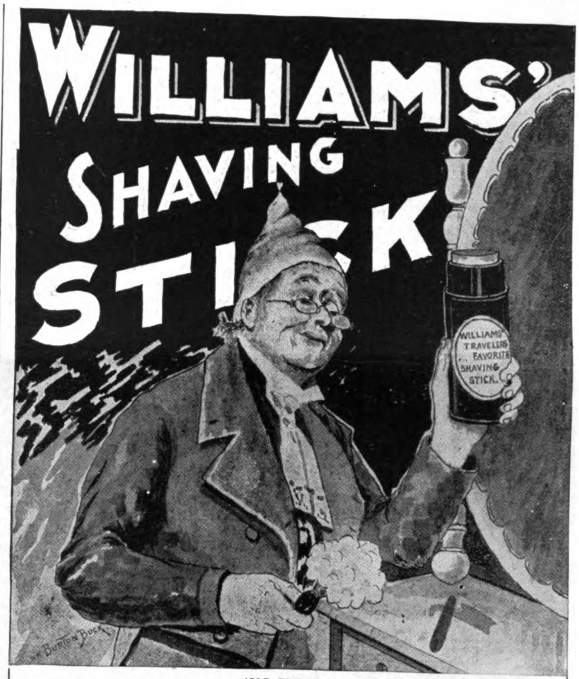
The social life of the present century creates conditions of motherhood which many times prevent the natural supply of food for infants. No so-called infant food equals the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk.—[Adv.]

Nothing contributes more towards a sound digestion than Dr. Siegert's Angostura Bitters.—[Adv.]

Abbott's—The Original Angostura Bitters—makes rich blood; blood right, good health inevitable.—[Adv.]

Use Brown's Camphorated Saponaceous Dentifrice for the Teeth. 25 cents a jar.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.



You throw away half your cigar — half the time! Why not get the full benefit of what you pay for?

Van Bibber Little Cigars

are excellent little cigars for all ordinary short smokes. They are made of the very best imported whole leaf tobacco and never vary in quality. Any intelligent smoker who will try them will adopt them as a part of his smoking outfit.

Ask your dealer for them or send 25c. (stamps) and 10 of them will be sent, in special pocket pouch, by return mail, prepaid, wherever you live.

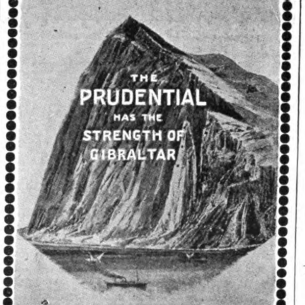
H. Ellis & Co., Baltimore, Md.
The American Tobacco Co., Successor

(OLD FRIENDS)



WILLIAMS' SHAVING STICK is a friend that filleth the heart of the shaver with joy. In a perfect shaving soap, you must have: LATHER that's Big, and Thick, and Creamy; that will soften the beard and make easy work for the razor: LATHER that's Soothing, Refreshing. These qualities have been winning friends for Williams' Shaving Soaps, for more than half a century, all over the world. "The Only Real Shaving Soaps."

Williams' Shaving Soaps are sold everywhere, but sent by mail if your dealer does not supply you.

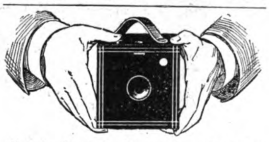
Williams' Shaving Stick, 25 cents. Luxury Shaving Tablet, 25 cents.
Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10 cents. Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50 cents.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barber's), 6 round cakes, 1 lb., 40 cts. Exquisite also for toilet. Trial cake for 2c. stamp.

THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO., Glastonbury, Conn.
London, 64 Great Russell St., W. C. Sydney, Australia, 161 Clarence St.



The Prudential
INSURANCE CO. OF AMERICA

Life Insurance for Both Sexes.
All Ages, from 1 to 70.

HOME OFFICE, NEWARK, N. J.
JOHN F. DRYDEN, PREST.

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak

Half the charm of a photographic outing is lost if one carries along several pounds of glass plates and holders and has every moment filled with anxiety for their safety.

Kodaks

use non-breakable film cartridges, which weigh ounces where plates weigh pounds.

KODAKS $5.00 to $35.00.

Catalogues free at agencies or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

BOKER'S BITTERS

The oldest and best Specific against dyspepsia; an appetizer and a promoter of digestion.
Ask your Grocer, Liquor Dealer, or Druggist.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE,

thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

Financial

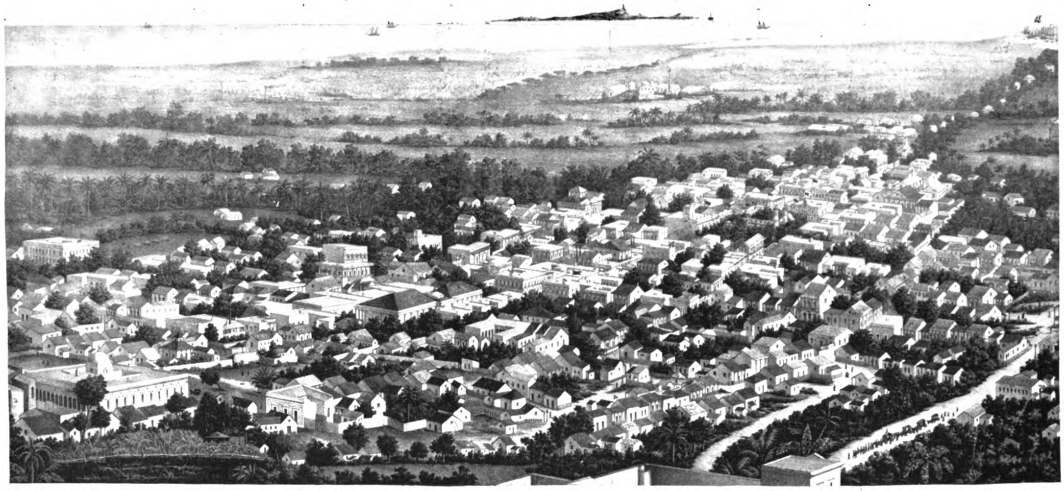
Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
Bankers, No. 59 Wall Street.

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

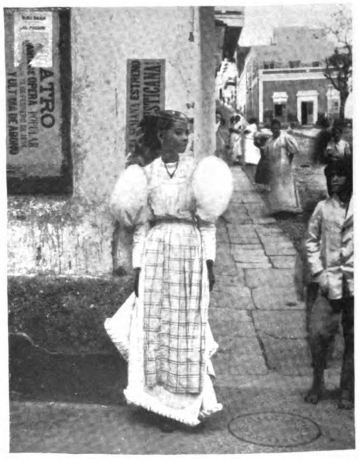
Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.
Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CONVENT OF ST. JOSEPH, SAN JUAN.

THE PLAZA, SAN JUAN.



Military Barracks. Hospital Tricoche. | Barracks of Civil Guard. Military Hospital. | Market-Place. | Catholic and Protestant Cemeteries. | Catholic Cathedral. | Protestant Church. | Hospital Madera.

THE CITY AND HARBOR OF PONCE.

NATIVE HOUSES, PUERTO RICO.

A PUERTO RICO BELLE.

IN PUERTO RICO.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PUERTO RICO AND SAN JUAN—SHOWING THE FIRST LANDING-PLACE OF GENERAL MILES'S ARMY, GUANICA, THE POINT OF ATTACK, SAN JUAN, AND THE ROAD THITHER, THROUGH YAUCO AND PONCE.—Drawn by Charles Graham.

Original from PENN STATE
Digitized by Google
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

TO THE POWERS.

SUGGESTED TEXT FOR AN OPEN POSTAL CARD TO EMPEROR WILLIAM, THE CZAR, ET AL.

WHAT shall we do with the Philippines?
Well, Europe, peep behind the scenes,
And what you see tell your marines.

Our plans, of course, are not complete;
Won't be till Merritt takes his seat,
Backed up by Army and by Fleet.

That done, we'll choose the fairest spots,
Divide 'em up in city plots,
And sell 'em off as corner lots.

And where the Spanish foe now loots
Mayhap you'll find some substitutes,
Like vaudeville and chuting chutes.

And possibly we'll take those Isles,
Whereon sweet peace so rarely smiles,
And give them to our men of wiles.

To Croker one, and one to Platt,
And one to Bryan—men like that—
So that we'll know just where they're at.

But one thing's fixed as any star:
We will not move those Islands far,
But let them stay just where they are.

We hope, dear Concert, great and square,
This answer strikes you as most fair.
If not, why—well, old Dewey's there.

JOHN KENDRICK BANGS.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

(Continued from page 759.)

General Miles has sent the following summary of troops composing the detachment of the Puerto Rico expedition under his immediate command — i. e., sailing from Guantanamo Harbor: "Four light batteries of the Third and Fourth Artillery; Lomin's Battery B. Fifth Artillery; Sixth Illinois; Sixth Massachusetts; 275 recruits for Fifth Corps; 60 men of Signal Corps, and Seventh Hospital Corps—3415 men all told." The four light batteries referred to are C and F of the Third Artillery and B and F of the Fourth. General Miles is now proceeding along the northern coast of Haiti, as appears from the circumstance that a despatch to the War Department this afternoon is headed, "On board U.S.S. Yale, Mole St. Nicholas, July 22."

Saturday, July 23.—Five troops of cavalry now at Camp Alger, Virginia, have been ordered to Newport News for embarkation on transports for Puerto Rico. These are Troops A and C of New York Cavalry, the Governor's Troop, Penn., and the Philadelphia City Troop.

The City of Rio de Janeiro sailed from San Francisco for the Philippines, with Brigadier-General H. G. Otis, Volunteer Companies A, C, D, E, F, G, L, M of the First South Dakota Volunteers, 32 officers, 669 men, 104 recruits for the Utah Light Artillery, staff officers, and clerks. Total, 50 officers, 840 enlisted men, and 10 civilians.

The following despatch to the War Department shows that the sailing of the Tampa detachment of the Puerto Rico expedition was delayed until to-day:

TAMPA, FLORIDA, July 22.

The transports Arkadia, Whitney, Miller, Clotilda, and Cherokee, with General Schwan's headquarters, sailed between ten and half past twelve to-day with two light batteries Seventh Artillery, one troop Second Cavalry, two companies Eleventh Infantry, full regiment Nineteenth Infantry, and two sections of the general pack-train. The Mohawk, which can easily overtake these boats, cannot sail before ten o'clock to-morrow. It will carry ten companies of the Eleventh Infantry, about 600 pack-animals, the brigade ambulance train, and Red Cross ambulances. JOHN I. RODGERS, Brigadier-General.

About thirty-five thousand men in all are to be sent to Puerto Rico from the several points of embarkation.

A petition to President McKinley, which has been signed by two thousand inhabitants of Santiago, expresses the hope "that the present state of affairs in Santiago, where the Spanish have still in their hands the administration and our interests, fate, and property, will be short, and that the city will be turned over to the Cubans."

Sunday, July 24.—The number of Spanish troops in Santiago province surrendering now, when notified of the fall of the city, is somewhat larger than General Toral reported. General Shafter says of those at Palma and San Luis that they "all apparently were greatly delighted at the prospect of returning home," for "they were on the verge of starvation." General Shafter continues: "And I have to send them rations to-morrow. If the numbers of troops keep up as they have, there will be about 24,000 to ship away. Nearly 12,000 are here—3000 from San Luis, 6000 from Guantanamo, and over 2000 at Sagua and Baracoa."

Monday, July 25.—Preparation for another expedition to Puerto Rico is now being made at Tampa. The three Southern regiments at that point—First Florida, Second Georgia, and Fifth Maryland—have orders to embark as soon as possible.

About 5500 men are now ready to embark at Newport News for Puerto Rico.

Brigadier-General Charles King said to-day: "It is my personal opinion that every man of the expeditionary force will be wanted in the Philippines, and will go there. Even should Manila be taken from the Spanish and the war settled in the Orient, as far as Spain is concerned, with the forces now there or already ordered to depart, it is still not to be doubted that General Merritt will be glad to have fifty thousand men before he is through with Aguinaldo."

Rumors of negotiations for peace now fill so much space in the daily newspapers that they must have a place in this diary as a part of the "news." And of course quot relatores, tot sententiæ, for in Spain you may have any answer that you expect. The Spaniard's emphasis is not upon matter, but upon manner, and he defines the agreeable man as the man who agrees. So to correspondents expecting peace, peace talk is accorded, while those who fear their livelihood would be more precarious in a "piping time" have the invincible Spanish peasant waved in their faces, so to speak. He used to be waved in Roman faces before Horace's time, but Spain became a splendid province. The most pointed of to-day's Madrid despatches says that "the Spanish government has drawn up a message proposing an armistice for the purpose of discussing the terms upon which peace with the United States can be arranged."

The popularity of the war loan is shown in a statement published to-day (when the first shipments of the bonds are being made) that there are about 300,000 persons to whom bonds will be allotted, and only those persons offering to take the bonds in small amounts (up to $4500) will receive them.

A landing at Puerto de Guanica, near Ponce, on the southern coast of Puerto Rico, was made by the military expedition under General Miles which sailed from Guantanamo Bay last Thursday. The selection of this point is referred to by the press despatches as a "surprise" to correspondents as well as to the enemy, but it will not greatly surprise readers of the WEEKLY, who recall the careful investigation made in the neighborhood of Ponce last May by Captain H. H. Whitney, now of General Miles's staff.* The landing was prefaced by a skirmish between Spanish troops and the crew of the Gloucester's launch, in which a number of the Spaniards fell.

Tuesday, July 26.—Details of the landing on the southern coast of Puerto Rico yesterday are contained in a despatch from General Miles to Secretary Alger. "Circumstances were such," the commanding general says, "that I deemed it advisable to take the harbor of Guanica first, fifteen miles west of Ponce, which was successfully accomplished between daylight and 11 o'clock. Spaniards surprised. The Gloucester, Commander Wainwright, first entered the harbor; met with slight resistance, fired a few shots. All the transports are now in the harbor, and infantry and artillery rapidly going ashore. This is a well-protected harbor; water sufficiently deep for all transports; the heavy vessels can anchor within a few hundred feet of shore. The Spanish flag was lowered and the American flag raised at 11 o'clock to-day. Captain Higginson, with his fleet, has rendered able and earnest assistance. Troops in good health and best spirits. No casualties."

The French ambassador at Washington, M. Jules Cambon, on behalf of the government of Spain, and at the request of the Spanish Minister for Foreign Affairs, presented to President McKinley this afternoon, at the White House, a message designed to open the door to negotiations for peace.

Admiral Sampson's report to the Secretary of the Navy, made public to-day, gives an account of the naval battle of July 3, outlining the action from the very moment when the head of the column of Cervera's squadron appeared (at 9.31 A.M.) to the moment when the Brooklyn and the Oregon, overhauling the enemy's best and fastest vessel, the Cristóbal Colon, "opened fire and got her range, the Oregon's heavy shell striking beyond her," and thus proving so conclusively that escape was impossible that "at 1.20 the Colon gave up without firing another shot, hauled down her colors, and ran ashore at Rio Tarquino, forty-eight miles from Santiago." The positions of all the vessels engaged are given, and the achievements (or fate) of each. An important paragraph is that in which we find both explanation of Cervera's dash in broad daylight and intimation of Admiral Sampson's plan: "I regard this complete and important victory over the Spanish forces as the successful finish of several weeks of arduous and close blockade, so stringent and effective during the night that the enemy was deterred from making the attempt to escape at night, and deliberately elected to make the attempt in daylight." The manner in which this was accomplished is described, and reports from Commodore Schley and the captains of the American war-ships are given. Altogether the document is of uncommon interest as well as of high importance, and the writing is that of gallant gentlemen.

Wednesday, July 27.—In anticipation of peace negotiations, London traders sent the price of Spanish fours up to 39⅞. Yesterday's closing price was 38¼.

General Shafter's report on the sanitary situation in Santiago: "Total sick, 4122; total fever cases, 3193; new cases of fever, 822; cases of fever returned to duty, 542."

The surrender of Guantanamo, province of Santiago de Cuba, reveals conditions there which are worse than those at Santiago before our forces, with coercion in one hand and relief in the other, took over the provincial capital. The Guantanamo troops are literally starving, and there are two thousand sick.

Thursday, July 28.—A detachment of the Puerto Rico expedition, under command of Major-General Brooke, sailed from Newport News.... At San Francisco the First Battalion South Dakota Volunteers, and recruits for Colorado and Minnesota regiments, embarked for Manila on the transport St. Paul.

Madrid newspapers protest against the continuance of hostilities by the United States "after Spain has sued for peace," and the following statement is attributed to Prime-Minister Sagasta, in a despatch to a London newspaper: "We resolved upon peace many days ago, and made known our resolution to the United States. I regard as null and void and as destitute of good faith everything the Americans have done since. I am ready to formally protest [to the powers]." The fact is that there were no overtures for peace of which the State Department at Washington was officially informed, before the visit of M. Cambon, Tuesday afternoon. The suggestion then made by the French ambassador was not of such a nature that it could be regarded as a warrant for stopping the war. Peace must wait upon the acceptance of conditions which have not yet been proposed, or even formulated; and it is not at all plain that a truce, too easily obtained, would advance the much-desired conclusion. M. W.

* See HARPER'S WEEKLY, June 25, 1898.

PARIS.

THE FRENCH PRESS AND THE WAR.

June 24, 1898.

THE Spanish war throws an interesting light on those astonishing organizations known as French newspapers. Whether, as has already been said by the WEEKLY, in their recent attacks upon us they have reflected true French feeling, does not concern us in the least. We need to care what Continental Europe may say about us only in case unfriendly sympathies are strong enough to lead those who entertain them into a hostile attitude towards the United States. But we are asked to believe that apparently almost the entire press of a country is not to be taken seriously; and, as a matter of fact, any one who has lived in Paris for many years, as I have, in touch with all sorts and conditions of men, knows that the press is not to be believed, and that the amount of credence to be placed in almost any paper may be estimated in inverse proportion to its importance and the number of its sales. This is a paradox worth looking into, especially as a time might come some day when it would be useful to us to know how to go to work to get a printed sentiment which the French themselves would avow.

To judge at all of French journals we must look at the principles underlying them, the first of which is, naturally, to make them pay. Every French paper has three sides —the coté administratif, or business side; its reportage, or news; and what is called grand journalism, those brilliant articles signed by well-known names which are famous the world over. All papers have at their head a group of politicians who are not only of a party, but the nuance of a party, and many of them have secret funds from the government. As the French do not understand advertising, that is not a source of revenue; and the business interests of the paper are maintained by a certain profession of faith called its politics, determined almost entirely by its capacity for making money.

Drument, for instance, makes La Libre Parole pay by popularity gained by dragging the government and the Jews through the mud. The campaign he leads is not only anti-Semitic and socialistic, it is distinguished by the nuance of Catholic socialism. Everything that is not Catholic—such as the American war against Spain—is against Drument. As the socialistic working-man who buys La Libre Parole must be regaled with strong language, the result is the violent and vulgar insults that have been heaped upon the American people.

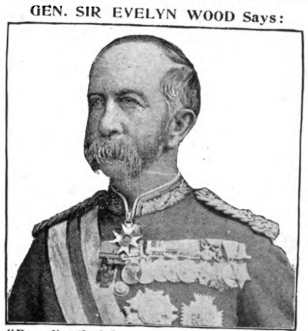
Other people buy Drument to see what Drument is saying. He is a personnage and a man to read, even while but few take him seriously. Outside of his leaders, the paper is nothing but a journal of affairs, filled up with no matter what, provided it be strong. The French are so used to hearing the heads of their own government characterized as gredins, crapules, fripouilles, in such papers as La Libre Parole, that what these turbulent organs said of another government left them indifferent, until they found that such utterances were precisely the ones most translated and commented on by their enemies and on the other side, and that they were taken seriously by the American people.

No French paper, politically, represents anything more than a certain shade of a certain sentiment of a certain party. The Figaro, the Gaulois, and the journal of M. Cassagnac, L'Autorité, which have a combination with the extreme royalists among the nobility, must support a Catholic and royalist government in Spain for political and business reasons at the same time that these papers are bought by the largest part of their readers for their literary criticism, their signed articles—for anything but their politics. Rochefort, who has been hurling invectives against the government since the time of the Empire, makes no more impression for us than the others against us, because his republicanism implies also communism, whither few are inclined to follow him, the socialism of France lying outside of the lines of L'Intransigeant. The men of weight in French papers are the "grand journalists" like Jules Lemaître, for instance, entirely outside of the political business affairs of the various organs.

Outside of the exaggerations of the newspapers, for political reasons, a certain mild sentiment against the war has existed all along in Paris among people of all shades of opinion; very much such a feeling as one encountered at first among Americans who had been long away from home, and upon whom the immediate settlement of the Cuban question by arms fell like a thunder-bolt from a clear sky. With the French, setting apart their interests in Spanish bonds, it came from the fact, as an Englishman intimately connected with diplomatic circles said to me, that they are the peace-makers of Europe. The key to the Dreyfus affair was their dread of complications that might bring on war. The very word of war, in a country where almost every man is a soldier, is a terror to them. It brings up the dreadful and poignant souvenirs of 1870—the invasion of the country, the incessant roar of the cannons advancing on Paris, the ambulances gorged with wounded too numerous to be cared for, the cold, famine, and crushing defeat. "From the New World we looked for progress towards peace," is the substance of what I have heard a hundred times from men of weight, "and you have taken the worst thing of the old régime."

All the French asked was to be allowed to go on peacefully to the end of the century and have their exposition, when we suddenly brought them face to face with the most disagreeable thing known to their consciousness. It is French instinct to put aside, if possible, the painful side of serious things, which is the direct consequence of that sensibility, which is their greatest charm.

The change in their feeling is not only for commercial reasons, and because of Mr. Chamberlain's speech, but because the serious element of the French people at large has looked the war squarely in the face, instructed itself, and learned to understand us better. As I said in the beginning, it is a matter of small moment to us what the sentiment may be, but it is nevertheless well to do a certain justice toward the nation that sent us Lafayette, that has most generously thrown open all the advantages of its schools to the student officers from our navy free of charge, and has given us proof of friendship in numberless ways. ALLEN SERGEANT.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

NEVER HAS ANYTHING BEEN SO HIGHLY AND SO JUSTLY PRAISED AS

VIN MARIANI

MARIANI WINE, the FAMOUS TONIC for BODY, NERVES and BRAIN.

GEN. SIR EVELYN WOOD Says:

"Regarding the infantry marching in the recent manœuvres, it was the best seen during my command at Aldershot. Many officers availed themselves of the tonic and reconstituent properties of the well-known Mariani Wine, the most certain as well as the most palatable method of inducing resistance to fatigue."
From "The London Sketch."

MAX O'RELL,
The Renowned Writer and Lecturer, Writes:

Your Vin Mariani is positively marvellous; one glass put me on my feet; one bottle made a new man of me.
Yours gratefully, MAX O'RELL.

ALL DRUGGISTS.
PARIS: 41 Boulevard Haussmann. LONDON: 83 Mortimer Street.

MARIANI WINE is invaluable at this season of the year, when, owing to trying climatic conditions, the system is especially susceptible to attacks of debility and prostration.

VIN MARIANI (MARIANI WINE) has stood the test of thirty-five years' trial. It has written endorsements from more than 8000 American physicians, in addition to having received cordial recommendations from royalty, princes of the Church and of the State, and many notable personages.

MARIANI WINE is a tonic prepared upon careful scientific principles. It contains absolutely no injurious properties. It gives power to the brain, strength to the entire nervous system, firmness and elasticity to the muscles, and richness to the blood. It has been aptly described as a promoter of good health and longevity.

MARIANI WINE is specially indicated for General Debility, Weakness from whatever causes, Overwork, Profound Depression and Exhaustion, Throat and Lung Diseases, Consumption, Malaria and La Grippe.

MARIANI WINE is an adjuvant in convalescence and a powerful rejuvenator. For Overworked Men, Delicate Women, Sickly Children it Works Wonders. Taken with cracked ice, it relieves Summer Prostration quickly and effectually. It soothes, strengthens and sustains the system.

To those who will kindly write to MARIANI & CO., 52 West 15th Street, New York City, will be sent, free, book containing portraits with endorsements of Emperors, Empress, Princes, Cardinals, Archbishops, and other interesting matter.

AVOID SUBSTITUTIONS.
MONTREAL: 28-30 Hospital Street.

Pepsalt...

is the best of table salt, into every grain of which is incorporated digestive substances natural to the stomach. Fill your salt-cellar with Pepsalt and use it in place of salt at your meals. If you have indigestion your stomach does not supply the necessary amount of the dissolving or digestive juices. Pepsalt taken in place of salt at your meals makes good this deficiency, as you take with every mouthful of your food a similar substance to that which is required and at the right time, and your indigestion is a thing of the past. Send for sample in salt-shaker bottle and try it.

Price 25 cents, postpaid.

THE VAUPEL SAMARITAN CO.
45 Sheriff St., Cleveland, Ohio.

Indigestion Has No Terrors For Him
That salt-shaker is filled with Pepsalt

PEPSALT CURES AND PREVENTS INDIGESTION

What Is It?

Why, the most delicious and exquisite

Natural Champagne

Fermented in the bottle. Excels in health-giving properties. Ask your dealer for it, or address

The New Hammondsport Wine Co.
Hammondsport, N. Y.

To more thoroughly introduce our productions, we will deliver at any point in the United States east of the Rocky Mountains having an express office, one assorted case containing twelve bottles as follows: One pint each of Golden Age, Beef Iron and Wine, and Cognac Process Brandy, and nine quart bottles of assorted Still Wines, making 1 doz. varieties, on receipt of address accompanied with $6.00.

No 4711 ESSENCE OF

Rhine Violets

No 4711

The highest degree of refinement.—Wonderfully delicate and lasting.—Absolutely true odor of the living flower.—Be sure to get the "No. 4711."

Sole U. S. Agents

MÜLHENS & KROPFF
NEW YORK

The Club Cocktails

MANHATTAN, MARTINI, WHISKEY, HOLLAND GIN, TOM GIN, VERMOUTH, AND YORK.

A COCKTAIL MUST BE COLD TO BE GOOD; TO SERVE IN PERFECT CONDITION, POUR OVER CRACKED ICE, (NOT SHAVEN) STIR AND STRAIN OFF.

G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., SOLE PROPRIETORS,
39 BROADWAY, NEW YORK, HARTFORD, CONN.
AND 20 PICCADILLY, W., LONDON, ENGLAND.

A NEW POCO.
The Folding Gem.

The neatest, smallest, most carefully built of all the low-priced cameras. A marvel of compactness weighing one pound, and only an inch and a-half thick, closed. Automatically locks itself as proper focusing distance. Closes by touching a spring.

TAKES A PICTURE 4 x 5
As perfect at edges as at centre.

COMPLETE, $7.00.
ROCHESTER CAMERA CO.
43 ELIZABETH ST., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

WAR BOOKS

"ALL HANDS." Pictures of Life in the United States Navy. By RUFUS FAIRCHILD ZOGBAUM. Large 4to, Cloth, Ornamental, Full Gilt, $5 00.

HORSE, FOOT, AND DRAGOONS. Sketches of Army Life at Home and Abroad. By RUFUS FAIRCHILD ZOGBAUM. With Illustrations by the Author. Square 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

THE UNDER SIDE OF THINGS. A novel dealing with army life at Tampa, Dry Tortugas, and Fort Hamilton. By LILIAN BELL. 16mo, Cloth, $1 25.

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION. By BENSON J. LOSSING. 1100 Illustrations. 2 Volumes. Royal 8vo, Cloth, $14 00; Three-quarter Leather, $15 00; Half Calf, $18 00.

PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE WAR OF 1812. By BENSON J. LOSSING. With 882 Illustrations. Royal 8vo, Cloth, $7 00; Three-quarter Leather, $8 50; Half Calf, $10 00.

THE STORY OF THE UNITED STATES NAVY, for Boys. By BENSON J. LOSSING. Illustrated. 12mo, Half Leather, $1 75.

NAVAL ACTIONS OF THE WAR OF 1812. By JAMES BARNES. With 21 Full-page Illustrations by CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, printed in tint or color, and 12 Reproductions of Medals. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, Deckel Edges and Gilt Top, $4 50.

ARMIES OF TO-DAY. By General WESLEY MERRITT, Lord WOLSELEY, and Others. Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $3 50.

FIFTEEN DECISIVE BATTLES OF THE WORLD; from Marathon to Waterloo. By E. S. CREASY. 12mo, Cloth, $1 00. (New Edition.)

BOOTS AND SADDLES; or, Life in Dakota with General Custer. By ELIZABETH B. CUSTER. With Portraits of General Custer. 12mo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 50.

OTHER BOOKS BY MRS. CUSTER:

FOLLOWING THE GUIDON. Illustrated. Post 8vo, Cloth, $1 50.

TENTING ON THE PLAINS. Illustrated. Post 8vo, Cloth, $1 50.

NEW YORK AND LONDON
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers

RICH, PURE FLAVOR.

Perfectly Matured and Mellow.

WEAR
COLUSA

FOR SALE AT FURNISHING STORES OR ON RECEIPT OF 25¢ IN STAMPS FROM H.C. CURTIS & CO.
TROY, N.Y.

CHEW
Beeman's

The Original
Pepsin Gum

Cures Indigestion and Sea-sickness.
All Others Are Imitations.

KLONDIKE NECESSITIES

A SMITH & WESSON Revolver may be of more value than a bag of gold-dust. Take one with you.

Our catalogue of heavy calibres mailed on application.

SMITH & WESSON,
15 Stockbridge St., Springfield, Mass.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

| | Per Year | | Per Year |
|---|---|---|---|
| Magazine, | $4 00 | Bazar, . | $4 00 |
| Weekly, . | 4 00 | Literature, | 4 00 |
| | | Round Table, | $1 00 |

Summer Resorts

LONG BEACH

Long Island
LONG BEACH HOTEL
INN AND COTTAGES
Finest Beach and Bathing
near NEW YORK CITY
Cuisine and Service Unsurpassed
45 minutes from New York via L. I. R. R. Express trains and unexcelled Railroad service. Accommodations for Bicycles.
LIBERAL RATES FOR SEASON GUESTS
Long-distance telephone No. 273 A, Long Beach.
A. E. DICK, Proprietor.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

A PARTY OF RUFF-RIDERS.

THE official tests by the Agricultural Department of the United States Government show the Royal to be a pure baking powder, superior to all others in leavening strength.

It therefore makes purer, more wholesome and economical food than any other baking powder or leavening agent.

Royal Baking Powder is more convenient for use than cream of tartar and soda and makes finer-flavored food.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

A delicious drink and a piquant relish.

Vigoral

"Concentrated Beef"

Represents all the nutriment and flavor of prime roast beef in a condensed form. It builds up the invalid. Strengthens the convalescent.
Our Chafing Dish Recipe Book sent upon request. It gives fifty ways of using Vigoral.
ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

"A PERFECT FOOD—as Wholesome as it is Delicious."

Walter Baker & Co.'s

Breakfast

Cocoa

Trade-Mark.

The Standard for Purity and Excellence....

Costs less than one cent a cup.

Our Trade-Mark on Every Package.

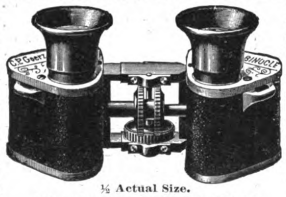
Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.
DORCHESTER, MASS.
ESTABLISHED 1780.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Upholstery.

Velour Glacé,
Tapestry Silk Damask,
for Curtains and Furniture Covering.

Real Lace Curtains.



Arabian, Marie Antoinette, Brussels and Renaissance.

Tamboured Lace and Muslin for Sash Curtains.

Broadway & 19th st.
NEW YORK.

Joseph Gillott's
STEEL PENS.
GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889,
AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.
THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

WONDERFUL TRIËDER BINOCULARS

½ Actual Size.

Prices Range from $44.50 to $72.50.

C. P. GOERZ, 52 Union Sq. (East), N.Y. City

Have 8 to 10 times the power of the best of the old-style field and opera glasses.

Pocket size—invaluable for Army and Navy, War Correspondents, Race Meets, Regattas, Travel, and the Theatre.

Send for Descriptive Catalogue. For sale by leading jewelers and opticians throughout the United States. Among them:
New York—Theodore B. Starr, F. G. Schmidt, Gall & Lembke.
Brooklyn—I. B. Hoecker, 312 Fulton St.
Chicago—C. D. Peacock, Spaulding & Co., Hyman, Berg & Co., N. Wattry, H. Borsch.
Philadelphia—Queen & Co., Bonschur & Holmes, Williams, Brown & Earle.
Washington—Franklin & Co., Moore & Leding, D. N. Walford.
Boston—Pinkham & Smith.
St. Louis—A. S. Aloe Co., Erker Bros.
San Francisco—Hirsch & Kayser, Henry Kahn & Co., Geo. H. Kohn.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,
BANKERS.
ESTABLISHED 1873.
2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.
Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.
Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.
A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.
Correspondence solicited.

CHICKEN

NOVEL MEXICAN DELICACY.

Minced chicken, highly seasoned with Mexican spices, and wrapped in corn husks. Unique, delightful. At grocers, or ½ pound can mailed for 10¢ in stamps. Booklet sent on request.

TAMALE

ARMOUR PACKING CO.
DEPARTMENT H
KANSAS CITY, MO. U.S.A.

TRADE C & W MARK
EARL & WILSON'S
LINEN
COLLARS & CUFFS
BEST IN THE WORLD.

MAGIC LANTERNS WANTED AND FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE.
HARBACH & CO. 809 Filbert St. Phila. Pa.

Books for Lovers of Nature

By CAROLINE A. CREEVEY

Flowers of Field, Hill, and Swamp. Illustrated by BENJAMIN LANDER. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 50.

Recreations in Botany. Illustrated. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 50.

By WILLIAM HAMILTON GIBSON

Illustrated by the Author.

Eye Spy. Afield with Nature among Flowers and Animate Things. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 50.

My Studio Neighbors. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 50.

Our Edible Toadstools and Mushrooms, and How to Distinguish Them. With Colored Plates. 8vo, Cloth, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, $7 50.

Camp Life in the Woods, and the Tricks of Trapping and Trap-Making. Square 16mo, Cloth, $1 00.

Pastoral Days; or, Memories of a New England Year. 4to, Cloth, Gilt Edges, $7 50.

Highways and Byways; or, Saunterings in New England. 4to, Cloht, Gilt Edges, $2 50.

Happy Hunting-Grounds. A Tribute to the Woods and Fields. 4to, Cloth, Gilt Edges, $7 50.

Strolls by Starlight and Sunshine. Royal 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Edges, $3 50.

Sharp Eyes. A Rambler's Calendar of Fifty-two Weeks among Birds, Insects, and Flowers. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

THE OUANANICHE. And its Canadian Environment. By E. T. D. CHAMBERS. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, $2 00.

FIELD-FARINGS. By MARTHA MCCULLOCH WILLIAMS. 16mo, Cloth, Ornamental, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, $1 00.

WASTE-LAND WANDERINGS. By C. C. ABBOTT. 12mo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 50.

CITY BOYS IN THE WOODS. By HENRY P. WELLS. Illustrated. Square, 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $2 50.

By ERNEST INGERSOLL

Country Cousins. Short Studies in the Natural History of the United States. Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

Friends Worth Knowing. Glimpses of American Natural History. Profusely Illustrated. Cloth, $1 00.

Knocking Round the Rockies. Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York and London

"AMERICA'S GREAT RESORTS," 48 pages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent stamp by GEORGE H. DANIELS, G. P. A. New York Central, New York.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PRINCE OTTO EDUARD LEOPOLD VON BISMARCK.

BISMARCK AND HIS PEOPLE.

TO know Bismarck, one must not seek him at Friedrichsruh, which, after all, is but a show-place, nor lay too much stress on a knowledge of his public doings, heralded by the press of all the world off and on, nor assume that a study of his Hamburg newspaper organ gives a clear insight into his character at this stage of his career.

It is true, one may catch him in his shirt sleeves at the country-seat near Hamburg, and "catch him tripping" at those minor public occasions as well as in his editorial work, but for all that we see only the official Bismarck—official, though without office—not the Bismarck who in his innermost heart confesses to the homo sum of the true philosopher.

The Bismarck as he is, is only to be met with at Varzin, the feudal estate in far-off Pomerania, which the Prince bought with the money raised by grateful citizens.

Starting from Berlin, it takes from twelve to fourteen hours' journeying to get there, and this probably explains the fact why the multitude of people who make it their business to write about the ex-Chancellor collect their material anywhere but at Varzin; it also accounts, no doubt, for Bismarck's sans façon way of living at this lonely tusculum.

The route leads through a bleak and almost desolate country, the ancient margravinate of Brandenburg, into the former dukedom of Pomerania, fully as cheerless and destitute as the other.

After eight hours' weary ride, interrupted by innumerable stoppages at stations where it was impossible to get anything beyond stale beer and the national black bread and herring, we arrived, towards five o'clock P.M., at Schlawe, a little town some few miles from the East Sea. There we were transferred to a branch line, a special passenger-car containing a first-class carriage being attached to a freight train for our benefit. Our miseries were, how-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google ever, not yet ended, for after three-quarters of an hour of crawling along, the train halted with a jerk in the thick of a forest, and the conductor came to tell us that we had arrived at Zollbrück, and were to again change cars for Hammermühle, terminus of the branch. After another hour of slow torture, that place was reached. There was no regular post-chaise to Varzin, but, luckily for us, there was a special mail delivery on that day, arranged for the benefit of Prince Bismarck and his guests, and we were allowed to ride to the village in a springless cart loaded down with packages and letter-bags.

It was nearly eight o'clock, when, in view of the first houses of Varzin, and as our cart was just swinging around the corner into the village street, the driver sharply drew in the reins and said, "There comes his Grace; I nearly ran into him."

True enough, there were the historical boar-hounds, racing along, barking and howling, and close behind them an open barouche of heavy make, drawn by two immense chestnuts. On the right sat a tall, broad figure, enveloped in a plaid to ward off the drizzling rain that had been falling for an hour or so. Now he raises his slouch-hat before the strangers in the mail-wagon, and in the twilight we recognize Bismarck.

Our driver did not attempt to follow in the Prince's wake until the rattle and clank of wheels and hoofs and the hounds' barking had thoroughly died out. Only then we entered upon the lanternless road, at the further end of which the inn was situated. Such an inn! Like a mediæval stronghold, it was surrounded by a pool of greenish water. A woman, milk-pail in hand, introduced herself as the landlady.

After a supper of eggs and potatoes, the cheese was impossible, and a night on feather beds, the feathers of which had not been "cured," we awoke betimes, and after a hard struggle for a tub of water, indulged in a hasty breakfast of bread and milk, which we found in the lower room. We had about finished, when our hostess and a man in a white cap and apron broke in upon us, and seeing us feasting, cried out: "They have eaten the rolls of our gnädiger Herr! What shall we do? What shall we do? Ah, and they have drunk his cream!"

We were informed that Prince Bismarck was the only person in Varzin indulging in the luxury of white bread, especially made for him by the woman's husband, the baker. These people were also bound by their contract of tenancy to save their cream for his Grace. All we could do was to offer a monetary equivalent for the damage done. Then we started upon a tour of the village.

Varzin, like most Pomeranian hamlets, consists of one street only, with the manor-house marking the upper terminus, and the premises of the head keeper (in this case the Oberförster—master of the forest) at the other end. The houses of the tenants are in every respect low, slovenly, and neglected, and, like our hotel, surrounded by a pool of stagnant water, collected from the refuse of the stables, the kitchens, and occasional rain showers. A single plank serves to bridge the chasm between the road and what is generally used for sidewalks—here a sloppy mire, in which numerous ducks and geese take their pleasure. These fowls are everywhere in the village. Here we find them waddling Indian file, or grouped in veritable battalions, a hundred heads strong, in the middle of the roadway; there they compel little children to seek shelter with their mother, or march unceremoniously through the passages of houses, peeping into the very rooms for prey. Some five minutes' walk from the manor-house there is a small lake literally covered with these birds.

The houses of the post and school masters are noteworthy exceptions to the prevailing carelessness, and the former makes quite a pretty picture of rural simplicity.

Being advised that Prince Bismarck was never visible before eleven o'clock, we took our time in looking about.

From the village we turned our attention to the manor-house or castle, whose yards and outbuildings reach down to the street, flanked at that point by poplars on both sides. It is probably due to the aristocratic notions of the founders of the estate that the residential buildings turn their back upon the village. The approach, covering nearly half an acre of ground, leads over a slight incline fortified with cobblestones, very trying to a city man, and between a succession of stables, which for all the world look like a number of the village cottages joined together. The yards and sheds appeared to be deserted, and not until we reached the newly built annex did we encounter a living soul. And this belonged to no less a personage than Dr. Chrysander, the Prince's reader, medical adjunct, and quasi-secretary.

The doctor is a tall slim man with a strange, raggy beard all around his face. The report of our visit and intentions evidently had preceded us, for he at once volunteered the information that "Prince Bismarck was not in the habit of receiving strangers at Varzin." For this piece of intelligence we were duly thankful, but having confidently expected the rebuff so promptly put forth, proceeded on our errand without further parley.

The annex already mentioned is a severely plain two-story-and-basement brick structure with plaster facings, and, like the rest of the buildings, yellow-washed. On the entrance floor is the secretary's office, containing a few pieces of rough furniture, besides two large tables, usually loaded with newspapers, which Dr. Chrysander has to read and mark for the benefit of his master. This room connects by a corridor with Prince Bismarck's own bedchamber in the adjoining manor-house, where his Grace receives the doctor's press reports and his mail immediately on awakening, and while taking his tea in bed. The Princess also has her room on the ground-floor, the whole of which is devoted to the old people's use. The fact is Frau von Bismarck, who in her husband's affectionate letters figures as such a robust and lively woman, is nowadays so crippled by old age as to be incapable of ascending stairs. The upper floor of the manor-house has been given over entirely to the Prince's children, grandchildren, and occasional guests.

We walked past the Prince's private stables and car riage-sheds, forming a sort of inner court with the rear of the manor and annex, and entered the park expanding in front. There a really pretty picture met our eyes. The greater part of the front is covered by a creeper, and mighty trees rise on all sides. The flower-beds facing the house are laid out tastefully without being artificial in design. There are no rare plants, no elaborate china vases, there is no evidence of the hot-house or the landscape-gardener's art. Everything is natural, simple, homelike, a lovely spot that any good housewife might keep in perfect order. The park covers many acres, finally to merge with the forests and fields belonging to the estate. Bismarck, standing on the roof of his house, might turn his face to the north or south, to east or west, and exclaim, with Monte Cristo, "The world is mine as far as the eye travels."

PRINCE BISMARCK AT VARZIN.

With exploring the nooks and corners, the shady avenues, and fenced meadows where the colts are kept, the time had passed speedily, and it was nearly twelve o'clock when an attendant from the castle announced that the Prince was about to take his usual morning stroll, and would be pleased to see us in the avenue leading to the spring. This spring is situated in a hollow near the house, and is credited with containing a certain amount of mineral matter. His Grace takes a glass of the water whenever he goes for exercise. Just now a man-servant was coming from the spot with a tumbler in his hand.

He had no sooner disappeared into the side entrance of the house when the boar-hounds came bounding along the avenue, followed by their master and Count Herbert. A young lady—the daughter of Baron von Merckh of Hamburg, as I afterwards learned—was trying to catch up with them.

The two tall men formed a splendid object for the instantaneous camera we were carrying.

"Ah!" cried Bismarck, when within hearing distance, "that is what I call a photographic attentat! Never mind; I have endured worse cases of assault."

The boar-hounds meanwhile had succeeded in reversing our private opinion about their alleged ferocious selves. They are splendid beasts with silklike bluish-gray coats, and as docile and amiable as kittens. They thrust their snouts into our hands, and otherwise tried to belie the bad name given them by politicians and reporters to whom their master had denied himself. The Prince said he had been advised we were neither political scandal-mongers nor persistent interviewers. "You come from London," he added; "well, what is the latest from across the Channel?"

We gave some instances of public life and doings, in which his Grace seemed much interested, and then branched off into literature, mentioning, among other things, the forth-coming English edition of some well-heralded memoirs.

"Yes, yes," said the Prince, "the memoirs of the great offer the most interesting study for those coming after us."

"And your Grace is credited with being engaged on the most memorable of them all."

"They credit me with a good many things—my friends and my enemies alike," answered Bismarck, with a knowing smile and a shrug of the shoulders, "but I assure you I have nothing ready."

"But you are preparing memoirs, are you not?" I persisted.

"I thought you were not an interviewer," said the Prince, somewhat seriously, and at once turned the conversation into other channels by inviting us to take a good look around his farm.

"This is a healthy country," he continued, pointing his stick in the direction of the broad expanse of woods and meadows before us. "I always feel quite young when stopping at Varzin, and would indeed be thoroughly contented with my lot if my wife were in better health."

These last words were uttered in a voice of almost womanly tenderness. The great man evidently felt deeply concerned about his Frau, as he called the Princess.

We were told by him that her Grace was losing strength all the time, and that since the beginning of the year she had been unable to attend to her household duties, in which she was so much interested.

"She is deprived of the best tonic Varzin offers, poor woman"—these were the fond husband's own words—"exercise in the fresh and bracing air. That's what keeps me so well. I am almost constantly out-doors—"

"Rain or shine," I interrupted, "as we observed last night, first thing after our arrival."

"Was that you?" gasped the Prince, with an amused twinkle in his eye. "Oh dear! oh dear! and in the open mail-cart too! Surely you are not stopping at our local hotel?"

We settled his mind on those points, and, in his turn, he congratulated us on our "passion for self-abnegation and self-sacrifice."

Walking along towards the fields, Bismarck indulged in the little pastime peculiar to his late master, Kaiser Wilhelm I., asking about our homes, parents, and studies. Of America he spoke with much warmth, dwelling on her inexhaustible resources of nature and the successes of her government.

After a while he bade us adieu, shook hands heartily, and repeated his invitation to make ourselves at home.

It is almost needless to say we followed his advice. In doing so we had the good fortune of again meeting the great man, when a party of ladies and children from one of the neighboring seats waited on him in the afternoon. He appeared as pleasant and cheerful as in the morning, and even displayed a certain amount of gallantry as he took the flowers offered by the fair donors. (See illustration.)

Bismarck's daily life at Varzin is of the simplest; there is no ceremony of any kind; he is hardly regarded as a Prince or a great man at all. The estate he occupies has been for hundreds of years in the hands of the lesser nobility, that is, persons endowed with the almost vulgar privilege of affixing a "von" in front of their family name. The old serfs called their masters and mistresses Gnädiger Herr and Gnädige Frau respectively, and this custom prevails among the tenants of the present day, in spite of the fact that their landlord's name and title are recorded in the Almanach de Gotha, Part II.

From all I hear and see, Bismarck is not an exacting master. He walks, drives, and rides among his quasi subjects with the nonchalance of a city man, accepting their reverence where it is freely offered as part and parcel of his station, but never insisting on any prescribed formality to another's discomfort. There was a time when, upon his arrival in his domain, the cottages appeared in all the glory of fresh whitewash and greens, when flags were hoisted and the tenants donned their best; but learning by personal application that he, the master himself, paid for this joyous display, either directly or indirectly, the Prince gave strict orders that such demonstrations should be discontinued. Although very fond of farming, and the general business and prerogatives of the feudal land-owner, he never interferes directly in administrative matters, and thoroughly abhors to treat with his tenants upon monetary affairs. If any of them has a grievance, or desires a release or loan, he must address himself to the Oberförster.

The tenants may be thorough Germans, as they claim, but in their appearance and manners cannot deny their Sclavonian origin, their descent from the old Kassuben, that Wendish tribe notorious in western Prussia for sluggishness, boorishness, and general dislike to water. Their wages are meagre, as the soil they till is poor, but they have a roof over their heads, plenty of potatoes, black bread, and herrings to eat, and even a little money for schnapps. The men earn from 40 to 45 pfennings per day (4 pfennings equal 1 cent), the women 30 pfennings, aside from free land, dwelling, and wood. Any extra hand in a household (aside from man and wife) receives 75 pfennings daily wage. This is the average pay for rural labor in Pomerania. The Prince pays neither more nor less than any other landlord; if he did go above the average, he would only foster drunkenness among his people.

We heard the Prince's own statement regarding his health, and it only remains to say that his looks and manner bore out his words.

Having lost his embonpoint under the skilful treatment of Professor Schwenniger, he appeared even taller than in the days of his glory; being unhampered by arduous duties and the thousand and one vexations of office, his temperament had softened and his natural cordiality had returned.

Did he look like a disappointed man?

Far from it. To the unprejudiced he appeared as one taking his comfort—and taking it in the most decided and deliberate fashion at that. And who knows but that the evident discomfort of his chief enemy does not materially contribute to his enjoyment of perfect ease?

HENRY W. FISCHER.

VARZIN, October 10, 1893.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PRINCE BISMARCK.

On the 1st of April, 1815, there was born to a quiet Prussian squire of Schönhausen, in the province of Brandenburg, a son, who was destined to make the name of Bismarck more famous than that of any statesman or ruler of his time. It was the year of Waterloo. Prussia, was a subordinate member of the German Bund, of which Austria, under the House of Hapsburg, was the acknowledged chief. Exhausted by the efforts it had made in the Napoleonic wars, the ruling House of Hohenzollern conformed its foreign policy to that of the Diet of Frankfort, which was the maintenance of a mild but steady inertia on the part of the Bund, believed then to be necessary to the maintenance of the "balance of power" in Europe. Little did the proprietor of Schönhausen dream that his second son was one day to convert the loosely joined, inert body of petty German states into a vast German Empire, instinct with the vital force of nationality, deeply influencing, and often dominating the destinies of the continent, and strongly affecting those of the whole world.

Certainly nothing in the life of Bismarck for the first thirty years gave sign of his splendid future. He passed through the common routine of the education of his time and class, but made slight use of the opportunities it offered. It is even disputed whether the late Chancellor of the German Empire ever passed the state examination, which is in his country a condition precedent to public employment. In college he was famous only for his wild life, his numerous duels, his skill in swimming and in horsemanship, and enjoyed as well as earned the title of flotter Bursche, a "jolly student." Leaving the university, he adopted rather than practised the profession of law, travelled frequently, took his turn in the landwehr, and gained a lieutenant's commission, but finally, at the age of twenty-four, with his elder brother, Bernhard, took charge of the family estates in Pomerania, with a residence at Kniephof. Here he succeeded in management, but led the social life of a wild country squire—a mighty hunter, a deep drinker, ready at feast or fight, known to the neighboring garrison as "the mad Bismarck" (der tolle Bismarck). A dozen years passed in this fashion, at the end of which he won the love and the hand of the Fräulein Johanna von Putkammer, in despite of much natural reluctance on the part of her parents.

Urged by his brother, who was alone in thinking that Bismarck was "by inclination and natural disposition made for the public service, and that sooner or later he must engage in it," he secured an election to the Diet of Saxony, and as deputy went, in 1847, to the first United Diet of Prussia. He immediately took a prominent place in the front rank of the ultra-conservative party. He attacked the Radicals and even the Liberals with tremendous energy, and quickly made himself noted for the vigor and freedom with which he announced his extreme views, and the trenchant and bitter sarcasm which he rained on his opponents. He held that nothing should be demanded of the King, and everything left to his Majesty's goodness; and to the claims of a democratic orator of Berlin, he savagely declared that "all the great cities ought to be destroyed and razed to the ground as the eternal homes of revolution and constitutionalism." Of constitutionalism, which he held in great contempt, he said that it was only la démocratie endimanchée (democracy in Sunday clothes). He had little respect and less taste for parliamentary life or methods. It was not by debate, he thundered, in one of those bursts of eloquence which occurred in his usually awkward oratory, that the decision could come between authority and revolution; "that decision will only come from God, from the God of battles, when he lets fall from his hand the iron dice of destiny."

His course won him some attention from the king, Frederick William IV. In December, 1848, he was elected from Brandenburg to the Second Chamber of the German Diet under the new constitution, and showed himself still not only an extreme conservative, but an ardent partisan of the supremacy of Austria. At this time he took a passing part in journalism, and wrote for the Kreuz Zeitung, whose motto may, more justly than would at first appear, be regarded as the one he followed through life: "Mit Gott für König und Vaterland" ("With God for King and Fatherland"). He sustained the ministry even in its humiliating concessions to Austria at Olmütz, and was, in May, 1851, sent as first secretary of the Embassy to the Diet of Frankfort, where, a few months later, he was made ambassador. He thus entered on a diplomatic career which was of immense service to him, though every instinct of his imperious and fiery mind revolted against it. Two things in his experience at Frankfort, which lasted eight years, are of special note. One was the intimate and lasting friendship which sprang up between him and the Count Gortschakoff, the future Chancellor of the Russian Empire; the other was the prompt perception at which he arrived of the unfitness of Austria to be the leader of Germany, with the conviction that it was within the duty and the power of Prussia to take that post. As ambassador, with indomitable perseverance, he bent his energies to the task of undermining the Austrian influence, and instilling into the minds of the leaders of Prussia an idea of her possible future.

But his part was still relatively modest, and the interest of the record of this period of his life, for which his letters to his beloved sister, the Countess von Arnim, ten years his junior, furnish ample material, lies in the racy and piquant pictures of the diplomatic world and the actors in it. In 1858 the mind of the King of Prussia gave way, and his brother, afterward the Emperor William I., was declared Prince-Regent.

In the change of Ministry which followed, Bismarck foresaw his possible dismissal, and regarded it with his usual rude philosophy. He "would retire under the guns of Schönhausen" and watch. "The prospect of a fresh and honest struggle," he wrote, "without any official shackles in political bathing-drawers (if I may say so) has nearly as much charm for me as a continued régime of truffles, despatches, and grand crosses. . . . With my simple wants I am independent; and if God keeps my wife and children in good health, I say vogue la galère! whatever the waters may be."

The "waters" on which Bismarck's ship was to set sail were to be changed; but he was far from being retired, or allowed to retire. He was sent as ambassador to St. Petersburg, where he arrived April 1, 1859. He remained at the Russian Court three years. During that time he cemented yet more closely the friendship with Gortschakoff—one of the most remarkable in the history of statecraft—and made many valuable connections with Russian leaders of politics and society. He labored earnestly to prevent Prussia from siding with Austria in the Italian war of 1859, and was incessant in his representations to his government of the necessity of a change in the relations of Prussia to the German Confederation. In one of his letters at this time occurred the forerunner of the famous phrase "blood and iron." "I perceive," he wrote, "something defective in our position in the Bund, which, sooner or later, we shall be obliged to repair ferro et igni unless we submit it in time and at a favorable opportunity to serious treatment." His efforts, however, were practically in vain. Prussia failed to arm in the cause of Austria only because that power, with fatal insolence, demanded that the troops so offered should be under the command of the Austrian generals; and King William listened with interest and admiration, but without acting upon them, to the vigorous ideas of his ambassador. Bismarck fell sick and was deeply discouraged. "I seem," he wrote in January, 1862, "like a sick circus-rider," but he would "go on doing his duty in a homespun way." He would like to go to Paris: the "climate would suit the children better"; but "sickness comes everywhere, and misfortunes too. With God's help one withstands them, or bows in submission to His will! locality has nothing to do with it." He had been spoken of as Minister; he was "downright afraid of the post as of a cold bath."

Again Bismarck's theatre of action was to be changed, but his rather sombre view of his future was not to be justified. William I., now become King (January 1, 1861), had so far yielded to the views of Bismarck—with which, indeed, in this regard, he warmly united—as to place General von Roon in the War Office, with orders to bring the army to the highest perfection as rapidly as possible. Bismarck was brought from Russia and sent to Paris preliminary to his appointment at the head of the Ministry. In this brief interval he saw Napoleon III. at Biarritz, made a rapid journey to the south, from whence he wrote fascinating letters to his wife and sister, visited London, where he made the most lively impression, and returned to take his place as President of the Ministry September 23, 1862. His aims were very clear in his own mind, but the task of their accomplishment was herculean. He proposed to himself nothing less than a united Germany under Prussia, from which Austria was to be expelled, possibly by peaceful means, probably and even preferably by force. The first step was the strengthening of the army. The Chamber obstinately refused it. It was dissolved, and the work went on without its sanction. The Minister was intensely unpopular, and was bitterly denounced for usurpation. He foresaw possible revolution as a consequence of his action, but he did not shrink. He only hastened the events which were to make revolution impossible. He strengthened himself on the side of Russia by a cruel offer of aid in crushing Poland, and in return obtained Russian neutrality in his plan for the dismemberment of Denmark. In this he enlisted Austria, and the two powers seized the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein under the sanction of the German Diet, for the professed purpose of securing satisfaction for the German elements in the population. But Austria had no sooner assumed her share of the joint occupation and administration than Bismarck proceeded to pick a quarrel with her, and to come to an understanding not only with her natural enemy, Italy, but with Napoleon III., her natural ally. Space does not allow the tracing of the complex and crafty negotiations by which the French Emperor was induced to withhold his hand. Bismarck's course was astute and unscrupulous. In June, 1866, the Emperor's intimates at Paris were discussing what should be claimed of one and the other party to the impending war to aggrandize France. On the 2d of July Bismarck wrote to his wife from the bloody field of Gitschin: "The ground is still heaped up with corpses, horses, and arms. Our victories are much greater than we thought. . . . Send me some French romances to read, but not more than one at a time."

The "French romance" which he had read completely, and to which he had furnished the prodigious dénouement, was the one in which Napoleon III. had dreamed of a Europe in which his word should be decisive, and in which Bismarck had been pictured as a "wild diplomat," who could be made useful to France. The "Seven Days' War" closed before the fortress of Königgrätz; Austria was expelled from the Bund; Hanover, Hesse-Cassel, Nassau, Hesse-Homburg, the Duchies of Schleswig-Holstein, the free city of Frankfort, and the principality of Hohenzollern were joined to Prussia, while the remaining states of Germany were embraced in the "North German Confederation," of the armies of which Prussia was to have the command. The instrument was finally ratified on the 16th of April, 1867.

The next three years were devoted by Bismarck, who became Chancellor of the Confederation, to consolidating its powers at home and adjusting its relations abroad. France, under the guidance of the Emperor, was bitterly disappointed, chagrined, and sullen. Bismarck foresaw that the necessities of the Emperor would impel him to seek a foreign war, and strove, on the one hand, to win him to some sort of understanding which should turn his armies away from Germany, and, on the other, to prepare for the worst if war must come. His efforts in the first direction failed; in the second they were supremely successful. The splendid triumph of his policy with reference to the Confederation had given him something like autocratic power, and every particle of it was devoted to perfecting the army, under the sagacious lead of von Roon and von Moltke.

In 1870, Napoleon, sore pressed by the "party of action," and desperate at his failure to win to his support the Liberals, whom he had sought to conciliate by the constitutional changes made through the Ollivier ministry, seized upon the incident of the nomination to the throne of Spain of Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern to make demands on Germany, which were repelled, and followed by a declaration of war. It has been often asserted that Bismarck entrapped the Emperor into this quarrel. The public records do not sustain the statement. If he did so, he had the consummate art to make every authentic document support the opposite view. The weight of testimony is that Napoleon rushed blindly upon his fate, deceived by his advisers, more deeply deceived by himself.

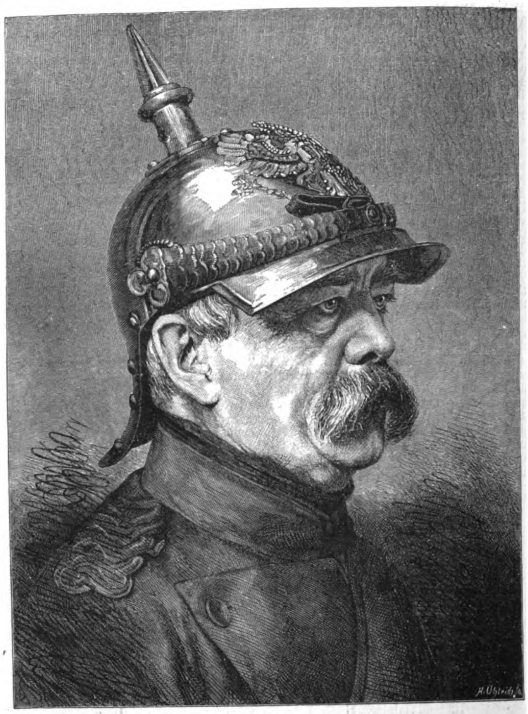
Bismarck accompanied the armies to the field, and for many months the government of Germany was guided from the headquarters of the King. The result is fresh in the minds of our readers. Bismarck's "instrument," as he had called the army, worked to the amazement and admiration of the world. In January, 1871, Napoleon was a prisoner in Wilhelmshohe; the best army of France was locked in Metz; Paris was prostrate under the German guns; and King William (January 18th), in the stately palace of Versailles, assumed the title of Emperor of Germany. In the next month the preliminaries were signed of that treaty which gave Alsace and Lorraine to the new empire and poured a thousand millions of dollars into the German treasury. Bismarck was made a Prince, and, naturally, Chancellor of the German Empire, while he retained his position as first Minister of Prussia.

The years that followed the great war, by the fiery trials of which the various and varying elements of German nationality were roughly but incompletely fused, were nearly twice as many as those of Bismarck's previous career, but they did not strengthen, they hardly sustained, his reputation as a statesman. Two great problems presented themselves urgently—the consolidation of the imperial political system, and the maintenance of the power and influence of the empire in Europe. With the second the Prince was able to deal, for there was no one in public life in any country who was nearly equal to him in force, in foresight, or in the skilful handling of individual men. Slowly and gradually, but with increasing success, he established the position of Germany as practically the arbiter of Europe. He limited her function to the preservation of the peace, but he assumed that that function involved her possession of the best and strongest army that her resources could supply and the most effective alliances that she could form. The first "triple alliance," as it was commonly called, was the fruit of that masterly policy by which Russia had been prevented from interfering in the struggle with France, and it was not until the influence of Bismarck had begun to wane that any serious approaches were made between the republic and Russia. This alliance was followed by the replacement of Russia by Italy, which was the only alternative after Russia became "impossible." It was a much weaker combination, and there is evidence that Bismarck would have preferred to keep Russia as an ally, and take Italy as an enemy and an ally of France, had he been allowed his choice. Whether the long-latent prejudice against Russia and the hostility bred by the contact of the two peoples along their border were too strong for him it is difficult to say, but the change came, and Bismarck has never ceased to express his regret for it.

In the course of his efforts to consolidate the political system of Germany, Bismarck came in conflict with the Papacy through the reactionary and separatist sentiment of the German Catholics fostered and guided by the priesthood. This led to the famous Kulturkampf—an attempt by law to diminish the power of the priesthood by restricting the privileges of the Pope, and extending those of the imperial government in the organization of the higher offices of the Church in Germany. It was a long and heated struggle, lasting from 1872 to 1886, but in the end, by the concessions of the latter year, Bismarck was substantially defeated. The almost passive but unyielding resistance of the Church was, in the long-run, invincible to the aggressive and arbitrary methods he employed.

Nor did the great Chancellor succeed in forming any permanent party in the imperial legislature on which he could rely. He gained his points when he did gain them, by a series of shifting combinations; one section after another acting now in his support, and now against him. The one thing that he accomplished was the steady development of the military force of the empire, though he failed to maintain that complete executive control of the treasury as to this object, which was one of the cardinal points of his policy, and several times he brought Europe to the very verge of war to force his army measures through. Meanwhile his strength in the Reichstag was in great part secured by the adoption of a protective tariff, which hampered the development of the national resources, and ultimately became a source of grave political weakness. He also undertook a system of colonial expansion in the South Pacific and in Africa, by which he hoped to turn the tide of German emigration, stimulated by the intolerable exactions of the military system, to lands where the German flag should cover and the German government control the young men who would not remain at home. It has been a very costly experiment, and though it is too early to pronounce it a failure, its success has been very limited so far.

After the death of the old Emperor William there was a belief that Bismarck would not retain his full influence with Frederick, the successor, whose inclinations were known to be toward a much more liberal policy. But Frederick's premature death brought disaster to the Prince from quite different causes. The present Emperor, quite as absolute as Bismarck's ideal required, did not see in Bismarck the safest, much less the sole, guide for the exercise of his power. He had ideas of his own, particularly with reference to winning the affection of the laboring classes and binding them to the throne, which the Prince could neither restrain, modify, nor tolerate. After the curious defeat of the government in the elections of February, 1890, Bismarck offered his resignation. Possibly to his surprise, and certainly to his deep chagrin, it was accepted as brusquely as it had been tendered. He retired to his estate at Varzin. He soon reentered public life as a member of the Reichstag, but his course was almost without influence upon the great empire he had, in one sense, created. It was one of peevish opposition, sometimes coming sadly near to being unpatriotic. He soon withdrew to private life almost wholly, and appeared to the world only as a bitter and spiteful, though still a strong old man.



It is impossible to doubt that he will pass into history as by far the greatest of his class of public men in his time, or, with the exception of Napoleon, of the nineteenth century in Europe. His private life, the purity and tenderness of his family relations, his simple and unaffected piety, will always redeem in part what there was cruel and even monstrous in his public ideas and actions. His monument will be united Germany, but it is practically certain that the verdict of the future will be that he was unequal to guiding, in harmony with the tendencies of his age, the tremendous force that he had called into being, or, what is worse, to permitting the German nation to develop itself in harmony with those tendencies.

EDWARD CARY.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

BISMARCK IN 1847-8.

BISMARCK ABOUT 1876.

BISMARCK AS CHANCELLOR, 1878.

BISMARCK AS CHANCELLOR, 1884.

BISMARCK ABOUT 1880.
From the painting by Franz v. Lenbach, photographed by the Photographische Union, Munich.

BISMARCK IN PORTRAITURE.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

Vol. XLII.—No. 2173.

Copyright, 1898, by Harper & Brothers.
All Rights Reserved.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 13, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

WHO IS THE CRIMINAL?

COLUMBIA TO UNCLE SAM: "THE GOVERNMENT MUST FIX THE RESPONSIBILITY, OR THE COUNTRY WILL."

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, AUGUST 13, 1898.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

This Paper is the best Pictorial History of the War with Spain, as it was of the War of 1861. Its Special Artists and Correspondents have followed the Army and Navy, and notable Events in Washington and elsewhere have been accurately portrayed.

Messrs. RUFUS F. ZOGBAUM and T. DART WALKER are at Puerto Rico, Messrs. FRANK D. MILLET, JOHN F. BASS, and O. K. DAVIS are in Manila or on their way thither, and Mr. HAROLD MARTIN is at Santiago.

AN appalling state of affairs called forth the letter from Colonel THEODORE ROOSEVELT and the round robin of the general officers of General SHAFTER'S army. Colonel ROOSEVELT says that the officers and men at Santiago are in danger of dying "like sheep"; that if the men are kept in Cuba "over half the army" will die. "This," he adds, "means ruin, from the stand-point of military efficiency, of the flower of the American army, for the great bulk of the regulars are here." He also says, "Not ten per cent. are fit for active work," and he writes "to avert a doom as fearful as it is unnecessary and undeserved." This is a terrible revelation, and an arraignment of the War Department the force of which Mr. ALGER will not succeed in breaking by printing a private letter which Colonel ROOSEVELT naturally supposed he was writing to a gentleman, and by reproving ROOSEVELT'S pardonable enthusiasm for his own command. Mr. ALGER must remedy the wrong which has evidently resulted from his indifference to the needs of the brave men whose courage alone saved the honor of the nation, or he and his memory will be execrated by his countrymen to the end of time. Moreover, the President himself is in danger; and if he continues to stand by his Secretary of War, after the latter's carelessness and incompetence have been proved, he will have to share the odium. The round robin signed by the general officers of the regular army is an extraordinary document. Soldiers such as these men have shown themselves to be do not engage in such a movement unless they are driven to the verge of desperation. They say that "the army is disabled by malarial fever to the extent that its efficiency is destroyed, and that it is in a condition to be practically destroyed by an epidemic of yellow fever, which is sure to come in the near future." They add: "This army must be moved at once or perish. As this army can be safely moved now, the persons responsible for preventing such a move will be responsible for the unnecessary loss of many thousands of lives." Here is the situation succinctly and vigorously expressed. The soldiers that have fought our battles are threatened with death, while the authorities at Washington are contemplating the use of the transports in which the suffering men might be carried to Montauk Point for taking unneeded volunteer soldiers to Puerto Rico purely for the gratification of local pride. The War Department must bring General SHAFTER'S army home at once, and this can be done if it will display the energy which marked the preparation for the expedition. For every death resulting from unnecessary detention of the army in Cuba the Secretary of War is responsible.

MR. E. T. HOOLEY has failed as a company-promoter, but he has succeeded splendidly in shocking the British public into one of those fits of moral indignation whose periodic recurrence it regards as the proper thing. This time the shock is felt in a tender spot—respect for the peerage. Mr. HOOLEY saw the advantage of titled dignitaries as officers and directors of his companies, and in order to get them he had to pay for them. It was a costly bargain, and the cash details came out during Mr. HOOLEY'S examination as a bankrupt. Lord DELAWARR received $125,000; Lord ALBEMARLE, $62,500; Lord WINCHILSEA, $50,000; and other noblemen were paid smaller sums, the total expenditure amounting to more than half a million dollars. The disclosures will certainly not tend to strengthen British belief in the nobility as in any special sense the depository of honor, though cooler heads will reflect that such purchasable persons as DELAWARR and the rest are very poor representatives of the British peerage. An example of more shameless venality—in fact, of downright rascality—was given not long ago in the case of JABEZ BALFOUR, a middle-class company-promoter, and supposedly pious Non-conformist, who looked upon fashionable life as born of Satan, but who used his unctuous reputation to cheat the confiding poor without stint. The incident only confirms the familiar truth that roguery of this sort is found among all classes; but noblesse oblige will soon become an obsolete phrase if the HOOLEYS and their kind are able to continue such work. It should be added that one of the implicated peers has since denied that the money received was for influence, and asserts that it was for services rendered.

THE terms proposed by the President as a basis for peace negotiations are hard, but not harder than were to have been expected. The question of the Philippines has been left open, and we think this an error, at least in this, that the President should have renounced any intention to take the islands for the United States, holding them temporarily merely with a view of protecting the rights of their people. So far as our own interests are concerned, they will be promoted by refusing to undertake the government of these islands, or of Luzon or of Manila alone. Annexation is favored by a few persons who regard commerce in sugar and tobacco as possessing a claim on our government superior to considerations of national honor or to those of our republican tradition. Some men whose imagination is warm and whose judgment is inactive agree with these trading souls. There are others who want us to imitate Europe, but who do not understand precisely what Europe is doing in the way of colonizing, or what it is suffering by reason of its efforts. These are our annexationists, and the President would have done well to disappoint them in advance. Now he leaves the question open for politics; and while we believe that the expansionists will be beaten by the people, if we are to have a fair discussion, no one can predict wisdom on the part of the Senate. It is significant that the Indiana Republicans at their State convention last week did not demand territorial expansion. Spain is evidently ready to take our terms, whatever they are, because she must, and peace is assured. But peace may bring us heavier burdens than war, if we are unjust and ungenerous, or too greedy for our own welfare.

THERE is a growing instead of a decreasing or even halting interest in favor of a good and friendly understanding between Great Britain and the United States. In a large way this is as it should be, for not only are the interests of the two peoples much the same, notwithstanding their diametrically opposite commercial policies, but, what is greater still, their conception of the rights of the individual and of his liberty is the same. By all means the two nations should be friends, and the best way to promote such a friendship is to adopt a general policy of arbitration. It would do more for the advancement of Christianity in the world if Americans and Englishmen should agree never to fight each other without first submitting their difference to peaceful arbitration, than if they should agree to fight together against each other's enemies. The latter agreement may be well on occasion, but the first is good and wholesome all the time. We are now in a fervor of friendship, and so are the Englishmen. It is a time when we need to recover command of ourselves. It must be borne in mind that the English have a foreign policy which must be carried through, and which ought to be carried through with a much stronger hand than Lord SALISBURY'S. It is England's interest that we should acquire territory in the Pacific, because then we would probably have to fight her cause in China. Shall we take the Philippines, where expenses are bound to be out of proportion to revenue, and which will continue to be the home of alien and largely of savage peoples, in order that we may protect England in China against Russia and France and Germany? No English friend of ours thinks we ought. Many English friends of ours think that England herself would be better off if Russia or France or Germany, instead of the Chinese, controlled the lands now under the nominal sway of the Emperor.

WHO is responsible for the medical and sanitary conditions prevailing at Santiago de Cuba? The stories that come to us from the field of battle and from the transports coming North with the sick men of the army are heart-rending. We know that the lack of medical appliances, of medicines, of ordinary comforts, of doctors and nurses, was criminal. We know that if it had not been for the Red Cross Society, conditions would have been more murderous than they actually have been. But who is responsible? Whoever it may be, the severest punishment will be mild compared with the wrong which he has inflicted on our soldiers. At the very outset of the expedition from Tampa the wrong began. Whether sufficient medical supplies for the army were taken or not, not nearly enough reached the front. We are told that a sufficient supply was forwarded, and that a sufficient supply of good and nourishing food, including canned soups and fresh meat, was actually shipped on the transports to Santiago, but we know that the soldiers never had them. Who is to blame for this? Who is to blame for leaving needed supplies behind at Tampa? Who is to blame for not giving the soldiers what was actually on the transports at Siboney? Is it the Surgeon-General, or the Quartermaster-General, or the Commissary-General, or is it General SHAFTER? Who is responsible for the horrors of the transports that have brought back the stricken soldiers? Did General SHAFTER really forbid the captain of the Concho from getting a fresh supply of water to take the place of that which had been in his ship since last May? There is nothing more sickening than the story of the Concho, except it be that of the other transports. It is the story of men sick with fever, crowded into noisome holes, drinking foul water, without necessary medicines. And these sick men are the soldiers who have fought our battle, the soldiers of the richest and most resourceful nation of the world. There is another story, too, that of wounded soldiers on the field of battle without surgical aid, and that of other wounded men walking miles and miles to the rear for doctors and hospital, some of them surviving, and all of them displaying the heroism of martyrs. The campaign of Santiago illustrated the magnificent virtues of the American soldier, but it gave an opportunity to some careless criminal, to whom justice should be done. Who is he?

HOW FAR SHALL WE GO?

THE foreign policy of the United States has been changed. Our government has already become a colonial power by the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands, it is doomed to acquire Puerto Rico, and to hold Cuba for some time to come, and the question is whether it shall go on in its career; whether, to use the modern phrase, it shall become a "world power"—in other words, whether it shall imitate absolute powers like Russia and Germany, or that curious democracy of France, which, in its foreign policy and in its military system, is so much like an absolute power as to be hardly distinguishable from its neighbors. There is, be it understood, no disposition on the part of our politicians to follow the example of Great Britain in establishing free democracies in the temperate countries of the world. So far as the colonial experiences and policy of England furnish any precedent for the course in which we have entered, it is to be found in her rule of India and the crown colonies. In other words, we are beginning an experiment which has failed whenever or by whomsoever it has been undertaken. It is not true, of course, that we are to repeat the experience of England in this country, for we are not to attempt to rule our own people without their consent, or to monopolize their trade to our own expected gain and to their certain loss. We have undertaken the government of distant and alien peoples, whose customs, manners, morals, religion, habits of thought, are utterly different from our own. In undertaking similar experiments, the nations of Europe, including Great Britain, have succeeded in establishing expensive military posts and naval stations. Spain's experiment is at an end, and we are picking it up where she was compelled to drop it, having abundantly proved her wretched incapacity. That we shall give to all the old Spanish dominions which have come within our power a better government than Spain has given them goes without saying. It is impossible for an American to be so cruel and so oppressive as Spanish officials habitually are, and it would be equally impossible for the most dishonest of our politicians to be so rapacious as Spanish captain-generals have been. American government can never become so corrupt or so indifferent as to turn a plunderer like WEYLER, for example, into rich colonial pastures in order that he may satiate his ambition on the money that he may extort and steal from the subjects of his country. But we must nevertheless expect to be disgraced abroad by the politicians who will seek and obtain colonial offices, just as we are shamed by them at home—at least until, in the remote future, Congress shall yield to a public clamor that is sure to become violent before it attains its object, and shall establish a colonial service offering rewards to able and honorable men.

We are no longer at the parting of the ways.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

We have chosen our path, and we have only to decide how far we shall walk in it. We must govern Hawaii and Puerto Rico, and we must hold Cuba until its people establish a stable government. Shall we go on acquiring, or shall we stop with what we have until Congress has shown its capacity for colonial government—at least until it has established a system and enacted necessary laws? Our experience with Congressional government of the Territories and of Alaska does not encourage us to believe that this new experiment will be a brilliant political success, at least until we become more careful in our selection of Congressmen. Alaska, it must be remembered, was purchased more than thirty years ago. The power of Congress to govern it has never been questioned. Some of the newspapers have recently been expressing wonder and surprise at a decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals in California, in which is set forth the liberal power of Congress over territories belonging to the United States. But the decision is merely a restatement of decisions of the Supreme Court, several of them as early as the chief-justiceship of MARSHALL. The truth is that the power of Congress over territory outside of the States is practically unlimited; but, so far as Alaska is concerned, it has been exercised so unintelligently and with such lack of diligence and interest that Alaska is still almost without government. The explanation of this is, of course, that Congressmen are too much devoted to the material and pecuniary interests of their districts and of influential private citizens to care for law and justice generally. If there is money for any one in proposed legislation for a distant colony, we may expect the enactment of a law; if the proposed legislation merely contemplates the welfare of the colonists, the establishment of a just and equitable rule over the subjects of the republic, we may expect to wait for many years before Congress will become sufficiently interested to consider the measure seriously and to establish the law. And even then the personnel of Congress must be greatly improved if our subjects are to have a competent and wise body of laws. At least our experience with Congress justifies us in expecting a halting, feeble, incomplete, and inefficient government of our colonies. The improvement that will take place in the government of Puerto Rico and of Cuba will be due to the superior character of the administration which the Spanish-ridden people will enjoy.

We start out in our colonizing career absolutely without experience, without a system, without the machinery necessary for colonial government, and with a Congress and under a condition of politics which suggest grave doubts of our ability to govern wisely. Already we are catching a glimpse of the future through Hawaii. The Americans who live there, many of whom were born there, are competent to carry on the government of the islands. However much we may dislike the manner in which Mr. DOLE came to the Presidency of the so-called republic, he is evidently a competent man, and he enjoys the confidence of the minority which has dominated the islands. But the moment annexation was assured, Mr. DOLE seems to have been dropped as a possible head of the local government, and politicians, notably Mr. HAROLD SEWELL, of Maine, began to pull wires for the first governorship. In other words, we are apparently about to apply the worst features of our politics to these distant lands, and the natives and residents of them are about to become dependent upon Congress for law and justice. In view of the history of the past, have we not enough material for the new experiment? Before taking on other territory, ought we not to insist that Congress shall learn its task of colonial government with what we already have on hand? Many years are to pass before that task is to be properly learned; much bitterness of conflict and vast expense are to be endured by our patient people before we shall be proud of our colonial governments. So much trouble is to be ours, we fear, that it is a matter for sincere rejoicing that we have for contemplation and remembrance the splendid examples of the essential virtues of American manhood given by the army and navy at the threshold of the test to which the American politician is to be put.

There are other considerations which may well give us pause. The question of expansion is no longer one of principle with us; it has become practical. Will it pay this country to take the Philippines, for example? We think not. Indeed, it is clear that many years must elapse before any of our colonies will begin to pay. We are in the position of one who has purchased a landed estate which must be developed before it will begin to make return of revenues. We must at once greatly increase our army and navy for the defence of the territories which we already possess. The necessary annual expenditures for our army are now in the neighborhood of $25,000,000. This does not take into account the cost of new fortifications. Our new acquisitions necessitate an expenditure for the army of at least $60,000,000 a year. If we take the Philippines, we shall be compelled, according to Admiral DEWEY'S estimate, to maintain a large force for their defence against the natives. Most of the islands really govern themselves. Their people are savages, who have never heard of Spain, much less of the United States. We should probably leave them in their present condition, undertaking only the government of Luzon and a few of the larger islands. But we would have to hold our possessions by force of arms. Are we willing to expend from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 a year for soldiers for the Philippines alone? Then we have the navy to consider. Not counting the cost of new ships, the maintenance of the navy costs the country about $20,000,000 a year. We shall be obliged to add, say, $10,000,000 to this for the defence of our new outposts. If we take the Philippines, our naval expenditure must be doubled. In other words, to the ordinary yearly expenses of the army and navy we have already added $45,000,000 at least; and the question is whether, for the sake of holding three or four of the Philippine Islands, governing an unwilling people, we shall take upon ourselves, in addition to our present expenditure, an annual burden of from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000, besides an annual expenditure of from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 for an indefinite number of years for the construction of new ships and new forts.

These are questions to be considered gravely and thoughtfully before we take on more territory than we have now acquired. For ourselves we believe that, so far from being of value to us, the Philippines will be a constant source of trouble, a constant threat of war—of war from which we will derive nothing that we cannot have now without war by the simple process of keeping on good terms with the powers among whom China is to be ultimately divided. But, moral and remote causes aside, ought we not, in common prudence, to refuse to undertake the government of the Philippines at a cost entirely out of proportion to their full value; and ought we not to be content with our present possessions until we learn how Congress is to carry on its task in Hawaii and Puerto Rico?

BISMARCK AND GERMANY.

NOBODY will dispute that the Germans have a right to be proud of BISMARCK. He was so typical a German, and he avoided so many of the defects that commonly go with the German qualities. He was under no illusions, sentimental or otherwise, about the world he lived in. He knew the levers that move men, and he knew how to operate them. His direct, practical businesslike methods were rather English than German. Not since FREDERICK the Great has there appeared a German in high place who showed so perfect an adaptation of means to ends.

But it is necessary, in appraising his achievements, to consider the ends for which he wrought. To admire a display of force, as such and unreservedly, is to fall into a dangerous state of mind. BISMARCK-worship is such an unreserved admiration, just as NAPOLEON-worship was. We are at a distance from NAPOLEON, which enables us to appraise exactly his achievements. We see that "they have become void of effect, and the affairs of the world return to their former level." Will it be different with those of the only other man of the nineteenth century who is worthy to be named with him as an example of sheer personal force?

Nobody has thought or will think of praising BISMARCK as a friend of humanity. He himself would have been the first to reject such a pretension. The epitaph he composed for his own tombstone shows in what light his life appeared to himself. He was a "faithful German." That he was a patriotic German, according to his lights, cannot be doubted. His life-long desire was that his Prussia should be aggrandized, and the great work of his life was the bringing of all Protestant Germany, including even some states which are not nominally Protestant, into one powerful confederation under the primacy of Prussia. His efforts were crowned with a great success. United Germany is his work. He was the only man who can be said to have been indispensable to its accomplishment. Even now, looking back over a generation, it is hard to see how the union could have been brought about if BISMARCK had not been. The dreams of the "ideologists" could not have been realized without this "business man." From his own point of view his success was unmixed. He found his country not higher than fifth in the list of European powers. It would be hard to find a "good German" who would admit that he has left her even the second.

This was not a success that came of any of the modern political forces that have come into the world. It was not the result of free discussion or of constitutional government. It was a success of "blood and iron." It was a success of diplomacy, too, in the Bismarckian sense. No statesman ever knew better how and when to appeal to the interests or even the sentiments of others, nor, when it suited him, to manage their susceptibilities. But in the last analysis German unity was achieved under BISMARCK by the same means by which the Prussian monarchy was built up under FREDERICK, by having not only the best-disciplined army, but the best-disciplined nation in Europe. The scattered principalities were welded into one powerful empire by the same means by which the great empires of history were established.

It was not to be supposed that a statesman whose method had achieved such a success would abandon it when the success had been achieved. And, in fact, the German Empire under BISMARCK followed the traditions of the Prussian monarchy. He could skilfully cajole the leaders of parliamentary opposition. But in the last resort he governed by force, which it never became necessary for him actually to use. The knowledge that he possessed it was enough both for him and for those who opposed him, and opposition was not carried beyond the danger-point. "The consent of the governed" was of no more necessity in BISMARCK'S scheme of politics than in Julius Cæsar's. Accordingly, paternalism took the place of individualism, and took the form of "state socialism." What in more modern communities are held to be the rights of the people came to them in BISMARCK'S Germany as "graces" from the throne. He was anxious to allay popular discontent in every way except the one needful way of admitting the right of the people to govern themselves. When it came to that, he always let it be understood that the army was at the door of the Reichstag. Accordingly, individualism was repressed; paternalism was substituted; and in respect to political civilization, the last state of the German people is worse than the first.

It was the irony of fate that BISMARCK himself should have perished at the hands of the monster which he had built up. There is a human pathos in his appeal to the constitution and to public opinion against the masterfulness of his young "master," but there is also a political retribution. The Kaiser treated this appeal, when it was made by BISMARCK, as BISMARCK had taught him to treat it—as BISMARCK himself had been accustomed to treat it when it was made by the representatives of the German people. The world at large is under no debt to BISMARCK. It is not better or freer or happier because he has lived in it. What even Germany owes to him it must be left for the future to determine, but it is already plain that against this debt there are heavy offsets and abatements.

In spite of the enormous space he filled in his own time, and of the enormous force he displayed, he can scarcely be ranked among the great men of the world. The measure of the greatness of these men was the extent of their "co-operation with the real tendency of the world." The measure of BISMARCK'S strength was the extent to which he succeeded in obstructing this tendency. The most powerful champion of reaction is not a great man. He is only a "big fellow."

DIARY OF THE WAR.

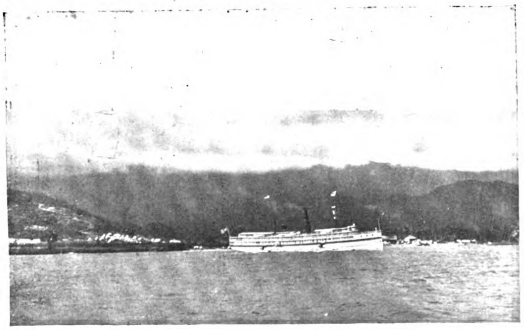
Thursday, July 28.—Ponce, the largest city in Puerto Rico, surrendered to our navy and was occupied by our army. A despatch from Captain Higginson of the Massachusetts says that Commander Davis, with the Dixie, Annapolis, Wasp, and Gloucester, left the port of Guanica yesterday afternoon to blockade Ponce and capture lighters for the use of the army. Shortly after midnight the port and city of Ponce were "surrendered to Commander Davis upon demand." Provisional articles of surrender stipulated by the Spanish commander and accepted by Commander Davis were: 1. Garrison to be allowed to retire. 2. Civil government to remain in force. 3. Police and fire brigade to be maintained without arms. 4. Captain of the port not to be made a prisoner. This morning, at 6.40 o'clock, General Miles and General Wilson, with the Massachusetts, Cincinnati, and transports, arrived at Ponce from Guanica. Captured lighters were used in landing the army. The despatch concludes: "No resistance. Troops welcomed by inhabitants. Great enthusiasm. Captured 60 lighters, 20 sailing-vessels, and 120 tons of coal."

General Miles's account of the same occurrences was sent while General Wilson, with Ernst's brigade, was disembarking. "Spanish troops are retreating from southern part of Puerto Rico," he says. "Ponce and its port, having a population of fifty thousand, now under American flag. The populace received troops and saluted the flag with wild enthusiasm. . . . This is a prosperous and beautiful country. The army will soon be in mountain

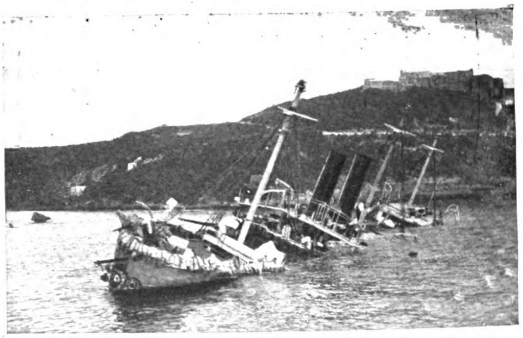
(Continued on page 791.)

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CATHEDRAL, AND PLAZA DE ARMAS.



SAN CARLOS CLUB, PLAZA DE ARMAS.



COLONEL J. J. ASTOR AT GATE OF PRISON.

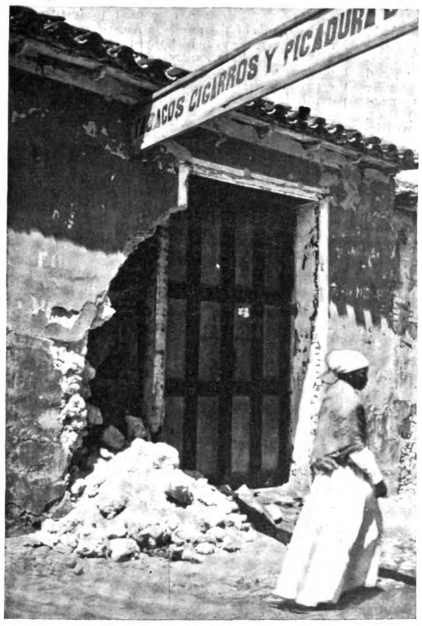
REMOVING OUR SICK SOLDIERS FROM THE CITY

HOSPITAL-SHIP "RELIEF."

THE "REINA MERCEDES," SUNK IN THE HARBOR BY SAMPSON'S GUNS.

PARTY OF RED CROSS WORKERS.

HAVING BREAKFAST IN THE STREETS.



SANTIAGO AFTER THE SURRENDER.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JAMES BURTON, SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHER FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL SHAFTER'S ARMY.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE AMERICAN FLAG FLYING OVER THE CASA MUNICIPAL AND GOVERNOR'S RESIDENCE.

WHERE AN AMERICAN SHELL STRUCK.

NATIVES WAITING IN LINE FOR UNCLE SAM'S RATIONS.

DISCUSSING THE SURRENDER ON A STREET CORNER.

SANTIAGO'S FILTHY STREETS.

SANTIAGO AFTER THE SURRENDER.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JAMES BURTON, SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHER FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL SHAFTER'S ARMY.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

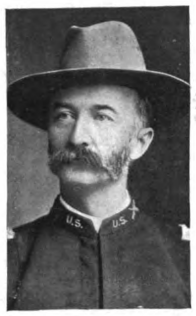
The Williamsport (Pennsylvania) Index having contrasted the "after-action prayer" of Captain Philip of the Texas with the "frequently quoted profanity" of Captain Evans of the Iowa, Captain Evans has made reply through the newspapers in a letter which is not to be read without emotion. He says that after the Vizcaya had struck her colors in the fight off Santiago the chaplain of the Iowa came to him and suggested saying "a few words of thanks to Almighty God for our victory." Captain Evans said, "By all means do so; I will have the men sent aft for that purpose"; but just then it was reported that a Spanish battle-ship was standing towards them from the eastward, so they immediately got ready to fight her, and by the time it was discovered that she was an Austrian the Iowa was surrounded by boats bringing dying and wounded prisoners from the Vizcaya, the relief of whom engrossed all attention. So, owing to the stress of circumstances, formal thanks were not returned. Nevertheless, says Captain Evans, "every drop of blood in my body on the afternoon of the 3d of July was singing thanks and praise to Almighty God for the victory we had won."

That Captain Evans has not been overmuch pleased to be contrasted as a profane officer with his God-fearing brother of the Texas appears in his remark that he, like the majority of the officers of the navy, had never thought it necessary to announce to his crew that he believed in Almighty God, but had considered that that "went without saying," though Captain Philip had a perfect right to make such formal acknowledgment if he chose. The impression made on a reader of the story of Captain Philip's pious acknowledgment is that his choice of the words he used was made under stress of strong emotion, and was due to a vivid sense of an escape almost miraculous from sudden death. It will be remembered that in the fight, within a very few minutes after Captain Philip and the officers with him left the bridge of the Texas, a shot came along and demolished the platform on which they had been standing. Their escape was either a marvellous piece of good luck or it was "providential." In view of it as something fresh in Captain Philip's mind, and of the further wonder that not a man on the Texas had been hurt, his solemn attestation of "belief in Almighty God" seems not at all unnatural. It may be doubted whether the somewhat profuse advertisement of the godliness of Captain Philip by his chaplain, Mr. Jones, has been of especial service to the captain. Most readers like the story of Captain Philip's "after-action prayer" better in the brief simplicity of its original narration than as garnished by Chaplain Jones's details and testimonials.

Our naval officers seem to be an unusually religious lot of men. Very likely the perils and vicissitudes of the sea are more potent to make men conscious of the presence of their Maker and of their dependence upon Him than the ordinary experiences of life ashore.

PRIVATE CHAS. D. JACOB, JR.,
Troop G, 1st U. S. Cavalry. Killed at Santiago, July 1, while endeavoring to save his Sergeant.

As for the "cuss-words" which Captain Evans is credited with using sometimes, that is largely a joke. If on occasion he buttresses his language with expletives, that is a matter of superficial importance, with some bearing perhaps on temperament, but very little on character or piety. Some very pious men swear sometimes. There was Andrew Jackson; and George Washington is confidently stated to have damned General Lee. Is it not recorded that the Duke of Wellington sometimes used words of not very carefully modulated commination? Yet the great duke's piety appears in the story that when in church he came to that place in the Psalter where the text runs "Thou hast covered my head in the day of battle," he always read that verse aloud, though it is an odd-numbered verse, and so one of those allotted to the priest and not to the congregation.



Evidences of a disposition to trace the hand of Providence in our war are not far to seek. Our naval victories, with their exceedingly small attendant loss of life to us, are pretty generally held to border on the miraculous, and so they do, though readers of history are aware that they are not the first sea-fights in which the side that warred with Spain got off with wonderfully small loss.

In the recently published Life of Lord Cochrane there are stories of sea fights against amazing odds, or where extraordinary risks were taken, with resulting victories that compare for thoroughness and for small losses to the victors with our battles of Manila and Santiago. Doubtless, however, the Almighty fought with Cochrane also. The cause then was the same as now, the cause of Spanish colonists—Chilians and other South Americans—against Spain.

Dr. R. S. McArthur, of New York, in a recent sermon in Tremont Temple, Boston, found it notable not only that the Lord was conspicuously on our side, but that so many pious men were fighting our battles. "Dewey and Sampson are Christians," he is reported to have said, "and Gomez and Miles are also, and Baptists at that." That is interesting, if not certainly conclusive. If Gomez is a Baptist, one would like to know how it happened; but, anyway, Spain had better be in haste to make peace. The fact that Admiral Cervera and the officers with him go regularly to church on Sundays at Annapolis should not weigh to the contrary.

1st LIEUT. WILLIAM H. SMITH,
10th U. S. Cavalry.

CAPT. CHARLES W. ROWELL,
2d U. S. Infantry.

LIEUT. L. H. LEWIS,
9th U. S. Infantry.

U. S. ARMY OFFICERS KILLED AT SANTIAGO.

Mills Hotel No. 1, on Bleecker Street, in New York, which was opened last November, has proved so successful that Mills Hotel No. 2 has since been built, on the corner of Rivington and Chrystie streets, and was opened last week. It has room for 600 lodgers, being smaller than No. 1, which has room for 1154. In arrangement No. 2 differs from No. 1 in having baths on every floor, instead of in the basement only. This change will increase considerably the comfort of its patrons. Both hotels are open to all respectable men who have twenty cents.

Mr. Mills contended the other day that the assessed valuation of Hotel No. 1 should be low, because the property made only a small return on the money invested. The inference is reasonable that the success of Hotel No. 1 consists in its large patronage and in its usefulness to the public, rather than in remunerativeness to its owner.

General Linares's cablegram sent on July 12 from Santiago to Madrid, explaining the necessity of surrender, shows a noble spirit which is appreciated abroad if not at home. After setting forth the condition of affairs and the utter hopelessness of continuing the defence of a city whose people had deserted it and were being fed by the enemy, he says that if the defence must go on, for reasons of which he is ignorant, or that if some one must assume the responsibility of surrender, "I faithfully offer myself on the altars of my country for the one, and for the other I will retain the command for the purpose of signing the surrender, for my modest reputation is of little value as compared with the country's interests."

Much interest will be felt in this country in the reception the beaten Spanish officers and soldiers meet with on their return home. It has been reported that Admiral Cervera would not go back at all, but that is very unlikely. General Linares will go home very shortly with his troops, and we shall know more about Spain when we learn how he fares.

Something seems to have happened to the Brooklyn Bridge; nothing serious, apparently, but enough, perhaps, to make the ferry-boats popular for a week or two among hypercautious persons. On Friday evening, July 29, a dead horse caused a block of trolley-cars on the bridge, when suddenly there was a noise like a pistol-shot near the Brooklyn tower, and many persons seem to have received the impression that the bridge sagged several inches. It takes an expert to understand what really happened; but the explanation given is that one of the steel trusses, described by friends of the patient as "a bottom chord," buckled or twisted about 200 feet west of the Brooklyn tower on the south roadway. The bridge doctors say that the strength of the bridge is not affected. Responsibility for the occurrence is distributed between the trolley companies and the protracted hot weather. The heat has made the cables stretch to an unusual extent. The trolley companies are said to have violated the bridge rules in allowing their cars to run too close together, thereby putting too many cars on the bridge at once.

The Rev. P. F. Jernegan's scheme for getting the gold out of sea-water seems to have been as ingenious a plan for demonstrating the truth of Solomon's observation about the alacrity with which certain persons part with their money as has been matured in many a moon. The story in brief, as it has been coming out in the newspapers, is that Jernegan, being without occupation, and having leisure to improve his mind, learned that there was gold in sea-water, and resolved to get some of it out. After sundry apparently successful experiments before witnesses, he started works on the coast of Maine, where ocean water is cheap, good, and plentiful, and proceeded to ship to Boston gold bricks ostensibly derived by his process from the ocean. On the strength of these periodical bricks he sold stock profusely in his company, receiving money therefor, which he turned into government bonds and other valuables. Then suddenly he went to France, leaving no address behind. His "secret process" is stated to have been that he "salted" the ocean by employing a diver to place gold dissolved in mercury in a box which he used to let down into the ocean, duly baited to catch the riches of the deep. His adventure is understood to have profited him several hundred thousand dollars, though doubtless the end of his story will give further illustrations of the wisdom of Solomon which will be less to his advantage. It was Stevenson (not Solomon) who said, "Fools and knaves both come to grief in time, but the fools first."

The report that James Whitcomb Riley is writing comic opera, with Paul Lawrence Dunbar as his accomplice, is denied, assurance being given that Mr. Riley is busy this summer, as usual, in the production of the general-use verses, which continue to be in brisk demand by American readers.

Mr. Wilbur T. Crofts writes from Washington to the Weekly to say that the statement that the Kentucky was the first American battle-ship to be christened with water is erroneous. "The two most famous ships of our navy, the Constitution and the Hartford, were so christened," says Mr. Crofts, "and yet the superstition about luck and wine lives."

Mr. Crofts will find himself in trouble if he talks about "christening" battle-ships, whether with water or wine. The use of that word in association with ships is warmly resented by a good many persons, who have persuaded themselves that it is blasphemous.

Comment was made in the Weekly of July 16 on a report that the principal of the Boys' High-School in Reading, Pennsylvania, had refused to sign the diploma of a lad whose graduating essay had contained a criticism on the means now generally used to instil patriotism into the minds of the pupils in American public schools. Mr. Scheibner, the principal, says that the report was inaccurate in several particulars, and that his refusal to sign the young man's diploma "was in no way connected with the paper referred to, but was officially known." Apparently it was officially approved also.

This has been a great month for Constructor Hobson. He had to come home on official business to plan for raising the sunken Spanish war-ships, and though he has gone about that business with devoted diligence he has not been able to avoid a great deal of miscellaneous "recognition." He must have found this a trying country for a modest man, but, after all, he couldn't hide for the rest of his days, and as his fellow-Americans had accounts to settle with him, the settlement might as well come first as last. The culmination of his embarrassments came on the evening of August 4, in New York, when, with the consent of Secretary Long, he presided at the public meeting held under the auspices of the New York Soldiers' and Sailors' Families' Protective Association. The object of the meeting was to raise funds for the relief of the families of soldiers and sailors who have gone to the war from the city of New York. The means used to raise the money was to put Lieutenant Hobson on exhibition as presiding officer, to have speeches made by him and other eminent gentlemen, and to charge from fifty cents to a dollar for admission. The meeting was highly successful. Lieutenant Hobson told beautiful stories about the Jackies, and told them very, very well. He was cheered, praised, and admired; some thousands of enthusiastic citizens can now boast that they have seen him and heard him talk, and a fund for an eminently worthy and patriotic purpose has been increased by thirty-five hundred dollars.

Governor Myron H. McCord, whose portrait is here given, has resigned the governorship of Arizona to accept the colonelcy of the Arizona, New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Indian Territory volunteer regiment. As member of Congress from Wisconsin he supported William McKinley for Speaker. Mr. McKinley, being presently appointed chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, got up the tariff bill which made for him the reputation which afterwards put him into a position to remember his friends. Mr. McCord, being appointed Governor of Arizona, endeared himself to his party by accepting the resignations of all Democratic officers and putting Republicans in their places. It does not appear that Colonel McCord has had any military experience; but Captain D. D. Mitchell, of the Fifteenth Infantry, is a major of his regiment, and may become its lieutenant-colonel.

MYRON H. McCORD,
Who resigned the Governorship of Arizona to accept the Colonelcy of a Volunteer Regiment.

So far as is generally known, Mark Twain has not expressed his views about the war, but his sentiments on one of its results are set forth in a letter written from Kaltenleutgeben, near Vienna, to the United States consul at

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Leipsic, declining an invitation to be present at the Fourth of July celebration of the Americans in Leipsic.

Ordinarily [he writes] I would not care, but I must care this time, for this is not an ordinary Fourth. On the contrary, it is a memorable one—the most memorable which the flag has known in thirty-three years—and there have been but two before it which may claim to rank with it as happy epoch posts in the history of the republic—1865 and 1776. This one marks the burial of the estrangement which has existed so long and so perniciously between England and America, a welcome condition of things, which, if wisely nursed and made permanent, can be of inestimable value to both nations, and incidentally to the world.

In reverence for liberty, in humanitarian and civilizing impulses, and in other great things of the heart and the spirit the two nations are kindred, as well as in blood, and friendly relations between them mean the forward march of the human race. That old animosity is buried. Let us hope it will stay buried, and also hope that for centuries to come this august funeral will still continue to be celebrated at our Fourth, and that meantime any man who tries to dig up that corpse will promptly be put in condition to take its place.

That is how it strikes a good American and discerning citizen living temporarily in Europe, but hoping to get back in due time to Hartford, Connecticut. From what he does not say about the war with Spain the inference may be drawn that it seems to him worth its cost if only for its result in bringing Britain and America together.

Dr. William Pepper, of Philadelphia, died on July 29 at the country house of Mrs. Hearst, near San Francisco. He had gone there to rest and recruit his strength. His death, from an affection of the heart, was sudden and unexpected.

If there was a real foundation to the theory that Philadelphia is a languid city, we might well expect that the loss of such a man as Dr. Pepper would bring it to something like a standstill. He was born in 1843, and was consequently only fifty-five years old; but the record of the work he accomplished in thirty-five years of active life is extraordinary. His father, William Pepper, was a noted physician, and doubtless gave his son an excellent start. The son graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1862, and from its medical department in 1864. At twenty-five he became a lecturer in the university, in the medical department of which he continued to hold important appointments and professorships until, in 1881, he was elected provost of the university. Under his administration, which lasted thirteen years, the University of Pennsylvania saw the number of its students increase from 981 to 2180. Eight new departments were added to it, and the value of its property and endowments more than tripled. Dr. Pepper himself gave $30,000 to help on the extension of the course of study in the medical school from three years to four.

Besides what he did for the university, he practised medicine with such success that his services were in active request as a consulting physician. He wrote or edited several medical works of value, and many shorter papers. He served as medical director of the Philadelphia Exposition of 1876, and was a leader in establishing the Philadelphia Museum of Science and Art and the Free Library of Philadelphia.

His economy of time is said to have been extraordinary, and, unlike most men, he was able to use all the time he saved, for there seemed no limit to his energy. The Philadelphia Ledger says he used to work eighteen hours a day, taking meals at irregular intervals, and sleeping when he found leisure. The effect of saving time by skimping his meals and going without due sleep seems to have been that he was worked out twenty years before his time. Only a very industrious man can make enough of odd moments borrowed from meal-time and sleep to make up for twenty years cut off from the end of life.

E. S. MARTIN.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

(Continued from page 787.)

region; weather delightful; troops in best of health and spirits; anticipate no insurmountable obstacle in the future. Results thus far have been accomplished without the loss of a single life."

(In an engagement on the skirmish-line last Tuesday four Americans were wounded. The Spanish losses during the week are not exactly known, but it is believed and hoped they do not exceed a score.)

A later despatch from General Miles: "The Spanish retreat was precipitate, they leaving rifles and ammunition in barracks and forty or fifty sick in hospital. The people are enjoying a holiday in honor of our arrival." It is known that the garrison, numbering only about three hundred and fifty, and utterly without support from the citizens, were seized with panic; and their retreat was not merely precipitate, but uncommonly ludicrous, adding a dash of the burlesque to the most amiable capitulation that ever took place.

General Miles's proclamation to the Portorriqueños, issued at ten o'clock this morning, promised the largest measure of liberty consistent with a military occupation; protection of persons and of property; prosperity under American institutions and government; and maintenance of existing laws and customs that may "conform to the rules of the military administration, order, and justice." The inhabitants of the island are released from their former political relations, "and it is hoped this will be followed by the cheerful acceptance of the government of the United States." General Wilson will act for the present as military governor of the Ponce district.

Friday, July 29.—General Shafter's message to Secretary Alger to-day is an interesting item, for it makes Garcia's withdrawal somewhat easier to understand: "The trouble with General Garcia was that he expected to be placed in command at this place—in other words, that we would turn the city over to him. I explained to him fully that we were at war with Spain, and that the question of Cuban independence could not be considered by me. Another grievance was that, finding that several thousand men marched in without opposition from General Garcia, I extended my own lines in front of him and closed up the gap, as I saw that I had to depend on my own men for any effective investment of the place."

Jibara, on the northern coast of Cuba, in the portion of the province of Santiago not ceded by General Toral, is now held by our navy. The gunboat Nashville entered the harbor, and found a force of Cubans in possession, the Spanish garrison having retreated to Holguin.

Saturday, July 30.—General Merritt, commander-in-chief of the expedition to the Philippines, cabled (Cavité, July 25, viâ Hong-kong, July 30) that he arrived at Manila last Monday on the Newport, and that the other transports were about four days in the rear. "All troops assigned to me," he concludes, "will probably be needed."

The negotiations for peace now in progress at Washington give especial prominence to the Philippines, with all the world more or less expectant of our government's decision in regard to them. The French ambassador, M. Cambon, representing Spain in these negotiations, spent several hours at the White House this afternoon, and received a reply to the Spanish overtures which were mentioned in this Diary last Tuesday. The precise terms of the administration's note have not been made public.

A PRAYER.

And in thy majesty ride prosperously, because of truth and meekness and righteousness; and thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things.—PSALM XLV.

ALMIGHTY God! eternal source
Of every arm we dare to wield,
Be Thine the thanks, as Thine the force,
On reeling deck or stricken field;
The thunder of the battle hour
Is but the whisper of Thy power.

Thine is our wisdom, Thine our might;
Oh, give us, more than strength and skill,
The calmness born of sense of right,
Heroic competence of will
To keep the awful tryst with death,
To know Thee in the cannon's breath.

By Thee was given the thought that bowed
All hearts upon the victor deck,
When high above the battle's shroud
The white flag fluttered o'er the wreck,
And Thine the hand that checked the cheer
In that wild hour of death and fear.

O Lord of love! be Thine the grace
To teach, amid the wrath of war,
Sweet pity for a humbled race,
Some thought of those in lands afar,
Where sad-eyed women vainly yearn
For those who never shall return.

Great Master of earth's mighty school
Whose children are of every land,
Inform with love our alien rule,
And stay us with Thy warning hand
If, tempted by imperial greed,
We in Thy watchful eyes exceed,—

That, in the days to come, O Lord!
When we ourselves have passed away,
And all are gone who drew the sword,
The children of our breed may say,
These were our sires who, doubly great,
Could strike yet spare the fallen state.

S. WEIR MITCHELL.

Sunday July 31.—A message of this date from General Miles, at Ponce, says that Spanish volunteers are surrendering themselves, with arms and ammunition; that four-fifths of the people are overjoyed at the arrival of our army, and two thousand from one place have volunteered to serve with it. The Portorriqueños are furnishing supplies and means of transportation, the custom-house has already yielded $14,000, and there is a request for flags, to be given to the different municipalities.

The official report of the military operations around Santiago made to Secretary Alger by Inspector-General Breckinridge comments upon "the entire absence of the usual comforts and conveniences of even the simplest army life during the whole of the expedition, and sometimes of medical essentials even in the hour of utmost need."... The Inspector-General's observations on the Cuban soldiers and the aid they have rendered are judicial. They were of "undoubted assistance" at certain times and in their own peculiar fashion, but they require constant supervision and direction. "In every skirmish or fight where they were present they seemed to have a fair proportion of killed and wounded." The critical moment in the campaign, when the uncharacteristic suggestion was made that our army should retreat, is thus referred to: "Doubtless, through telegrams and otherwise, there have been sufficient indications of the intense strain in the whole military situation on the field of operations which led to the consultation at the El Pozo house the night of July 2, and some of the general officers favored a retrograde movement during the day or two prior to our intrenchment taking shape and the armistice being agreed upon."

Monday, August 1.—The first of the transports of the Spanish steamship company which has the contract for conveying the surrendered troops from Santiago to ports in the northwest of Spain is expected to reach Santiago next week.

The Spanish cabinet met to frame a reply to the note of our administration in relation to the peace proposals.

Admiral Dewey has received information from Manila that the city will surrender when called on to do so; General Merritt advises our administration that he requires more men. The explanation of these two apparently conflicting statements is found in the defiant attitude of Aguinaldo, insurgent leader and dictator of the Philippines. Fearing annexation, he openly opposes the Americans, and his followers make no secret of their intention to kill every Spaniard who falls into their hands. It is evident, therefore, that a strong force will be needed, whether the garrison of Manila surrenders or not, and whatever the terms of peace may be; for no terms that Spain can make will bind Aguinaldo.

The total number of men for General Miles in the various detachments of the expedition to Puerto Rico (including those that await transports at Tampa and Newport News) is about 30,000. To these about 20,000 may be added, as appears from a despatch sent by Adjutant-General Corbin to Major-General Wade. Eighteen regiments of volunteer troops will be designated for (possible) service in Puerto Rico under General Wade, and, it is said, "these regiments will be selected on a basis such that each State heretofore unrepresented at the front shall now have representation."

Tuesday, August 2.—The publication of an outline of our terms of peace is authorized in this official statement

In order to remove any misapprehension in regard to the negotiations as to peace between the United States and Spain, it is deemed proper to say that the terms offered by the United States to Spain in the note handed to the French ambassador on Saturday last are in substance as follows:

The President does not now put forward any claim for pecuniary indemnity, but requires the relinquishment of all claim of sovereignty over, or title to, the island of Cuba, as well as the immediate evacuation by Spain of the island; the cession to the United States and immediate evacuation of Puerto Rico and other islands under Spanish sovereignty in the West Indies; and the like cession of an island in the Ladrones. The United States will occupy and hold the city, bay, and harbor of Manila, pending the conclusion of a treaty of peace which shall determine the control, disposition, and government of the Philippines.

If these terms are accepted by Spain in their entirety, it is stated that commissioners will be named by the United States to meet commissioners on the part of Spain for the purpose of concluding a treaty of peace on the basis above indicated.

General Merritt has requested the War Department to increase his command to 50,000 men. The troops at present with him at Manila, those on the way, and those destined to form the next expedition from San Francisco number, all told, about 20,000; it is evident therefore that Aguinaldo's successes, or his arrogance, or both together, have more than doubled the difficulties of the situation.

And General Merritt is not alone in his mistrust of the Philippine insurgents. From Manila to Rome, from the papal authorities to the apostolic legation at Washington, from the apostolic legation to the departments of our government, whose arms reach half-way around the earth—by this course the news comes that Aguinaldo's motley following—his men of Luzon, men from Batanga, men from Babuyan—threaten to kill the bishop and clergy at Cavité. The interposition of our government has been requested, and suitable instructions have been sent to General Merritt and Admiral Dewey.

Wednesday, August 3.—The Secretary of War made an official statement concerning the "unfortunate occurrences" on the Seneca and (more recently) the Concho that brought home sick and wounded soldiers from Santiago. On both vessels the suffering was augmented by a lack of proper accommodations, medicines, and supplies. Secretary Alger blames nobody, but offers an explanation of the "unforeseen circumstances" that hampered the authorities at Santiago, who "have done the best they could." The superlative of good seems to have a somewhat different meaning when we say the soldiers got their wounds when "doing the best they could."

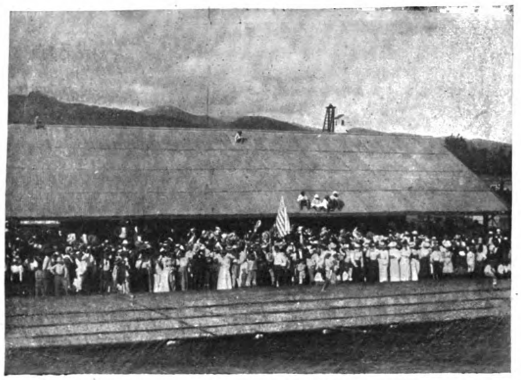
At a conference this afternoon, in which President McKinley, M. Cambon (representing Spain), and Secretary Day participated, details of the American note relating to conditions of peace were discussed.



A landing of American troops under General Brooke was made at Arroyo, on the southeastern coast of Puerto Rico.

At Santiago de Cuba, General Shafter's officers united in a round robin, the gist of which lies in the following sentences: "We, the undersigned officers, commanding the various brigades, divisions, etc., of the army of occupation in Cuba, are of the unanimous opinion that this army should be at once taken out of the island of Cuba and sent to some point on the Northern sea-coast of the United States.... This army must be moved at once, or perish." A letter from Colonel Theodore Roosevelt to General Shafter explains the situation. "All of us are certain," writes Colonel Roosevelt, "as soon as the authorities at Washington fully appreciate the conditions of the army, to be sent home. If we are kept here it will, in all human probability, mean an appalling disaster, for the surgeons here estimate that over half the army, if kept here during the sickly season, will die."

Thursday, August 4.—The Secretary of War has ordered General Shafter's troops relieved from further duty in Santiago as fast as transportation can be provided and the transfer of Spanish prisoners will admit of reduction of the garrison.

MARRION WILCOX.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CROWDS ON THE WHARF AWAITING THE ARRIVAL OF S.S. "COPTIC."

THE "COPTIC" ENTERING THE HARBOR OF HONOLULU FLYING THE SIGNAL, "HAWAII IS ANNEXED."

CHEERING IN FRONT OF THE EXECUTIVE BUILDING, HONOLULU.—Drawn by T. de Thulstrup after a Photograph.

HAWAII RECEIVES THE NEWS OF ANNEXATION.—[See Page 804.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

BISMARCK IN CARICATURE.

AGGRESSIVE caricature, tempered by not too lenient press laws of its subject's own making, was the initial element of publicity that presented Bismarck to the world at large in his character as a statesman, with all his faults and some of his great qualities exaggerated. More than his much-admired and much-criticised attitude in questions of public moment, and his great labors for the public good, did the comic press contribute to his ever-growing reputation.

1849—A FOLLOWER OF PETER THE HERMIT.

1853—BISMARCK RECEIVING THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE PRESS.

For forty-one years had this great man flourished in journalistic caricature, and when, in the spring of 1890, he returned the salient feature of most of his comic portraits, the three hairs, to their inventor, he did so with a heavy heart and a head bowed by grief—grief over the future of his great German father-land, which was newly created by him.

The first notice by the comic papers enjoyed by Bismarck occurred away back in 1849, when a Berlin weekly, as will be seen by the accompanying sketch, pictured him as one of the followers of Peter the Hermit, here impersonated by the reactionary Minister of State von Gerlach, who sits astride of a mule, raises a cross in one hand, is flanked on one side by his adherent, the much-despised Parliamentarian Stahl, in the garb of a Jesuit, and on the other side by Bismarck clothed in crab-shaped armor, intended to signify his reactionary tendencies. In his right hand Bismarck holds a formidable knout, symbolizing his Russian sympathies, and in his left hand his family tree, of which he was always very proud. The reason for introducing Bismarck in this cartoon was a speech he delivered on October 24, 1849, in which he made a strong plea for the aristocracy; as it was von Gerlach's highest ambition to gather in supporters to sustain the rights of the throne and church, the cartoonist evidently considered Bismarck his right-hand man. The Kreuz Zeitung party (Bismarck at that time was part owner of the paper) is represented in the background by the figure of Don Quixote.

Was it that this cartoon wounded Bismarck's feelings, or did he act on general principles? At any rate, the "coming man" thought it desirable that the freedom of the German press should be further curtailed, and to this end advocated a law which the editors throughout the country considered to be harassing and arbitrary. This was an excellent opportunity for the cartoonist, and the only illustration that is accessible, reflecting upon Bismarck in 1853, shows him, as Plenipotentiary of Prussia to the German Federal Council, receiving a committee of prominent editors, who are demanding from him permission to tell the truth.

In 1862, while Bismarck was Prussian Ambassador to Paris, the cartoonists were unusually busy, and almost every issue of the comic papers contains some allusion to him and his associations with Louis Napoleon. The first cartoon of this year represents a scene from "Faust," in which Louis Napoleon plays the part of Mephistopheles, who has hypnotized Bismarck, while he arranges an alliance between Prussia, Russia, and France, which just then was being much discussed. The Journal des Débats masquerades as a siren, for the reason that at the time of Bismarck's appointment that paper published a complimentary biography of him, and in many ways evidenced its friendly feelings.

Later in 1862, when Bismarck took leave of France to enter the ministry of King William I., the papers noticed his leave-taking, and perpetuated the parting scene that was supposed to have taken place between himself and the Emperor. In this scene the Emperor is made to say to the departing diplomat, "Show that one can learn something from me," at the same time pointing toward the French throne, which is inscribed, "Instituted on the 2d of December."

1862—BISMARCK (FAUST) HYPNOTIZED BY LOUIS NAPOLEON (MEPHISTO).

1862—TAKING LEAVE OF THE FRENCH COURT.

Still later in 1862, and after Bismarck had become a recognized factor in the Prussian government, the papers further utilized his supposed friendship with Napoleon as a subject of illustration. By this time he had identified himself even more strongly than before with the policy of absolutism; and as Napoleon was regarded as the standard-bearer of that same principle, Bismarck, in this cartoon, is pictured between the Emperor and the reactionary minister von Manteuffel at the moment of being introduced into the happy hunting-grounds of "pleasing absolutism."

Suggestive of the results that would follow to the loyal citizens, a Russian knout is conspicuously suspended over the portal. To denote the martial character of Bismarck, his head is provided with a Pickelhaube, or spiked helmet, while the spirit of the pietist Hassenpflug, who had made himself conspicuous by his alleged willingness to reform the world, floats away in the background with his hands in the attitude of prayer.

While President of the Ministry, in 1862, Bismarck made no concealment of his indifference to and disregard for the Prussian constitution, which document the cartoonist has placed in his hand in the next sketch, with that portion of it exposed which begins with the words, "The Chamber has the Right—," while Bismarck interjects the remark, "I cannot govern with such a thing as that hanging over me."

During the year 1862 Bismarck continued his repressive measures towards the press, and many objectionable journals were either confiscated or forced to appear with portions of their contents blotted out. Among the retaliatory methods adopted by the persecuted papers was a cartoon showing on a stormy sea a small craft manned by the editors of the three leading comic papers, who are striving their utmost to live through the high sea of official persecution. At the right is the alert police, with hands extended ready to seize the offenders, and at the left the phlegmatic and stupid Law. High above in the gloomy heavens appears Bismarck, shorn of its three hairs, threatening utter annihilation to the occupants of the boat.

It was some considerable time after the appearance of this cartoon that the famous three hairs which have always been associated with caricatures of Bismarck appeared. The small cut showing Bismarck with his left hand raised and his first finger and thumb extended, though a rather insignificant sketch, has now become famous, for the reason that it was the first to bring the three hairs into prominence, and to make them a characteristic of the man.

During the first month of 1863, after Bismarck had shown his disposition to do without the advice and aid of the Diet, he was pictured as a sign-post, his extended arm pointing straight ahead, while he encouraged the members of Parliament to go home, as he had no further use for them.

Again in 1863, after Bismarck had expressed his contempt for the Parliamentary opposition in every possible way, he was shown in three individual sketches in various attitudes of indicating that contempt while his opponents were presenting their views in the Diet.

1862—ENTERING THE HAPPY HUNTING-GROUNDS OF ABSOLUTISM.

1862—SPURNING THE PRUSSIAN CONSTITUTION.

1862—JOURNALISTS IN THE SEA OF OFFICIAL DISPLEASURE.

In 1864 the Danish question was interesting Europe, and England was particularly concerned in the matter because of the close relationship between Queen Victoria, King Christian of Denmark, and the rest of the Schleswig-Holstein family, and it was considered a good stroke of business for the London Times to send de Blowitz to Berlin to interview Bismarck on the subject. This gave the papers an opportunity to caricature the two men; but of the many sketches produced, the accompanying series of six were the best. Bismarck at first was somewhat unwilling to discuss business of state with the correspondent, but the well-known insinuating manner and language of de Blowitz 1863—FIRST APPEARANCE OF THE FAMOUS THREE HAIRS.

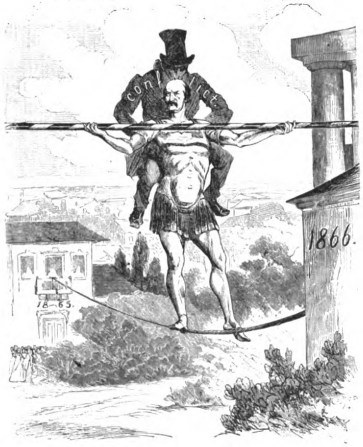
1863—SHOWING CONTEMPT FOR THE OPPOSITION IN THE DIET.

1863—"NACH HAUSE"—"GO HOME."



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

1864—BISMARCK AND DE BLOWITZ DISCUSSING SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN.

1865—THE PASS IN THE ALPS.

1865—THE GERMAN BLONDIN.

1865—CORRALLING THE OYSTERS (SCHLESWIG-HOLSTEIN) AND HOLDING ON TO THE (RHINE) WINE.

soon overcame his objection, and the two gentlemen are shown in the various stages of their confidences and the amiable manner in which they parted.

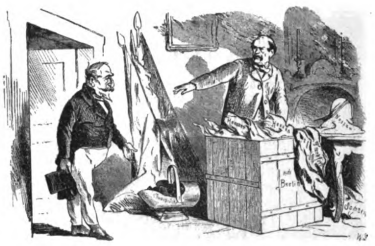
Nothing more seems to have occurred during that year to excite the attention of the satirists, but early in 1865 is found the rather pretentious representation of a pass in the Alps, over which two riders are approaching in opposite directions. The man upon the mule at the left is supposed to represent the majority in the Diet that opposed with stubbornness the contemplated army reform, demanding frequent debate on the question. He looks no further ahead than the limits of the constitution, which he holds in his hand. The figure upon the other mule is Bismarck, who had shown the same determination to win his point that the others had to adhere to the status quo. The relative positions of the representatives of the two principles are cleverly indicated by the attitude of the mules, between whom a collision seems inevitable. Bismarck is shown to an advantage in this sketch, for while he carefully studies the plans for army reorganization, he holds his head high, indicating that he is looking ahead of and beyond questions of the moment; he sits firmly in his saddle.

It will be remembered that in the year 1865 the Prussian Diet refused in toto the appropriations for government expenses demanded by Bismarck, and that the latter settled the matter by using the national funds for the purpose he desired, entirely ignoring the Budget question. How he was to extricate himself from the complications his independent action would entail was a question the papers could not determine, and so they pictured him as an acrobat, endeavoring to keep his balance upon a slack wire extending from 1865 to 1866. This German Blondin is, moreover, weighted down with the spectre of a constitutional conflict.

On October 22, 1865, Bismarck and Louis Napoleon met at Biarritz, and the meeting was an excuse for the comic papers to print several humorous scenes of their interviews, among which the accompanying is selected as having the most point as applied to the situation, and also because it is characteristic of German humor. The two famous men are shown seated on opposite sides of a table, and the following dialogue explains the situation. Napoleon says, "You have the oysters" (meaning the seaboard duchies of Schleswig-Holstein) "and I will take the wine" (meaning the Rhine). Bismarck gathers in the oysters, and then seizes the bottle, saying, "I beg your pardon a thousand times, but what would oysters be without (Rhine) wine?"

After the peace of Nikolsburg, by which Prussia acquired a large extension of her territory, namely, the kingdom of Hanover, Hessen, Nassau, and the free city of Frankfurt, Napoleon appears before Bismarck in the attitude of a mendicant, and is made to ask: "I came to congratulate you on the beautiful inheritance you have just received. Have you anything for me?" To which Bismarck replies, pointing to the door: "Oh, pshaw! We don't give to beggars."

According to the German press, Napoleon continued, even after this rebuff, to bargain with Bismarck, demanding that France be compensated for Prussia's gains. Napoleon in the act of soliciting, and Bismarck in that of refusing, are shown by the cartoonist in a pastoral scene, where Bismarck poses as a good shepherd surrounded by the petty states, represented by rather simple-looking sheep labelled Mecklenburg, Weimar, Saxony, and Oldenburg. Baden and Bavaria, apparently as little sheep-dogs encouraged by Bismarck, are aggressive, and look towards Napoleon in a menacing way. Saxony, which had been badly used by Prussia in the war of 1866, has her dependent position exaggerated by her representative sheep being attached to a stake, from which she is trying to break away that she may flee to the protection of France. Mother Germania floats in the atmosphere at the background, and is made to say to Bismarck, "Look after my herd," while the hero of the situation is knitting on the proverbial shepherd's sock, which in this instance is made to represent the unity of the nation.



During 1867 the Luxembourg question became a prominent one, and the artists found considerable satisfaction in picturing the King of Holland as a peddler trying to get rid of that territory. One of these pictures shows Bismarck, disguised as a policeman, taking the King by the wrist and ordering him off the street, telling him he has "no license to sell goods."

Rumors of the breaking of the peace of Prague were rife early in 1870, and the cartoonist showed the various potentates prepared to sell out before the war began. The illustration given here is entitled "The Last Bazar," and shows the Pope, Louis Napoleon, and Bismarck, transformed into corpulent women, offering for sale the possessions they wanted to get rid of.

After Sedan, in 1870, there was ample opportunity for the artist to indulge in all the satire at his command, and the events were such that the pictures generally spoke for themselves, no explanation being necessary. One of these showed King William and Unser Fritz holding the French wolf while Bismarck, with a pair of shears, is cutting off his claws, labelled "Alsace," "Lorraine." At the same time Bismarck says, "We shall have to cut off the claws of this animal in order to insure peace for the future."

In the year 1873 the Italian minister La Marmora published a book in which he vigorously assailed Bismarck, accusing him of a long list of crimes, any one of which, had he been guilty, would have condemned him before the world. Unfortunately for La Marmora, he was removed from office just before the book was published, and the journalists friendly to Bismarck took advantage of this fact to picture their hero in the character of Papagena, the bird-fancier, dancing along over the country holding his Pan's pipes in one hand and a long staff in the other, while sitting upon this extended rod are three tamed birds representing Louis Napoleon, the Saxon-Austrian minister Count Beust, and his Italian critic La Marmora, all of whom had to go to please Bismarck. The comic press of Berlin sits upon the ground in the corner, pointing to the captive birds, and asking why they were so foolish as to go on Bismarck's lime.

By this time Bismarck had become an object of idolatry; loyal citizens from all parts of the father-land flocked to Berlin to look upon the great man, and he suffered, in consequence, the intrusion to which every one who becomes famous is more or less subjected. This annoyance finally became so irritating to Bismarck who, in 1877, was

1866—"WE GIVE NOTHING TO BEGGARS."

1866—THE KIND SHEPHERD.

1867—"YOU'VE GOT NO LICENSES."

1870—THE LAST BAZAR.

1870—CLIPPING THE CLAWS OF FRANCE.

1873—THE BIRD-CATCHER GATHERING IN HIS FOES.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google suffering from a nervous illness, that, incensed by the ridiculous position in which he was placed and by the persistency with which his well-meaning admirers followed his every step, he threatened to resign. In showing the houses surrounding his garden, where, at every window, a curiosity-seeker looks at Bismarck with a pair of opera-glasses, the artist has exaggerated the situation, as cartoonists are wont to do, although it is reasonable to believe the subject of his sketch fully sympathized with it, even if it was overdone.

In 1878 Bismarck forced the Reichstag to swallow his anti-socialist laws, much against the vigorous opposition of that body. On account of these laws Bismarck was repeatedly threatened that his life would be taken if he persisted in his advocacy of class legislation. The Reichstag is pictured as a goose; Bismarck has the creature by the neck, and is crowding down its throat the objectionable bill.

In 1878 Bismarck re-established amicable relations with the papal authorities, and the cartoonist took occasion to picture his Holiness Leo XIII. seated upon the pontifical throne receiving Bismarck. The Pope, consistent with tradition, extends his foot, saying, at the same time, "There is my foot." Bismarck, standing before him, while willing to meet his Holiness upon equal grounds, does not care to take advantage of the invitation the Pope extends, and so he replies, extending his own foot, "And there is mine!". The figure looking through the half-open curtain is Dr. Windthorst, the papal champion in the German Reichstag.

In 1879 the intimacy between Bismarck and Windthorst grew to such proportion that the papers showed the latter sitting upon the Chancellor's knee, while in another instance the well-known scene from "Richard III." is paraphrased, with Bismarck as Richard, and Windthorst as Anne; Bismarck says, in an aside, "I'll have her, but I won't keep her long." It will be remembered that this intimacy led to unpleasantness between Bismarck and the Kaiser, and finally to Bismarck's dismissal.

When, late in 1879, Bismarck had obtained all he sought from Windthorst, and that gentleman thought he had Bismarck in the right condition to do with him as he pleased, Windthorst made bold to lead Bismarck in his direction, only to find himself suddenly thrown overboard and done for effectually. The comic papers have shown this episode by placing Bismarck in a cab, with Windthorst as driver; the button is pressed at the moment when Windthorst turns to his passenger and says, "Shall I go direct to Canossa?" (Canossa being the place where the Emperor Henry IV. did homage to the Pope, and was kept standing for three days in the snow and ice in front of the papal residence before he was admitted to an audience and reconciliation.) Bismarck, looking from the cab window, gives Windthorst his quietus by replying, "No; rather to Daldorf" (where the state insane asylum is located); "but drop me at the corner of Wilhelmstrasse." Bismarck's palace was in Wilhelmstrasse.

In 1881 it struck some clever artist to perpetuate the fame of Bismarck's artistic peculiarity. There was therefore evolved the Apotheosis of the Three Hairs. The first illustration was entitled "Fine Weather"; the second, "Changeable"; and the third, "Stormy." In the third instance the hairs take the form of the Pickelhaube spike.

1885—THE JUDGMENT OF SOLOMON.

The year 1884 produced two interesting incidents, according to the cartoonist. The first one of these was the discovery by Bismarck on the head of his son Herbert one of the three hereditary family hairs. The Chancellor is shown at the moment of the discovery. The other incident was the action of Prince Bismarck (as the real editor of the North German Gazette) calling upon the London Times to attend its own affairs, and to stop criticising his actions. In this instance the artist has shown Bismarck in the rather aggressive attitude of calling the Times to account on the Irish question.

When the complications touching the Caroline Islands came up, in 1885, the Spaniards were fighting mad, and threw out hints of an alliance with France for the purpose of attacking Germany. Bismarck really cared very little for the Caroline Islands; he thought it desirable to make a show of resistance, but finally suggested to lay the matter before the Pope for arbitration. The artist has shown the Pope, in the attitude of Solomon in his well-remembered decision, lifting the Caroline Islands, personated in the figure of an infant, a sword in his hand, and suggesting that he cut the babe in two and give each one half. To this Bismarck agrees, as did the false claimant in the Bible; but Spain, being the legitimate mother of the infant, would rather part with it than see it cut up, and exclaims, "Don't hurt the darling." Whereupon the Pope, recognizing the sentiments of the rightful owner, turns the islands over to Spain.

On the 3d of February, 1888, the German Official Gazette and the Vienna Official Gazette published simultaneously an agreement between Germany and Austria, thereby proving that an alliance, not on the defensive, had been formed, by which both countries agreed to combine their forces against Russia if either were attacked. In the cartoon representing this event Bismarck unveils the figures of the united German-speaking peoples before the Czar, who looks upon the scene in a semi-haughty, threatening, but also astonished manner.

The events of 1890, when Bismarck retired from public life, are shown by an affecting cartoon, where the great ex-Chancellor, grip-sack in hand and his famous dog at his side, is about to say farewell to the public press forever. He hesitates at the doorway, and returns to the comic editor the three hairs with which the cartoonists identified him, saying that as he has no further use for them, the cartoonist better keep them for a memento.

Henry W. Fischer.

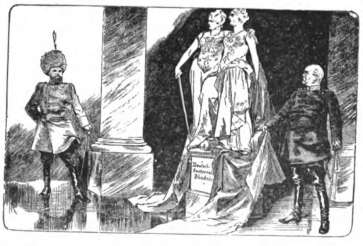
1877—THE PENALTY OF FAME.

1878—AN UNWILLING MEAL.

1878—"AND THERE IS MINE!"

1879—BISMARCK AND WINDTHORST TALKING RECONCILIATION TO ROME.

1879—"I WON'T KEEP HER LONG."



1881—THE APOTHEOSIS OF THE THREE HAIRS.

1879—"DROP ME AT THE CORNER OF WILHELMSTRASSE."

1884—SQUELCHING THE LONDON "TIMES."

1888—UNITED GERMANY AND AUSTRIA DISCLOSED TO THE CZAR.

BRING THE FIFTH CORPS NORTH.

We read that the Fifth Army Corps is to be brought North, and then we read that it is not. The President should punch up those old bureaucrats of his down in Washington and have them bring that corps home—up North, and the farther North the better. It has done enough. The vitality of the men was exhausted in the terrific campaign against Santiago, and they are not fit to encounter the heat and fever. This corps is the flower of our army, and contains all the material for our future great commanders, because in it is nearly all of the regular army establishment. Other fresh troops could go in and relieve it. These new men would not be weak from hunger, fatigue, and wounds, and would bear up better.

The idea of acclimating the men which I have heard advanced is simple foolishness. It takes two years to acclimate a man to the tropics, if he doesn't die, and then he is weakened permanently. The English understand tropical campaigning, and they put strong men into a jungle, march and fight them hard until the object of the campaign is accomplished, when they are immediately withdrawn.

Bring the Fifth Corps home immediately. Justice and good policy demand it.

Frederic Remington.

A WESTERN PLAIN.

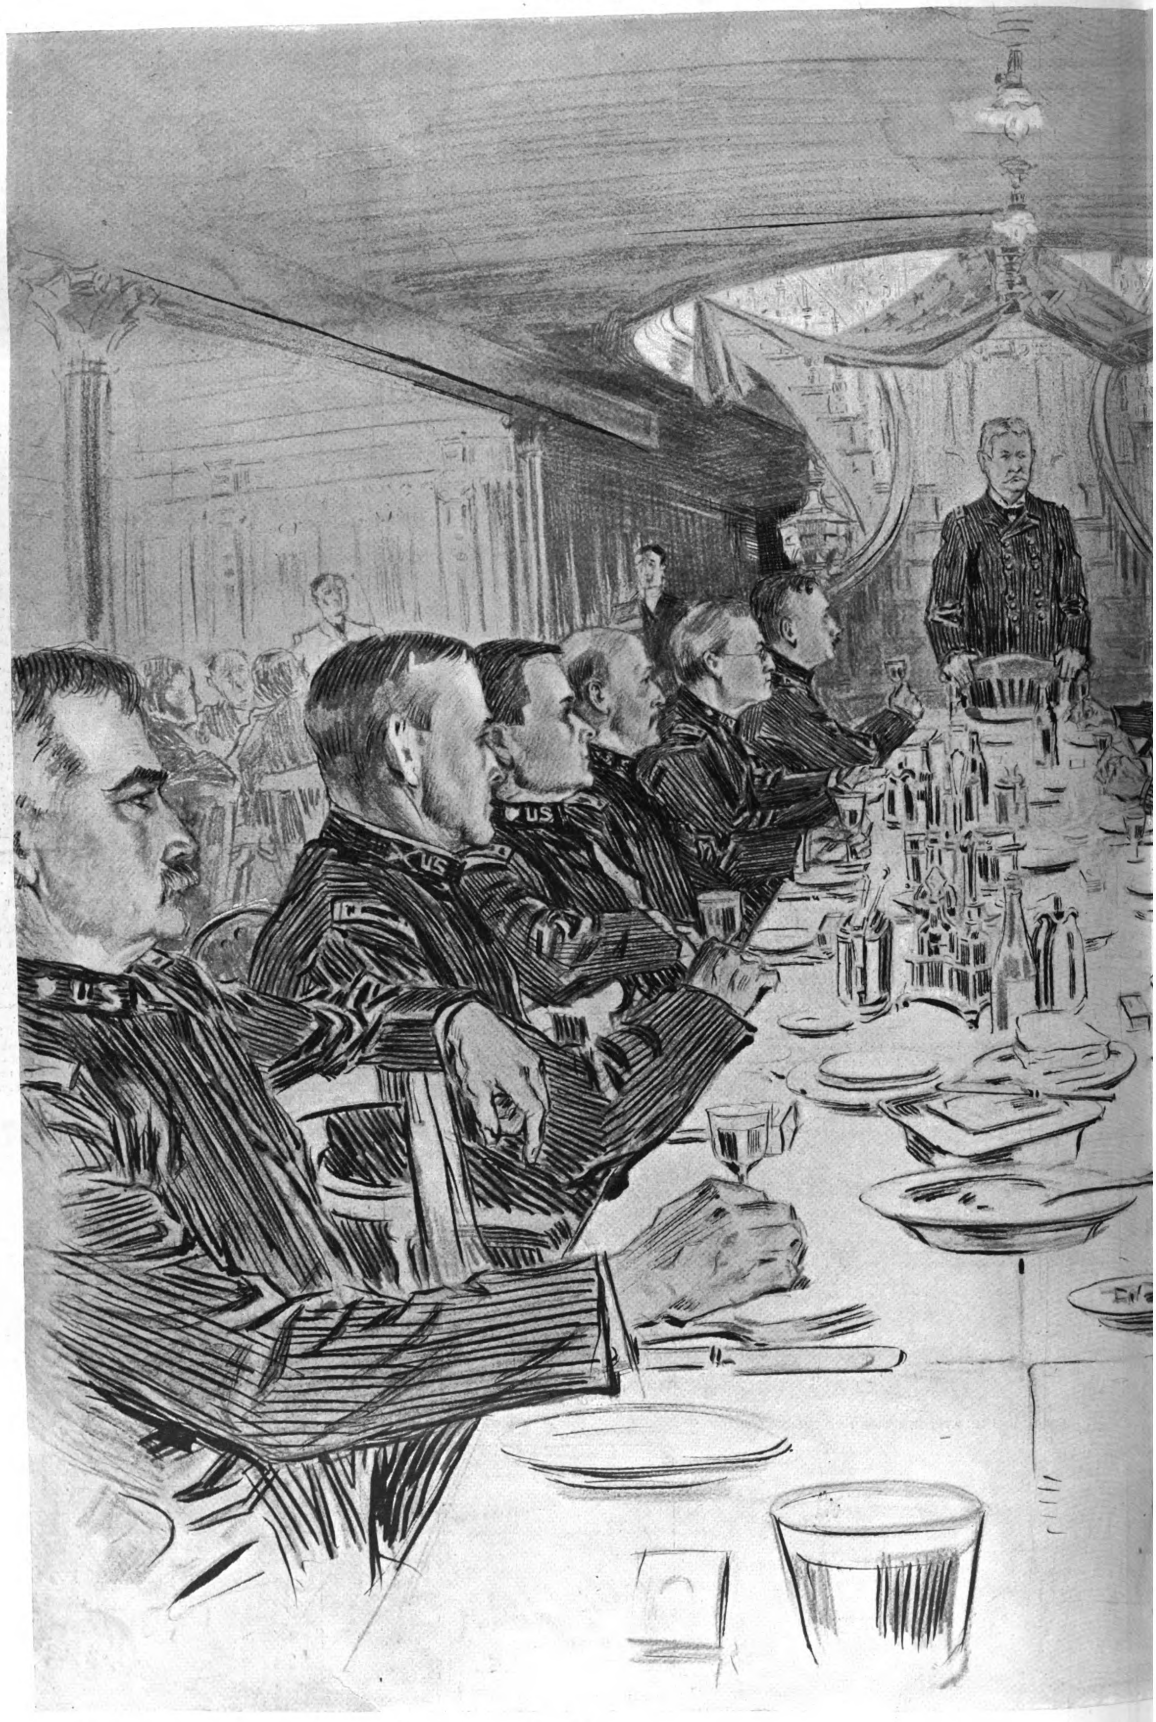
A lonely whitewashed farm-house where I wait,
A sweep of swirling corn-fields, far and nigh,
A flight of crows across a dreamy sky,
Fast-fading morning glories at the gate,
A lonesome field-lark, seeking for his mate.
No hazy purple mountains meet the eye,
No giant white-capped ocean thunders by.
The land is quiet as the face of Fate.

A craving for the mountains and the sea,
A pining and a waiting evermore;
A longing for the crags and cascades free,
A yearning for the sea-weeds of the shore;
A hopeless hope, on cloud-swept cliffs to be,
To hear the stormy ocean billows roar.

Walter Malone.

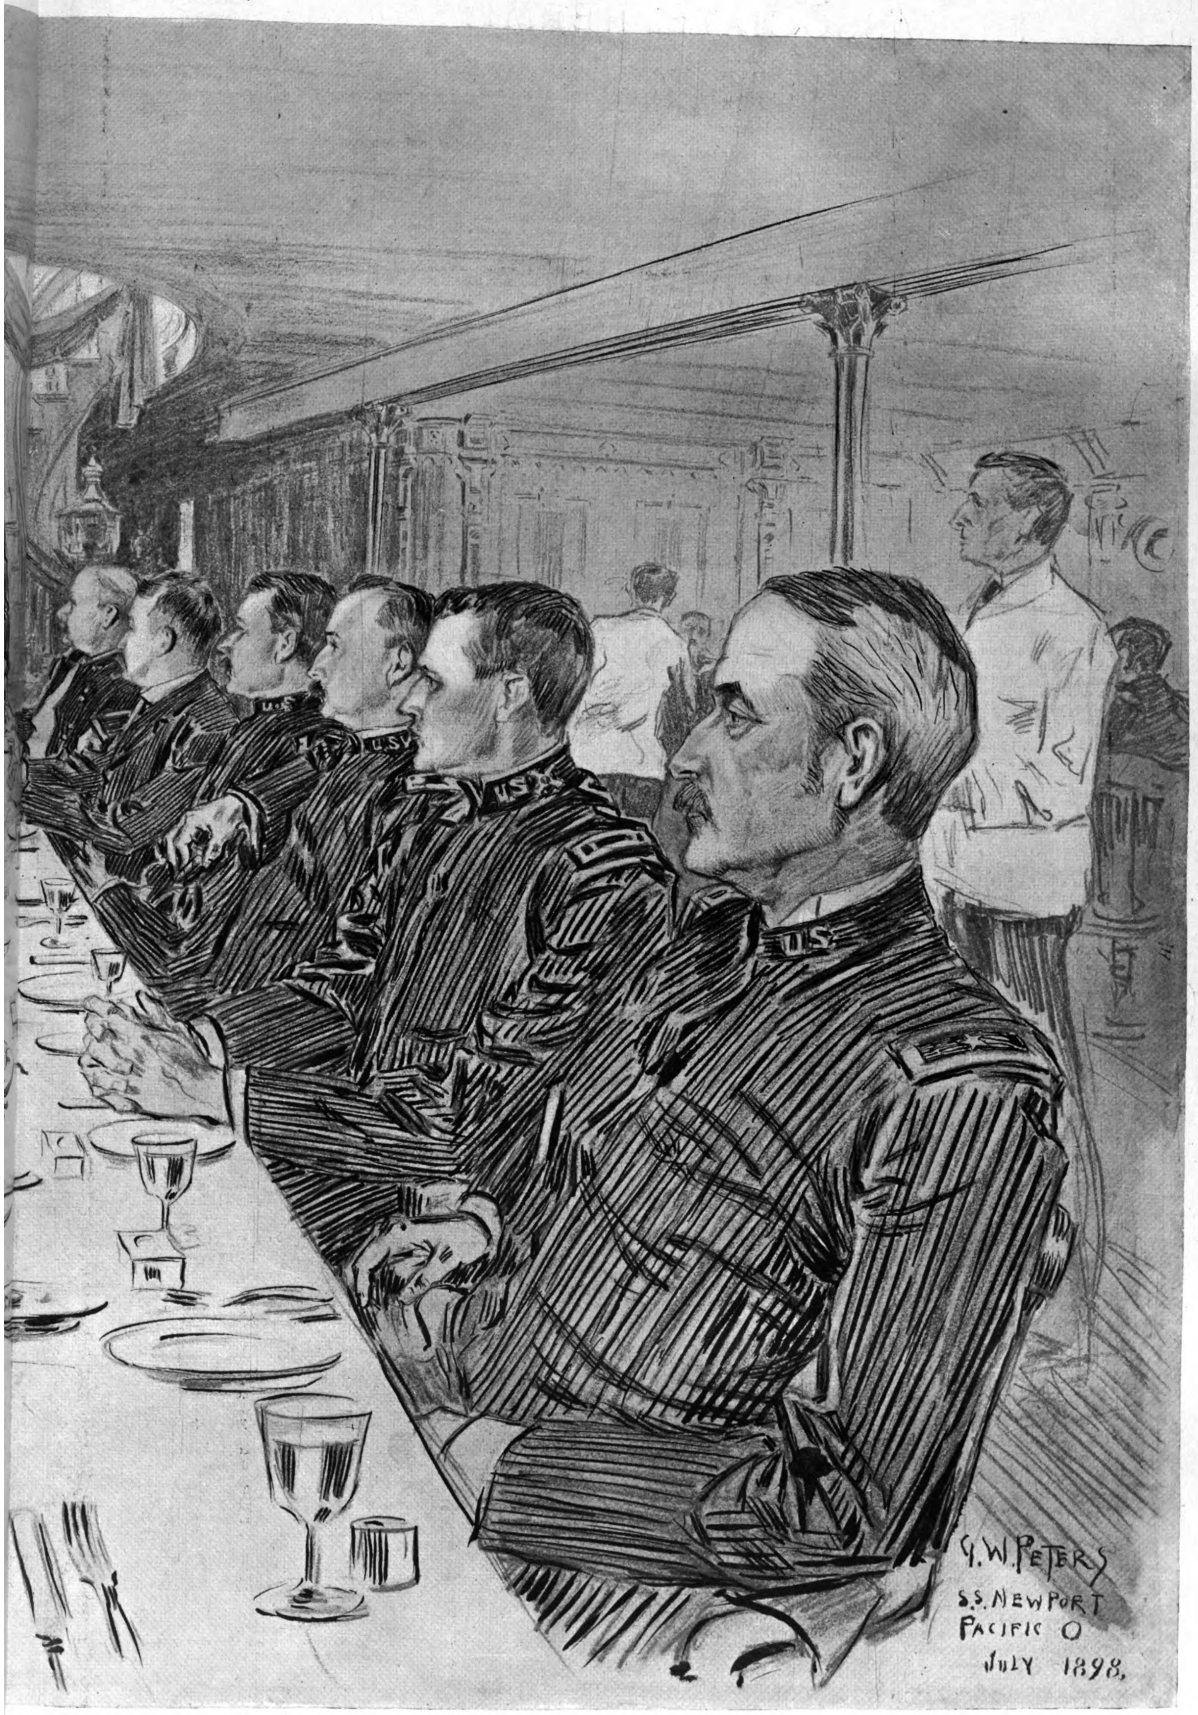


1884—DISCOVERS HIS SON HERBERT POSSESSES ONE OF THE HEREDITARY THREE HAIRS.

1890—VALE, BISMARCK.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Major Thompson. Major Whipple. Major Bement. Major-General Merritt. Gener



Major Simpson. Major Strother. Major Hale.

AN INCIDENT OF THE V

General Merritt responding to the toast "Our Country and Our Drawn from Life by G. W. Pete

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

eral Whittier. Mr. F. D. Millet, Major Sturgis.
Special Correspondent of "Harper's Weekly."

Major Wadsworth. Captain Mott. General Babcock.

OYAGE TO THE PHILIPPINES.

PRESIDENT" AT THE INDEPENDENCE DAY DINNER ON THE STEAMER "NEWPORT."

S ON BOARD U. S. TRANSPORT "NEWPORT."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS.*

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "THE GREAT STONE OF SARDIS," ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY A. B. FROST.

XV.—A NET OF COBWEBS TO CAGE A LION.

"I THINK there's something besides a lunatic that you are afraid of," said Martin to Matlack the next morning, as they were preparing breakfast.

"What's that?" inquired the guide, sharply.

"It's that fellow they call the bishop," said Martin. "He put a pretty heavy slur on you. You drove down a stake, and you locked your boat to it, and you walked away as big as if you were the sheriff of the county, and here he comes along, and snaps his fingers at you and your locks, and, as cool as a cucumber, he pulls up the stake and shoves out on the lake all alone by herself a young lady that you are paid to take care of and protect from danger."

"I want you to know, Martin Sanders," said Matlack, "that I don't pitch into a man when he's in his bed, no matter what it is that made him take to his bed or stay there. But I'll just say to you now, that when he gets up and shows himself, there'll be the biggest case of bounce in these parts that you ever saw."

"Bounce!" said Martin to himself, as he turned away. "I have heard so much of it lately that I'd like to see a little."

Matlack also communed with himself. "He's awful anxious to get up a quarrel between me and the parson," he thought. "I wonder if he was too free with his tongue and did get thrashed. He don't show no signs of it, except he's so concerned in his mind to see somebody do for the parson what he ain't able to do himself. But I'll find out about it! I'll thrash that fellow in black, and before I let him up I'll make him tell me what he did to Martin. I'd do a good deal to get hold of something that would take the conceit out of that fellow."

Mr. Arthur Raybold was a deep-minded person, and sometimes it was difficult for him, with the fathoming apparatus he had on hand, to discover the very bottom of his mind. Now, far below the surface, his thoughts revolved. He had come to the conclusion that he would marry Margery. In the first place, he was greatly attracted by her, and again he considered it would be a most advantageous union. She was charming to look upon, and her mind was so uncramped by conventionalities that it could adapt itself to almost any sphere to which she might direct it. He expected his life-work to be upon the stage, and what an actress Miss Dearborn would make if properly educated—as he could educate her! With this most important purpose in view why should he waste his time? The Archibalds could not much longer remain in camp. They had limited their holiday to a month, and that was more than half gone. He must strike now.

The first thing to do was to get Clyde out of the way; then he would speak to Mr. Archibald and ask for authority to press his suit, and he would press that suit as few men on earth, he said to himself, would be able to press it. What girl could deny herself to him when he came to her clad not only with his own personal attributes, but with the fervor of a Romeo, the intellectuality of a Hamlet, and the force of an Othello?

The Clyde part of the affair seemed very simple; as his party would of course have their own table Clyde would see his sister at every meal, and as Corona did not care to talk to him, and must talk to somebody, she would be compelled to talk to Clyde, and if she talked to Clyde and looked at him as she always did when she talked to people, he did not see how he could help being attracted by her, and when once that sort of thing began the Margery-field would be open to him.

He excused himself that morning for hurriedly leaving the breakfast table by saying that he wished to see Mr. Archibald before he started out fishing.

He found that gentleman talking to Matlack. "Can I see you alone, sir?" said Raybold. "I have something of importance I wish to say to you."

"Very good," said the other; "for I have something I wish to say to you," and they retired toward the lake.

"What is it?" inquired Mr. Archibald.

"It is this," said Raybold, folding his arms as he spoke. "I am a man of but few words. When I have formed a purpose I call upon my actions to express it rather than my speech. I will not delay, therefore, to say to you that I love your ward, and my sole object in seeking this interview is to ask your permission to pay my addresses to her. That permission given, I will attend to the rest."

"After you have dropped your penny in the slot," remarked Mr. Archibald. "I must say," he continued, "that I am rather surprised at the nature of your communication. I supposed you were going to explain your somewhat remarkable conduct in bringing your tent into my camp without asking my permission or even speaking to me about it; but what you have said is of so much more importance than that breach of good manners that I will let the latter drop. But why did you ask my permission to address Miss Dearborn? Why didn't you go and do it just as you brought your tent here? Did you think that if you had a permit from me for that sort of sport you could warn off trespassers?"

"It was something of that kind," said Raybold; "although I should not have put it in that trifling way."

"Then I will remark," said Mr. Archibald, "that I know nothing of your matrimonial availability, and I do not want to know anything about it. My wife and I brought Miss Dearborn here to enjoy herself in the woods, not to be sought in marriage by strangers. For the present I am her guardian, and as such, I say to you that I forbid you to make her a proposal of marriage, or, indeed, to pay her any attentions which she may consider serious. If I see that you do not respect my wishes in this regard, I shall ask you to consider our acquaintance at an end, and shall dispense with your visits to this camp. Have I spoken plainly?"

The knitted brows of Raybold were directed toward the ground. "You have spoken plainly," he said, "and I have heard," and with a bow he walked away.

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2167.

As he approached his tent a smile, intended to be bitter, played about his features.

"A net of cobwebs," he muttered, "to cage a lion!"

The weather had now grown sultry, and the afternoon was very hot, and there was a general desire to lie in the shade and doze. Margery's plans for a siesta were a little more complicated than those of the others. She longed to lie in a hammock under great trees surrounded by the leafy screens of the woodlands; to gaze at the blue sky through the loop-holes in the towering branches above her, and to dream of the mysteries of the forest.

"Martin," said she, to the young guide, "is there a hammock among the things we brought with us?"

His face brightened. "Of course there are hammocks," he said. "I wonder none of you asked about them before."

"I never thought of it," said Margery. "I haven't had time for lounging, and as for Aunt Harriet she would not get into one for five dollars."

"Where shall I hang it?" he asked.

"Not anywhere about here. Couldn't you find some nice place in the woods, not far away, but where I would not be seen, and have a little time to myself? If you can, come and tell me quietly where it is."

"I know what she means," said Martin to himself. "It's a shame that she should be annoyed. I can find you just such a place," he said to Margery. "I will hang the hammock there, and I will take care that nobody else shall know where it is." And away he went, bounding heart and foot.

In less than quarter of an hour he returned. "It's all ready, Miss Dearborn," he said. "I think I have found a place you will like. It's generally very close in the woods on a day like this, but there is a little bluff back of us, and at the end of it the woods are open, so that there is a good deal of air there."

"That is charming," said Margery, and with a book in her hand she accompanied Martin.

They were each so interested in the hammock business that they walked side by side, instead of one following the other, as had been their custom heretofore.

"Oh, this is a delightful place!" cried Margery. "I can lie here and look down into the very heart of the woods; and it is a solitude like Robinson Crusoe's island."

"I am glad you like it," said Martin. "I thought you would. I have put up the hammock strongly, so that you need not be afraid of it; but if there is any other way you want it I can change it. There is not a thing here that can hurt you, and if a little snake should happen along it would be glad to get away from you if you give it a chance. But if you should be frightened or should want anything you have only to call for me. I shall hear you, for I shall be out in the open just at the edge of the woods."

"Thank you very much," said Margery; "nothing could be nicer than this, and you did it so quickly."

He smiled with pleasure as he answered that he could have done it more quickly if it had been necessary; and then he retired slowly, that she might call him back if she thought of anything she wanted.

Margery lay in the hammock, gazing out over the edge of the bluff into the heart of the woods; her closed book was in her hand, and the gentle breeze that shook the leaves around her and disturbed the loose curls about her face was laden with a moist spiciness which made her believe it had been wandering through some fragrant folinge of a kind unknown to her, far away in the depths of the forest, where she could not walk on account of the rocks, the great bushes, and the tall ferns. It was lovely to lie and watch the leafy boughs, which seemed as if they were waving their handkerchiefs to the breeze as it passed.

"I don't believe," she said to herself, as she cast her eyes upward toward an open space above her, "that if I were that little white cloud and could float over the whole world and drop down on any spot I chose that I could drop into a lovelier place than this." Then she brought her gaze again to earth, and her mind went out between the shadowy trunks which stretched away and away and away toward the mysteries of the forest, which must always be mysteries to her because it was impossible for her to get to them and solve them—that is, if she remained awake. But if Master Morpheus should happen by, she might yet know everything—for there are no mysteries which cannot be solved in dreams.

Master Morpheus came, but with him came also Arthur Raybold; not by the little pathway that approached from the direction of the lake, but parting the bushes as if he had been exploring. When she heard footsteps behind her, Margery looked up quickly.

"Mr. Raybold!" she exclaimed. "How on earth did you happen here?"

"I did not happen," said he, wiping his brow with his handkerchief. "I have been looking for you, and I have had tough work of it. I saw you go into the woods, and I went in also, but some distance below here, and I have had a hard and tiresome job working my way up to you; but I have found you. I knew I should, for I had bent my mind to the undertaking."

"Well, I wish you hadn't," said Margery, in a vexed tone. "I came here to be alone and take a nap, and I wish you would find some other nice place and go and take a nap yourself."

He smiled deeply. "That would not answer my purpose at all," said he. "Napping is far from my desires."

"But I don't care anything about your desires," said Margery, in a tone which showed she was truly vexed; "I have pre-empted this place, and I want it to myself. I was just falling into a most delightful doze when you came, and I don't think you had any right to come here and disturb me."

"The sense of right, Miss Dearborn," said he, "comes from the heart, and we do not have to ask other people what it is. My heart has given me the right to come here, and here I am."

"And what in the name of common-sense are you here for?" said Margery. "Speaking about your heart makes me think you came here to make love to me. Is that it?"

"It was," said he; "and I wish you to hear me."

"Mr. Raybold," said she, her eyes as bright, he thought, as if they had belonged to his sister when she was urging some of her favorite views upon a company, "I won't listen to one word of such stuff. This is no place for love-making, and I won't have it. If you want to make love to me you can wait until I go home, and then you can come and speak to my mother about it, and when you have spoken to her you can speak to me, but I won't listen to it here. Not one word!"

Thus did the indignant craftiness of Margery express itself. "It's a good deal better," she thought, "than telling him no, and having him keep on begging and begging."

"Miss Dearborn," said Raybold, "what I have to say cannot be postponed. The words within me must be spoken, and I came here to speak them."

With a sudden supple twist Margery turned herself, hammock and all, and stood on her feet on the ground. "Martin!" she cried, at the top of her voice.

Raybold stepped back astonished. "What is this?" he exclaimed. "Am I to understand—"

Before he had time to complete his sentence Martin Sanders sprang into the scene.

"What is it?" he exclaimed, with a glare at Raybold, as if he suspected why he had been called.

"Martin," said Margery, with a good deal of sharpness in her voice, "I want you to take down this hammock and carry it away. I can't stay here any longer. I thought that at least one quiet place out-of-doors could be found where I would not be disturbed, but it seems there is no such place. Perhaps you can hang the hammock somewhere near our cabin."

Martin's face grew very red. "I don't think," said he, "that you ought to be obliged to go away because you have been disturbed. Whoever disturbed you should go away, and not you."

Now Mr. Raybold's face also grew red. "There has been enough of this!" he exclaimed. "Guide, you can go where you came from. You are not wanted here. If Miss Dearborn wishes her hammock taken down, I will take it." Then turning to Margery, he continued: "You do not know what it is I have to say to you. If you do not hear me now, you will regret it all your life. Send this man away."

"I would very much like to send a man away if I knew how to do it," said Margery.

"Do it?" cried Martin. "Oh, Miss Dearborn, if you want it done, ask me to do it for you!"

"You?" shouted Raybold, making two steps toward the young guide; and then he stopped, for Margery stood in front of him.

"I have never seen two men fight," said she, "and I don't say I wouldn't like it, just once; but you would have to have boxing-gloves on; I couldn't stand a fight with plain hands, so you needn't think of it. Martin, take down the hammock just as quickly as you can. And if you want to stay here, Mr. Raybold, you can stay; and if you want to talk, you can talk to the trees."

Martin heaved a sigh of disappointment, and proceeded to unfasten the hammock from the trees to which it had been tied. For a moment Raybold looked as if he were about to interfere, but there was something in the feverish agility of the young guide which made his close proximity as undesirable as that of a package of dynamite.

Margery turned to leave the place, but suddenly stopped. She would wait until Martin was ready to go with her. She would not leave those two young men alone.

Raybold was very angry. He knew well that such a chance for a private interview was not likely to occur again, and he would not give up. He approached the young girl.

"Margery," he said, "if you—"

"Martin," she cried to the guide, who was now ready to go, "put down that hammock and come here. Now, sir," she said, turning to Raybold, "let me hear you call me Margery again."

She waited for about a half a minute, but she was not called by name. Then she and Martin went away. She had nearly reached the cabin before she spoke, and then she turned to the young man and said: "Martin, you needn't trouble yourself about putting up that hammock now; I don't want to lie in it. I am going into the house. I am very much obliged to you for the way you stood by me."

"Stood by you!" he exclaimed, in a low voice, which seemed struggling in the grasp of something which might or might not be stronger than itself. "You don't know how glad I am to stand by you, and how I would always—"

"Thank you," said Margery; "thank you very much," and she walked away toward the cabin.

"Oh, dear!" she sighed, as she opened the door and went in.

XVI.—A MAN WHO FEELS HIMSELF A MAN.

TOWARD the end of the afternoon, when the air had grown cooler, Mr. Archibald proposed a boating expedition to the lower end of the lake. His boat was large enough for Matlack, the three ladies, and himself, and if the two young men wished to follow, they had a boat of their own.

When first asked to join the boating party Miss Corona Raybold hesitated; she did not care very much about boating; but when she found that if she staid in camp she would have no one to talk to, she accepted the invitation.

Mr. Archibald took the oars nearest the stern, while Matlack seated himself forward, and this arrangement suited Miss Corona exactly.

The boat kept down the middle of the lake, greatly aided by the current, and Corona talked steadily to Mr. Archibald. Mrs. Archibald, who always wanted to do

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

what was right, and did not like to be left out of any conversation on important subjects, made now and then a remark, and whenever she spoke Corona turned to her and listened with the kindest attention, but the moment the elder lady had finished, the other resumed her own thread of observation without the slightest allusion to what she had just heard.

As for Mr. Archibald, he seldom said a word. He listened, sometimes his eyes twinkled, and he pulled easily and steadily. Doubtless he had a good many ideas, but none of them was expressed. As for Margery, she leaned back in the stern, and thought that, after all, she liked Miss Raybold better than she did her brother, for the young lady did not speak one word to her, nor did she appear to regard her in any way.

"But how on earth," thought Margery, "can she float over this beautiful water and under that lovely sky, with the grandeur of the forest all about her, and yet pay not the slightest attention to anything she sees, but keep steadily talking about her own affairs and the society she belongs to, I cannot imagine. She might as well live in a cellar and have pamphlets and reformers shoved down to her through the coal-hole."

Messrs. Clyde and Raybold accompanied the larger boat in their own skiff. It was an unwieldy craft, with but one pair of oars, and as the two young men were not accustomed to rowing together, and as Mr. Raybold was not accustomed to rowing at all and did not like it, Mr. Clyde pulled the boat. But, do what he could, it was impossible for him to get near the other boat. Matlack, who was not obliged to listen to Miss Corona, kept his eye upon the following skiff, and seemed to fear a collision if the two boats came close together, for if Clyde pulled hard he pulled harder. Arthur Raybold was not satisfied.

"I thought you were a better oarsman," he said to the other; "but now I suppose we shall not come near them until we land."

But the Archibald party did not land. Under the guidance of Matlack they swept slowly around the lower end of the lake; they looked over the big untenanted camp-ground there; they stopped for a moment to gaze into the rift in the forest through which ran the stream which connected this lake with another beyond it, and then they rowed homeward, keeping close to the farther shore, so as to avoid the strength of the current.

Clyde, who had not reached the end of the lake, now turned and determined to follow the tactics of the other boat and keep close to the shore, but on the side nearest to the camp. This exasperated Raybold.

"What are you trying to do?" he said. "If you keep in the middle we may get near them, and why should we be on one side of the lake and they on the other?"

"I want to get back as soon as they do," said Clyde, "and I don't want to pull against the current."

"Stop!" said Raybold. "If you are tired, let me have the oars."

Harrison Clyde looked for a minute at his companion, and then deliberately changed the course of the boat and rowed straight toward the shore, paying no attention whatever to the excited remonstrances of Raybold. He beached the boat at a rather poor landing-place among some bushes, and then, jumping out, he made her fast.

"What do you mean?" cried Raybold, as he scrambled on shore. "Is she leaking more than she did? What is the matter?"

"She is not leaking more than usual," said the other; "but I am not going to pull against that current with you growling in the stern. I am going to walk back to camp."

In consequence of this resolution the two young men reached Camp Rob about the same time that the Archibald boat touched shore, and at least an hour before they would have arrived had they remained in their boat.

The party was met by Mrs. Perkenpine, bearing letters and newspapers. A man had arrived from Sadler's in their absence, and he had brought the mail. Nearly every one had letters; there was even something for Martin. Standing where they had landed, seated on bits of rock, on the grass, or on camp-chairs, all read their letters.

While thus engaged a gentleman approached the party from the direction of Camp Roy. He was tall, well built, handsomely dressed in a suit of light brown tweed, and carried himself with a buoyant uprightness. A neat straw hat with a broad ribbon shaded his smooth-shaven face, which sparkled with cordial good-humor. A blue cravat was tied tastefully under a broad white collar, and in his hand he carried a hickory walking-stick, cut in the woods, but good enough for a city sidewalk. Margery was the first to raise her eyes at the sound of the quickly approaching footsteps.

"Goodness gracious!" she exclaimed, and then everybody looked up.

For a moment the new-comer was gazed upon in silence. From what gigantic bandbox could this well-dressed stranger have dropped? Then, with a loud laugh, Mr. Archibald cried, "The bishop!"

No wonder there had not been instant recognition. The loose, easy-fitting clothes gave no hint of redundant plumpness; no soiled shovel-hat cast a shadow over the smiling face, and a glittering shirt front banished all thought of gutta-percha.

"Madam," exclaimed the bishop, raising his hat and stepping quickly toward Mrs. Archibald, "I cannot express the pleasure I feel in meeting you again. And as for you, sir," holding out his hand to Mr. Archibald, "I have no words in which to convey my feelings. Look upon a man, sir, who feels himself a man, and remember from what you raised him. I can say no more now, but I can never forget what you have done," and as he spoke he pressed Mr. Archibald's hand with an honest fervor, which distorted for a moment the features of that gentleman.

From one to the other of the party the bishop glanced, as he said, "How glad, how unutterably glad, I am to be again among you!" Turning his eyes toward Miss Raybold, he stopped. That young lady had put down the letter she was reading, and was gazing at him through her spectacles with calm intensity. "This lady," said the bishop, turning toward Raybold, "is your sister, I presume? May I have the honor?"

Raybold looked at him without speaking. Here was an example of the silly absurdity of throwing pearls before swine. He had never wanted to have anything to do with the fellow when he was in the gutter, and he wanted nothing to do with him now.

With a little flush on her face Mrs. Archibald rose.

"Miss Raybold," she said, "let me present to you," and she hesitated for a moment—"the gentleman we call the bishop. I think you have heard us speak of him."

"Yes," said Miss Raybold, rising, with a charming smile on her handsome face, and extending her hand, "I have heard of him, and I am very glad to meet him."

"I have also heard of you," said the bishop, as he stood smiling beside Corona's camp-chair; "and I have regretted that I have been the innocent means of preventing you for a time from occupying your brother's camp."

"Oh, do not mention that," said Corona, sweetly. "I walked over there yesterday, and I think it is a great deal pleasanter here, so you have really done me a favor. I am particularly glad to see you, because, from the little I have heard said about you, I think you must agree with some of my cherished opinions. For one thing, I am quite certain you favor the assertion of individuality; your actions prove that."

"Really," said the bishop, seating himself near her, "I have not given much thought to the subject; but I suppose I have asserted my individuality; but if I have, I have done it indefinitely. Everybody about me having some definite purpose in life, and I having none, I am, in a negative way, a distinctive individual. It is a pity I am so different from other people, but—"

"No, it is not a pity," interrupted Corona, the color coming into her cheeks and a brighter light into her eyes. "Our individuality is a sacred responsibility. It is given to us for us to protect and encourage—I may say, to revere. It is a trust for which we should be called to account by ourselves, and we shall be false and disloyal to ourselves if we cannot show that we have done everything in our power for the establishment and recognition of our individuality."

"It delights me to hear you speak in that way," exclaimed the bishop. "It encourages and cheers me. We are what we are; and if we can be more fully what we are than we have been, then we are more truly ourselves than before."

"And what can be nobler," cried Corona, "than to be, in the most distinctive sense of the term, ourselves?"

Mr. and Mrs. Archibald walked together toward their cabin.

"I want to be neighborly and hospitable," said he, "but it seems to me that, now that the way is clear for Miss Raybold to move her tent to her own camp and set up housekeeping there, we should not be called upon to entertain her, and, if we want to enjoy ourselves in our own way, we can do it without thinking of her."

"We shall certainly not do it," said his wife, "if we do think of her. I am very much disappointed in her. She is not a companion at all for Margery; she never speaks to her; and, on the other hand, I should think you would wish she never spoke to you."

"Well," said her husband, "that feeling did grow upon me somewhat this afternoon. Up to a certain point she is amusing."

Here he was interrupted by Mrs. Perkenpine, who planted herself before him.

"Is'pose you think I didn't do right," she said, "'cause, when that big bundle came it had your name on it; but I knew it was clothes, and that they was for that maf in our camp, and so I took them to him myself. I heard Phil say that the sooner that man was up and dressed, the better it would be for all parties; and as Martin had gone off, and there wasn't nobody to take his clothes to him, I took them to him, and that's the long and short of it."

"I wondered how he got them," said Mr. Archibald; "but I am glad you carried them to him." Then, speaking to his wife, he added, "It may be a good thing that I gave him a chance to assert his individuality."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

JULES CAMBON, FRENCH AMBASSADOR TO THE UNITED STATES, IN CHARGE OF PEACE NEGOTIATIONS ON BEHALF OF SPAIN.

WITH GENERAL MERRITT.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

HEADQUARTERS OF THE EXPEDITION TO THE PHILIPPINES,
S.S. "NEWPORT," HONOLULU, July 7.

THE chronicle of this voyage, the first stage of which has been successfully and, in the main, not unpleasantly passed, cannot fail to be of interest, not as a record of incidents of sea travel, which in the hands of the most accomplished writer might present little novel, but as contributing to the intimate history of this noteworthy and history-making enterprise. The inexorable decrees of Neptune have not been suspended for us, nor have we failed, on the other hand, to appreciate the contrasting delights of travel in the balmy trade-winds that scarcely ruffle the sapphire expanse of the Pacific. The departure of the Newport on the morning of the 29th of June was accompanied by the display of fervent patriotic enthusiasm which the emotional people of San Francisco have not restrained on the occasion of the sailing of other detachments of the Philippine expedition. But the departure of the Newport with General Merritt, his personal and department staff, together with about five hundred picked troops, caused a degree and quality of excitement which was most gratifying to witness. Scarcely had we turned our thoughts from the friends we were leaving, to the consideration of personal comfort, scarcely had we time to note the vanishing of the bold outlines of the noble headlands of the Golden Gate into the gray veil of summer mist, before we were headed and lashed by the advance gusts of a severe gale, which soon compelled the steamer to lie to and hammer the vicious sea for seventeen long hours. The transport is fortunately not crowded beyond the measure of comparative comfort, although the lower deck, where the men are berthed in five rows of double bunks three tiers high, cannot be said to offer the most sumptuous accommodations. The chief subject of complaint has been so far the lack of mess-room for eating, and the men find it at times very difficult to manage their mess-tins and their cups of soup or coffee without any available table-room to balance them on.

General Merritt, however, at considerable discomfort to himself and to his officers, has not restricted the circulation of the men on the decks, and they wander at will at all times of the day and night all over the ship, except of course in the saloon and social hall, where the officers are quartered in comfortable, airy staterooms. On the lower deck, admirably ventilated through a large forward hatch, and several small ones with wind-sails, the Astor Battery is quartered forward, K Battery of the Third Regular Heavy Artillery in the waist of the ship, and H Battery near the stern. After the storm was over and we were able to stand away on our true course again, the men were not slow to crawl out from their quarters, and the decks were covered by a chattering happy crowd, apparently devoting the larger part of their time to the consumption of food. Many of them produced tins of preserves and other delicacies to tempt their appetites, jaded by the turmoil of the past days. The chronic grumblers found the bill of fare too solid and heavy for any human being to eat; they even went so far as to criticise the liberality with which the rations were dispensed. But the grumblers we have always with us, although they find on this boat few active supporters and plenty of philosophical opponents.

Fourth of July, fortunately, turned out a perfect day. Certain crude luxuries, like apple-duff, were added to the bill of fare of the soldiers, and an impromptu entertainment was managed on the upper deck. Father Doherty, the chaplain of the expedition, followed the reading of the Declaration of Independence by Colonel Whipple with a vigorous and inspiring though brief oration, and the glee club of the Astor Battery sang the usual patriotic songs. As there is no band aboard, the popular music of the day, often sung to words written by a witty member of the coterie, furnishes the only entertainment of a musical order possible aboard. In the saloon, after luncheon, a short list of toasts was drunk in punch strong enough to satisfy a Russian, and thus we, with no cloud over our spirits, without a thought of the uncertainties of the future, which, it must be confessed, come to all of us at times, cheered by the companionship of sympathetic friends, and unconsciously exalted by the ineffaceable memories of the festival at home, pricked off a red-letter day in our calendar. Who can tell when and where we shall put another indelible mark to record an event to be remembered in the history we are helping to make?

A slight accident to the machinery on the afternoon of the 5th stopped the revolution of the screw for five hours and more. The teeming life on the boat seemed suspended

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

PUERTO-RICAN COMMISSIONERS ACCOMPANYING GENERAL MILES'S ARMY.
Photograph by M. W. Tennant, Newport News.

for a moment at the sudden pause in the forward motion, and then took a new and more active start. Sharks were seen in great numbers, and several were hauled up the side, but each one succeeded in breaking away just as the men with cheers and laughter had hauled his vicious head up to the rail. This pastime was perforce suspended as soon as the screw began to churn the water again and the monotony of the trip, if that can be called monotony which is a succession of amusing human incidents. Then naturally all thoughts were turned toward Honolulu. The last day before reaching port was the happiest day of the week on the water. Eager to have a run on shore, and anticipating pleasures which I am afraid did not fully materialize, imagining prospective beauties of tropical scenery which were more than realized, the whole ship's company were in a state of mild exultation. The quartermasters issued shore-going suits of tan-colored linen, with thin underwear, and the non-commissioned officers made up their squads for landing. The excitement of trying on the new clothes and the occupation of letter-writing made the day seem all too short. The officers appeared shy as schoolboys at first in suits of gray linen with blue or red trimmings. Helmets of unexpected shape and startling size were produced, and, but for the knowledge that this was to be only a brief pause in our voyage, we should all have felt much as the passengers on an Atlantic liner do when Queenstown is passed or the Lizard sighted. The hazy outlines of Molokai shimmered in the distant horizon to the south just before sunset.

When we landed, early in the morning, the little town was already given over to peaceful military occupation. Soldiers everywhere, most of them, following the pleasant custom of the island, decorated with wreaths of pinks and garlands of fragrant leaves and flowers. In the shade of great trees and palm-thatched bowers in the grounds of the old palace tables were laid, heavy with tropical fruits and more solid food; and already, long before noon, hundreds of ladies had assembled to welcome the soldiers, and, after the feast was over, Mrs. Dole and her friends held an informal reception on the green. Hawaiian hospitality has unique and fascinating elements of grace and picturesqueness in it which make such a festival as I have briefly alluded to the most perfect in the world. Nor are the men who enjoy it unworthy of it or unappreciative of its rare qualities. Marshal Brown, who is at the head of the police force of the island, informs me that up to this date not a single arrest of a soldier has been made, and not a disturbance of the peace of any kind has been reported to him. This, with all restraints of discipline temporarily suspended, with all the excitement of novel surroundings and the temptations of abundant hospitality, proves the temper of the men, and is worth as much to the cause they are fighting for as a victory in the field.

PROGRAMME OF EXERCISES ON BOARD THE STEAMER "NEWPORT" OF NEW YORK ON THE FOURTH OF JULY, 1898.

1. Prayer.....Chaplain Doherty.
2. "Star-spangled Banner".....Astor Battery Glee Club.
3. Declaration of Independence.....Read by Major C. H. Whipple.
4. "America".....Astor Battery Glee Club.
5. Oration.....Chaplain Doherty.
6. "Red, White, and Blue".....Astor Battery Glee Club.

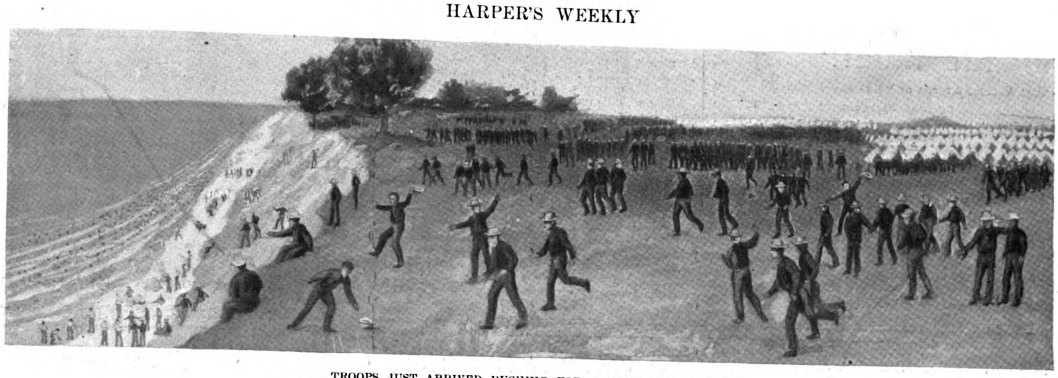
Officers and enlisted men will assemble in front of the officers' cabins, on the hurricane-deck, 11.30 A.M.

COMMITTEE OF ARRANGEMENTS.

Colonel Pope, Colonel McClure, Major Kilbourne, Major Strother, Major Bement, and Captain March.

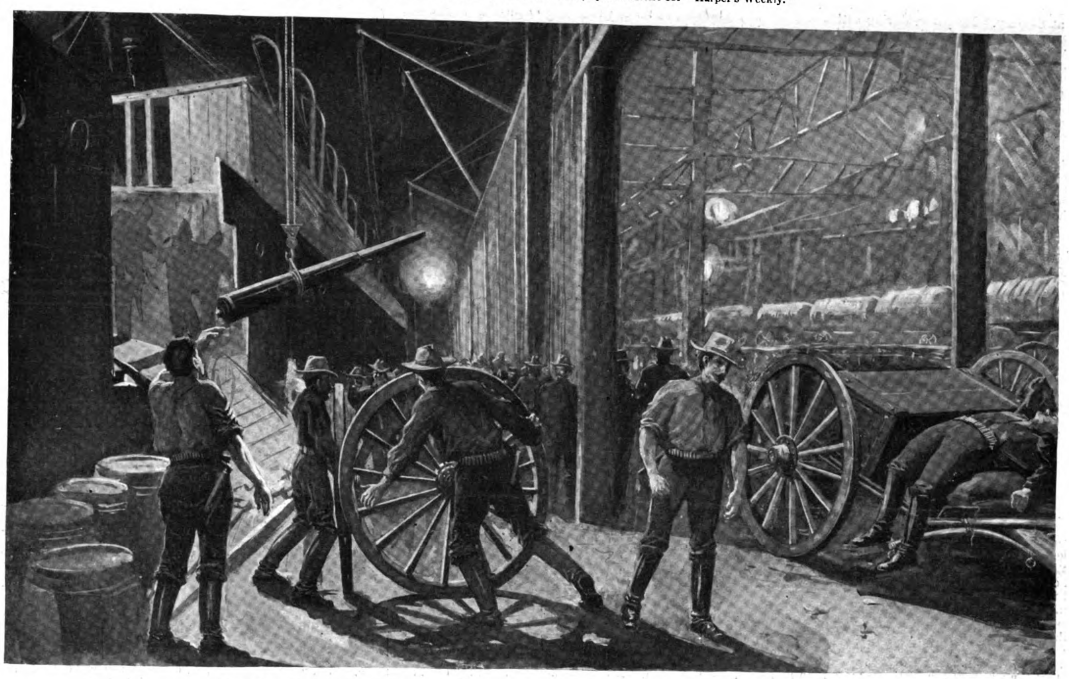
TOASTS AFTER LUNCH.

1. Our Country and Our President.....Major-General Merritt.
2. Nations Friendly To Us and the Queen of England.....Mr. Frank D. Millet.
3. Our General Commanding the Army of the Philippines.....Colonel McClure.
4. A Modern Crusade.....General Babcock.
5. The Day We Celebrate.....Mr. Murat Halstead.
6. The Girls We Left Behind Us.....General Whittier.
7. The Army and The Navy.....Colonel Crowder.
8. Our Good Ship Newport, and Her Gallant Captain and Crew: To be drunk standing.....Captain Saunders.

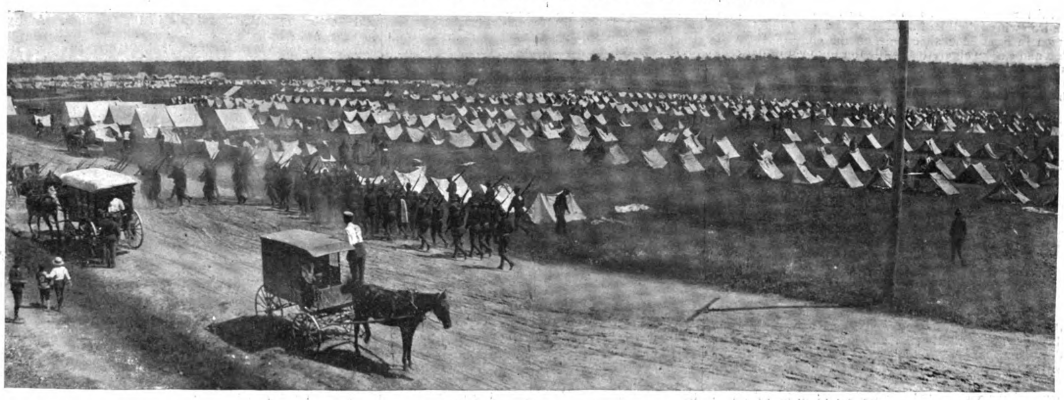


Three Cheers for General Merritt and the Day We Celebrate.

F. D. MILLET.



WITH THE THIRD MANILA EXPEDITION AT HONOLULU.
Group of American and Hawaiian Officers and Officials on the Veranda of the "Bungalow."—Photograph by Davey.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

TROOPS JUST ARRIVED RUSHING FOR A SWIM IN THE SURF.
After a Sketch made on the Spot by T. Dart Walker, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly."

LOADING LIGHT ARTILLERY ON BOARD THE TRANSPORTS AT TWO O'CLOCK IN THE MORNING.
After a Sketch made on the Spot by T. Dart Walker, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly."

BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF CAMP.
Photograph by M. W. Tennant, Newport News, Virginia.

OFF FOR PUERTO RICO—SCENES AT NEWPORT NEWS.

COMMISSIONERS TO PUERTO RICO.

On the opposite page is a picture of the group of Puerto-Rican commissioners who were selected, under direction of General Miles, by former Consul-General Warner P. Sutton and Captain Whitney of General Miles's staff, to land in Puerto Rico with our army and apprise the people of their several localities of the present status of the war between the United States and Spain, and of the intention of the United States to annex Puerto Rico.

They are to give their former neighbors a general idea of our institutions, and of the advantages to Puerto Rico which will follow annexation. They went to the island on the cruiser St. Louis.

Their intention, as set forth by General Mattei and Mr. Fajardo, is to establish newspapers at once in Puerto Rico, through which, as well as by circulars, the announcements of General Miles may be circulated in the island. The Puerto Rico Junta in New York has advocated independence rather than annexation, but these commissioners have all along been annexationists, and were chosen for their present duty largely on that ground. Mr. Sutton has a large acquaintance in Puerto Rico, and understands the people there, and being on terms of warm friendship with the annexationist leaders, is likely to be very useful in promoting good feeling between the people of the island and our forces.

The fact that the commissioners seem to have got their flag upside down indicates that they are not quite used to it yet; but the American flag is already much more familiar to the Puerto-Ricans than it was when the picture was made.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE TRUCE.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

Chaffee's Headquarters, July 10, 1898.

It is Sunday at the trenches. A truce is on, and the band that helped the wounded in the wake of Chaffee's charging brigade is playing "Calvary."

"Hosanna!"

It is the most cheerful spot on a battle-field—the trenches—and a comparatively safe spot for the non-combatant even during action. Men at the front see their comrades drop, usually, without an outcry, and pass on, if advancing, under an excitement of conflict that quickly makes them callous. At the trenches, and after sharp action is over, the dead are buried; the wounded and the sick are carried to the rear—to be seen no more, unless they come back to take a place in the ranks again. The firing dies down to the popping duel of sharp-shooters and the uncanny whistle of a vagrant shell. A short peace of reaction follows, which quiets the strained nerves, but does not last long; the men get restless and impatient quickly. But while they may sit in the sun by day and sleep in the mud at night, as they did here before Santiago, they are saved contact with that ghastly road of choking odors and choking memories that leads through the rear, and to the still pitiful pictures under the hospital tents at Siboney. Moreover, during action the Spanish fire sweeps that same road between the base of the hill under the trenches and the woods, and makes the zone of just getting to the front or just getting away more dangerous even than the front itself; and then to the man who must go to the rear there has always been the inglorious and enraging possibility of being potted in the back by a sharp-shooter from a royal palm or a mango-tree. Lastly, the bands play up and down the lines, and, especially when a truce comes, a curious spirit of holiday pervades the air. There is nothing more incongruous, nothing more grotesque, on the field after a battle than the sight of a bass-drum or a big bass-horn lying, as I saw several on the afternoon of July 1, just under the conquered Spanish trenches. But it is very fine and inspiriting next morning to hear both booming to a Sousa march or a jolly negro melody; and it is moving beyond words just now to hear "Calvary" swelling reverently overhead, and breaking gently against the still green spires that far up the valley thrust themselves now and then into cloud-land.

"Hosanna! Glory to God!"

The wind is gentle and cool, the air is clear and brilliant, the sun shines, the mountains are divine in majesty and peace, but it is glory to the God of Battles that band is playing now, for the memories of Caney still bleed, and with more than half a circle of bayonets we invest Santiago; a truce is on, and we are expecting the Spaniard to give up his plucky fight.

Last night Major-General Lawton, who is never to be caught napping, for the reason that he never seems to sleep (I believe he never went to his cot the first week except to have the shirt in which he came ashore restored to its original color), shot out his right flank a mile and a half, so that, with the Cubans, out of whom he can get more work than any other general in the army, he holds El Cobre road—the last avenue of escape for the Spanish to the hills.

General Ludlow is next the Cubans, and keen, watchful, untiring Chaffee—a major-general too, since his reckless courage and strong fight at Caney—touches Ludlow's left flank on one side, and, on the other, the right flank of that nimble old veteran, who scales trees for personal reconnoissance and mounts his horse for battle from an ambulance—General Wheeler. Of this division, and of the whole line, indeed, Colonel Roosevelt of course has the shortest air-line from his rifle-pits to the Spanish trenches. Kent's division starts from Wheeler, following ever the throttling sweep of a circle.

So that the wings of the army are more than half shut, like the wings of our bird of freedom when he drops through the air for prey. Therefore we have sent the Spaniard word that unless he gives up the fight this day the awful rending of beak and claws shall begin again, and the iron wings shall be folded closer. Meanwhile the little men in light blue sit calmly on the edge of their trenches and smoke cigarettes, while the big men in dark blue sit on the edge of theirs and good-humoredly cast tobacco juice towards Santiago. Down in the hollows midway between the lines are Spanish soldiers and American soldiers gathering yams and mangoes, with only a narrow cocoanut grove between them. For half an hour I watched two of the Americans trying to round up and drive into our lines half a dozen horses that were running loose in a field and belonged to Spanish officers, until a major, fearing that the mischievous dare-devils might bring on an engagement during a truce, sent a lieutenant down to stop them. The lieutenant rode a gray mule as a flag of truce, and I rode down with him, but the Spaniards paid as little attention to us as they paid to the men we were after, and the lieutenant rebuked these men with a stern severity in his voice that was not, I'm sure, in his heart, and they let the horses alone. At one point along the line two Spanish officers came towards our trenches and signalled for our officers to approach, which they did. The Spaniards said they had been trying to get over for two days, and I am told they were good fellows; that they brought along a little rum, and Spaniard and American drank mutual healths, and swore with equal heartiness at the Cuban, and declared that motive of the war a wicked shame. And by-and-by, when peace was come, they would have a dinner at the Waldorf, and talk it all over, and be decorously merry.

However, the rumor now is that the Spaniards are not going to surrender to-day, and we begin firing at noon. Meanwhile we have given the enemy nine round days of fair weather in which to recover his spirits, gather yams, and make good and ready for his fight in the last ditch.

There are many others besides us who are anxious to get into Santiago—eighteen thousand others, indeed—the half-starved refugees who came out of Santiago when we announced that we meant to shell the town, and are waiting at the little conquered town of Caney for the time when they may go home again. I was there yesterday afternoon under the guidance of the Major, with whom I came down on the Iroquois, and it is a distressing scene. The town is built about a plaza, and the houses—those that are not thatched hovels—are low, and have blue walls and red-tiled roofs. At the head of the plaza stands a big and very old cathedral, which is a storehouse just now for Uncle Sam, whose generous right hand reaches daily from the door to give rations to his enemy as to himself, while the left stays under his coat tails unknowing. They are mostly women and children, the refugees—white women, yellow women and children, the refugees—white women, yellow women, brown women, and black women; and babies black, babies brown, babies yellow, and white babies: ludicrous mites, some of them, and nearly all as naked as they were at birth. Some of the women were the wives and widows of Spanish officers, and the few men in the crowd were sick or aged or straggling Cubans. Most of the refugees expected to be out of Santiago only a day or two, so even the well-to-do were hungry, and the poor and the reconcentrados were nearly starved. The distribution of rations, in spite of priest and soldiers, was in consequence little more than a moblike fight for hardtack. It is such a town as would have about one thousand inhabitants in our States. Imagine, then, how these refugees are crowded! The plaza is a swarm of women and children; the streets, the curb-stones, the narrow sidewalks, are massed with women and children; so are the porches, door-steps, doorways, hallways; the back yards and side yards are full, and so is the little creek that runs between the town and the shattered stone fort which Chaffee stormed. And always the cry is, "Mucha hambre! mucha hambre!" But when they are not hungry they are as laughing and light-hearted as though they had not a care in the world and would never get hungry again. Not one over five years of age and under sixty but knew the Major—who had been playing the part of a summer Santa Claus in the town—and had a smile for him; and for each the Major had a smile, while the fat little priest who gave out the bread called him his brother, and embraced him as such. And how the dusky groups of roguish girls in the porches flashed dark eyes and white teeth at him as he rode by, and how the Major smiled back and loved it all!

The Major has done his work well. During the fight around Caney, his duties led him several times into the "jaws of hell," as he says, and he went in—not without flinching, for the Major is frank, but he went in. Once he was sent with a guard of five troopers to find General Ludlow.

"The bullets in one lane were like hail," said the Major. "'Don't go down there, sir,' said a soldier. 'You'll be killed. General Ludlow is back there.' I rode back through that awful lane. 'Where is General Ludlow?' I said to a soldier. 'General Ludlow—' he said, and a bullet caught him in the forehead, and he fell dead. I was sent to another place, and another, and I couldn't find him. Finally I went to an old officer. 'Colonel,' I said, 'I've been looking for General Ludlow for two hours, and can't find him. I've got five troopers here. I'm not married myself, and of course I don't care for myself, but they're all married men, and I've got to think of them. I don't want to risk their lives any more. Now, I'm a tenderfoot, and I ask you frankly what ought I to do?' 'Don't you report to your superior officer,' said the Colonel, 'until you have found General Ludlow.' That was enough for me, and off I started, but I said to the troopers, 'You needn't come; not a one of you.' But every one came. Once I got ahead of our own line. I heard a click, looked up, and there was a Spanish picket-post not fifty yards away, with their guns levelled. I lay down on my horse and skipped. The bullets whistled, but I wasn't touched. Finally I did find him. 'This way, Webb, my boy,' he called from the woods. It was hot in there. 'Stoop, sir; stoop,' said a soldier; and as I stooped the poor fellow himself got a bullet in the breast. 'Here you are,' called the general, who was standing straight, with his shoulders squared. I straightened up my backbone too, though I never felt so humble in my life, and I gave my message and started away. When I had got off fifty yards the general called me back through that death-hole. I left again, and if he didn't call me back again! 'General,' I said, 'for God's sake, don't call me back any more.' He laughed, and didn't; and here I am."

So, now that promotions rustle the Cuban air, the Major says frankly, and with logic and justice: "If I am a staff officer, put me back in the rear and let me be ornamental. If I am to have duties steadily on the firing-line and ahead of it, as I had, and do them, as I did—here's So-and-so and So-and-so being made colonel, brigadier-general, and major-general—what do I get?"

Noon now, and the Spaniards decline to surrender. We shall begin bombarding at four. Meanwhile here is the story of the day's advance towards Santiago, brought up by a croaker from the rear: The correspondent's hammock swung, at corps headquarters, from the limb of a mango-tree. The siege-guns were behind because the roads were bad; the pack-mules tramped through mud; the wagons creaked through mire; and men on foot—even the wounded one day—waded the bridgeless creek four or five times between front and the rear, and yet a body of volunteers and an engineer or two were busy all morning cutting a wagon-road through thick brush to the top of a low hill about three-quarters of a mile away. At noon, while staff-officers, aides, and attachés were at lunch, came the order to move camp. Lunch stopped short, off hustled aide and attaché, the big wagons rolled in, and there was a great falling of tents and a mighty bustle for fear the wagons might roll out again before each man had his outfit tossed in. Such was the hurry that even the solemn and elegant attachés hurriedly helped to fold their own things. Out came the guard of mounted troopers; out the guard of infantry; out the Spanish prisoners; and out the correspondents, who sought to keep in touch with the source of the done, the doing, and the undone; out came the commanding general, mounted, and with his left foot swathed; out the very tall aide and the courtly inspector-general and other members of the staff; out the attachés and their orderlies and servants—all mounted—everybody mounted except the infantry, the Spanish prisoners, and the correspondents, whose horses were left behind at Tampa. The general led the way, followed by the very tall aide, the courtly inspector-general, the other staff-officers, the attachés, the troopers, the three big army-wagons with their six-mule teams, the infantry, the Spanish prisoners, and the correspondents—and the long train wound laboriously along and up the wagon-road cut that morning through thick brush by engineer and volunteer, when the one road from front to rear was muddy and bridgeless, and the siege-guns were still where they staid till the end—behind. Now and then the procession halted for axemen to clean out a bush and broaden the road here and there, but in time it crawled slowly to the top of the hill. There the general swept horizon and hill with his eye for perhaps three minutes. Then he turned his horse. The very tall aide turned his horse. The courtly inspector-general, the aides, and attachés turned theirs. Turned, too, the heavy wagons, creaking, and the six mules each; turned troopers, infantry, Spanish prisoners; turned correspondents—aside into the grass to laugh; and as the long train wound up, so wound it down—down the trail that engineer and volunteer had laboriously cut through thick brush that morning, and back to the same still smoking camp. There the general swept the scene with his eye, rode to a fresh spot a little way off, and halted. And there, one hundred yards from where it sat before, sits the general's camp to-day. The hammock of the correspondent swings from the same limb of the mango-tree.

The poor wounded have had a hard time. Apparently the powers thought there were not going to be any wounded; and, without doubt, few on Cuban soil dreamed there would be so many. The wounded at Las Guasimas were carried three miles to Siboney by hand, for when that fight was over not a wagon for ammunition, supplies, or hospital needs was on shore.

Especially at Caney, men not seriously wounded lay for hours awaiting their turn after the men who were worse hurt. Nowhere were hospital preparations complete enough in tents, medicine, nurses, or surgeons, on the field, in the rear, or at Siboney. At Siboney the surgeons had not time to get the names, or even to count the number brought in. If you wanted to see a wounded friend, you had to walk the aisle between the row of bandaged soldiers, until you found him. And the way those brave fellows took their suffering! Sometimes the jolting ambulances were too much, and soldiers would pray for the driver, when he stopped, not to start again. One man groaned. "Grit yer teeth," said another, an old Irish sergeant, sternly—"grit yer teeth; there's others that's hurt here except you."

The sergeant himself was shot through the head, and thereafter no man in that ambulance uttered a sound. It was the slightly hurt, the men who were wounded in the leg or arm, who made the most noise.

Three men were brought into a hospital from San Juan. The surgeon took the one who was groaning. He had a mere scratch on one leg. Another was dressed, and as the third sat silently on a chair, still another was attended, and another, before the surgeon turned to the man who was so patiently awaiting his turn.

"Where are you hurt?"

The man pointed to his left side.

"Through?"

"Yes, sir."

I have told of that wounded courtier Cosby, who, feverish, trembling, with a scraped temple, a badly wounded hand, and a bullet in his chest, staggered painfully some ten miles, waving off all assistance, and confessing at last, as he sat on the beach, in the broiling sun, waiting to be taken to a hospital-ship, that if it were handy, and could be got without too much trouble, he thought he would like a canned peach. Well, out from the firing-line at Caney staggered a soldier with half his face shot away, and went staggering to the rear without aid. On the way he met a mounted staff-officer, and he raised his hand to his hatless, bleeding forehead, in a stern salute, and without a gesture for aid, staggered on. The officer's eyes filled with tears.

"Lieutenant," said a trooper, "I'm wounded."

"Can you get to the rear without help?"

"I think I can, sir," and he started. After twenty paces he pitched forward—dead. His wound was through the heart.

Such are the men who sleep in Cuban soil, who lie in the hospitals and on the transports at Siboney and on the big white relief-ship, that was as grateful a gift from home as though it had come from the Almighty Himself. And such are the men who might have been saved death or suffering if we had had, as we should have had, a right proportion of sixty cannon instead of sixteen. The source of the trouble seems to have been in our underestimate of the Spaniards in the trenches. And yet the Spaniards have always been famous for guerilla warfare and strong fighting from behind breastworks. In times when the Spanish sailor would take to his knees rather than climb a mast in a storm, his brother on shore and intrenched was giving Napoleon such trouble as that general rarely had with any foe.

It is now half past three, and firing will begin at four. An army buckboard, drawn by a mule and driven by a large gentleman in a pith helmet, is moving along the base of the hill. Here and there a major or colonel, or perhaps a brigadier-general, looks stern. Some of the captains smile. A lieutenant or two grins broadly, and the sarcastic private in the trenches curses bitterly. Our commanding general is passing by.

I have just come down from the trenches to Roosevelt's tent. The hill under the firing-line looks like the abode of cave-dwellers, so burrowed is it with bomb-proofs, which are merely shallow earth caves dug into the side of a hill with the point of a bayonet, and covered with flat projecting roofs of planks and layers of dirt. The men dug bomb proofs and trenches most willingly, especially the negro troopers. "Foh God," said one, as he swung his pick at dusk after the fight of San Juan, "I never thought I'd git to love a pick befoh!"

The men up at the trenches are ready. Their cartridges are piled along the edge of the pits—in the tops of corn-beef cans, on pieces of boards, in little hollows scooped from the dirt—and everybody is eager and expectant. Sergeant Borrowe, bronzed and grimy, is at the breech of his long dynamite-gun, as keen for another experiment as a child with a Christmas toy that he has not fully mastered. A young German stands at a machine-gun not far away.

"It iss nervous at first," he says, "just waiting. But after the shooting begins it iss all right. I hear no bullets—nutting—the gun makes so much noise. Two of my men were killed the udder day, and I shoot on for two hours and not know it."

Across the air-line from Roosevelt's outermost trench I could see a group of Spanish officers ride hastily to the little house opposite and then gallop along the line. Those fellows seem to do things with great ceremony across there. The officers were evidently giving orders when to begin fire, for, as they passed, the straw hats began to

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

drop out of sight in the Spanish trenches. Pretty soon the Spanish flag went up, about one hundred yards from the still flying flag of truce. Then down came the white flag, and up it went again—whimsically. Then a Spaniard seized it, shook it across at the Americans, and pulled it down permanently. But no Spaniard fired. He rarely does first; he is too polite, I suppose.

So we are waiting in Roosevelt's tent for our signal-gun, which is to thunder out on the right flank. A storm is coming. There is vertical lightning up and down the big black mountains in the east. The wind is high, and blowing the plumes of the palm towards Santiago. After it comes a thick gray mist of rain from the mountains, and the drops strike the tent overhead. It is three minutes after four, and no signal-gun yet. I suppose we are waiting for the storm to pass.

"Have you read Salammbô?" asks a voice outside, with an intonation that one hears in a Harvard class-room; "and do you remember Hanno, the fat general, who lay in the shade and scratched himself with a golden spatula?"

Nobody answers; that first shot comes!

An hour and a half later, and the firing has quieted down to the popping duel of the sharp-shooters. We are in the tent again, and an occasional Mauser ball whistles overhead. It is curious, but even the tent-flaps seem to be some sort of a protection against those nasty little insects. The bombardment was, after all, very mild, and this is how it seemed: When the first gun roared to the right, a rattling ran down the line towards us, and the Mausers began to pop and sing. Everybody sprang to his feet and followed Colonel Roosevelt up the hill, each man bending low to lessen the danger surface that his anatomy presented to the bullets coming over the hill. Davis forgot his glasses, and coolly went back for them. I waited for him a while—a very little while—but when several bullets spat around me rather viciously and rather near, I accepted the hospitable invitation of two Rough Riders and crawled under a bomb-proof, between Lieutenant Greenway and Captain Llewellyn. There were about twenty of us in there. The planks overhead were thin, the cracks between them were wide, and the dirt on top was shallow — very shallow. "We're all right except for the shrapnel," said the captain several times. Every now and then a soldier would stick his head outside, or go out to light his pipe or for some other reason, and the captain would call him down sharply:

"Get down there! We don't want to be bothered with wounded men now. Get down!"

We could hear the steady flutter of the machine-gun, the rapid-fire Colt's going like an old-fashioned mowing machine in a meadow, and now and then a shell.

"All right," repeated the captain, "except for the shrapnel."

And the shrapnel were friendly; I could not tell that a ball touched the bomb-proof. The Spaniards were not firing heavily. They were evidently saving their ammunition and waiting for another wild American charge—which never came; and so the bombardment ended in about an hour, as the rain had ended—in a slow patter, an occasional drop, and then in stillness. Indeed, I can almost liken an action of this sort at the trenches to an expected rain-storm in which there is a good deal of lightning. It thunders, the drops begin to patter, and you run for shelter, and you lie in comfort and in safety, except for the chance of being struck by lightning, which flashes sometimes uncomfortably near. By-and-by the storm passes, the rain quiets down to random drops, and you come out into the air, look around at the heavens, and stretch yourself.

Loud cheering rose at the trenches as we turned away, and somebody said that Sergeant Borrowe had tossed a Spanish cannon, a tree, and a mass of mingled breastwork and Spaniards into the air with one charge from his terrible gun. At General Wheeler's headquarters, further down, the report was that the Rough Riders, without orders, had charged along their air-line and had captured the Spanish trenches. Somebody said the one rumor was not true, but nobody seemed to think the other at all improbable.

There was but one fatality on our side that afternoon, and that was a tragedy. On the left flank Captain Rowell of the Second Infantry was instantly killed by a Spanish shell. As a first lieutenant he had waited twenty years for promotion, and his promotion outran his death but a few days.

THE SURRENDER.

Next morning, after the Sunday bombardment, we sent word over to ask the Spaniard if now he would be good. General Toral replied that he would at least be better if the home government would let him. So we gave him time until the following Thursday in which to communicate with Madrid. In the beginning he declined any and all terms of surrender; then an unconditional surrender; then he was willing to march out with the full honors of war, bearing his arms, with his flag flying, and the American soldier doing it homage, to march into another province, and thus be ready to fight us again some day. Now he was considering any terms that did not involve humiliation to Spanish honor and Spanish pride. Meanwhile the heroic figure of General Miles had appeared one fine morning, superbly mounted, and a reverent "Praise God!" ran along the lines. And General Randolph, too, of the artillery. I saw the latter at the front but once. He disappeared then, but I noticed that guns began to roll up from the rear as though they had wings, and I knew the siege-guns, if needed, would follow, even if they had mountains to climb. There was nobody who did not have a cheerful eye on General Randolph.

Thursday came, and the word went around that the Spaniard had come down from his high horse. He would stack his arms, march out, evacuate the province, surrender all the troops in it—some 20,000—and in return we should feed them and carry them back to Spain. The sunny air straightway was rent with cheers. The sickest man in one regiment sprang from his blanket and led all his comrades in a foot-race for the trenches, there to join in the hallelujahs. Still, the doubting were suspicious. The wily Spaniard must be up to some game. Perhaps he was contemplating general peace at Madrid, and perhaps he was merely "working" our opulent government for the transportation of as many of his troops as possible, where sooner or later they would have to go—home. Maybe he really thought we were 50,000 strong—a French refugee had brought out word that such was the Spanish belief at Santiago—and on this supposition not one

(Continued on page 805.)

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

INFANT HEALTH.

INQUIRIES prompted the publication of "Infant Health" in pamphlet form, by the N. Y. Condensed Milk Co., N. Y., and the appreciation of its value led to an elaborate edition. Sent on application.—[Adv.]

"HE'S a jolly good fellow" who recommends and uses only ABBOTT'S—The ORIGINAL ANGOSTURA BITTERS—best for digestion, best tonic, best all 'round. —[Adv.]

DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS are the most efficacious stimulant to excite the appetite.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pears'

To keep the skin clean is to wash the excretions from it off; the skin takes care of itself inside, if not blocked outside.

To wash it often and clean, without doing any sort of violence to it, requires a most gentle soap, a soap with no free alkali in it.

Pears', the soap that clears but not excoriates.

All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

EDUCATION BY MAIL

Thousands have been helped to better pay & positions through our system of instruction

Buildings erected expressly for this purpose at a cost of $225,000

Courses of Steam, Electrical, Mechanical or Civil Engineering; Chemistry; Mining; Mechanical and Architectural Drawing; Surveying; Plumbing; Architecture; Metal Pattern Drafting; Prospecting; Bookkeeping; Shorthand; English Branches.

$2 A MONTH pays for a College Education at Home. 40,000 Students and Graduates.

Circular FREE. State subject you wish to study.

THE INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
Box 1159, Scranton, Pa., U. S. A.

CHICKEN

NOVEL MEXICAN DELICACY.

Minced chicken, highly seasoned with Mexican spices, and wrapped in corn husks. Unique, delightful.

At grocers, or ½ pound can mailed for 10¢ in stamps. Booklet sent on request.

TAMALE

ARMOUR PACKING CO.
DEPARTMENT H
KANSAS CITY, MO. U.S.A.

WALTHAM WATCHES.

"The Perfected American Watch, in its simplicity, accuracy, permanency, and cheapness, represents the highest stage in the watchmakers' art. The American Watch Co., at Waltham, Mass., has constructed 500,000 of these watches and has revolutionized the industry it has transferred to the New World."—Chambers' Encyclopedia, 1875.

To the inquiry we often receive, "What Waltham watch shall I buy?" we say that the "Riverside" (trade-mark) is as good a timepiece as you can buy, either of American or foreign make, no matter what you pay. See the name "Riverside" as well as the word "Waltham" engraved on the movement plate.

AMERICAN WALTHAM WATCH COMPANY,
WALTHAM, MASS.

"Whose smoke like incense doth perfume."
— TITUS ANDRON.

If you smoke it in your pipe "It's Good"

Yale Mixture

A Gentleman's Smoke

VICI Leather Dressing

The best Shoe Dressing in the world. The genuine is made only by Robert H. Foerderer, Philadelphia, manufacturer of the famous

VICI KID

Ask your dealer for Vici Leather Dressing, and be sure the trade-mark with the name of the maker, is on each box or bottle. Imitations may ruin your shoes.

A book about buying, wearing and caring for shoes, mailed free. Address
ROBERT H. FOERDERER, Philada., Pa.

On your Summer Outing take a box of Huyler's DELICIOUS BONBONS CHOCOLATES

Sent Everywhere by mail or express.
863 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

STATEMENT
OF
THE TRAVELERS
Life and Accident Insurance Company,
OF HARTFORD, CONN.
Chartered 1863. (Stock.) Life and Accident Insurance.
JAMES G. BATTERSON, Pres't.

Hartford, Conn., January 1, 1898.

| | |
|---|---|
| PAID-UP CAPITAL, | $1,000,000.00 |
| Assets (Accident Premiums in the hands of Agents not included.) | $22,868,994.16 |
| Liabilities, | 19,146,359.04 |
| Excess Security to Policy-holders, | $3,722,635.12 |

July 1, 1898.

| | |
|---|---|
| Total Assets (Accident Premiums in the hands of Agents not included.) | $24,103,986.67 |
| Total Liabilities, | 19,859,291.43 |
| Excess Security to Policy-holders, | $4,244,695.24 |
| Paid to Policy-holders since 1864, | $35,660,940.19 |
| Paid to Policy-holders January-July, '98, | 1,300,493.68 |
| Loaned to Policy-holders on Policies (Life), | 1,161,705.00 |
| Life Insurance in Force, | 94,646,669.00 |

GAINS.
6 Months—January to July, 1898.

| | |
|---|---|
| In Assets, | $1,234,992.51 |
| In Surplus (to Policy-holders), | 522,060.12 |
| In Insurance in Force (Life Department only), | 2,764,459.00 |
| Increase in Reserves, | 705,642.18 |
| Premiums Received, 6 Months, | 2,937,432.77 |

JOHN E. MORRIS, Secretary.
EDWARD V. PRESTON, Sup't of Agencies.
J. B. LEWIS, M.D. Medical Director and Adjuster.
SYLVESTER C. DUNHAM, Counsel.
NEW YORK OFFICE, 31 Nassau St.

BRASS BAND

Instruments, Drums, Uniforms, Equipments for Bands and Drum Corps. Lowest prices ever quoted. Fine Catalog, 400 Illustrations, mailed free; it gives Band Music & Instructions for Amateur Bands.
LYON & HEALY, 17 Adams St., Chicago.

THE CELEBRATED
SOHMER
Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.

Our name spells—
S—O—H—M—E—R
New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

(Continued from page 803.)

of the men who loved our commanding general least but gave him full credit for his bull-dog persistency and for the stark audacity of his first demands. But the Spaniard, whatever his reason, was this time in earnest, and out under the peace tree between the lines a commission was appointed on each side to draw up the terms. The surrender was sure, and a courteous Englishman raised his hat to the victorious general, and asked if he would be permitted to enter Santiago and witness the raising of the flag. Rasping oaths form the chief part of the general's vocabulary.

"Not a —— —— rod," the Englishman was told, violently. "If any newspaper man goes into that town I'll have him shot —— ——."

Therefore the obedient and the orderly went quietly back to their transports at Siboney, while the disobedient or the disbelieving remained on the field and marched into Santiago and saw the colors raised.

It happened at noon on Sunday, the 17th. The soldiers were drawn up at parade rest along the great ten-mile circle of the trenches and stood facing Santiago. They could see nothing—only the red roofs of the town—but the batteries were to thunder word when the red and yellow flag of defeat went down and the victorious stars and stripes rose up. While they waited, men in straw hats and blue clothes appeared in an open field towards Santiago and began swinging hammocks and tethering horses, while men in Panama hats advanced to the American trenches, saluting courteously. The Americans sprang across the trenches to meet them, and while they were shaking hands, and on the stroke of twelve, the thunder of twoscore and one salutes began. The Spaniards looked rather startled, but the cheers rose and they understood. From the right rose the cheers, gathering volume as they came, swinging through the centre far to the left, and swinging through the centre back again, until they broke in a wild storm against the big green hills. Then to the rear the storm ran, over Las Guasimas, and down the foothills to be mingled with the surf at Siboney, and swung by the rocking transports out to sea. Under the sea too it sang, along the cables—to ring through the white corridors of the great Capitol, and spread like a hurricane through our own waiting land. Already the bands were playing when the force of it broke at the trenches—playing the "Star-spangled Banner"—and the soldiers cheered again. Then they grew quiet—the bands were playing hymns: old, old hymns that the soldier had heard, with bowed head and at his mother's side, in some little old country church at home; and what hardship, privations, wounds, death of comrades, had rarely done those old hymns did now—they brought the tears. Then some thoughtful soldier pulled a box of hardtack across the trenches, and the little Spanish soldiers fell upon it like schoolboys, and scrambled like pickaninnies for a penny.

Thus was it all around the shining circle of sheathed bayonets, silent carbines, and dumb cannon mouths, at the American trenches around Santiago where the fighting was done. And inside, under the very folds of the ever-victorious, ever-beloved Old Glory—what there?

At that very hour the commanding officer was suffering himself to be involved in a street squabble, and demeaning himself, his flag, the people whom he served, and the soldiers whose worship he should have earned. It does not matter much whose was the first blow struck, or whether a blow was struck at all; there was no excuse for correspondent or general, and the word or the blow, or both, from one, at such a time, was a stroke at the pride of the American soldier, the American officer, and the American gentleman from a man who at all times, and particularly then, should have stood a spotless ideal for the three.

"He will not wear his uniform again?" asked the aghast foreigner.

The American laughed—"Won't he?" And then he went on to explain apologetically how our political system made the appointment of such a man to such high office and his maintenance in that office possible, and to add seriously that though another star were added to the ones already worn, though enough were given to quite encircle the neck-band of his blouse—all, in the eyes of every true American, would be dimmed by such conduct at such an hour, forever.

JOHN FOX, JR.

SAMPSON AND SCHLEY AT SANTIAGO.

THE following letter comes to HARPER'S WEEKLY from one who writes from a full knowledge of the subject with which he deals:

My Dear ——:

You have read, doubtless, with surprise and regret, the various newspaper despatches and editorials which endeavor to make Schley the hero of Santiago, and to take from Sampson—the commander-in-chief—the credit of his successful campaign and his great victory. I am glad to say that it has not degenerated into a controversy. Schley's friends and the sensational newspaper correspondents have had it all their own way so far; but if the crusade should continue, and have any influence upon Congressional action next fall, the whole history of the Santiago campaign will be made public. The officers of this fleet will not see Schley—who is entitled to no credit for leadership—honored at the expense of the commander-in-chief, who instituted and carried out, in this age of steam and electricity, a blockade which made Cervera's escape impossible, and which makes a brilliant chapter in the history of modern naval warfare.

I think you will be interested in a few facts concerning these operations. I would like you, as a citizen and as the editor of a great weekly, to know the truth. To begin, I go back more than two months. We reached Key West, after the San Juan expedition, on May 18. Cervera had left Curaçoa on the 15th. His destination was probably Cienfuegos, as he was reported to have munitions of war necessary to the defence of Havana, and Cienfuegos is the only deep water port on the south side of Cuba that has rail communication with Havana. Schley left Key West on May 19th, with the Brooklyn, the Massachusetts, Texas, and Scorpion, for the south side of Cuba, to blockade Cienfuegos. On the next day the battle-ship Iowa, the cruiser Castine, and a collier followed to join him, and on the 21st the Marblehead, Eagle, and Vixen. Schley himself reached Cienfuegos on the 21st, and the other vessels joined him within 48 hours. He thus had a powerful fleet of three battle-ships, one armored cruiser, two protected cruisers, three armed auxiliaries, and 4500 tons of coal in a collier. Admiral Sampson .... gave Schley his best battle-ship—the Iowa—two cruisers, and two auxiliaries (the Brooklyn, Massachusetts, Texas, and Scorpion (the Squadron"), and gave him the best chance of meeting and defeating the Spanish fleet. I mention this to show the kind of man that Sampson is, and in view of the newspaper charges that he has attempted to take away Schley's due credit. He has no jealousies, but is animated only by a desire successfully to carry on the war.

It soon became known that Cervera was at Santiago, and had reached there on the 19th. As soon as the news was credibly confirmed—on May 21st—Sampson sent despatches to Schley so informing him, and directing him to proceed to Santiago, first satisfying himself that the Spanish ships were not at Cienfuegos. Schley received these despatches on the 23d. It took him another day to convince himself that the Spanish squadron was not in Cienfuegos, and on the evening of the 24th he sailed for Santiago—or perhaps it would be more accurate to say in the direction of Santiago; for, from the time Schley arrived at Cienfuegos, his movements lacked promptness and purpose. The distance from Cienfuegos to Santiago is 300 miles—twenty-five hours at Schley's best squadron speed—twelve knots. The object being to blockade and hold Cervera, his plain duty was to reach Santiago as soon as possible and institute a close blockade. It was not doubted that he would do this. Leaving Cienfuegos in the evening of May 24, he should have reached Santiago before midnight of the 25th. But he did not blockade Santiago until the evening of the 28th of May—four days after sailing from Cienfuegos. Why not, has never been satisfactorily explained. He proceeded to the eastward, and reached the vicinity of Santiago, but thirty miles to the southward, on May 26th. On the 27th he started west, signalling to his squadron that he was going back to Key West (800 miles) to coal, and telegraphed the department to this effect; but before he had gone very far he was overhauled by the Harvard with a telegram which turned him back again, and on the 28th he appeared off Santiago, and lay off the port until Admiral Sampson came on June 1.

I have thus particularized the incidents of the last ten days of May because the statement has been frequently made in the press that Schley "discovered" and "bottled up" Cervera in Santiago. He did nothing of the kind. Sampson knew on the 21st that Cervera was in Santiago, and so informed Schley. Schley knew it positively on the 24th, as, if Cervera was not at Cienfuegos, he must be at Santiago. Yet Schley did not blockade Santiago until the 28th, and would not have reached that port at all—would have abandoned the attempt—but for imperative orders. His collier broke down, and he made that an excuse. It was not material, as he had plenty of vessels to tow her.

Now to go back a few days. After sending Schley information on May 21 that Cervera was in Santiago, Admiral Sampson, with the New York, his only remaining battle-ship—the Indiana—and what Monitors and cruisers could be spared from the blockade, went eastward and occupied the old Bahama Channel, in order to catch Cervera should he attempt to get to Havana by the north side of Cuba. He had already been in Santiago long enough to coal his ships. Should he make a dash for Havana, it was necessary to guard both sides of the island. Sampson maintained daily communication through Key West—by means of despatch-boats—with the Navy Department, and with the large auxiliary cruisers scouting in the Windward Passage and off Santiago.

On May 26 the Admiral first became aware of Schley's dilatory action and delay in starting for Santiago, and at midnight on May 28 he learned that Schley had turned back and started for Key West to coal. At the time of the receipt of this startling news the New York was at Key West. The Admiral went at once, leaving at midnight on May 29, picked up the Oregon, Mayflower, and torpedo-boat Porter from the Havana blockade, and went to Santiago at a speed of thirteen knots, arriving there on the morning of June 1. I should have mentioned that before knowing that Schley intended to abandon the whole enterprise the Admiral had sent the New Orleans, on May 27, to join Schley, to strengthen his force, and to order him imperatively to blockade Santiago at all hazards. This, I think, effectively disposes of Schley's claim to have "discovered" and "bottled up" the Spanish fleet.

But there is another lie of recent publication, viz., that Schley wished to make a dash into the harbor, irrespective of the mines or batteries, and destroy Cervera's fleet. Schley had plenty of time to make a dash—plenty of opportunity to show audacity and contempt for mines and batteries—and, in fact, the situation at Santiago when he arrived was such as to invite prompt action; but he did not avail himself of his opportunity. Instead of showing contempt, he showed a very marked and unusual respect for the enemy's defences. The Cristóbal Colon and one of the armored cruisers—probably the Maria Teresa—were lying in plain sight about 1200 yards inside the harbor entrance, with no steam, and therefore powerless to move. The batteries, as was afterwards abundantly proved, were not powerful; and were easily silenced. They offered no material obstacle to a close bombardment, and there was no reason to believe in advance that they were any stronger than they proved to be. Schley held the situation in his hands. He had the powerful Iowa, Massachusetts, Texas, Brooklyn, and New Orleans, besides smaller vessels, and he finally made up his mind to attack. This he did at an initial range of 8000 or 9000 yards, and increased this range to 11,000 yards. His fire was ineffective, and the Iowa's 12-inch mounts were injured by the strain of firing her guns at so great an elevation. There was nothing to prevent his going in to a range of 2000 yards from the ships and destroying them; and officers to whom I talked about the affair, after our arrival, were very indignant that he had not done so, and regarded the attack as a ridiculous one, and one that reflected discredit upon the navy.

The papers report Admiral Cervera as saying of this attack that he didn't know what was meant by it, in which he agreed with our own people. There was no danger of mines, which were all in the channel itself, within a thousand yards from the ships. Schley had his chance—a chance in which only ordinary pluck, enterprise, and a willingness to fight for an adequate object were needed—and he failed to improve it. So much for his "dash"!

I have now brought up the story to the time of Admiral Sampson's taking command in person off Santiago. From that moment he instituted a close blockade, which each week became more rigorous and difficult to evade. When we arrived on June 1 the moon was nearing its full, and for several nights it was so light that the harbor entrance could be plainly seen; but the dark nights soon came, and with them great danger that the enemy's ships might escape, or his torpedo-boats make an attack upon the fleet. To prevent this, the entrance to the port was illuminated by the battle-ships. Taking turns of two hours each, they stationed themselves in the prolongation of the axis of the narrow channel, and close to the Morro—frequently within a mile—and threw the powerful beams of their search-lights directly up the harbor entrance, illuminating it up to Punta Gordo, 1200 yards inside the Morro, so brightly that the movements of small boats could be detected. Pickets of steam-launches, small boats could be detected. Pickets of steam-launches, small vessels, and torpedo-boats were placed at and near the harbor mouth, just clear of the search-light beam (so that they should not themselves be illuminated).

The stations of the large blockading vessels were drawn nearer the harbor entrance from time to time, until, after the landing of the army, the distance from the Morro for all ships at night was made two miles, and a battle-ship lay alongside the search-light ship, with her broadside trained on the channel, ready to fire on the instant. That these dispositions made Cervera's escape at night impossible is sustained by the testimony of the Spanish Admiral and his officers, and by the fact that daylight was deliberately chosen. That he could not get away in the daytime was sufficiently demonstrated by the disastrous result of his attempt. Sampson's organization and discipline destroyed Cervera's fleet. When his ships appeared, our own waiting vessels simply acted the part for which they had been preparing during the entire month of June.

In the fight itself the New York was left in the rear. The Admiral, in the execution of his duties, had gone to Siboney, directing all the other vessels to hold their positions. He was on his way to hold a conference with General Shafter, and when the Spanish flag-ship appeared in the channel, the New York was seven miles east of the Morro and four miles east of her blockading station, and although she turned back instantly and increased her speed as rapidly as possible, she could not get within range of the large Spanish ships before they were beached. She joined, however, in the chase of the Cristóbal Colon, and getting steam on all her boilers, was gaining rapidly on that vessel, and was only eight or ten miles from her when she surrendered. The flag-ship was therefore present, although not within range, and the whole fight and chase was under the eye of the commander-in-chief. Nor was the New York entirely out of the fighting, as she ran the fire of the shore batteries, which were doing all they could to aid the escape of the Spanish ships.

The Spaniards came out in column, and turned to the west, maintaining this formation. This removed all tactical difficulties, and made the task of each vessel a perfectly plain one—to close in, fight, and chase. This situation had been laid down by the Admiral in previous instructions, and the vessels needed no orders. The Brooklyn, Schley's flag-ship, had the westernmost blockading station, which gave her a great advantage in position at the beginning of the fight. She maintained this advantage in the chase, except with respect to the Oregon, which showed unusual speed, and which, after good fighting all along the line, forced the surrender of the Cristóbal Colon. With a blockading line eight miles long much depends, in these quick and speedy days of steam, on chance. Had the Spanish fleet turned to the eastward, the New York would have been in the lead of the fighting and chase, and the Brooklyn in the rear.

The impudent attempt on the part of Schley's friends to take from Sampson the glory for this achievement is probably unexampled in naval history. A commander-in-chief has always the credit for success and the responsibility for failures. A conspicuous illustration of this, and one to which attention naturally turns, is the battle of Cape St. Vincent. The feature of that battle was Nelson's brilliant manœuvre—not only his own inspiration and his own initiative, but executed in contravention of the commander-in-chief's signals, and which made of what otherwise might have been an inconclusive fight one of the great naval victories of the world. The fight has been for a hundred years analyzed and discussed to show Nelson's genius and greatness, and yet it has always been Sir John Jervis's battle, and he was made Earl St. Vincent for his great victory. In the battle of Santiago Schley took no initiative and exercised no leadership.

Very sincerely yours,

——

HAWAII RECEIVES THE NEWS.

HONOLULU, July 20.

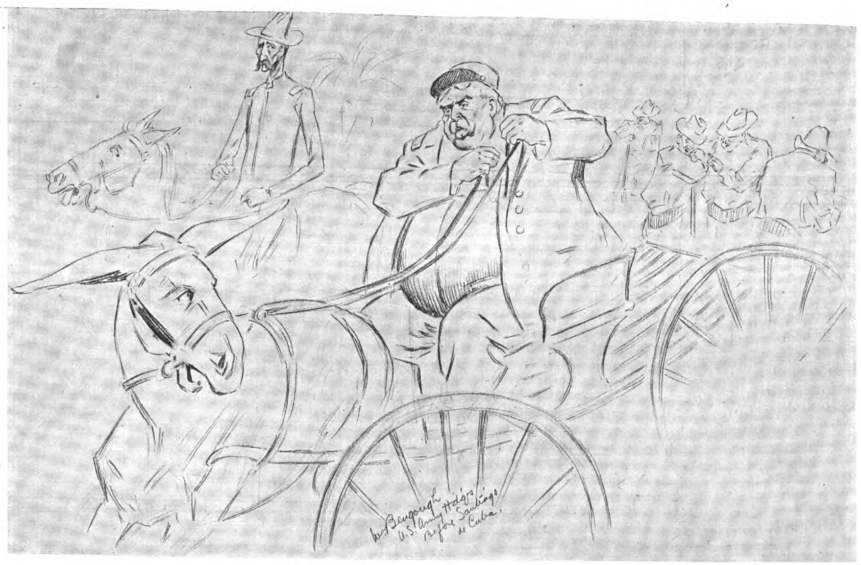
ONE week ago the steamer Coptic arrived with the long-expected news of the annexation of Hawaii. With flags, pennants, and streamers on every mast, the vessel that bore the longed-for tidings was descried far out at sea. The lookout on historic Diamond Head made out that signals were up. He telephoned the news to the city, and the steam-launch of the United States steamer Mohican was manned and put to sea. Miles away the message was read, "Hawaii is annexed!" American flags appeared, as if by magic, everywhere. Fire whistles shrieked, factory whistles joined in, and this ear-piercing tumult was punctuated by the deep boom of one hundred guns fired on the Executive grounds. Just as the news was confirmed, President Dole reached the wharf, his horse white with foam, as he had ridden at full gallop from his seaside home at Waikiki. Nearly all the members of his cabinet were there, with consuls and other prominent officials and members of the national guard.

Then the great steamer came in, and the officers and passengers were cheered. Word was given, "To the Executive Building," and a volunteer procession moved up Fort Street, with a band at its head. When it reached the Executive grounds there was a scene of enthusiasm never surpassed in island history. Then in line the crowd marched three times round the building, cheering until it was hoarse. Minister Hatch's message to the government was read; the procession marched through all the principal streets, and a great show of fireworks closed the eventful day.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



WOUNDED SPANISH PRISONERS—"YOU WON'T KILL US?"

"GLORY!"

"A CUP OF COLD WATER."

"ON, SHAFTER! ON!"

IMPRESSIONS OF SANTIAGO.
SKETCHES FROM LIFE BY WILLIAM BENGOUGH.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LONDON.

July 23, 1898.

The present war marks the close of an epoch and the beginning of a fresh start in the affairs of the world, perhaps the most remarkable since the Peace of Paris, in 1763, left the English race in possession of an Indian and Colonial Empire and the command of the sea. It was in the year previous to the Peace of Paris that English expeditions had reduced both Cuba and Manila. The period of exclusive sea power which began in 1763 is likely to end in the present year. England enters upon a new phase. America is not likely to relax her efforts until she has become one of the two greatest sea powers in the world. The consequences of the Spanish-American war will therefore be even more serious for other countries, perhaps for England, than for Spain. The colonies of Spain have sapped her strength. Their loss may renew it. Spain has touched bottom. The sea power that America will now organize for herself is envied and feared by every power in Europe, except England. The German newspapers have become complete converts to the doctrine of sea power. The National Zeitung observes that "whoever has not the best and most powerful fleet need not enter into a struggle. He has lost the battle before he begins it." This is a confession equivalent to a declaration in the London Times in favor of conscription. Modern Germany was founded on the basis of military power as the one source of national strength. It is unlikely that the German dream of rivalling England or America at sea will ever be fulfilled. Still, British naval estimates, being calculated solely on the naval provisions of other countries, will be forced upwards by the German ambition for sea power. Russia contemplates the expenditure of $255,000,000 upon her fleet during the next seven years. "Day and night the Neva ship-yards ring with the clang of the hammer-stroke on men-of-war for a country without colonies or a vulnerable coast-line."

The Admiralty reply to the Russian naval programme was communicated to the House of Commons yesterday. Sanction was asked for the construction of four new battle-ships, four new cruisers, and twelve torpedo-boat-destroyers, the total cost of which will be $40,000,000, in addition to the $35,000,000 voted earlier in the year for the construction of new ships and the purchase of armaments and ammunition. In the present state of feeling M. Goschen could have obtained $500,000,000 for the asking. But men shake their heads and ask themselves whether the most irresistible navy is of any avail, until the foreign policy of the country is placed in stronger hands.

The French navy is the most powerful in the world next to our own. M. Lockroy, the new Minister of Marine, is an interesting personage. He is a man of pleasure, a bundle of nerves, a great cigarette-smoker, and a civilian. But he is a far abler Minister of Marine than his naval predecessor, Admiral Besnard. M. Lockroy enters office with wide schemes and an ambitious programme. He has already obtained the control of the coaling-stations, and a grant of $80,000,000 for the fortification of present and additional coaling-stations. Diego Suarez in Madagascar is potentially the strongest place in the Indian Ocean. It menaces the Cape route to India and China. It is to be made into a Gibraltar. Martinique is to be heavily armed and fortified. In addition to all this, M. Lockroy proposes to bring the French navy up to date in armaments and general equipment. Still, the possession and utilization of sea power are not obtainable by the process of counting ships any more than the counting of noses in politics produces the wisest and best administration. The personal equation is still the greatest factor in the problem. Captain Mahan, who, more than any one living, is responsible for the sea-hunger that gnaws the rulers of all nations, has been guided by the unerring instinct of genius. He predicted that the supremacy of personnel would be greater under the new conditions of sea-fighting than under the old. His foresight has been signally vindicated. The war has shown that although the genius of the Latin race may possibly continue while fighting behind fortifications, the genius of the "Anglo Celtic" race (surely this is ethnographically the right word) is still for sea-fighting. If this be true, Russian, German, and French additions to their war-ships will leave to America and Britain the mastery of the sea. Pursuit of a common policy on the high seas should therefore be the aim of both countries.

On this ground the passage in the President's instructions for the government of the newly conquered province of Santiago, to the inhabitants of Cuba, which relates to the "open door" has given lively satisfaction in England. The passage referred to is as follows: "All ports and places in Cuba which are in the actual possession of our land and naval forces will be opened to the commerce of all neutral nations as well as our own in articles not contraband of war, upon payment of the prescribed rates of duty which may be in force at the time of importation." Anxiety has been felt, if not expressed, on this subject. It is now assumed that the two governments are substantially agreed on the fiscal policy to be pursued by each of them in the event of further territorial changes consequent on operations now in progress or which may hereafter be undertaken. As the policy of the "open door" is established by the United States at her very threshold, the adoption of the same principle in the Far East is looked on as removing any probable source of difference between the two nations, and materially to strengthen the tie that already exists between them.

The arrangements for the forth-coming campaign against the Khalifa are now completed. One battalion of the Guards now at Gibraltar is to take part in the advance, much to the delight of officers and men. Notwithstanding rumors to the contrary, Sirdar Kitchener will command. General Grenfell, commanding the English troops in Egypt, is understood to have behaved with signal generosity and to have displayed great good feeling towards his colleague in command of the Egyptian army. General Kitchener has carved his way with his sword. He is a soldier, pure and simple, with little social influence, but endowed with a will that enables him to triumph over obstacles that would crush smaller men. It is owing to this iron will and his splendid qualities of leadership that he retains the supreme command in the advance on Khartoum. General Grenfell, it is understood, might have obtained it, but stood aside, as Outram stood aside when Havelock was on the point of entering Lucknow, and as General Miles in like manner abstained from taking over the command from General Shafter at Santiago. There is, however, no doubt that friction has occurred between the War Office authorities and General Kitchener. He has insisted on a free hand, and immunity from the civilian red tape which smothers, for the present, at all events, effective reform in the administration of the British army at home. At one period of the controversy the War Office was face to face with the possibility of Kitchener's resignation. The strong man had his way. There is now no position to which he may not rise, and if all goes well at Khartoum he may and probably will be commander-in-chief after General Roberts has served his term in that position.

There is a natural desire on the part of the royal family that the Duke of Connaught should be elevated to the supreme command of the army when a vacancy occurs. The advice of the great Duke of Wellington to the Queen is constantly quoted: "Madam, always keep the command of the army in your own family." There are, however, strong objections to the Duke of Connaught occupying that position. He is amiable, popular, and, by the consent of those who have served under him, a good soldier. But he is not of the stuff of which the master-minds of the world are built, and in the troubled times ahead of us it would be dangerous to the monarchy to associate in the public mind possible catastrophe with the appointment of a member of the royal family who is not marked out by nature for supreme responsibility. The Indian army and the Egyptian army are free from the control of the War Office, and hence success in the field is organized more cheaply and with greater certainty than is possible under the cumbrous forms of Pall Mall. Lord Wolseley, although popular with one section of the army, has disappointed the nation. He came into office as commander-in-chief with a great opportunity before him. The Duke of Cambridge, his predecessor, was the embodiment of military Toryism. Change, in the view of his Royal Highness, was an evil, and the consequence was perpetual refusal to adopt necessary modifications of the existing system, and hence the War Office to this day clings as far as it dare to the obsolete traditions of the earlier part of the century. The fierce criticism that pours upon the War Office begins, however, to take effect in such matters as recruiting and the comfort of the private soldier.

Government departments are now required to reserve two thousand posts annually which will for the future be bestowed upon soldiers only; 3800 ex-soldiers were taken on by the railway companies last year, and strong appeals are made to the other great employers of labor to follow their example. The soldier's life while still serving with the colors is happier and healthier than at any previous period of army history. Tommy Atkins is now quartered in well-lit and well-ventilated barracks. Soldiers no longer sleep in the dark and stuffy places in which they used to be herded together. Canteens are well organized, and all the profits are spent for the advantage of the troops. Comfortable quarters are provided for the men permitted to marry. Recreation-rooms, gymnasia, and bath-rooms are luxuries to which the recruit of twenty years ago was a complete stranger. In many English villages the idea still survives that a lad who has enlisted for a soldier has gone to the bad. That idea is a survival of the time when the ranks of the army were filled from the jails, and when the conditions of the regimental life of our soldiers were inconsistent with common decency.

A new method of making the army attractive has been adopted by Lord Lansdowne with satisfactory results. Regiments returned from foreign service are sent for a march round the counties from which they derive their territorial name. The First Northumberland Fusileers—commonly known as the Fighting Fifth—for example, proceeded last week from Plymouth to Newcastle-on-Tyne, and there commenced a march through the valleys and uplands of breezy Northumberland. The regiment had been absent from England for about eighteen years. The men were bronzed with an Indian sun, and their reception was quite extraordinary. Tens of thousands of people filled the streets, and the men were almost killed with kindness. Recruiting is greatly stimulated by these route marches. Victoria Cross men, who hitherto have only received $50 a year as a pension, are now to get $250 a year on winning the most coveted distinction in the British army. This grant will prevent the recurrence of the scandal of Victoria Cross men herding with paupers in the workhouse. The reform is one that should have been instituted long since.

Waddesdon Manor, the seat of Baron Ferdinand Rothschild, where the Prince of Wales has met with an unfortunate accident in the fracture of his left kneecap, is a French château built on the top of what was a treeless hill. The Saturday to Monday parties at Waddesdon have almost attained the dimensions of a national institution, and invitations to take part in them are much sought after. Baron Ferdinand Rothschild belongs to the Austrian branch of the house, but is a naturalized English subject, and for many years has been member of Parliament for the Aylesbury division of Bucks. He takes no part in the business of the famous firm. The baron has devoted himself to history, art, politics, and society. He is a childless widower, an intimate friend of the Prince of Wales, and is one of the few living subjects of the Queen who have had the honor of receiving her Majesty at their own house. The magnificence of Waddesdon reminds the visitor of Versailles, but the feature most striking to the imagination is the success with which great wealth combined with good taste has converted bare uplands into well-wooded slopes, avenues, and drives, interspersed with lawns and landscape-gardening of exquisite beauty. The flowers of Waddesdon are a sight to see and remember. Other show-places in England may have a larger acreage under glass. Chatsworth, Bowood, and Woburn Abbey are show-places that possess features of historic interest. Waddesdon is of this generation. Luxury is found there in its latest phase. Its owner, however, is a simple, kindly, and unpretending host, and is popular in all classes of society. Some years ago Baron Ferdinand Rothschild aspired to the representation of an East End constituency in Parliament. He never went to the poll, but his speeches to the working population of the Tower Hamlets won golden opinions. The Prince of Wales makes an annual visit to Waddesdon when the gardens are in the height of their beauty, and the accident which has just taken place is the only contretemps which has happened during a series of visits which now extends back for many years.

The accident to the Prince of Wales has produced a deep impression, especially as the serious character of the disaster was at first withheld or suppressed. Since the Prince's dangerous illness in 1871 no incident has so roused the sympathy of his future subjects. No less than fifteen folio pages of the visiting-book at Marlborough House were filled by the signatures of callers on the first day. The newspapers naturally deny that the accident is at all serious. It is to be hoped they are right. But, in spite of a cheerful disposition and a courageous spirit, the stamina of the Prince's constitution is not altogether satisfactory. It is understood that while there is no danger, the effect of enforced inaction excites apprehension. The Prince has already suffered from the veins of the same leg that is now injured. His health greatly depends on the annual visit to Homburg or Marienbad, and it is assumed that for this year, at all events, his Continental visit will be postponed.

The vast increase to the naval strength of the country is in sharp contrast with the weakness of its foreign policy. Discontent with Lord Salisbury is met with in all classes, except the party of Little-Englanders, whose champion, Mr. Labouchere, is not regarded even by himself as a serious politician. Tories of the City of London, moneyed men with old-established interests, talk mutinously against the Prime Minister. Any change, they say, would be for the better, even a Radical ministry. Lord Salisbury is a tired Titan. His life is shadowed with grief. Lady Salisbury has undergone a fresh surgical operation for the relief of the disease from which she is suffering, and it is known that sorrow for his wife's illness saddens and dispirits the Prime Minister. One rarely hears a good word in this country for the Foreign Secretary. Lord Cromer, however, the ruler of Egypt, who is designated by many persons as the best possible successor to Lord Salisbury at the Foreign Office, by no means holds the depreciatory view prevalent in England. Lord Cromer has written to more than one of his friends, enjoining them "on no account to lose confidence in Lord Salisbury." Furthermore, there is good reason for believing that the Prime Minister is not altogether his own master. The participation in affairs by the Queen herself is no mere form. Her Majesty's obstinate resolve to sanction no step likely to bring the country into collision with European powers reminds on-lookers of the chief characteristic of her grandfather, George III. Foreign powers are not ignorant of the Queen's determination to disallow all measures tending towards a rupture of the peace. Although the newspapers and Parliament are necessarily silent on this subject, information from sources beyond suspicion has reached me that much of what is justly regarded as weakness in British foreign policy is not fairly to be attributed to the vacillation of the Prime Minister. The refusal of the Foreign Office to speak out frankly about Egypt is a case in point.

Rearrangement of the Foreign Office is inevitable. It is the mouth-piece of a great Asiatic power, but there is no Asiatic Department. African questions are dealt with piecemeal, and on no settled principles. An attempt to remedy this latter defect is being made by the creation of a new Under-Secretaryship of State. Mr. Martin Gosselin, now secretary to the embassy in Paris, is nominated for the appointment. In some quarters the African Under-Secretaryship is regarded as a slap in the face for Mr. Chamberlain. There is no truth in the statement, as Mr. Chamberlain's jurisdiction over the British colonies in Africa is determined by Parliament. Moreover, Lord Salisbury is not the man to smite a colleague by an underhand blow, while Mr. Chamberlain is not the type of statesman who meekly accepts a rebuff of the kind.

No play during the present year has attracted so much attention from literary men as M. Rostand's "Cyrano de Bergerac," produced on the Lyceum stage. It had an immense success at the Porte Saint-Martin Théâtre in Paris. No less than 80,000 people are alleged to have seen it in the French capital. M. Coquelin's spirited acting in the title rôle is the perfection of dramatic art, and the consequence is that M. Rostand, like Aaron, has struck the rock of popular approbation. At the present time it gushes forth, bubbling, rushing, overwhelming, with only a few whispers of doubt raised by one or two level-headed and non-emotional critics. The play is declared in the superlative degree to be noble in conception, beautiful in execution, supremely great in language, in music, in imagery, and in versification. To read the play it is difficult to understand the cause of the popular clamor. If "Cyrano" is really a masterpiece of imaginative literature, and an addition to the great poems of the world, it is evident that Dante, Goethe, Corneille, Shakespeare, and Milton must squeeze up a little higher and make a nook for Rostand among the immortals.

It is not in accordance with the history of works of genius that the popular voice has instantly appreciated their value, and acclaimed their authors as possessing the sacred fire. The multitude has hitherto required about a century before fully appreciating a masterpiece. A few nights' performance at the Lyceum, with a few thousand copies of "Cyrano de Bergerac" distributed among the reading public, seem to be looked on by the critics as sufficient to have raised M. Rostand's play to the level of the highest. "Cyrano" is certainly a good stage play, delivered in felicitous and musical verse. It is smooth and easy, good and glib, effective verse, but bears the same relation to literature as the best theatrical scenery to Velasquez or Burne-Jones. The dialogue, the love interest, the situations, and the climax make it a good melodrama, but it is neither "inspired" nor "magnificent," and it owes its success to a good and symmetrical plot, to the prettiness of its fancy, and to the wide range of interest covered by a pure and charming play that is, in fact, the sign of a wholesome reaction against the garbage that has been too long foisted upon the world as the typical French play.

Arnold White.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

BRIGHT'S DISEASE

A Distinguished and Despairing Physician Perfectly Restored by

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER

Dr. G. A. Foote, of Warrenton, N. C., ex-President State Medical Society, formerly Member of the State Board of Medical Examiners, and also of the State Board of Health:

"I had, in January, 1893, a violent attack of 'grip,' which was soon followed by the complications of ascites, cardiac trouble, etc., and rapidly developed into severe nephritis or Bright's. My physicians, Drs. King and Jerman, upon examination of my urine, found by volume fifty-five per cent albumen, which test was frequently corroborated by subsequent examinations showing also casts and low specific gravity. My nephritic trouble gradually grew worse, and I declined in weight from one hundred and ninety-five to one hundred and thirty-five pounds. In this condition, with little if any hope of relief from any remedy, I visited the BUFFALO LITHIA SPRINGS of Virginia, making free use of the Waters for some eight weeks. Analysis of the urine soon after reaching the Springs, by Dr. E. C. Laird, resident physician, confirmed the examinations previously made. Other analyses, however, by Dr. Laird from time to time showed a gradual diminution, and finally a total disappearance, of both albumen and casts and the urine in a normal condition. Leaving the Springs, I continued the use of the Waters several months at home. At the expiration of some two years there has been no return of any unpleasant symptom, and I am now as well as I ever was in my life, and a living monument to the virtues of BUFFALO LITHIA WATER"

BUFFALO LITHIA WATER is for sale by Grocers and Druggists generally. Pamphlets on application.

PROPRIETOR, BUFFALO LITHIA SPRINGS, VA.

Springs open for Guests from June 15 to Oct. 1.

---

NEVER HAS ANYTHING BEEN SO HIGHLY AND SO JUSTLY PRAISED AS

VIN MARIANI

MARIANI WINE, the FAMOUS TONIC for BODY, NERVES and BRAIN.

GEN. SIR EVELYN WOOD Says:

"Regarding the infantry marching in the recent manœuvres, it was the best seen during my command at Aldershot. Many officers availed themselves of the tonic and reconstituent properties of the well-known Mariani Wine, the most certain as well as the most palatable method of inducing resistance to fatigue."
From "The London Sketch."

MAX O'RELL,
The Renowned Writer and Lecturer, Writes:

Your Vin Mariani is positively marvellous; one glass put me on my feet; one bottle made a new man of me.
Yours gratefully, MAX O'RELL.

ALL DRUGGISTS.
PARIS: 41 Boulevard Haussmann. LONDON: 83 Mortimer Street.

MARIANI WINE is invaluable at this season of the year, when, owing to trying climatic conditions, the system is especially susceptible to attacks of debility and prostration.

VIN MARIANI (MARIANI WINE) has stood the test of thirty-five years' trial. It has written endorsements from more than 8000 American physicians, in addition to having received cordial recommendations from royalty, princes of the Church and of the State, and many notable personages.

MARIANI WINE is a tonic prepared upon careful scientific principles. It contains absolutely no injurious properties. It gives power to the brain, strength to the entire nervous system, firmness and elasticity to the muscles, and richness to the blood. It has been aptly described as a promoter of good health and longevity.

MARIANI WINE is specially indicated for General Debility, Weakness from whatever causes, Overwork, Profound Depression and Exhaustion, Throat and Lung Diseases, Consumption, Malaria and La Grippe.

MARIANI WINE is an adjuvant in convalescence and a powerful rejuvenator. For Overworked Men, Delicate Women, Sickly Children it Works Wonders. Taken with cracked ice, it relieves Summer Prostration quickly and effectually. It soothes, strengthens and sustains the system.

To those who will kindly write to MARIANI & CO., 52 West 15th Street, New York City, will be sent, free, book containing portraits with endorsements of Emperors, Empress, Princes, Cardinals, Archbishops, and other interesting matter.

AVOID SUBSTITUTIONS.
MONTREAL: 28-30 Hospital Street

---

HARPER'S CATALOGUE.
Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS

| | Per Year | | Per Year |
|---|---|---|---|
| Magazine, | $4 00 | Bazar, . | $4 00 |
| Weekly, . | 4 00 | Literature, | 4 00 |
| Round Table, | $1 00 | | |

STANDARD PRICES

CRESCENT BICYCLES

SOLD BY AGENTS EVERYWHERE

HAVE MANY IMPORTANT IMPROVEMENTS —A GRACE, STRENGTH, BEAUTY, PERFECTION NEVER BEFORE ATTAINED . . . .

Crescent Construction

is simple: not a device anywhere that a child could not understand. In the Crescent line there is a bicycle for every one—large or small, old or young, heavy or light. . . . . .

Art Catalogue, with "Care of the Wheel," FREE.

WESTERN WHEEL WORKS
CHICAGO NEW YORK

---

The Best is the Cheapest

Rae's Olive Oil is both the best and cheapest, quality considered.

The Chemical Analysis of S. Rae & Co.'s Finest Sublime Lucca Oil, made Sept. 15th, 1896, by the Ledoux Chemical Laboratory, declares it to be "unadulterated by admixture with any other oil or other substance. It is free from rancidity and all other undesirable qualities, and it is of Superior Quality and Flavor."

S. RAE & CO., Leghorn, Italy.

Established 1836.

---

THE BEST PENS ARE

ESTERBROOK'S
LEADING NUMBERS:
048, 14, 130, 239, 313, A1, 556.
PENS IN ALL STYLES, FOR EVERY PURPOSE.
FOR SALE BY ALL STATIONERS.
The Esterbrook Steel Pen Co.
26 John St., N.Y. Works, Camden, N. J.

PENS

---

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,
BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

---

We refund your money any time within 60 days.

This will enable you, without risk, to test

THE "PRACTICAL" TROUSERS HANGER AND PRESS.

A device which keeps Trousers "Smooth as if Ironed," and enables a closet arrangement which gives maximum convenience and twofold capacity. Each garment separately get-at-able.

Our 52-page descriptive booklet (free on request) tells you what other people think of our device. It contains facsimile reproductions of letters from customers sending us duplicate orders—the strongest kind of endorsement—and the names of over 1500 well-known gentlemen who have in use one or more of our $5.00 sets.

The Five-Dollar Set consists of 6 Practical Trousers Hangers and 3 Practical Closet Rods—sent express prepaid on receipt of price. The closet shown is fitted with a $5.00 set. It meets the average requirements. Single Hangers, Trousers, 75c. each. Single Rods, price, 25c. For $1.00 we will send, prepaid, one Hanger and one Rod, and afterward, if wanted, the remainder of the set for $4.00.

PRACTICAL NOVELTY CO., 431 Walnut St., Phila., Pa.

---

HARTSHORN'S SELF-ACTING SHADE ROLLERS

NOTICE NAME THUS Stewart Hartshorn ON LABEL AND GET THE GENUINE HARTSHORN

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

"A DASH OF COLOR O'ERSPREAD THE MAIDEN'S UPTURNED CHEEK."

WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

It means that Ivory Soap is as pure as it is possible to make it; it means too, that if Ivory Soap is used, there are no complaints of new, or nearly new, clothing coming from the wash, "worn out."

One adulterant of poor soap is alkali. Pure soap washes out the dirt, alkali burns and eats it out and it does not stop with the dirt.

Have your laundress use only Ivory Soap, and see how much longer the clothes last.

Copyright, 1896, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

Those Fine English Tobaccos Capstan, Bird's Eye, Westward Ho, Three Castles, Gold Flake, etc.

Put up by W. D. & H. O. WILLS of Bristol, England, and famous the world over for their superb flavor and exquisite aroma, can be obtained for you by your dealer. If he will not get them, write to us for price-list of the well-known brands.

J. W. SURBRUG, Sole Agent, 159 Fulton Street, NEW YORK.

ROYAL

Baking Powder,

used exclusively,
will insure your food
from all danger of alum
and kindred injurious adulterants.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

Armour's Extract of Beef

"has that rich, beefy flavor."

It's handy for summer use, requires no cooking, may be used with hot or cold water.

"Culinary Wrinkles" may be had for the asking—gives 50 ways for using Extract.

ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

For absolute comfort and convenience in CAMPING or YACHTING

"PERFECTION" AIR MATTRESSES AND CUSHIONS

are important requisites—they are waterproof, light, and convenient—can be deflated and rolled into small compass. Desirable for hospital or home use.

Free illustrated catalogue tells all about them.

MECHANICAL FABRIC CO., Air-Goods Department, Providence, R. I.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Hosiery.

Plain and Fancy Lisle-Thread, Silk, and Cashmere Hose and Half-Hose.

Summer Underwear.

Cartwright & Warner's

Celebrated Underwear.

for Children, Ladies, and Gentlemen.

Broadway & 19th St.

NEW YORK.

See that Hole?

To insert a pointed instrument and eject the pen from the holder. Prevents the ink from flowing back into the holder and soiling the fingers.

WHAT IS IT FOR?

Samples on receipt of return postage. Ask for Vertical No. 37.

The perfection of pens, slightly stiff, smooth points, durable, and uniform.

SPENCERIAN PEN CO.
450 Broome St., New York, N. Y.

STEVENS RELIABLE POCKET RIFLES.

A Combination Rifle and Pistol.

10-inch barrel. Globe and peep sights. Nickel-plated detachable rest. Weight with rest only one pound. Made to take the .22 long-rifle cartridge.

A perfect summer companion.

A rifle chambered for this cartridge will also take the C. B., .22 short and .22 long cartridges.

Price, complete, $8.25.

Where dealers do not carry STEVENS RIFLES in stock, we will send, express charges prepaid, on receipt of price.

Send for our new eighty-page catalogue, describing our full line and containing special information.

J. Stevens Arms & Tool Co.,
P. O. Box 210.
CHICOPEE FALLS, MASS.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,

BANKERS.

ESTABLISHED 1873.

2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.

Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.

Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.

A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.

Correspondence solicited.

TRADE E & W MARK

EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS BEST IN THE WORLD.

Summer Resorts

LONG BEACH

Long Island

LONG BEACH HOTEL INN AND COTTAGES

Finest Beach and Bathing

near NEW YORK CITY

Cuisine and Service Unsurpassed

45 minutes from New York via L. I. R. R. Express trains and unexcelled Railroad service. Accommodations for Bicycles.

LIBERAL RATES FOR SEASON GUESTS

Long-distance telephone No. 23 A, Long Beach.

A. E. DICK, Proprietor.

"AMERICA'S GREAT RESORTS," 48 pages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent stamp by GEORGE H. DANIELS, G. P. A. New York Central, New York.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—NO. 2174. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 20, 1898. TEN CENTS A COPY. FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.

THROUGH THE JUCARO-MORON TROCHA UNDER FIRE.

DRAWN BY F. LUIS MORA FROM A SKETCH BY CLYDE D. V. HUNT, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH THE INSURGENT FORCES.

[SEE PAGE 813.]

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, AUGUST 20, 1898

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

This Paper is the best Pictorial History of the War with Spain, as it was of the War of 1861. Its Special Artists and Correspondents have followed the Army and Navy, and notable Events in Washington and elsewhere have been accurately portrayed.

Messrs. RUFUS F. ZOGBAUM and T. DART WALKER are at Puerto Rico, Messrs. FRANK D. MILLET, JOHN F. BASS, and O. K. DAVIS are in Manila or on their way thither, and Mr. HAROLD MARTIN is at Santiago.

THE war is ended. The protocol was signed at the White House on Friday, August 12, at 4.23 P.M. The army and navy of the United States have won great glory. The value of American institutions as the builders of strong and self-reliant character has been fully demonstrated. The place of the nation among strong powers has been fixed. Now come the hard tests of peace, when our politicians will have the opportunity to show that they are worthy of our sailors and soldiers.

THE Philadelphia Press asserts that some of the old machine legislators of Pennsylvania are to be defeated because of their obedience to the machine. One of the weak and evil things about Pennsylvania politics is that the Republican party of the State contents itself with breaking unimportant parts of the machine, which are easily repaired with as bad material, while the machine as a whole remains to oppress and disgrace the State.

GOVERNOR BLACK'S canal commission has reported that the $9,000,000 appropriated for the repair of the canals has been wasted and stolen. The officials responsible for the waste and thieving are men for whom both BLACK and PLATT are in turn responsible. BLACK is reported to be discouraged by the revelations, and as contemplating a declination of a renomination. In other words, he fears that PLATT and his machine will not give it to him. This is not because the Republican machine of the State desires to punish any one for the robbery of the canal fund, but because it regards the Governor whose commission brought out the disgraceful facts as too much of a fool for its purposes.

THE discussion as to whether Admiral SAMPSON or Commodore SCHLEY is entitled to the credit and the substantial reward for the destruction of CERVERA'S fleet seems to us to have been settled by the convincing letter which we published last week. Nevertheless, Secretary LONG'S contribution to the discussion is valuable, and it is doubtless pleasant to Admiral SAMPSON to realize that the head of the navy appreciates the worth of his services to the country. Mr. LONG'S letter is a private one, but it was evidently intended for publication, and as an answer to many critics of Admiral SAMPSON, who have been stirred into activity by Commodore SCHLEY'S over-zealous friends. In rendering this service to Admiral SAMPSON, Mr. LONG also renders a service to the country, to which injustice to this worthy officer, to whose preparations and vigilance we owe the destruction of Spain's fleet, would have brought shame.

THE Irish Local Government bill has passed the House of Commons and the House of Lords, and is now a law. Its speedy enactment into law was certain, as the question of opposition by the Lords had been already settled by an understanding with Conservative and Unionist peers. Nationalists accept it as a half-way house to home-rule; Liberals look upon it as a direct result of the interest in Ireland's welfare which had been excited by Mr. GLADSTONE'S advocacy; Conservatives seem to view it with some misgiving, while congratulating themselves on the indefinite shelving of a dangerous question; and Liberal-Unionists find much satisfaction in the fact that the bill, while granting a large measure of local self-government, denies all claim of separate political existence to Ireland. There is no doubt that the law is as complete a democratization of county affairs as could be wished for by the Irish. The influence and offices which for generations have belonged to the landlords are now thrown open to the people, and their representatives will sit in county boards and councils, and will share or control their management. Candidates will be elected on a very liberal franchise, and it is significant of an awakened common interest and healthy contention that several landlords have already decided to solicit popular support for office. The change will give the Irish an excellent chance of proving their fitness for the larger measure of self-government which they are striving for.

AUSTRALIAN federation seems to be narrowed down at present to a dispute between New South Wales and the three colonies which voted in favor of the Commonwealth bill—Victoria, Tasmania, and South Australia. It is now known that the opposition of New South Wales is more provisional than a matter of settled policy, and that the requisite vote was withheld by reason of the onerous conditions which the federal pact would have imposed upon that colony in respect to taxation and revenue. The bill provides for a uniform customs tariff for the new federation, and this would compel the abandonment of the free-trade policy of New South Wales, whose taxes are mainly derived from land and income, while those of the other voting colonies are based on excise and customs. Though willing to relinquish her fiscal system in behalf of federal unity, the parent colony objects to paying more than a fair share in making good the revenue deficiencies of the others. All the colonies except New South Wales are protectionist, with border duties against one another as well as the outside world. In the new scheme they would lose all revenue from these duties, while New South Wales has comparatively little to lose. Under the provisions of the bill the latter colony is to have a proportionate share of surplus federal revenue returned to her in case there should be any after meeting the cost of the federal government; but before such cost is met and a surplus declared the revenue deficiencies of the protectionist colonies must also be made good, and the only resource is the tax funds of New South Wales. In addition to the financial difficulty, there is a strong party in the latter colony which favors a constitutional amendment changing the proposed equal representation of the colonies in the Senate. Advices state that New South Wales and Queensland are likely to combine in the attempt to secure better terms, but there is no talk of a settled resolve to defeat federation. The present movement is only a temporary check. The centripetal forces are too strong, and will triumph by the grant of local concessions now demanded.

THE discussion as to who is responsible for the lack of medical supplies and surgeons in Cuba goes on with increasing vigor. Secretary ALGER lays the fault at the door of the Medical Department, and the department insists that the fault was General SHAFTER'S, while the last mentioned denies all blame. The Medical Department is the most precise in its denial of responsibility and in its evidence in its own behalf, and this counts for something in its favor. Captain and Assistant-Surgeon EDWARD L. MUNSON, who was on duty as adjutant to the chief surgeon of the Fifth Corps, has made a report to Surgeon-General STERNBERG. He avers that abundance of medical stores were placed on board the transports at Tampa, and that they were properly, even skilfully, organized for emergencies. There were, besides the hospital-ship supplies, regimental supplies. He says that when the expedition reached Cuba the landing was made so hastily that the medical supplies were left on board the ships, and that General SHAFTER himself interfered with a belated attempt to land them, and succeeded in stopping it. When the surgeons reached the shore they found themselves without their field chests, and with "absolutely no resources at hand except such as were provided by the orderly and ship corps pouches and the first-aid packets carried by the soldiers." The half-emptied ships with their supplies had in the mean time put back to sea. At Las Guasimas there were actually "no dressings, hospital tentage, or supplies of any kind on shore within reach of the surgeons already landed." The Quartermaster's Department, Surgeon MUNSON says, refused to aid in any way, and the captains of transport steamers refused to obey the orders of the medical men. The question of responsibility seems to have narrowed down to one between the Medical Department on the one hand, and General SHAFTER and the Quartermaster's Department on the other. Whoever is guilty ought to be punished, but responsibility in the end must rest on Congress—unbusinesslike, cruelly indifferent Congress; and it is quite likely that no individual and no department of the army will suffer for the heinous wrongs that have been inflicted on our soldiers. Probably this reckless, haphazard, headless, lucky campaign affords an illustration of what we are to expect whenever the republic makes war, and so long as the army is commanded by politicians.

THE President, in seeking public opinion on the subject of the retention of the Philippines, has undertaken a most difficult task. Probably by following the dictates of his own common-sense he would adopt the best possible method to satisfy the public conscience and public opinion. It is interesting to note that the feeling in favor of the retention of the islands is not so strong as it was, and that a contemplation of the difficulties in the way of governing them, and of the possibilities of still greater difficulties in the future, have sobered some minds and substituted doubt in others. Some New York newspapers profess very decided opinions in favor of the retention of the islands, but we do not believe that they represent this community. On the other hand, most of the influential newspapers of Boston, and many of the soundest papers of the rest of the country, are strongly opposed to any further departure from the wise traditions of the country. A significant utterance is that of the Philadelphia Press, Postmaster-General SMITH'S newspaper. It says, "The Philippines as a whole the United States does not hold, has not conquered, and could not acquire save after tedious weeks of operations by land and sea." Then it states their commercial unimportance. The Kansas City Times, Democratic, says, truly, "If the United States is the leader of the world in advancing civilization to higher levels, it should not teach that the constant centralization of political power at home and the acquisition of foreign territory by force of arms are conducive to the broadening and deepening of human liberty." The Pittsburg Dispatch is inclined to think that the President will find that the "United States does not wish to burden itself with a population not only exotic, but antipodal in every respect." The San Francisco Call believes that the taking of the Philippines would be "contrary to the spirit of the Constitution." The Boston Transcript proclaims that Massachusetts "will not consent to be the ruler over vassal states or subject peoples. She will enter upon no mad career of empire in distant seas. She will not seek to force her trade upon unwilling peoples at the cannon's mouth." There are some Republican Senators, too, who read the signs of the times. Senator HOAR voted for the annexation of Hawaii, but he will not vote for annexation of the Philippines. Even the bellicose Senator MASON is against further expansion; and, most marvellous of all, Senator MORGAN wants to stop. The longer this question of keeping the Philippines is discussed, the less likely are we to be taken in the net spread out for us by the English Jingoes. As we have said already, our real friends in England do not want to see us cumber ourselves with the new Eastern question, but the English Jingo who wants to fight Russia to-morrow is very anxious to coax us into a position where we would probably be compelled to take a hand in the conflict.

THE COST AND VALUE OF THE PHILIPPINES TO THE UNITED STATES.

THE President has apparently made hard terms of peace for Spain, but when they are finally accepted they will be found to be greatly to the material advantage of that unfortunate kingdom. Even with the obligation of the enormous Cuban debt resting upon her, she will be better off without the island than in recent years she has been with it: for, with or without Cuba, Spain is the real debtor, and must provide for the principal and interest of the Cuban bonds, while her income from the island has lately been insufficient for her needs there. Without her colonies Spain's resources will not be so large as they have been, but the annual charges will be so greatly reduced that her net income will be greater than for many years past. She will be relieved immensely by the termination of her colonial obligations. She will have fewer captains-general to support, and the cost of her military establishments will be reduced. It is not probable that she will imitate the example of France, and enter upon the expensive task of recreating a navy and reorganizing her army for the purposes of revenge, for the general attitude of the nation is that of hopelessness, and consequently of indifference. Indeed, there is reason to believe that the Spaniards are so crushed by their overwhelming defeat that there is not enough spirit among them to sustain the revolt that has been so long anticipated as the inevitable consequence of any peace involving the cession of Spanish territory. On the whole, then, while Mr. MCKINLEY'S demands seem harsh to Europe, the waiver of a money indemnity makes them really light, while

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the surrender of her colonies, either to us or to the natives of the different islands, will relieve Spain of a burden which must have eventually crushed her. Without her colonies she will have a chance to recuperate—a chance, it is true, of which she may have neither the industry nor the patience to avail herself.

The question of most importance that is left open for discussion in the negotiations for a definitive treaty of peace is as to the final disposition of the Philippines, and this, as we said last week, is now a practical question. Most of our information concerning these islands is crude and insufficient. Even the number of the islands is not accurately known, some writers placing it at 1400, while one at least puts it as low as 600. The population is between 8,000,000 and 9,000,000. However that may be, we do know that the islands are inhabited chiefly by savages who do not now yield obedience to Spain, many of them not knowing of her existence, much less of her overlordship; and while the lands may be rich and exploitable, their cultivation, after the natives had been subdued by us, would have to be carried on under the protecting guns of the army and the navy. The force of troops necessary for the task of subjugation has been variously estimated by military authorities as ranging from 50,000 to 150,000 men, according as they contemplated the reduction of Manila and Luzon alone or the entire group of islands. Now the pay alone of 50,000 men would be about $30,000,000 a year, and for 150,000, therefore, about $90,000,000. If we add the expenditures incidental to the maintenance of foreign military posts and to the conduct of war, we should find the annual cost of troops alone for the reduction of Manila and Luzon running perilously near $50,000,000, while the cost of a force for the reduction of the whole archipelago would certainly reach $100,000,000. For the retention of the islands 30,000 men at least would be needed. It may be answered that this estimate of the number of troops that would be required for the retention of the islands is excessive; but we do not think so, for the reason that the annexation of the Philippine Islands would make the United States a party to the struggle for the division of China. In fact, it is argued as a principal reason for the retention of the Philippines that our presence there, with arms in our hands, will protect and expand our commercial interests in China. And while it might be that this country would not voluntarily take part in the partition of that empire, and while our interests would be more valuable in China than they now are if she were under the control of the great European powers, it is clear that warlike Europe is in Asia at present, and that the danger is imminent of an outbreak in which every Asiatic power may have to participate for self-defence. At any rate, any Asiatic power, such as the United States would be if we were in control of Luzon or of all the Philippines, would be supremely foolish not to be prepared for the most direful of emergencies. Great Britain's forces in Asia and in South and East Africa, which are available in Asia, number about 90,000 men. So that we are probably within bounds in asserting that this country will be obliged to maintain a force of at least 30,000 men in the Pacific if it is to play any part in Eastern affairs. The mere pay of this force would add about $17,000,000 to our regular army expenditures, and we may safely add $3,000,000 more for the expenditures of the Commissary, Quartermaster, Medical, and Ordnance departments. To the cost of reducing the island and to the $20,000,000 of constant annual expenditure that would be required for the maintenance of the troops of the Department of the Pacific we must add at least $10,000,000 annual increase to our naval expenditures, so that the Philippines would cost us from $60,000,000 to $110,000,000 a year, until their savage inhabitants were reduced to subjection, and afterwards about $30,000,000 a year for the defence of our Asiatic interests.

Now what would the people of the United States gain from this enormous expenditure, which would make necessary the continuance of the war taxes?—for the government can only procure money by taxation. Some revenue would be derived, of course, from the Philippines. Under Spanish rule taxation is very heavy, and the revenue received from the islands is about $13,500,000. The United States might obtain $15,000,000 of revenue by reason of better and more honest administration of the tax laws. From this sum must be deducted the cost of the civil service, of the post-office, of the administration of justice, and of other functions of government. The net revenue received by Spain from the islands is less than $300,000. Let us suppose that the United States would receive at least $10,000,000 over the actual expense of holding the islands, not counting the increased cost of the army and navy. Deducting this annual contribution of $10,000,000 from the cost of the military services, the people of this country, then, would be obliged to pay in taxes from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year while we were engaged in subjugating the natives, and $20,000,000 a year afterwards, on account of the Philippines. The last sum is nearly as great as the total value of all the exports of the islands in 1896, which reached the sum of $20,756,250, and nearly twice as great as the total value of the imports, which in the same year amounted to $10,937,500. These values are approximate, but they are those of "The Statesman's Year Book" for 1898. The figures that we are certain of are those of our own Bureau of Statistics concerning our trade with the Philippines. These show that for the fiscal year 1898, ending on the 30th of June, the value of our exports to the Philippines amounted to $127,804, and of our imports thence to $3,830,415. In other words, it is proposed to tax the people of this country to an amount ranging from $20,000,000 to $100,000,000 a year in order that some private persons in this country, some of whom may not even be citizens, shall conduct under the American flag a trade which, all told, has not over an annual value of quite $4,000,000, and the profits on which may possibly reach $1,000,000. But it may be increased by reason of our rule, say the expansionists. Let us suppose that this is true, and that we exchange places with Great Britain, what then will be our advantage; what then will flow into the pockets of private persons from the prize for whose maintenance the tax-payers will be paying at least $20,000,000 a year? In 1896 the total British imports from the Philippine Islands was valued by the Board of Trade at $7,682,665, while the exports from Great Britain to the islands were $2,538,005. This, we fancy, is as well as any nation can do in trade with the Philippines, and if we could absorb Great Britain's trade with the islands, until we actually took her place commercially, we would buy with our $20,000,000 an annual commerce of a little more than $10,000,000, and sell to the Philippines $2,500,000 of our products.

"But," again say the expansionists, "we will increase the whole of our trade in the East by reason of our occupation of the Philippines." That will be impossible, of course, unless we change our commercial policy and invite importations, or unless we take our share of China and bring it within the sphere of our free-trade system. But, as a matter of fact, our export trade with China, which constitutes nearly half of our export trade with the whole of Asia and Oceanica—more than two-thirds of it if we exclude our trade with Australasia, which will not be affected by anything that can possibly happen touching the Philippines—is about $30,500,000 a year, while Great Britain sells to China each year produce of the Kingdom of the value of nearly $43,000,000. Therefore, even if our possession of the Philippines should result in giving us a commerce with China and the islands equal to that of the British Empire, the increase in the value of the goods that our producers would sell to the Philippines and China combined would not begin to equal the amount of the tax that our people would pay for the support of the additions to the army and navy made necessary by our retention of the islands.

It seems perfectly clear from this brief and necessarily unsatisfactory examination of the economical aspects of this question that the annexation of the Philippines would be supreme folly. From the material point of view we would lose money, and our tax-payers would pay exorbitantly for the small profit of a few favored individuals. (Without regard to the great moral and political questions involved, without regard to the proposition that we, a democracy, shall exercise despotic rule over an alien people without their consent, that we shall take away from Spain territory that we have practically promised to leave untouched, the shrewd and businesslike American people will be the laughing-stock of practical business men the world over if they finally insist on the acquisition of a commerce which may possibly make an annual market of from $2,500,000 to $16,000,000 worth of our products at a yearly cost to the country of at least $20,000,000.

ECONOMICS OF THE LIQUOR PROBLEM.

DOUBTLESS an investigation of the results of the drink habit on employees in various industries would have a high economic value if it embraced a sufficient number of facts, and if it estimated with some degree of accuracy the variable conditions due to differences of character and temperament. The Department of Labor at Washington has issued its twelfth annual report, in which this phase of the liquor problem is treated on the basis of an investigation conducted in co-operation with a large number of employers. The points on which light was sought were, broadly speaking, concerned with the consideration which is given to the drinking habits of the seeker for employment and the means used in judging his fitness. The various industries in which those who indulge in intoxicants are not employed were considered, as well as the reasons for such exclusion from employment. The opinions and experience of employers were also investigated as to the use of liquors by employees subject to night work, overwork, exposure, irregular hours, and shorter hours of labor. The relation between pay-days, holidays, and Sundays and over-indulgence in intoxicants was also considered, and, finally, the means suggested by employers as best calculated to lessen the consumption of intoxicants were examined.

Of the 30,414 employers to whom schedules containing questions on the above points were addressed, 6091 replied, reporting a total list of 1,745,923 employees. Manufacturing industries reported 3700 establishments and 1,011,661 employees, while 713 transportation companies reported 458,764 employees. In other industries a fairly representative number of establishments and employees reported. It should be noted that less than one-fourth of the whole number of employers replied to the inquiries addressed to them.

As was expected, the results of the investigation showed many differences in the point of view from which existing evils were sought to be remedied. Of 7000 employers, 5363 reported that means were employed to ascertain the practice of employees in regard to intoxicants. The largest proportion of these were connected with transportation companies, where sobriety is a matter of the highest importance; and the two predominant reasons given were "to guard against accidents" and "responsibility of position." More than one-half of the establishments reporting require, in certain occupations and under certain conditions, that employees shall not use intoxicants, while the remainder make no such requirement.

In regard to the use of liquor by those engaged in night work, statistics will correct the prevalent impression that more drinking is done than by those who work during the day. Out of 1659 establishments employing night workers, only 141 stated that more liquor was drunk than by day workers, while 1460 reported less consumption among night workers than among day workers. Equally surprising and contradictory of the usual belief are the facts in regard to employees subject to overwork, exposure, and irregular employment. These unusual conditions, according to the testimony of a very large majority of establishments consulted, were not accompanied by any greater use of intoxicants than among those habituated to regular hours and more favorable conditions. There is here excellent material for consideration by those who have often based a certain class of arguments on premises which at least need revision. There is nothing unusual about the findings of the Labor Commission in regard to the increase of drinking immediately after pay-days and on holidays. It is human nature that a full purse should begin to be emptied a little liberally at first, and that its contents should disappear more slowly as the next pay-day is approached. By far the most interesting feature of the replies concerned the inquiry as to the best means of lessening liquor-drinking among the people. Prohibition was suggested by 1103 establishments, while 1687 reported in favor of the non-employment of drinking men, high license, education, abolition of saloons, and local option. A great deal of the evil due to intoxicants is set down to the treating habit, whose contagious viciousness and seductive influence are denounced in many of the reports as the chief obstacles to the desired reform.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

Thursday, August 4.—Five United States volunteer regiments, immunes, have been ordered to Santiago for garrison duty. The Spanish prisoners (many of these also the worse for Santiago fever) will be taking their departure in a few days if the Spanish Transatlantic Company lives up to its agreement. And so Shafter's army is "relieved." Its transports "will sail for New York as fast as the men can be comfortably embarked," a War Department bulletin announces to-day, and adds that "the rest at Montauk Point [Long Island] will prepare these seasoned troops for the campaign against Havana, in which they will probably take part."

Friday, August 5.—General Miles says that the peace negotiations will not affect the march to San Juan. His very deliberate advance in overwhelming force is designed to make resistance seem useless, and so to prevent a sacrifice of lives—American or Spanish. Moreover, instead of chopping down the tree, it seems as well to take it as it stands, with all its fruit still growing. All the southern coast of Puerto Rico except the city of Guayama being securely held, landing parties are now taking possession of the eastern coast—at Cape San Juan and other

(Continued on page 828.)

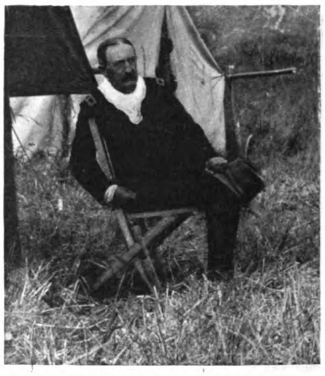
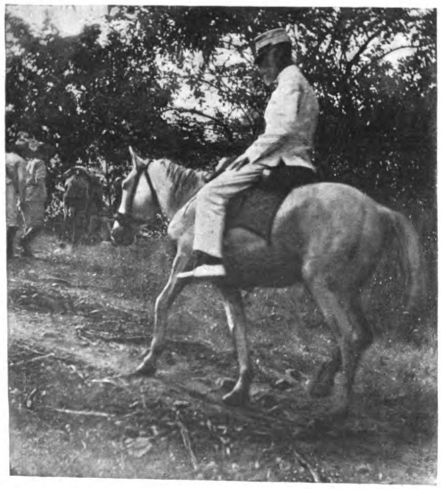
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

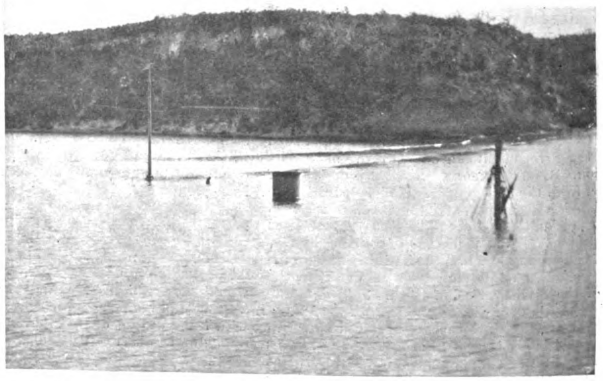
ANTIQUATED BRASS CANNON USED BY SPANIARDS.



THE ONLY SPANISH CANNON DISMOUNTED BY THE AMERICAN FIRE.



GENERAL SHAFTER ON BOARD THE TRANSPORT "SEGURANÇA."



THE RELIEF-SHIPS AT THE DOCKS IN SANTIAGO.

MAJOR-GENERAL J. FORD KENT.

ADMIRAL SAMPSON ON HORSEBACK.

THE SUNKEN "MERRIMAC"—LOG BOOMS, CARRYING MINES, IN THE REAR.

SANTIAGO—AFTER THE SURRENDER.—From Photographs by William Dinwiddie.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

GENERAL MENOCAL'S TROOPS THAT CROSSED THE TROCHA.

OUR PARTY AT THE LAST OUTPOST BEFORE RECROSSING THE TROCHA.

WITH THE CUBAN INSURGENTS.

SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."— ILLUSTRATED WITH PHOTOGRAPHS BY THE AUTHOR.

THIS is a story of a trip of several hundred miles through Cuban forests, swamps, underbrush, and across trochas to the seat of the Cuban government, and also to General Gomez's camp, and finally back to the United States in an open boat, steering by the North Star by night and by the sun in the daytime. It reveals what campaigning in Cuba means. It shows the kind of a struggle the Cubans have been carrying on, and with what meagre resources they have fought, and also with what lasting hope they have persisted.

We left Banes port on May 29 last, and exactly one month later, after a march through the brush of 143 leagues, or 429 miles, reached La Esperanza, the seat of the Cuban government. As a rule, we broke camp about five o'clock in the morning, and rode fifteen or twenty-five miles, over bad trails and through the swamp, sometimes drinking a little "Cuba libre" (water and brown sugar), but oftener making the march on nothing. Our diet was chiefly plantains and bull beef. We often camped in little ranchos used by the soldiers, which were dirty and full of fleas, or else in the open, with our hammocks swung between trees. The country was beautiful with its large palms and deserted sugar-plantations. The region was bare of population, and there was little to indicate that it had been inhabited once, except now and then a rancho. On June 8 we passed within six miles of Holguin, where there were several thousand Spaniards quartered. The Spanish general had moved his headquarters from Gibara there, fearing a bombardment from the coast. The Spaniards were so frightened that they seldom left the city, unless they took several thousand men to go foraging. Most of the streams we crossed were sluggish, the water was colored from the decayed forest matter, and often we had no water except that which we got from small pools. In the trip thus far of 400 miles we had come across only three clear streams. The horses fared well on the tall native grass.

We soon learned that General Ducassi had been sent by General Gomez to General Garcia to bring two thousand men that had been armed and equipped by the well-known "Florida" expedition, but Garcia sent back word that, as he was about to make a demonstration, he could not spare them, much to the chagrin of Ducassi. We also found that the prefecturas were well organized, and carried on a government without much of any military force. For example, the general would send ahead a day in advance news that we were coming, a government post-courier being the messenger, and, as a rule, a bullock and plantains or sweet-potatoes would be ready on our arrival. It became known during the march that on Saturday, June 11, a Norwegian steamer, with six thousand sacks of provisions, arrived at Nuevitas, and the Spaniards were so delighted they all got drunk. The steamer had false French papers, and was intercepted twice by American gunboats and let go.

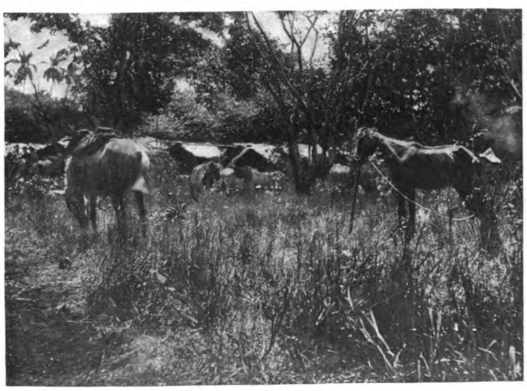
We crossed the line that runs from Puerto Principe to Nuevitas, which has small forts every three thousand feet, without being fired on, although a few Cubans who crossed a week before did not have such good luck. The seat of the Cuban government, La Esperanza, is simply a street lined with small ranchos. The president, Bartolomé Masso, is very intelligent. He, as well as most of the government officials, speaks English. In fact I find that many of the officers have been educated in America. The government officials were disappointed, we found, that the United States had not recognized their government, but they had expressions of nothing but good-will towards us. The son of an ex-President, and himself an officer of the army, said to me,

THROUGH THE TROCHA UNDER FIRE.
Diagram Explanatory of Front Page Illustration.

"We know you Americans are smarter business men than we, and will own everything some day, but it can't be helped."

While we were at La Esperanza it was decided that General Menocal, who is a graduate of Cornell, should leave with a force of two hundred volunteers to try to cross the trocha and get to Gomez. No force had as yet crossed it on horseback. The general invited me to join his troopers, and on June 30 we set out for Vera Cruz, about twenty-five miles to the east of the Moron-Jucaro trocha, where we were to wait for darkness, and where we hoped to pass the trocha before the moon should come up. It was after we left Vera Cruz that our first thrilling adventure came. It was on the night of July 8 that we started, and encamped for the night at San Tomas, an outpost protected by General Agramonte's forces, that operate on the eastern side of the military trocha Moron-Jucaro. The following day, before the sun was up, we resumed the march, stopping at Las Piedras at noon for breakfast. At two o'clock in the afternoon we were again in the saddle until half past five, when we halted in a sabaneta (small prairie) a mile distant from the Spanish military line, in order to feel for the enemy and profit by the last rays of light. After dusk we mounted in silence, and marched five hundred metres nearer the enemy. Instead of having a cloudy sky to protect us, the stars came out, and we were soon face to face with the question of victory or defeat under these disadvantageous circumstances.

Soon, breaking the silence of the night, we heard at a distance the baying of blood-hounds, the "alerta" of the sentinels, and the notes of the Spanish bugles as they sounded evening retreat. The fateful moment was at hand. Who knows or can tell the ideas that succeeded each other rapidly in the minds of the 200 men hiding and moving along by stealth? I can only say that in my immediate group, instead of sadness, we suffocated our laughter, cracked jokes, and commented on past and future events with real "mamby" (Spanish name for the insurgents) good-humor under our breaths. Five minutes, and then came the order,



"Silence and mount!"

The column advanced slowly. The night allowed one to see distinctly forty metres ahead, but the men on white horses could be seen at from fifty to sixty metres. Soon we saw in the fence a breach seven yards wide through which we might pass without becoming entangled. Five men and half an hour's work had done the work of opening it. The line of march was in single file. First there was an advance-picket of four men; then came General Menocal with the chief of his staff and aides, and twenty-five men of the escort. After them there was a group of chiefs and officers, at the head of which we marched. We were followed by a squadron of cavalry, behind which was the pack-train.

When the head of the column arrived at the railroad line, after having gone in a roundabout way, through the mistake of one of the guides, and when we were at the place on our path which was nearest the fort, there came the loud challenge from a vigilant sentinel:

"Alto! Quien vive?" (Halt! Who goes there?)

At once the Cuban infantry, which had been placed to the right and left of us, began firing. It was answered immediately by the Spaniards, who extended the shooting all along the line for two miles, and we received it from eight forts. The bullets swept toward us from all quarters, sharp and continued; probably 4000 rounds of ammunition were discharged. Having received orders not to respond, we moved on slowly and as quietly as possible. It

"DEPOSITORY" FOR HORSES OF GENERAL GOMEZ'S ARMY.

COROJO-NUTS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google seemed as though we had fallen into an ambush. The horses began to get restless, and from the slow walk soon changed to a canter. A few cowards turned back, causing great confusion among the pack-mules. But the rest continued their determined advance under the cross-fire of the Spanish rifles, and when we arrived at the edge of the woods we halted to wait for those who were yet behind.

We had forced our way through the military trocha of Jucaro-Moron, the first force to have done so since it had been strengthened. Several men were wounded, and Antoine Gomez, nephew of General Gomez, who bravely rode along with the troop after being shot through the abdomen, died soon after we stopped. Several of the horses were killed and others were wounded. The eight officers and thirty men in the pack-train who turned back probably escaped.

When we first came on General Gomez after crossing the trocha, he was moving back from the coast with the supplies that the "Florida" expedition had landed. He had about 3000 Cuban soldiers with him. In a few days he had less than 300 with him. Some had gone towards Havana, and others were in the province near La Demajagua, Sancti Spiritus, where Gomez was. Food was scarce, and many men could not be quartered in one place.

Lieutenant Johnson, U. S. A., who had fifty colored cavalry of the Tenth United States regulars with him, invited me to join his camp, so I soon was quartered there, within five minutes' riding distance of General Gomez. Johnson had supplies for sixty days.

Before meeting General Gomez I had heard many wonderful stories about him, and everybody I met seemed more or less afraid of him. It is said that he is a very early riser, and one morning before daybreak he called the sentry on watch, and ordered him to bring up some men he had heard talking. The sentry went, and returned, saying he could find no one up. The general again ordered him to bring the men to him. Thereupon the sentry awoke two officers sleeping in their hammocks, told them they were under arrest, and brought them to the general. A short time ago some one sent General Gomez a very beautiful tent from Paris. When it was put up the general looked at it and said:

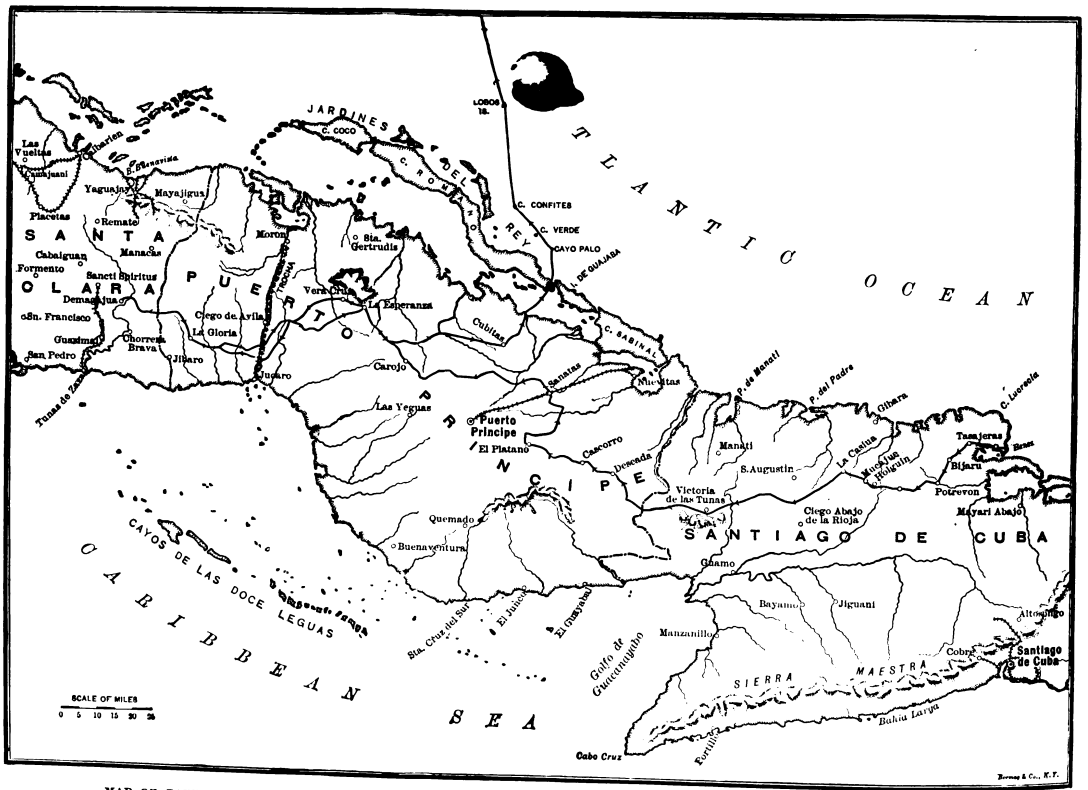
"Yes; h'm, h'm! It is very pretty, but I do not need it. Why did they not send food?" He gave it to the officers, and they made hammocks of it.

After one meets General Gomez and the ice is broken, he finds a man of the most charming character. There is no one so respected in Cuba, and none of whom the people so stand in awe. With a few hundred men he has fought thousands of Spaniards. His men obey him implicitly. A few months ago, having taken a garrison of Spaniards, his starved and thirsty soldiers began to break into some casks of rum. Gomez at once stopped them, told them they were excited enough without drinking, put a guard around the rum, and said that he would have the first man shot who touched a drop. The casks were broken open and the rum was poured out upon the ground. Some ran down a little gutter where there happened to be the footprint of a mule, which caught a little. One soldier there was seen to sip it up. He paid the penalty with his life.

It had been decided by General Gomez that I should go to the United States with important messages, and the question came up as to the quickest way to get there. Some big guns had been heard off the northern coast, and in two days men would be back to report what the firing meant; but a special messenger was to cross the trocha on foot with despatches for the government the next day. The general thought the surest way for me to get out of Cuba would be by starting with the messenger. He said that President Masso would send me on at once by boat. At six o'clock on the morning of July 18 an officer called at my palm-leaf hut in Johnson's camp, and said the chief of despatches awaited me in General Gomez's camp. The general ordered his adjutant-general to give me several letters he had written, and Captain Gomez and myself mounted our horses and headed toward the trocha.

A league from camp we stopped at the hospital, which is a rancho, where there were half a dozen sick men in their hammocks. Apparently they had plenty to eat. We picked up two Cubans leading raw-backed horses, and together travelled on for the next fifteen miles, keeping our eyes open for any guerilla bands that might be about. While we were going through the woods one of the pacificos pointed to a new grave, and I asked whose it was. The Cuban said it was the grave of one of General Menocal's soldiers. It was the last resting-place of General Gomez's nephew, our comrade of a few days, who was killed as we crossed the trocha in the night. Soon we arrived at the forlorn rancho where he died. Then we floundered through a swamp for five miles, and we arrived at the place in the trocha where a small Cuban force on the west side watches the Spaniards.

The bravest practico of the force, one of the men who came over with Menocal and cut the wires, was there, and acted as our guide. After eating some mangoes we started on the last twelve miles before reaching the line. We took two men to bring our horses back. From the trocha we were to go on foot. At every opening we looked for possible ambush, and as the sun was setting we skirted a piece of woods until we came to an overgrown road. We felt our way carefully along the edge, not speaking to one another. Suddenly the practico turned sharply to one side, and we followed into the brush and dismounted. We could hear the voices of the Spaniards in the forts. We took off our hammocks and saddle-bags from the horses, our helpers started back, and we prepared our bundles and waited for darkness. When the evening gloom had deepened into night we shouldered our bundles and moved a little nearer to the edge of the woods, where, over the high grass and between the trees, we got a glimpse of the forts. There we lay down in the wet grass and waited. We heard the "alerta!" as it came along the line from fort to fort and lost itself in the distance.



Then step by step we felt our way out into the open, to enable the practico to get his bearings on the forts. The stars were shining brightly, and we hid in the grass. A blue shirt was taken from a saddle-bag and tied around my hammock, the white color of which showed for some distance. In half an hour we started, and, like brigands, moved on diagonally between the forts. All at once the practico turned to me and whispered, "Agua" (water). I, in turn, whispered it to the captain. Then on we went to the railroad ditch, over the track, and down the other side into a swamp, trying as much as possible to let the water drain out of our boots before lifting them from the surface. Every few minutes we heard the sentinels giving the "alerta!" from the forts. That signal helped to give us our bearings. I counted as many signals as I could hear. There were eight coming towards us and four going away. The sentry in the fort to the left had a fine bass voice, and I was afraid all the time that he would discover us. Just about this time he sneezed three times, and I remember what confidence it gave us. He could not hear us take our feet out of the water while he was sneezing!

At last we came to the first line of barbed wire. It was only three feet high, and we pressed it down and stepped over. The succeeding ones were more difficult. They seemed to go from the top of one post to the bottom of another. Sometimes strands would start at one post and go zigzag in various directions. The water was up to our knees, but after a time we got over the wires. Then we came to a thicket; we could not pass through it, and we had to go around it. Soon we passed the wood, and picked our way along parallel to the forts, and finally struck a trail without being fired upon. It was worth the work and long suspense, just for the satisfaction of not getting hit. Another league, and we tied up our hammocks, wet through and through, but we went to sleep fagged out. The next day before daylight we walked ten miles to a rancho, where we got something to eat.

After arriving at the seat of government, I delivered my letters and asked the Secretary of War, Colonel Sterling, when I could leave for the United States. He told me I could go at once. After lunching with him, and after a chat with President Masso, I left for the coast, which is forty-five miles from the government. On July 25 we left Guanaja in a twenty-three-foot sailing-boat, with three men. At nine o'clock in the evening we hoisted sail and passed through the narrow channel of mango-bushes, keeping a good lookout for any Spanish boats. The Spaniards have a garrison of forty men at the semaphore ten miles off, and the officer in charge of our escort told us that two boats with Spaniards went along the coast at sunset. At the mouth of the creek our boat ran aground. The men all jumped overboard and pushed her off, notwithstanding the sharks. This process was gone through with several times before we came to open water. At 7 A. M. on July 26 we arrived at Cayo Palo (Spanish for Pigeon Key). After breakfast we weighed anchor and made for Confites, where there is a deserted hut and flagpole. We hoisted a blanket to attract a steamer going by at a distance, but did not succeed. Owing to a dead head-wind, we decided to spend the night there.

The next morning we headed our little craft towards Lobus Light, one of the Bahamas, and after taking on water, put off with a half-hurricane blowing. We had a very rough voyage, and the three sailors, two of whom were Key West cigarmakers, were not good for much. One was told to steer by the North Star. All at once our sail jibed, and we found he was steering by another star. We asked him why he did so. He replied that a cloud came over the North Star, so he had to take the next one. The following day Cat Cay was sighted, where we found a most hospitable Englishman, a Mr. Height, who owns the island, and who persuaded us to spend the afternoon and night with him. The entrance to Miami, Florida, after the run across the channel, was difficult to make in the dark, but late on the evening of July 30 we made it, and were safe once more in the United States.

CLYDE D. V. HUNT.

MAP OF PART OF EASTERN CUBA SHOWING THE ROUTE TAKEN BY OUR CORRESPONDENT ON HIS VISIT TO GENERAL GOMEZ.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

THE Merchants' Association has issued a pretty pocket-pamphlet, setting forth in brief the charms of New York as a summer city, giving a map of it with all its newly acquired territory, and telling merchants all over the country how they may get here with due advantage from the reduced rates offered by the railroads. New York, when it is not too hot, is a good place in summer; and even when it is hot, it seems breezy and comfortable to travellers from the South. There is no month in the year when thousands of visitors do not testify by their presence that it is good to be here.

The next hero of the war that we are likely to have on exhibition is Colonel Roosevelt. The troops from Santiago can doubtless get to Montauk Point without marching up Broadway and Fifth Avenue, even as far as Thirty-fourth Street, but New York is bound to have a sight of them, either coming or going. After the Montauk breezes have blown the fevers out of them, surely we shall see them. The whole country wants to see the troops, white and black, whose personal gallantry saved from failure the campaign about Santiago. When they come here—dear, dear! what a day that will be! Moreover, if the war ends, and Colonel Roosevelt gets back on to the soil of New York State, how will it be possible to avoid running him for Governor?

The Sixth Massachusetts, the regiment that was "first in three wars," is one of the last of the volunteer regiments that one would have expected to see get into trouble. But in trouble it has been, as is evident from the resignation of its colonel and four other officers, who, report says, gave up their commissions rather than be examined to test their efficiency. The Sixth went to Puerto Rico, and seems not to have prospered there, as its men are charged with straggling and with unauthorized foraging. Its new colonel, Edmund Rice, is a veteran of the civil war who entered the regular army, in which he ranks as captain of infantry. Doubtless the Sixth will profit by his experienced direction.

The letter of Captain Mahan in the Sun of August 7, and the letter, unsigned, in the last HARPER'S WEEKLY, will give small comfort to those injudicious admirers of Commodore Schley who have tried to give him credit for Cervera's defeat at the cost of Admiral Sampson. It was a foolish and disreputable attempt, adopted to stir up strife and inflame jealousies where there was no occasion for anything but good feeling. Commodore Schley, who has himself said no word that was unseemly, owes his superserviceable friends a grudge for doing their best to put him in a bad light.

Dr. Georg Maurice Ebers, Egyptologist and story-writer, who died at Tutzing, Germany, on August 7, has done little writing for ten years past. He was born in 1837, was the son of a banker, and read law at Göttingen. While still a student he had a very serious illness, from the effects of which he never fully recovered, and that disability helped to turn him from a life of active business to a more studious career. While he was studying Egyptology he fell in with the brothers Grimm, students of folk lore, grammarians, and writers of story-books, and through them he met Lepsius. These associations seem to have determined the direction and scope of his endeavors. He published A Princess of Egypt, which was successful, and in 1864 became a tutor at Jena. Some years afterwards he became Professor of Egyptology at the University of Leipsic. He made repeated visits to Egypt, and in 1877 published Uarda, which was followed by Homo Sum and other novels. He wrote sixteen historical novels in all, besides fairy-tales and biographies.

The news that Mr. George N. Curzon has been appointed Viceroy of India is of special interest in this country, because Mr. Curzon is well known here, both as an accomplished gentleman and diplomat, and as the husband of an American wife. He married, in 1895, Miss Mary Leiter, daughter of Mr. Levi Leiter, of Chicago, and sister of Joseph Leiter, the eminent grain-speculator.

Mr. Curzon is the son of a clergyman (the Rev. Alfred Curzon, Baron Scarsdale), and has been private secretary to Lord Salisbury. He has been a member of Parliament, and for some time was Under-Secretary of State for India. He is thirty-nine years old, and is a very high authority on Eastern affairs. The newspapers tell us that Mr. Levi Leiter has expressed his satisfaction at his son-in-law's appointment, and says of Mr. Curzon that he is "a first-class man anywhere and everywhere, and (the first thing, after all) a manly, good man." It is a pleasant thing to find an American father-in-law who is thoroughly satisfied with his British son. Mr. Leiter has also expressed his confidence that his daughter will be equal to any position to which she may be called, and there is reason to believe that in that particular his opinion is sound. It may not be an impertinence to add that Mr. Leiter seems to be a good deal of a man himself, and appears to have met certain recent vicissitudes of fortune with notable courage and good sense, as well as with very large sums of ready money.

That Joseph Leiter made some friends for himself by his attention to the price of wheat appears from the movement reported to have been lately started in Harvey County, Kansas, to pay to him, or to his father, one cent on every bushel of wheat sold this year. This movement may not result in much revenue, but it certainly shows sympathy, good-will, and a sense of obligation.

Chaplain Jones, of the Texas, seems to be the authority for the story that Captain Philip of that ship has so great a regard for the sanctity of the Sabbath that he expects the side that begins a fight at sea on Sunday to be beaten. If Captain Philip feels so about it there's no fault to find, because a sailor-man is entitled to his superstitions; but the religious papers which point to Captain Philip's little superstition as an exemplary thing, and who point to the battle of Santiago as an illustration of the wrath of God kindled against Sabbath-breakers, make themselves very ridiculous. The New York Observer, a paper old enough to know better, actually seems to regard Admiral Cervera as a man punished for Sabbath-breaking, and suggests that his attempt to steal a march on the American fleet while the men were at Divine service vexed the Almighty so heartily that not one of Cervera's ships was suffered to get away.

Now, war is a condition of affairs where one lot of men do their best to kill or disable another lot of men. If the Almighty is not too squeamish to tolerate war on week-days, the chances are that He can stand it on Sundays also. A great evil often nullifies a less one. Mosquitoes are not troublesome in the busy time of a naval battle; murder done on Sunday is classed as murder, not as Sabbath-breaking; and war in its active stage is so colossal an evil that such breaches of the peace of Sunday as it involves are probably overlooked by the recording angel. A circumstance that seems to conflict with the belief that the Almighty particularly objects to Sunday fighting is that it was on a Sunday morning (May 1) that Admiral Dewey had his memorable experience with Spanish ships in the harbor of Manila.

Chicago is reported to have drawn plans for a "peace carnival," to begin on October 3, to last a fortnight. It is to include a great show on the lake, as well as prodigious demonstrations ashore, and is announced as planned on a scale which will make it cost $700,000. That amount of money should make some pretty shows, but a "carnival" lasting two weeks, over the end of a four months' war, seems out of proportion. Moreover, will not the comity of cities be somewhat prejudiced if Chicago gives a $700,000 carnival in the face of the Omaha Fair?

It is interesting, albeit somewhat appalling, to notice how commonly those of our contemporaries who commit suicide do it with carbolic acid. Women especially, who are out of conceit with life, seem to turn to carbolic acid as the natural remedy. Yet this acid burns even the outer skin, much more the inside tissues, and makes death come with dreadful pain. No judicious person would choose to die by it. Its use must be due to its availability. It is easy to get, being so useful as a disinfectant that it is freely sold.

The map of Cuba which has hung conspicuous on so many walls for three months past makes way for the time for the map of Long Island showing the situation of Montauk Point, which is just now an important centre of martial interests. The maps show that New London, Newport, and Narragansett are points of strategetical importance relative to Montauk Point, and numerous expeditions are likely to be fitted out from those harbors, and even from as far to the eastward as Nantucket and Buzzards Bay. Yachts will be pretty sure to go to Montauk if they can find anchorage there, and if they are allowed in the neighborhood.

It appears, by-the-way, that the Montauk Indians claim Montauk Point as part of their reservation, and that their attorneys have been instructed to collect from the government whatever money may be due for the use of their land as a camp. The Indians dispute all claims of the Long Island Railroad to ownership of the reservation lands over which it has laid its rails.

Some one with a long memory and acquaintance with local history has recalled that Nantucket and Marthas Vineyard formerly belonged, with Long Island, to the province of New York. The counties in all these islands seem to have been named at the same time. Marthas Vineyard is still Dukes County, and Long Island has its Queens and Kings.

A Concord (New Hampshire) correspondent of the Boston Transcript wants to see the Rollo Books reprinted for the benefit of the rising generation of Americans. Perhaps they would help American manners. Certainly they are still readable for persons of a suitable age; and so, for that matter, are the Parents' Assistant and Maria Edgeworth's Moral Tales. Miss Edgeworth's stories are really literature, and are as good as they ever were. If we are to be such fast friends with our British cousins, the fact that these tales reflect British civilization and social conditions and classes will no longer be a drawback to their use by young American readers.

The Rollo Books might have to be brought down to date. Rollo's experiences at Santiago, at Manila, at Puerto Rico, at Honolulu, and even at Chicago offer great opportunities for a competent hand. Mr. George's views on General Shafter might be highly edifying even to adult readers.

California has lost a notable and interesting citizen in Adolph Heinrich Joseph Sutro, who died in San Francisco on August 8. He was born in Germany in 1830, and made a special study of mineralogy, which he sought to turn to account by coming, in 1850, to this country, and going to California. His great exploit as a mining engineer was the famous Sutro tunnel, which he built between 1865 and 1871, to give access to the mines of the Comstock lode in Nevada. It is five miles long, and as a tunnel is a great success, and made a fortune for its constructor, though by the time it was finished the ore in the Comstock lode pretty much gave out.

Mr. Sutro, like most Germans who come to this country, threw in his lot heartily with the community in which he settled, and became a public-spirited and very active and influential citizen of San Francisco. He gave that city a fine library and art gallery, and also presented to it, about ten years ago, a copy of the Bartholdi Statue of Liberty which stands in New York Harbor, which latter service will doubtless be forgiven him in view of the rectitude of his intentions. He owned a large property near the Cliff House on the ocean-front near San Francisco, which he designed to improve and give to the city as a public pleasure-ground. In his efforts to carry out this purpose he got into a fight with the Southern Pacific Railway, which he conducted with so much vigor as greatly to endear himself to the San Francisco community. As a consequence he was elected Mayor of the city on a Populist ticket, but his administration did not add to his credit.

Mr. Sutro was notable as being one of the rich Californians who found the interests of the Pacific coast sufficient to make life agreeable, and continued to the end to stay by the community in which he found his fortune.

It is interesting to notice that the remedy vulgarly known as "a hair of the dog that bit you" is offered for the relief of sufferers from such writings of Tolstoi as have turned out to be unwholesome. The novelist has a son, Count Lioff Tolstoi, who has published a story called A Chopin Prelude, which is offered, to the Russian public as an antidote to the Kreutzer Sonata. As that objectionable tale was in discouragement of marriage, the new story by Tolstoi fils takes the other view, and agrees that, all things considered, marriage is best. The morals of the younger count's writings are warmly commended by the critics, who are unable, however, to discover as yet that the son has inherited the literary gifts of the father.

There is a vast deal of talk in circulation about the Santiago campaign. Now that the men who took part in it are coming home in considerable numbers, stories innumerable are being told, and comments of great vigor are being exchanged. Everything that is being said will presently find its way into the newspapers; for as soon as peace is declared there will be no further need of holding back anything the communication of which will relieve any truthful person's mind. There will be an immense amount of censure of various representatives of the government. It will not be pleasant, but it may be useful. It is for the interest of the country that we should all know in good time how the war has been managed, how far political considerations have interfered with good appointments and effective work, how far maladministration was inevitable and due to a bad system which the present administration inherited, what was well done, and what so badly done or so outrageously neglected that some one should suffer for it. The military end of the war will make a prodigious amount of reading, considering how short a time the war has lasted. The navy has won glory enough to go around, but the army hasn't. The army has won glory of imperishable quality, but the distribution of it is very unequal.

Is our war experience likely to breed an appetite for more military experiments? That is a question that one hears propounded. We all hope not, and it seems likely that by the time we get all through with this war, and have computed the pension bill, and reckoned up the total loss by wounds and disease, and have got the fever out of all the survivors, our appetite for glory may be sated for some time to come.

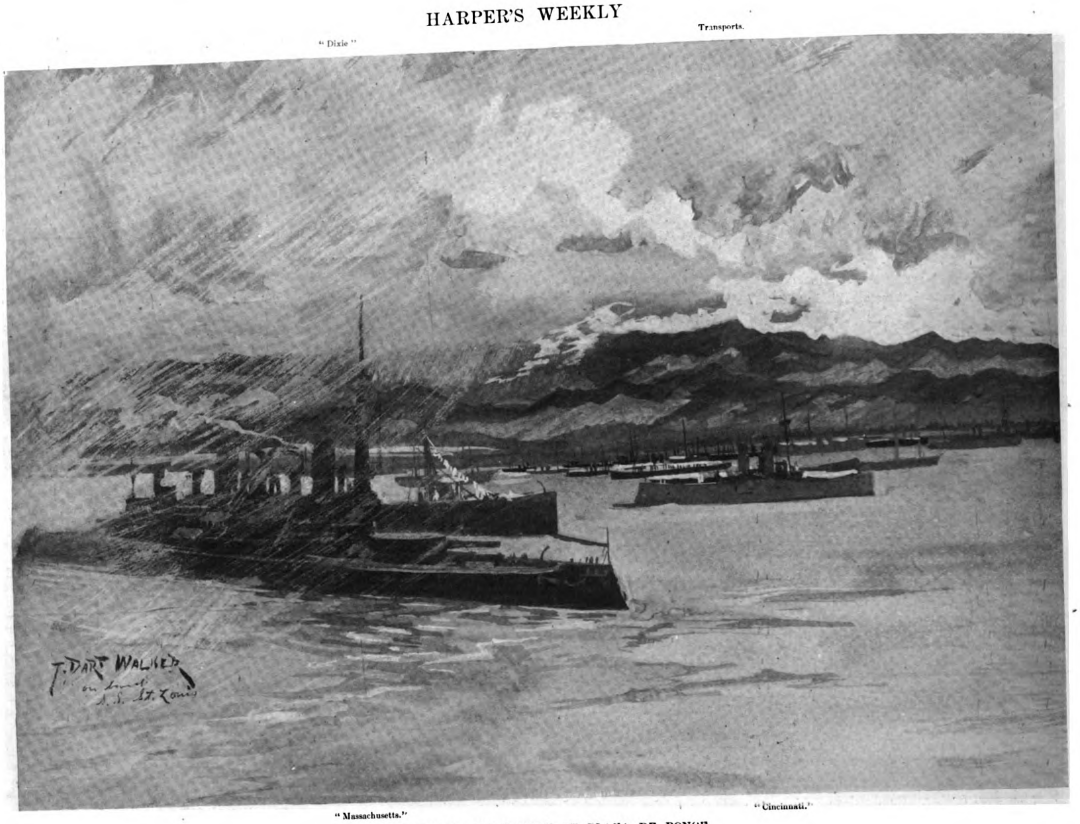
Fever, by-the-way, is not an affection that is readily quenched. Many of the men who have come back from Santiago are likely to have annual reminders of their experiences there for a long time to come.

The Erie Canal has two principal excuses for existence. One is to be the subject of investigation. The other is to provide for the passage of canal-boats from Albany to Buffalo. It is just now serving the first—which is possibly its primary—purpose unusually well, but not the other. The canal-boats and all the interests that are concerned with them have had a hard summer. The old canal is in a pretty bad way. The money that has been spent on it has doubtless improved it in spots, but a continuous trip through is still perilous and liable to ruinous delays.

The prospect of a new race for the America's cup is cheerful. The temper of the country, mollified by recent evidences of British esteem, could doubtless stand another race now, and there is no reason why we should not hope that Sir Thomas Lipton with the Shamrock, or Mr. Charles Ewing with the Rainbow, should not be blessed in the desire to bring about a new meeting.

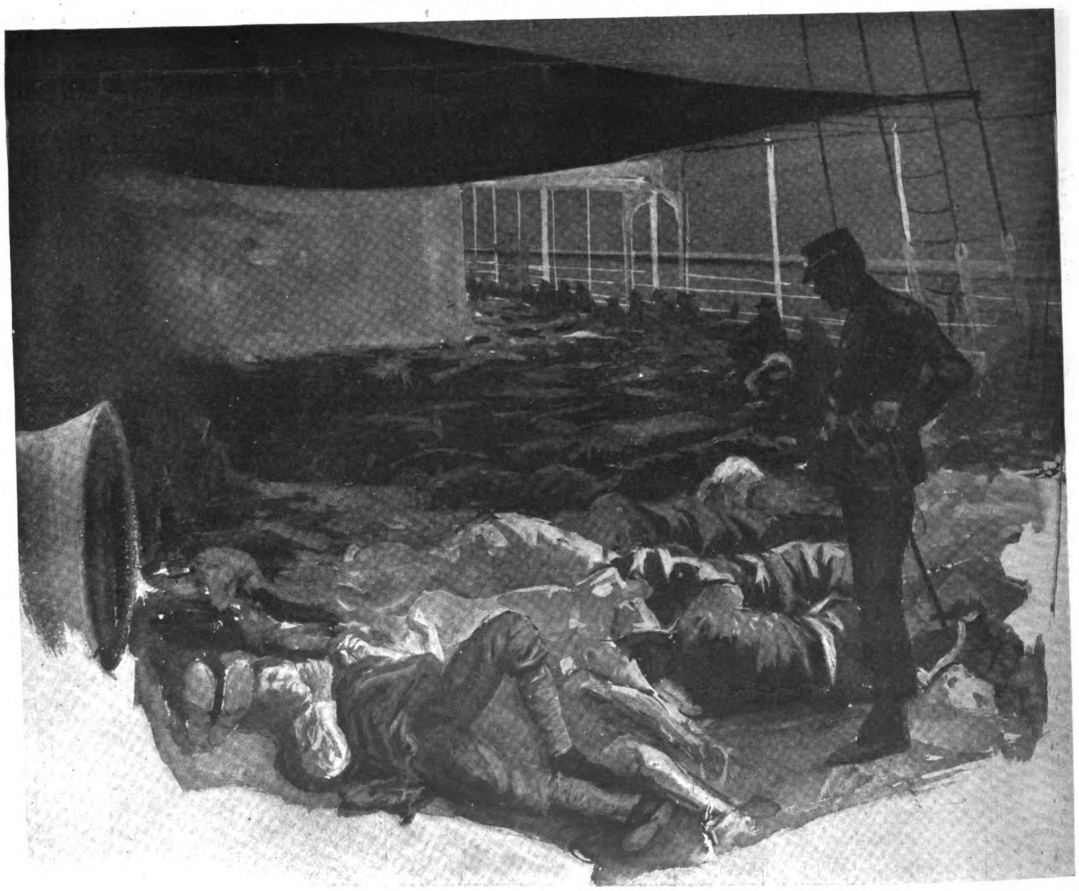
Sir Thomas Lipton seems to be fired with a remarkable zeal for the promotion of public enterprises. It will be noticed that almost simultaneously with the rumors of his desire to challenge comes the report of his gift of £100,000 to a favorite project of the Princess of Wales—the establishment of dining-rooms in London where working-men can get good meals for very little money.

Report says that a syndicate of English capitalists wants possession of the Isles of Shoals. An American sea-shore resort managed under direction of English capitalists would be interesting, and might be attractive. It might offer the change from American housekeeping to hotel-keeping, which one finds on a British steamer, and which for novelty's sake is welcome to many American travellers. An American summer resort seems an odd thing, in some respects, for an English company to buy, but, after all, British syndicates are traditionally adventurous.



"Hell's Kitchen," the scene of recent disturbances in New York, is the name applied to Thirty-ninth Street near the North River, a region of unenviable repute, which has of late years become a residence quarter for negroes. So far as appears from the deliverances of the local historians, negroes have been received there as tenants of tenement-houses because they were the only decent people who were willing to live in a neighborhood that bore so bad a reputation. It is not they who have given the quarter a bad name, but it is because the bad name already existed that property-owners made negroes welcome there. The original inhabitants do not view the negro immigration in the same favorable light that the house-owners do, and hence much jealousy and friction, culminating from time to time in such outbreaks as that of three weeks ago.

Mr. George W. Smalley does not take a rose-colored view of the personal qualities of the German Emperor. Reviewing a volume of the Emperor's deliverances, which has been lately issued under the title of Kaiserworte, Mr. Smalley remarks upon the note of boastful self-consciousness which is so seldom absent from the written and spoken words of William II., and confides to us that "they say of him in England that he is not a gentleman." To William, Mr. Smalley says, the world is a stage, and he the chief actor. He is always theatrical, and would have made a good stage-manager; he is self-assertive, boastful, vainglorious, loud-mouthed, regardful of himself and not of others. "Such is not the type of person to whom, in England, the word gentleman is applied."

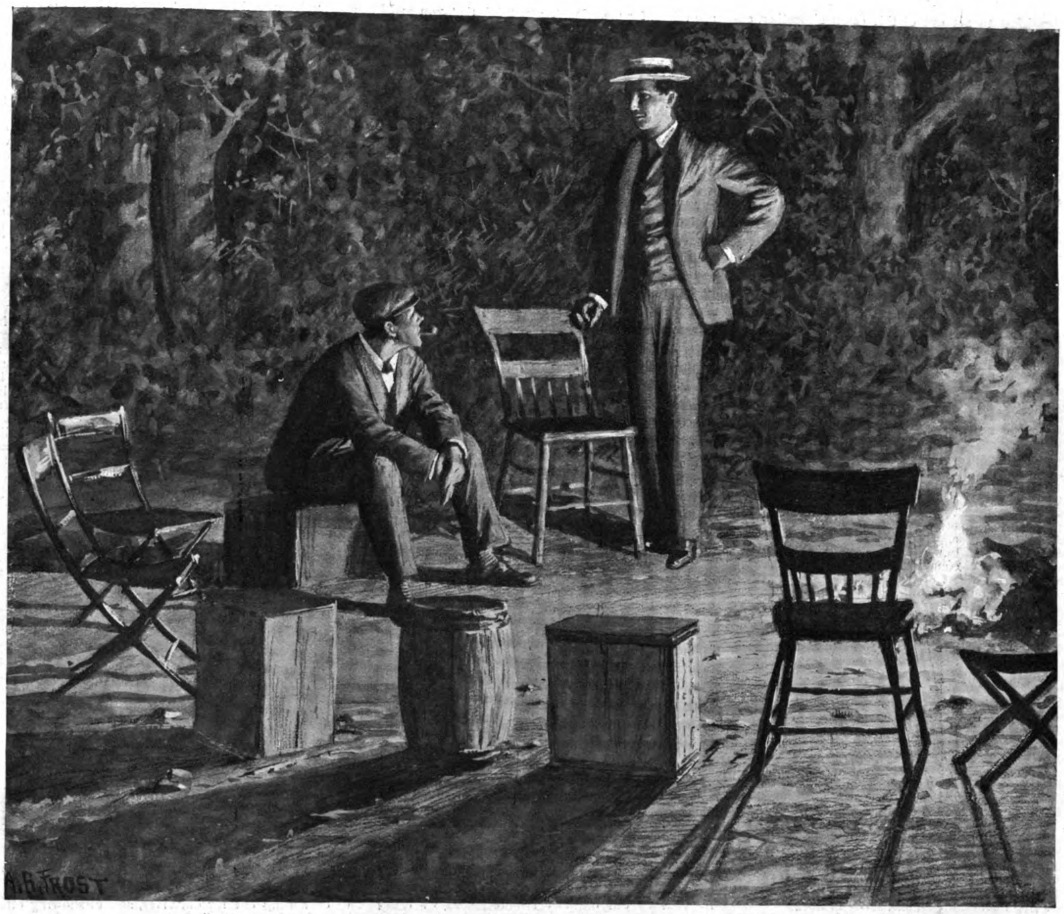


Hence we may see (and Mr. Smalley himself may find profit in remembering it) that if in our Congress there are from time to time persons whose manners and feelings are not all we could wish, we still are not the only civilized people who can discern painful blemishes in their rulers.

E. S. MARTIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

TROOP-SHIPS AND CONVOY AT PLAYA DE PONCE.



TROOPS SLEEPING ON THE DECK OF THE U. S. S. "ST. LOUIS."

THE INVASION OF PUERTO RICO.

Drawn by T. Dart Walker, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly" with General Miles's Army.—[See Page 828.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS.*

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON,

AUTHOR OF "THE GREAT STONE OF SARDIS," ETC.

ILLUSTRATED BY A. B. FROST.

XVII.—MRS. PERKENPINE ASSERTS HER INDIVIDUALITY.

ABOUT half an hour after the beginning of the conversation between the bishop and Miss Corona, Mrs. Perkenpine came to the latter and informed her that supper was ready, and three times after that first announcement did she repeat the information. At last the bishop rose and said he would not keep Miss Raybold from her meal.

"Will you not join us?" she asked. "I shall be glad to have you do so."

The bishop hesitated for a moment, and then he accompanied Corona.

As Mrs. Perkenpine turned from the camp cooking-stove, a long-handled pan, well filled with slices of hot meat, in her hand, she stood for a moment amazed. Slowly approaching the little table outside of the tent were the bishop and Miss Raybold, and glancing beyond them toward the lake, she saw Clyde and Raybold, to whom she had yelled that supper was ready, the one with his arms folded, gazing out over the water, and the other strolling backward and forward, as if he had thought of going to his supper, but had not quite made up his mind to it.

Mrs. Perkenpine's face grew red. "They are waitin' for a chance to speak to that gal," she thought. "Well, let them wait. And she's bringing him! She needn't s'pose I don't know him. I've seen him splittin' wood at Sadler's, and I don't cook for sech." So saying, she strode to some bushes a little back of the stove, and dashed the panful of meat behind them. Then she returned, and seizing the steaming coffee-pot, she poured its contents on the ground. Then she took up a smaller pan, containing some fried potatoes, hot and savory, and these she threw after the meat.

The bishop and Corona now reached the table and seated themselves. Mrs. Perkenpine, her face as hard and immovable as the trunk of an oak, approached, and placed before them some slices of cold bread, some butter, and two glasses of water.

Still earnestly talking, her eyes sometimes dimmed with tears of excitement as she descanted upon her favorite theories, Corona began to eat what was before her. She buttered a slice of bread, and if the bishop chanced to say anything she ate some of it. She drank some water, and she talked and talked and talked. She did not know what she was eating. It might have been a Lord Mayor's dinner or a beggar's crust; her mind took no cognizance of such an unimportant matter. As for her companion, he knew very well what he was eating, and as he gazed about him, and saw that there were no signs of anything more, his heart sank lower and lower; but he ate slice after slice of bread, for he was hungry, and he hoped that when the two young men came to the table they would call for more substantial food.

But long before they arrived Corona finished her meal and rose.

"Now that we have had our supper," she said, "let us go where we shall not be annoyed by the smell of food, and continue our conversation."

"Is it possible," thought the bishop, "that she can be annoyed by the smell of hot meat, potatoes, and coffee? I suppose the delicious odor comes from the other supper table. Heavens! Why wasn't I asked there?"

There was a dreadful storm when Raybold and Clyde came to the table; but Mrs. Perkenpine remained hard and immovable through it all.

"Your sister and that tramp has been here," said she, "and this is all there is left. If you keep your hogs in your house, you can't expect to count on your victuals."

Some more coffee was made, and that with bread composed the young men's supper.

When Arthur Raybold had finished his meal, he walked to the spot where Corona and the bishop were conversing, and stood there silently. He was afraid to interrupt his sister by speaking to her, but he thought that his presence might have an effect upon her companion. It did have an effect, for the bishop seized the opportunity created by the arrival of a third party, excused himself, and departed at the first break in Corona's flow of words.

"I wish, Arthur," she said, "that when you see I am engaged in a conversation, you would wait at least a reasonable time before interrupting it."

"A reasonable time!" said Raybold, with a laugh. "I like that! But I came here to interrupt your conversation. Do you know who that fellow is you were talking to? He's a common, good-for-nothing tramp. He goes round splitting wood for his meals. Clyde and I kept him here to cook our meals because we had no servant, and he's been in bed for days because he had no clothes to wear, and now you are treating him as if he were a gentleman, and actually brought him to our table, where, like the half-starved cur that he is, he has eaten up everything fit to eat that we were to have for our supper."

"He did not eat all of it," said Corona, "for I ate some of it myself; and if he is the good-for-nothing tramp and the other things you call him, I wish I could meet with more such tramps. I tell you, Arthur, that if you were to spend the next five years in reading and studying, you could not get into your mind one-tenth of the serious information, the power to reason intelligently upon your perceptions, the ability to collate, compare, and refer to their individual causes the impressions—"

"Oh, bosh!" said her brother. "What I want to know is, are you going to make friends with that man and invite him to our table?"

"I shall invite him if I see fit," said she. "He is an extremely intelligent person."

"Well," answered he, "if you do I shall have a separate table," and he walked away.

As soon as he had left Corona, the bishop repaired to the Archibald's cooking-tent, where he saw Matlack at work.

"I have come," he said, with a pleasant smile, "to ask a very great favor. Would it be convenient for you to give me something to eat? Anything in the way of meat, hot or cold, and some tea or coffee, as I see there is a pot still steaming on your stove. I have had an unlucky experience. You know I have been preparing my own meals at the other camp, but to-day, when Mrs. Perkenpine brought me my clothes, she carried away with her all the provisions that had been left there. I supped, it is true, with Miss Raybold, but her appetite is so delicate and her fare so extremely simple that I confidentially acknowledge that I am half starved."

During these remarks Matlack had stood quietly gazing at the bishop. "Do you see that pile of logs and branches there?" said he; "that's the firewood that's got to be cut for to-morrow, which is Sunday, when we don't want to be cuttin' wood; and if you'll go to work and cut it into pieces to fit this stove, I'll give you your supper. You can go to the other camp and sleep where you have been sleepin', if you want to, and in the mornin' I'll give you your breakfast. I 'ain't got no right to give you Mr. Archibald's victuals, but what you eat I'll pay for out of my own pocket, considerin' that you'll do my work. Then to-morrow I'll give you just one hour after you've finished

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2167.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google your breakfast to get out of this camp altogether, entirely out of my sight. I tried to have you sent away before, but other people took you up, and so I said no more; but now things are different. When a man pulls up what I've drove down, and sets loose what I've locked fast, and the same as snaps his fingers in my face when I'm attendin' to my business, then I don't stand that man."

"Excuse me," said the bishop; "but in case I should not go away within the time specified, what would be your course?"

In a few brief remarks, inelegant but expressive, the guide outlined his intentions of taking measures which would utterly eliminate the physical energy of the other.

"I haven't taken no advantage of you," he said; "I have not come down on you when you hadn't no clothes to go away in; and now that you've got good clothes, I don't want to spile them if I can help it; but they're not goin' to save you—mind my words. What I've said I'll stick to."

"Mr. Matlack," said the bishop, "I consider that you are entirely correct in all your positions. As to that unfortunate affair of the boat, I had intended coming to you and apologizing most sincerely for my share in it. It was an act of great foolishness, but that does not in the least excuse me. I apologize now, and beg that you will believe that I truly regret having interfered with your arrangements."

"That won't do!" exclaimed the guide. "When a man as much as snaps his fingers in my face, it's no use for him to come and apologize. That's not what I want."

"Nevertheless," said the bishop, "you will pardon me if I insist upon expressing my regrets. I do that for my own sake as well as yours; but we will drop that subject. When you ask me to cut wood to pay for my meals, you are entirely right, and I honor you for your sound opinions upon this subject. I will cut the wood and earn my meals, but there is one amendment to your plan which I would like to propose. To-morrow is Sunday; for that reason we should endeavor to make the day as quiet and peaceable as possible, and we should avoid everything which may be difficult of explanation or calculated to bring about an unpleasant difference of opinion among other members of the party. Therefore, will you postpone the time at which you will definitely urge my departure until Monday morning?"

"Well," said Matlack, "now I come to think of it, it might be well not to kick up a row on Sunday, and I will put it off until Monday morning; but mind, there's no nonsense about me. What I say I mean, and on Monday morning you march of your own accord, or I'll attend to the matter myself."

"Very good," said the bishop; "thank you very much. To-morrow I will consider your invitation to leave this place, and if you will come to Camp Roy about half past six on Monday morning I will then give you my decision. Will that hour suit you?"

"All right," said Matlack; "you might as well make it a business matter. It's going to be business on my side, I'd have you know."

"Good—very good," said the bishop; "and now let me get at that wood."

So saying, he put down his cane, took off his hat, his coat, his waistcoat, his collar, and his cravat and his cuffs; he rolled up his sleeves, he turned up the bottoms of his trousers, and then taking an axe, he set to work.

In a few minutes Martin arrived on the scene. "What's up now?" said he.

"He's cuttin' wood for his meals," replied Matlack.

"I thought you were going to bounce him as soon as he got up?"

"That's put off until Monday morning," said Matlack. "Then he marches. I've settled that."

"Did he agree?" asked Martin.

"Tain't necessary for him to agree; he'll find that out Monday morning."

Martin stood and looked at the bishop as he worked.

"I wish you would get him to cut wood every day," said he. "By George, how he makes that axe fly!"

When the bishop finished his work he drove his axe-head deep into a stump, washed his hands and his face, resumed the clothing he had laid aside, and then sat down to supper. There was nothing stingy about Matlack, and the wood-chopper made a meal which amply compensated him for the deficiencies of the Perkenpine repast.

When he had finished he hurried to the spot where the party was in the habit of assembling around the camp fire. He found there some blazing logs, and Mr. Clyde, who sat alone, smoking his pipe.

"What is the matter?" asked the bishop. "Where are all our friends?"

"I expect they are all in bed," said Clyde, "with the bedclothes pulled over their heads—that is, except one, and I expect she is talking in her sleep. They were all here as usual, and Mr. Archibald thought he would break the spell by telling a fishing story. He told me he was going to try to speak against time; but it wasn't of any use. She just slid into the middle of his remarks as a duck slides into the water, and then she began an oration. I really believe she did not know any one was talking."

"That may have been the case," said the bishop; "she has a wonderful power of self-concentration."

"That is true," said Clyde, "and this time she concentrated herself so much upon herself that the rest of us got away, one by one, and when all the others had gone she went, and when I found she really had gone I came back. By-the-way, bishop," he continued, "there is something I would like to do, and I want you to help me."

"Name it," said the other.

"I am getting tired of the way the Raybolds are trespassing on the good-nature of the Archibalds, and, whatever they do, I don't intend to let them make me trespass any longer. I haven't anything to do with Miss Raybold, but the other tent belongs as much to me as it does to her brother, and I am going to take it back to our own camp. And what is more, I am going to have my meals there. I don't want that wooden-headed Mrs. Perkenpine to cook for me."

"How would you like me to do it?" asked the bishop, quickly.

"That would be fine," said Clyde. "I will help, and we will set up housekeeping there again, and if Raybold doesn't choose to come and live in his own camp he can go wherever he pleases. I am not going to have him manage things for me. Don't you think that you and I can carry that tent over?"

"With ease!" exclaimed the bishop. "When do you want to move—Monday morning?"

"Yes," said Clyde, "after breakfast."

XVIII.—THE HERMITS ASSOCIATE.

During the next day no one in camp had reason to complain of Corona Raybold. She did not seem inclined to talk to anybody, but spent the most of her time alone. She wrote a little and reflected a great deal, sometimes walking, sometimes seated in the shade, gazing far beyond the sky.

When the evening fire was lighted, her mood changed so that one might have supposed that another fire had been lighted somewhere in the interior of her mental organism. Her fine eyes glistened, her cheeks gently reddened, and her whole body became animated with an energy created by warm emotions.

"I have something I wish to say to you all," she exclaimed, as she reached the fire. "Where is Arthur? Will somebody please call him? And I would like to see both the guides. It is something very important that I have to say. Mrs. Perkenpine will be here in a moment; I asked her to come. If Mr. Matlack is not quite ready, can he not postpone what he is doing? I am sure you will all be interested in what I have to say, and I do not want to begin until every one is here."

Mr. Archibald saw that she was very much in earnest, and so he sent for the guides, and Clyde went to call Raybold.

In a few minutes Clyde returned and told Corona that her brother had said he did not care to attend services that evening.

"Where is he?" asked Miss Raybold.

"He is sitting over there looking out upon the lake," replied Clyde.

"I will be back almost immediately," said she to Mr. Archibald, "and in the mean time please let everybody assemble."

Arthur Raybold was in no mood to attend services of any sort. He had spent nearly the whole day trying to get a chance to speak to Margery, but never could he find her alone.

"If I can once put the matter plainly to her," he said to himself, "she will quickly perceive what it is that I offer her; and when she clearly sees that, I will undertake to make her accept it. She is only a woman, and can no more withstand me than a mound of sand built by a baby's hand could withstand the rolling wave."

At this moment Corona arrived and told him that she wanted him at the camp fire. He was only a man, and could no more withstand her than a mound of sand built by a baby's hand could withstand the rolling wave.

When everybody in the camp had gathered around the fire, Corona, her eye-glasses illumined by the light of her soul, gazed around the circle and began to speak.

"My dear friends," she said, "I have been thinking a great deal to-day upon a very important subject, and I have come to the conclusion that we who form this little company have before us one of the grandest opportunities ever afforded a group of human beings. We are here, apart from our ordinary circumstances and avocations, free from all the trammels and demands of society, alone with nature and ourselves. In our ordinary lives, surrounded by our ordinary circumstances, we cannot be truly ourselves; each of us is but part of a whole, and very often an entirely unharmonious part. It is very seldom that we are able to do the things we wish to do in the manner and at the times and places when it would best suit our natures. Try as we may to be true to ourselves, it is seldom possible; we are swept away in a current of conventionality. It may be one kind of conventionality for some of us and another kind for others, but we are borne on by it all the same. Sometimes a person like myself or Mr. Archibald clings to some rock or point upon the bank, and for a little while is free from the coercion of circumstances, but this cannot be for long, and we are soon swept with the rest into the ocean of conglomerate commonplace."

"That's when we die?" remarked Mrs. Perkenpine, who sat reverently listening.

"No," said the speaker, "it happens while we are alive. But now," she continued, "we have a chance, as I said before, to shake ourselves free from our enthralment. For a little while each one of us may assert his or her individuality. We are a varied and representative party; we come from different walks of life; we are men, women, and—" looking at Margery, she was about to say children, but she changed her expression to "young people." "I think you will all understand what I mean. When we are at our homes we do things because other people want us to do them, and not because we want to do them. A family sits down to a meal, and some of them like what is on the table, some do not; some of them would have preferred to eat an hour before, some of them would prefer to eat an hour later; but they all take their meals at the same time and eat the same things because it is the custom to do so.

"I mention a meal simply as an instance, but the slavery of custom extends into every branch of our lives. We get up, we go to bed, we read, we work, we play, just as other people do these things, and not as we ourselves would do them if we planned our own lives. Now we have a chance, all of us, to be ourselves! Each of us may say, 'I am myself, one!' Think of that, my friends, each one! Each of us a unit, responsible only to his or her unity, if I may so express it."

"Do you mean that I am that?" inquired Mrs. Perkenpine.

"Oh yes," replied Corona.

"Is Phil Matlack one?"

"Yes."

"All right," said the female guide; "if he is one, I don't mind."

"Now what I propose is this," said Corona: "I understand that the stay in this camp will continue for about a week longer, and I earnestly urge upon you that for this time we shall each one of us assert our individuality. Let us be what we are, show ourselves what we are, and let each other see what we are."

"It would not be safe nor pleasant to allow everybody to do that," said Mr. Archibald. He was more interested in Miss Raybold's present discourse than he had been in any other he had heard her deliver.

"Of course," said she, "it would not do to propose such a thing to the criminal classes or to people of evil inclinations, but I have carefully considered the whole subject as it relates to us, and I think we are a party singularly well calculated to become the exponent of the distinctiveness of our several existences."

"That gits me," said Matlack.

"I am afraid," said the speaker, gazing kindly at him, "that I do not always express myself plainly to the general comprehension, but what I mean is this: that during the time we stay here, let each one of us do exactly what he or she wants to do, without considering other people at all, except of course that we must not do anything which would interfere with any of the others doing what they please. For instance—and I assure you I have thought over this matter in all its details—if any of us were inclined to swear or behave disorderly, which I am sure could not be the case, he or she would not do so because he or she would feel that, being responsible to himself or herself, that responsibility would prevent him or her from doing that which would interfere with the pleasure or comfort of his or her associates."

"I think," said Mrs. Archibald, somewhat severely, "that our duty to our fellow-beings is far more important than our selfish consideration of ourselves."

"But reflect," cried Corona, "how much consideration we give to our fellow-beings, and how little to ourselves as ourselves, each one. Can we not, for the sake of knowing ourselves and honoring ourselves, give ourselves to ourselves for a little while? The rest of our lives may then be given to others and the world."

"I hardly believe," said Mr. Archibald, "that all of us clearly understand your meaning, but it seems to me that you would like each one of us to become, for a time, a hermit. I do not know of any other class of persons who so thoroughly assert their individuality."

"You are right!" exclaimed Corona. "A hermit does it. A hermit is more truly himself than any other man. He may dwell in a cave and eat water-cresses, he may live on top of a tall pillar, or he may make his habitation in a barrel! If a hermit should so choose, he might furnish a cave with Eastern rugs and bric-à-brac. If he liked that sort of thing, he would be himself. Yes, I would have all of us, in the truest sense of the word, hermits, each a hermit; but we need not dwell apart. Some of us would certainly wish to assert our individuality by not dwelling apart from others."

"We might, then," said Mr. Archibald, "become a company of associate hermits."

"Exactly," cried Corona, stretching out her hands; "that is the very word—associate hermits. My dear friends, from to-morrow morning, until we leave here, let us be associate hermits. Let us live for ourselves, be true to ourselves. After all, if we think of it seriously, ourselves are all that we have in this world. Everything else may be taken from us, but no one can take from me myself, or from any one of you yourself."

The bishop now rose. He as well as the others had listened attentively to everything that had been said; even Arthur Raybold had shown a great deal of interest in his sister's remarks.

"You mean," said the bishop, "that while we stay here each one of us shall act exactly as we think we ought to act if we were not influenced by the opinions and examples of others around us, and thus have an opportunity of finding out for ourselves, and of showing others exactly what we are."

"That is it," said Corona; "you have stated it very well."

"Well, then," said the bishop, "I move that for the time stated we individually assert our individuality."

"Second the motion," said Mr. Archibald.

"All in favor of this motion please say 'Aye,'" said Corona. "Now let everybody vote, and I hope you will all say 'Aye,' and if any one does not understand, I will be happy to explain."

"I want to know," said Phil Matlack, rising, "if one man asserts what you call his individ'ality in such a way that it runs up agin another man's, and that second man ain't inclined to stand it, if that—"

"Oh, I assure you," interrupted the bishop, "that that will be all right. I understand you perfectly, and the individualities will all run along together without interfering with each other, and if one happens to get in the way of another it will be gently moved aside."

"Gently!" said Matlack, somewhat satirically. "Well, all right, it will be moved aside. I am satisfied, if the rest are."

"Now all in favor say 'Aye,'" said Corona.

They all said "Aye," except Mrs. Perkenpine, who said "Me."

[To be continued.]

PARIS.

From a French diplomat I learn some interesting facts about the inside history of events in the Far East. According to my informant, a person of the utmost trustworthiness, the concession of the ports in China now occupied by France, Germany, and Russia was made at the end of the Chinese-Japanese war. A perfect understanding between these countries and China had existed for a long time before any one of them showed his hand. No one dared take the initiative before the eyes of the rest of Europe of occupying places in time of peace that had been given for services, more or less real, in war. The murder of the German missionaries furnished the necessary pretext to the Emperor William. France and Russia almost immediately followed in his wake.

In looking at the colonies of these countries we must remember that the states of Europe have common interests which impel them to the doctrine of colonial expansion, and at the same time interests that are common to one or two alone. A reason common to England and Germany, for instance, is their constantly increasing population, and the necessity of opening new markets for their productions, enormous in quantity, and cheap. France, on the contrary, does not suffer from over-production, and her population rests stationary. Her reason for colonizing is one common to Germany, but not to England—the ever-growing increase of dissensions at home, such as socialism, and a universal standing army. Since both nations desire peace within their own walls, they must give satisfaction to the large military party of their

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

EMMA EAMES AS ERO.

respective countries, and occupation to a multitude of idle officers by finding them an outlet for their activity abroad, while this also distracts attention from internal agitations.

The French are always at war in one place or another; after Senegal came Tonquin; after Tonquin, Madagascar. These conquests cost them enormously, and in practical benefits bring them in almost nothing. But they provide news for the papers, and a safety-valve for the army.

The German Emperor, with his wide-spreading view, has precisely the same preoccupation. The real secret of his journey to Palestine, it is said in diplomatic circles, is to secure for himself the port of Kaïfa, much superior to Beirut, and overlooking the rich country of Hauran. It is interesting to add that within a few years a colony of fifteen hundred Germans has already established itself there.

There is no doubt that, having a port in China, the Emperor William would like a station in the Philippines. Exactly how to get it, he certainly at present does not know. His thought, so far, is limited to saying, "Send war-ships to Cavité and see what happens." If Admiral Dewey by any chance failed to protect one German citizen against the insurgents, at any slight casualty, the Emperor might be able to fill his favorite rôle and step in.

In spite of the socialistic element in the new Chamber of Deputies, its formation is considered a step towards a more stable government. Nothing has been more opposed to this than the multitude of independent groups of the last Chamber, each trying by underhand manœuvres and alliances to gain the victory of a day. The overthrow of the Méline ministry was the result of a clever stroke of the radical-socialists, who contrived to add as condition to a simple ordre du jour that the cabinet should not count a majority composed partly of conservatives. M. Méline could not refuse to throw over brutally a party which, for over a year, had given him their support, and resigned with all his cabinet. This, together with the election of M. Deschanel as the new president, shows the frank division of the Chamber into two grand parties. One of these, slightly in the minority, is composed of the radicals, socialists, and collectivists; the other, of moderate republicans, united under the new title of progressists and conservators.

The greater part of these last, like young Boni de Castellane, put upon their electoral programmes the title of progressist republicans. This proves that they at last understand that the republic has come to stay, and that both royalism and imperialism have less and less chance. These rallies, as they are called, may, however, by their vote give the government some surprises later. Certain socialists also have slipped into the House under the guise of a profession of faith of moderate republicanism.

Among these is a young fellow named Zévais, who was twenty-five, the legal age for a deputy, the day of his election, a familiar figure to all Paris journalists in the editorial offices of advanced papers, and the organizer of manifestations in favor of Jaurés and Millerand, whom he openly professed his masters. Two years ago he conceived the clever idea of going to live in the peaceful department of the Isère, and getting the confidence of the brave farmers and glovers who made up the population of the country. Naturally he concealed his age and his opinions, and nothing could have been a greater surprise to his electors than to see from the Paris papers that they had sent to represent them a noisy and belligerent boy.

I doubt whether he will ever succeed in replacing his blackballed chiefs—far and away the most elegant speakers of the Chamber, as well as the most dangerous for the government. But, at all events, the sittings of the past month at the Palais Bourbon forecast a stormy and exciting season.

ALLEN SERGEANT.

MANCINELLI'S "ERO E LEANDRO."

LONDON, ever shy as to the new in any shape, whether it be music, morals, or mechanics, has consented to listen to Mancinelli's "Erò e Leandro" within a comparatively short time of its publication. Less than two years ago the work was given at the Norwich festival as a cantata, and having come triumphantly through being served up in this cold sliced style, without garnishings, is now being given in operatic form at Covent Garden.

While the legend of Hero and Leander may be sufficient as a theme, it is undoubtedly insufficient as a story; perhaps it is on this account that Arrigo Boito, to whom Mancinelli is indebted for a book which is much too dignified to be called a libretto, has added to it both characters and incidents which fill out the dramatic interest.

In his hands the story is introduced by a prologue; the story itself opens at the Temple of Venus at Sestos, where priestesses and sailors are celebrating the Aphrodisia. Ariopharnes, the high priest of the temple, enters, accompanied by Hero and by Leander, who has been declared the victor in the athletic contests. During the ceremonial attending the crowning of Leander by Hero, Ariopharnes perceives their love for each other, and while threatening her, also presses his own suit with vehemence. Hero repulses Ariopharnes with horror. Leander, returning to the temple, declares anew his love for Hero, and is overheard by Ariopharnes, who, concealing himself behind the statue of Apollo when Hero consults the oracle as to her fate, foretells her death.

In the second act, Hero, being given the choice "between the celestial Venus and the terrestrial," chooses the former as the only escape from the advances of Ariopharnes, and assumes the crown and silver veil of sacrifice before being immured in the Maiden's Tower by the Hellespont, Ariopharnes, the priestesses, and the guardians of the temple uniting in a chorus praising her choice.

The third act takes place in the Maiden's Tower, overlooking the Hellespont. Hero, awaiting Leander, signals him with the sacred torch, and watches from the tower his battle with the waves as he swims the Hellespont. A long love scene between the two is brought to an end by the bursting of a tremendous storm, of whose approach it was Hero's duty to give warning.

Her failure to do so brings Ariopharnes to the tower. To evade him, and to avert the terrible punishment which would be meted out to Hero should he be found in the tower, Leander plunges again into the now raging Hellespont, and is drowned, and the story ends with the death of Hero at the feet of Ariopharnes, her persecutor.

Such is the story. The whole unfolding of it devolves upon but three characters. The creation of the rôles devolved upon Madame Eames as Ero, upon Saléza as Leandro, and upon Plançon as Ariopharnes. But the division of responsibility is so unequal that in effect it is an opera of but one character—that of Ero—and Eames responds finely to the tremendous demands made upon her.

To be young and beautiful in person, to be graceful in pose and noble in poise, to be an aristocrat both in the interpretation of the music and of the character—all this is demanded of her who interprets Mancinelli's Ero aright; and to this is added one more demand, one to which Madame Eames alone, of the great sopranos now on the stage, is equal. The music written for Ero demands not only great declamatory force and dramatic intensity of expression, but unusual compass of voice and flexibility in execution—all constituting an almost impossible combination. But the almost impossible becomes with Eames the quite possible. In the delicious "Song of the Shell" and in the remarkable "Torch Song" the wonderful flexibility and penetrating purity of her voice are manifest, while in the two fine love duets with Leandro the intensity of her declamatory style is proved triumphantly.

L. MANCINELLI, COMPOSER OF "ERO E LEANDRO."

As Leandro Saléza, the French tenor (who soon makes his American début), has in comparison with Ero but little to do; yet that little is much if one measures it by its demands upon the voice and the dramatic resources of the interpreter of the character. Of Saléza, of his method and his lack of it, of his musical virtues and faults—and there are many of each—more anon. Suffice it to say here of his Leandro that it has a dramatic intelligence and a musical frankness that make it interesting in these days of the mechanical on the one hand and the over-subtle on the other.

In most operas there is a bore, just as there is in most society. Henry the Fowler in "Lohengrin" and Valentine in "Faust" are two of the most notable ones that come to mind at present; they are characters that are only redeemed by the great artists who have from time to time interpreted them. To this list must be added that of Ariopharnes in "Ero e Leandro," the redemption in this case being effected by Plançon, who, by-the-way, is on this occasion a Greek with a curled, square-cut Assyrian beard. It is a paradox perhaps to say that Ariopharnes would be less of a bore if one could have more of him, but it is true that a further development of the character would add much to its interest. It is an unwritten law of the stage that every principal character shall have its "chance." Ariopharnes has none, except in a short solo in the second act, "In Mezzo al Mar," in which he tells of the oracle having commanded the re-establishment of the Maiden's Tower by the Hellespont.

SALÉZA AS LEANDRO.

Ero's numbers, as might be expected, are both many and varied. The one that will be best known is the "Song of the Shell," already alluded to. One may confidently expect to see it soon added to the list of soprano "test solos," while the "Torch Song" and the two duets with Leandro will be saved by their great difficulty from commonness.

Ariopharnes's entrance is always heralded by a fine motif for trumpets, and there are two choruses, one almost immediately following the other, in the second act, that are unusual in form and quite splendid in effect. The first begins, "Beato vittima del casto vel!" (Oh, blessed victim of the holy veil!); the other is the finale, "Peana! Peana!" (We hail thee! We hail thee!).

By all odds the most delicately written of all the numbers is the Idyl for Ero and Leandro in the first act, beginning, "Ero, soave del volto celeste," and merging into the exquisite passage for Ero, with violin obbligato.

As to the general character of the music? Perhaps the critics who are adverse to Mancinelli will accuse him of affectation in his orchestration, and not without cause, especially in the first act. As to composition, he is often possessed of an evil spirit of consecutive fifths, and also pursued by the demon of the chromatic scale; the two combined or alternated give a Wagner-cum-Verdi-cum-Piccini effect. But when he has done with his experiments, then he is very successful.

Of those often inharmonious sounds which we call harmony there is enough and to spare in these degenerate days, but melody is rare, and it is in this latter direction that Mancinelli is at his best. No Mancinelli can serve two masters.

FLORENCE HAYWARD.

THE CALL.

THE clouds grew dark as the people paused,
A people of peace and toil,
And there came a cry from all the sky:
"Come, children of mart and soil,
Your mother needs you—hear her voice;
Though she has not a son to spare,
She has spoken the word that ye all have heard.
Come, answer ye everywhere!"

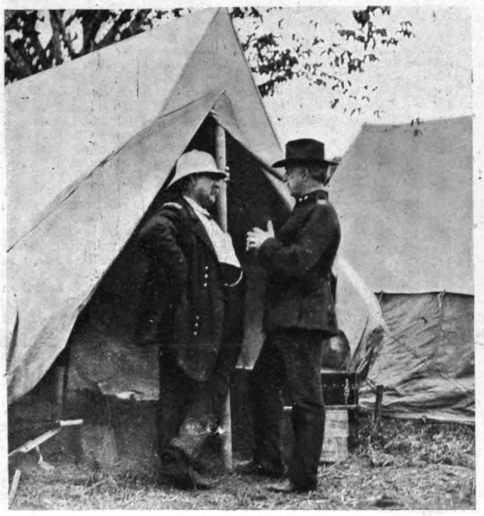
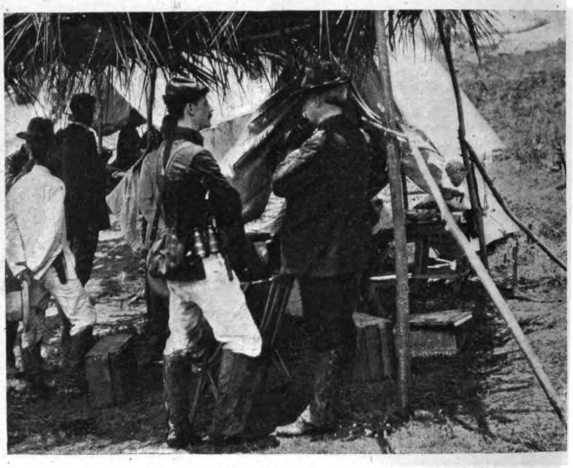
They need no urging to stir them on,
They yearn for no battle-cry,
At the word that their country calls for men
They throw down hammer and scythe and pen,
And are ready to serve and die!
From the North, from the South, from East, from West,
Hear the thrill of the rumbling drum?
Under one flag they march along,
With their voices swelling a single song,
Here they come, they come, they come!
List! the North men cheer the men from the South,
And the South returns the cheer.
There is no question of East or West,
For hearts are atune in every breast,
'Tis a nation answering here.

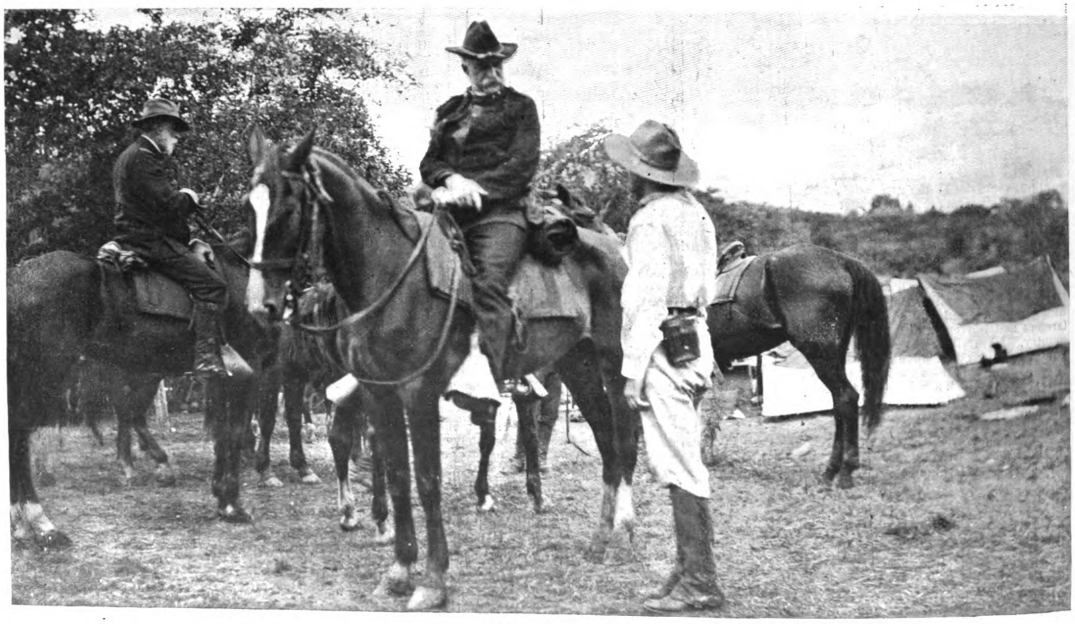


It is elbow to elbow and knee to knee,
One land for each and for all,
And the veterans' eyes see their children rise
To answer their country's call.
They have not forgotten—God grant not so!
(Ah, we know of the graves on the hill),
But these eager feet make the old hearts beat,
And the old eyes dim and fill!
The Past sweeps out and the Present comes,
A Present that all have wrought,
And the sons of these sires, at the same camp fires,
Cheer one flag where their fathers fought!
Yes, we know of the graves on the Southern hills
That are filled with the Blue and the Gray.
We know how they fought and how they died,
We honor them both there side by side,
And they're brothers again to-day,
Brothers again—thank God on high!
(Here's a hand-clasp all around).
The sons of one race now take their place
On one common and holy ground.

RICHARD BARRY.



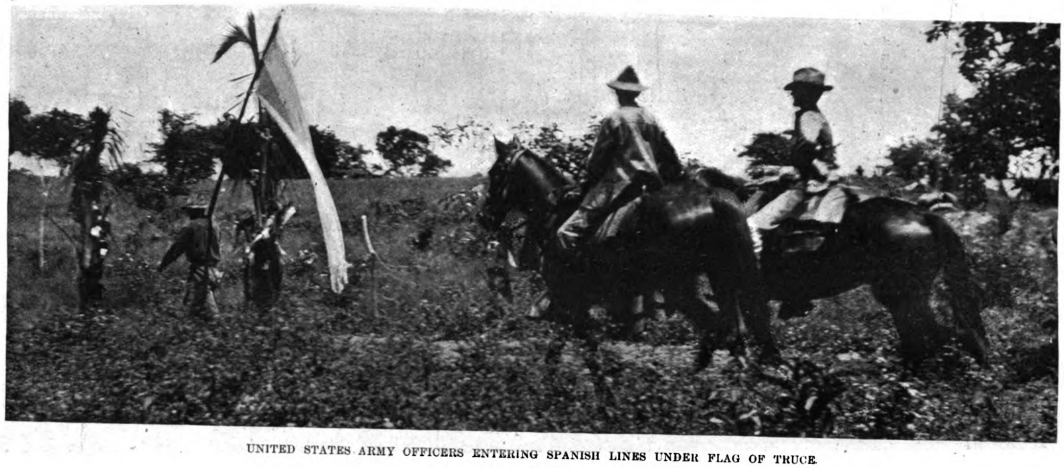
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



GENERAL MILES AND GENERAL SHAFTER HAVING A CONSULTATION.

GENERALS MILES AND SHAFTER TALKING OVER THE SURRENDER.

GENERAL MILES AND LIEUTENANT HOBSON CHATTING.



GENERAL MILES.

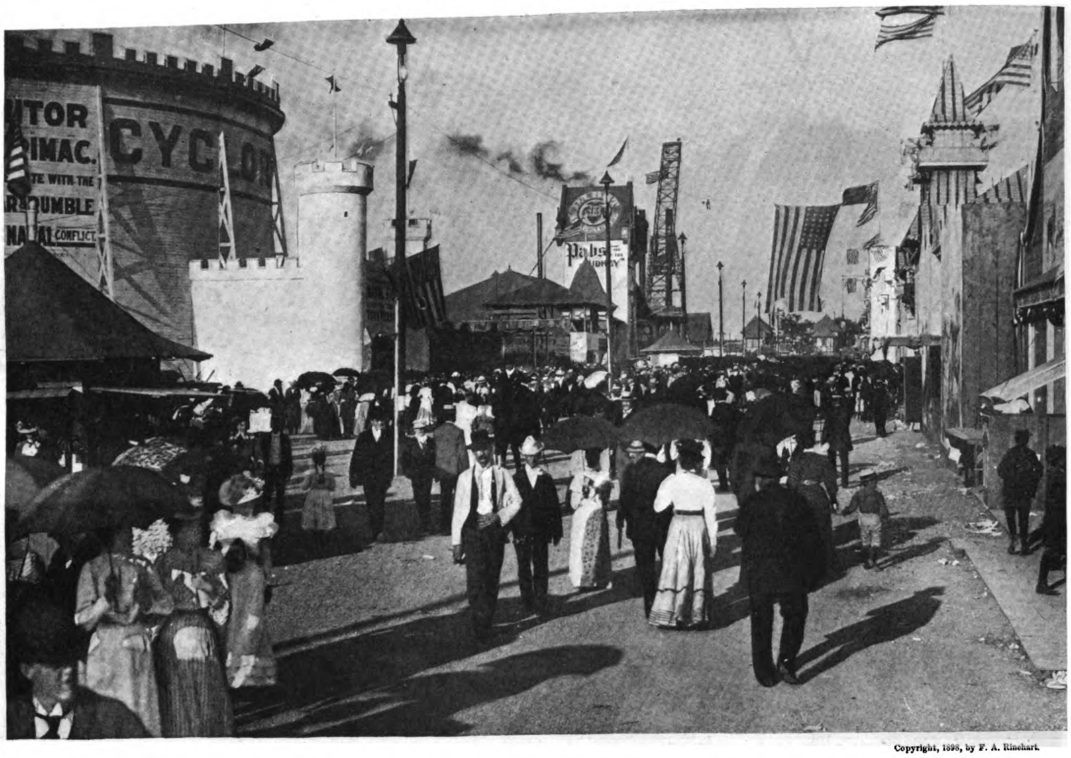
SCENES AT SANTIAGO DURING THE NEGOTIATIONS FOR SURRENDER.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JAMES BURTON, SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHER FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL SHAFTER'S ARMY.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

UNITED STATES ARMY OFFICERS ENTERING SPANISH LINES UNDER FLAG OF TRUCE.

GENERALS GARCIA AND CASTILLO VISIT GENERALS MILES, SHAFTER, AND WHEELER.



OUR TROOPS CHEERING UPON RECEIVING NEWS OF SANTIAGO'S FALL.

SCENES AT SANTIAGO DURING THE NEGOTIATIONS FOR SURRENDER.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY JAMES BURTON, SPECIAL PHOTOGRAPHER FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL SHAFTER'S ARMY.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Copyright, 1898, by F. A. Rinehart.

THE OMAHA EXPOSITION.

A LINE drawn somewhat irregularly down the map of the United States, beginning at the Canadian border, thence along the eastern sides of Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Illinois, along the southern border of Missouri, the eastern and southern sides of Texas, thence to and along the Pacific coast, and returning by the Canadian border line to the head of Lake Superior, broadly defines the territory represented in the Trans-Mississippi Exposition in the city of Omaha. Other commonwealths outside of this line have exhibits in the exposition, but it is this great Western region which particularly the fair illustrates. It may be well briefly to indicate somewhat of the enormous extent of territory represented. Inclusive of Alaska, which is logically a part of the region, and which is represented capitally in the building erected by the general government, there are in the region two million six hundred thousand square miles of territory. It comprises more than two-thirds of the whole United States—a vast and noble domain.

It is as large as France, Germany, England, Scotland, Ireland, Austria-Hungary, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Belgium, Switzerland, Greece, Sweden, Norway, the Netherlands, Denmark, Turkey in Europe, Bulgaria, Roumania, and Servia, together with Egypt and Japan, the Philippine Islands, Hawaii, and Cuba; and, in addition to all these, you must add all of New York, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Maine, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, and South Carolina. When you have set apart all these foreign countries, and to their combined area have added the areas of thirteen of the States of our own country, you have but reached the area of the region which is represented in this Western exposition. There were living in this region a half-century ago less than two million people, exclusive of Indians, three-fourths of the white inhabitants being in three States. To-day this population has been increased by over twenty millions of people.

Some of the States in the region are represented by special exhibits in the main buildings devoted to the large interests of the exposition, but quite a number of States have erected interesting buildings along a wide esplanade at the eastern portion of the exposition-grounds. The State buildings stand somewhat back from the main street, so to call it, of this portion of the grounds. They are of varying architecture, some of them of the prevailing staff of the buildings along the grand central canal, others in subdued colors, while one of them, the Minnesota State building, is in the form of a Swiss chalet, constructed wholly of logs from the timber regions of that State.

Hard by stands an attractive building, one of the few erected to represent outside commonwealths. It is by the State of New York. A charming exterior with wide colonnaded verandas invites to an interior capitally arranged for the purposes of a building of this character.

Perhaps the mighty advancement of the trans-Mississippi region is not objectively illustrated in any better way than by a comparison of the leading buildings along the esplanade with a small dark house in the rear of the Nebraska Building. It is a typical home of the early days, and even now, on the outposts of the region, no doubt you may see its counterpart in actual use. It is made wholly of sod. The walls are perhaps eighteen inches thick, and consist of layers of sod laid up in a neat manner, with deep windows and a low doorway. On the top of the house the flowers are growing, while feathery grasses on the side walls sway in the wind.

It has hardly been possible to think of Kansas in these later years without commiseration for her mortgage-burdened condition, but the emancipation from debt, which has been effected in the midst and in spite of the hard times, is celebrated at this exposition by a neat and ample building, whose interior, as well as exterior, speaks of the more solid prosperity which has found a home in this long-suffering commonwealth.

The twenty-two millions of people represented by these State buildings and the arch of States have found time to do something other than till the soil and work the mines and build the railroads. They have had enormous pioneering labors in the last half-century, and yet in this region indicated they have found time to establish two hundred and twenty institutions of higher learning; they have equipped these institutions with modern appliances, and have selected, generally with good sense and wisdom, a corps of nearly five thousand instructors and professors. According to the latest available statistics, these institutions have a scholastic population of nearly seventy thousand. In a general population of about seventy-two millions of people there are four hundred and eighty-four colleges and universities, and nearly one hundred and sixty thousand students; in the region represented by these States, comprising less than one-third of the entire population of the country, there are nearly one-half of the collegians, and two hundred and twenty out of four hundred and eighty institutions of higher learning.

It is difficult to realize how much the great material as well as intellectual progress of the nation has been dependent for its supplies upon this trans-Mississippi region; that without this vast and noble empire very largely must our national life have been circumscribed and insular. Too often also has it been forgotten that it is the Mother East that has given birth to this giant West. All too contentedly do some of Western fibre let pass from mind the fact that the intimate interrelation of the East has been of supreme aid in developing the scope and power of the newer region.

So recently, as nations mark time, a dependency of the crown of Spain, and now one of the chief glories of a nation to whom Spain must bow, this trans-Mississippi region seems right worthily entitled thus to step aside from its immense activities and to present to the nation such a proof of progress as this exposition affords. It is very much to the credit of this vast region that this fair so amply illustrates the present and so hopefully speaks of the future of this great storehouse, on which the nation may draw in splendid confidence.

A really magnificent arch, done in white, rising like some tribute to the victories of a great general, stands on a wide esplanade facing the central court of the exposition. In place of an opening for the passage of triumphal hosts a mighty sounding-board rises to the highest inner point of the arch, and under this the bands play. By night an electric arch under the façade sends its soft glow upon the performers. Orchestral and choral performances are given in an auditorium seating several thousands of people, built upon the grounds. Sensibly enough, the exposition management makes these fine concerts free to the public, and many thousands of people attend them.

The exposition has a Midway—a double-decker, so to say—running like a big L around the eastern and southern portions of the grounds. The fertile fakir is there, a bit more free and easy than he would be under Eastern restraint, a little cheaper and more commonplace mayhap, but still picturesque. The Oriental people, they with the flowing robes and inflated trousers and blasé faces and generally professional make-up, they and their camels and their donkeys, their quaint streets and their incessant chatter and their unwholesome dances and their dirty hands—the same parties that make all Midways interesting and vivid—are here in force. In fact, the exposition has deluged the public with the Oriental; for, in addition to the "Streets of All Nations," where the foreign folk dance and drive and smoke cigarettes, and swear in unknown tongues, there is the "Streets of Cairo," a rival institution of the same character. The proprietors of the two streets have been fighting in the courts for supremacy, one trying to oust the other, on the ground that the concession should have been sold to but one.

A novelty in the Midway region is the giant seesaw, which must be over a hundred feet high. It is made of steel, and its skeleton frame-work is balanced on an iron pier about fifty feet from the ground. On this pier is the working machinery of the concern. Two cages or cars, large enough to accommodate a good many people, are attached to the seesaw, one at either end of the giant arms—in you go, and up you go to a startling height.

The illumination of the grounds is admirable. I saw the city of Paris illuminated one night in honor of the return of President Faure from his successful mission to St. Petersburg, but there was nothing in the illumination of the French capital to be spoken of in the same breath with the display you may see any night on the grounds of the exposition. The Court of Honor, or whatever name you choose to give it, lies a half-mile long, a rippling-waved lagoon in its centre bearing many a picturesque gondola. The water reflects back the thousands of electric lights, which define with beautiful distinctness the great buildings that border the lagoon. In the distance, rising in noble proportions, its splendid façade picked out in soft lines of yellow light, the Government Building stands silhouetted against the dark sky. All down the court on either side, and here and there at short irregular distances from the buildings, stand graceful Grecian pillars—upon their tops no flaming torches or glowing smoking incense, but a knot of brilliant electric lights, symbolical rather of modern investigation than of ancient introspection. By day these pillars are fine and interesting, whether singly or in vistas; by night they are peculiarly attractive—a note of rich beauty in the general harmony.

From the western end of the court, looking toward the distant viaduct over one of the city streets, the view is scarcely less enchanting. The pillared corridors that connect the main buildings and afford such capital relief from rain or snow have their share of illumination. They join beyond the buildings in a graceful semicircle, or, as it is otherwise called, a hemicycle stairway, rising easily from the lagoon. Above this is a domed projection, under which the speakers stand on special occasions requiring oratorical display; and still above this two lofty minarets, each one bearing a graceful figure standing with sickle in hand, typical of the harvest. The effect of the illumination, looking either way from east to west or midway in the great canal, is very beautiful. Should you call it magnificent—indeed, superb—you would not misapply the words.

Perhaps the building which attracts the lion's share of

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google attention on the grounds is the one devoted to the government exhibit. The military display, quite naturally these days, draws many eyes. Elaborate reproductions of the uniforms of the various military epochs in our history are shown at one end of the great interior of the building, while in the opposite wing models of many of the battleships of all classes are eagerly eyed by the thousands who visit the building. In deep black one beautiful ship is encased, the base of its case a catafalque. It is a ship very dear, sadly, tragically dear, to America. Above its shapely form the government has printed, in clear types,

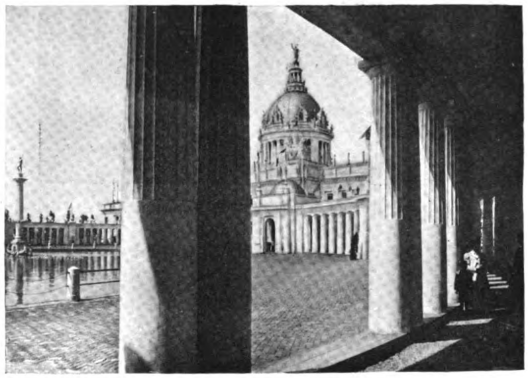
"REMEMBER THE MAINE."

Perhaps nothing in the immense building attracts the attention that does this beautiful model of the noble craft.

It would seem that all former expositions have been outdone in the matter of agricultural display. A large beautiful building near to the Government Building is devoted wholly to agriculture, illustrating in very many ways the progress as well as the present importance of this department of our national life. Very ingenious, and in a certain restricted sense very artistic, are the decorations of this building. There seems to be hardly anything susceptible of decorative treatment that cannot be reproduced by the materials which nature provides in field and meadow and farm. Illustrations of scenes of pioneer life—very attractive at a distance as pictures—prove on inspection to be wholly of corn or wheat or grasses, no color of any character save that which nature paints in the green spring or the ruddy summer or the rich brown autumn.

In front of one exhibit, that of the State of Kansas, a wicked little black mortar has for its ammunition a pile of glass cannon balls filled with corn, wheat, and rye, and on them kind Kansans have placed the words, "For Cuba."

In the region which this building illustrates is already raised more than one-half of the nation's supply of wheat, nearly two-thirds of its corn, and an enormous amount of the lesser grains and vegetables, while its live-stock interests are of vast value and extent. In the season of 1897 the region which is represented in the exhibits of this building produced, in round numbers, three hundred millions of dollars in value per year. The extent to which these figures may be drawn out passes from the realm of estimation into pure conjecture, now that the mines of Alaska, a part of the region in reality, are pouring forth their riches.



In the mining exhibit of Utah we read, on a high placard at one end of the booth, "Utah has produced in thirty years gold, silver, lead, and copper to the value of $199,000,000." Some exuberant Mormon has put in big letters at one end of the long exhibit, "Utah, the Jasper-walled Treasure House of the Gods."

Near at hand is the exhibit of Colorado, showing in various way the riches of her mines, while adjoining is a mimic gold-mine in full blast—a capital representation of the workings of the mine. Statistics will be furnished you at the Colorado booth showing that last year the State mined over nineteen million five hundred thousand dollars' worth of gold, nearly thirteen millions of silver, almost a million of copper, and two and three-quarter millions of lead, while since records have been available, less than fifty years, she has put forth one hundred and seventy-five millions in gold, and considerably over three hundred millions in silver.

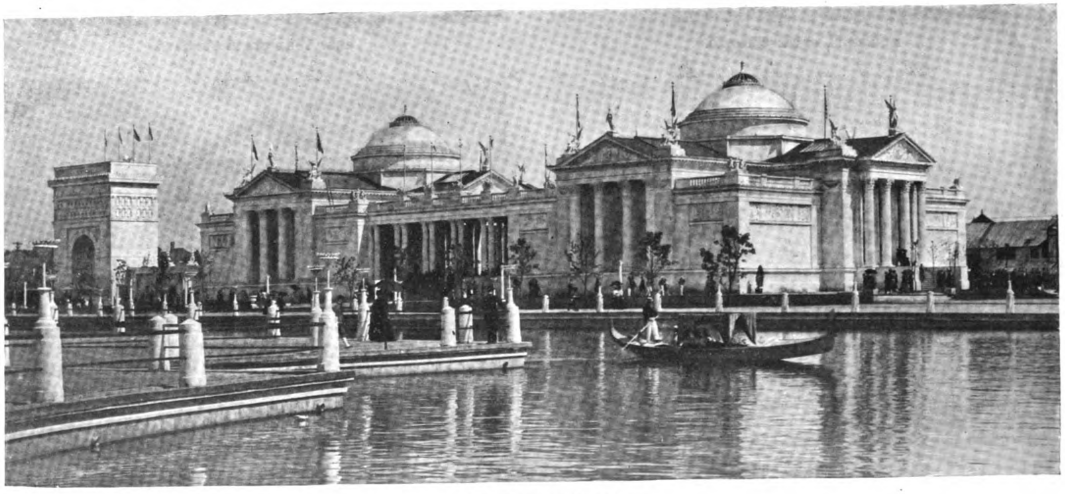
BRIDGES, AND THE ARCH OF STATES.
Copyright, 1898, by F. A. Rinehart.

And so you may pass on from booth to booth, reading figures as to the vast mineral resources of these States—Montana, New Mexico, Minnesota, now having the greatest iron-fields in the world; Wyoming, Utah, California, Kansas—yes, even Kansas, for she has much lead to mine; South Dakota and Nevada. Ample space was provided in the building for the exhibits from the various mining States, and the arrangement is very interesting and the exhibits very easy to study. Some of the States have handsomely enclosed their exhibits with huge pillars, illustrative of some feature of their mineral wealth. Not only minerals of the precious class, but many varieties of building-stone and huge specimens of coal from the newer Western fields are shown. In the centre of the main aisle of the building is a pyramid of solid silver weighing three thousand four hundred and eighty-eight pounds, one day's product of one of the smelters of Omaha.

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT BUILDING.
Copyright, 1898, by F. A. Rinehart.

One of the most beautiful buildings of the exposition is that devoted to the fine arts. The love of the Western people for that which is noble in art is attested in a very fine and beautiful way by this exposition. The great buildings of the grounds, their architectural adornment, the surpassingly beautiful illuminations of the grand central court at night—these speak eloquently of the appreciation of art in its broader scope. In the Fine Arts Building this is illustrated in a more definite way. The eight or nine hundred works shown might not be considered a very striking exhibit in some older city where art has thriven long, but in this frontier city, so to term it, the gathering of such a collection in such a noble building is something of more than ordinary significance. The catalogue shows a good many works by men of prominence—Corot, Puvis de Chavannes, Troyon, Diaz, Claude Monet, De Neuville, Constant, Delacroix, Dupré, Mosler, Kenyon Cox, Elihu Vedder, Edwin Lord Weeks, Carl Guthers, among them. Leading illustrators are represented through magazine collections—Remington, Zogbaum, Sonntag, Thulstrup, Chapman, Gaul, Wiles, Hopkinson Smith, Loeb, Castaign, Pennell, Pyle, Church, Frost, Smedley, Low, and others.

Perhaps one of the most interesting surprises which come to an Eastern man visiting this exposition is the fact, which somebody calls to his attention in the vast building devoted to the manufacturing interests, that one of the States in this new region, Illinois, until but recently, as time is counted in a large way, the habitat of the Indian, produced in value, according to the late census, more manufactured products, including receipts from custom-work and repairing, than any other State in the Union save New York. There is in this, as well as in the manifold exhibits of this building, a suggestion as to the possibilities of this trans-Mississippi region quite in a different line from any which in general it has been believed possible here to pursue. A pyramid of flour in an exhibit from the State of Minnesota also calls to mind the fact that away in the interior of this region, far from the fringe of the agricultural territory, more flour is manufactured in one Western city, Minneapolis, than in any other city in the world. And it is of interest to note, too, though not specifically manufacturing, that the city of Omaha, in which this exposition is held, has the largest smelting-works in the world, turning out annually over twelve million dollars in gold and silver. In the Manufactures Building, seemingly incongruous, though probably the most appropriate place on the grounds, are shown the products of the three great packing cities of the world—Chicago, Kansas City, and South Omaha; and really the booths which present these products of the shambles are among the most artistic and interesting in the building.



The extent to which manufacturing is being entered into in the West is a revelation to one who has not before given the matter consideration. I saw one immense exhibit, illustrating the variety of goods manufactured, given up to a display of all manner of matting for floors made from prairie-grass of tough fibre—on the face of it a very sensible and to be profitable field for manufacturing.

Take them as a whole, the buildings on the grounds of this exposition, which illustrate the progress of the trans-Mississippi region in so superb a manner, are more important, from the stand-point of the man of practical affairs, than any other feature of the many-sided fair. They are not only narrative, they are prophetic. They tell not only of the power of the West, but of its possibilities.

Omaha, Nebraska, 1898. W. S. Harwood.

ion bushels of wheat and considerably over one billion bushels of corn, while the total value of its agricultural output was somewhat in excess of one billion of dollars.

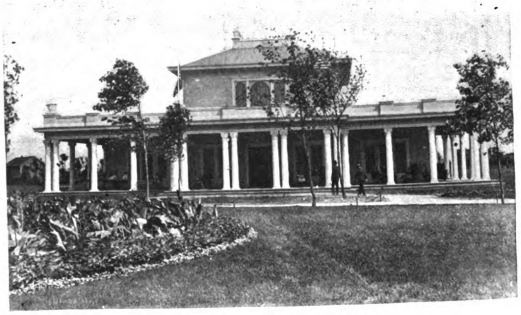
Certainly none of the great buildings of the fair possesses a larger field in which to study the many-sided West than the one devoted to an illustration of the mines of the region. The output of the mines of the trans-Mississippi region is now upwards of three hundred mill-

THE FINE ARTS BUILDING.
Copyright, 1898, by F. A. Rinehart.

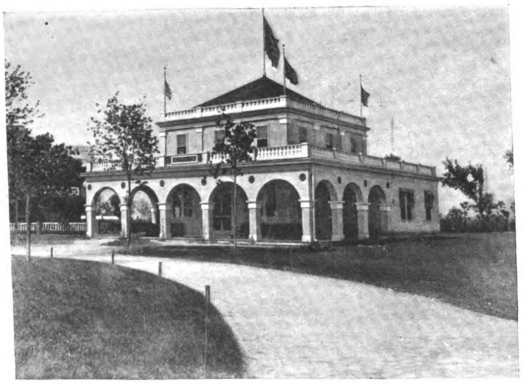
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

GEORGIA STATE BUILDING.

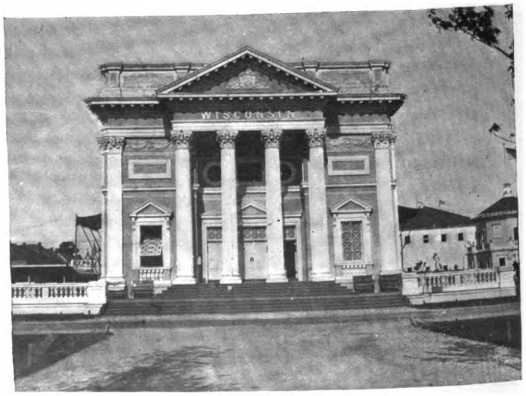
IOWA STATE BUILDING.



NEBRASKA STATE BUILDING.



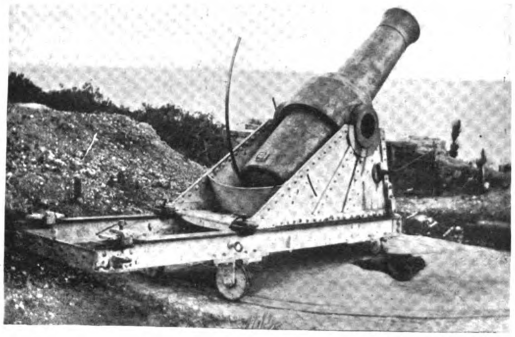
NEBRASKA SOD HOUSE (ON EXPOSITION-GROUNDS).



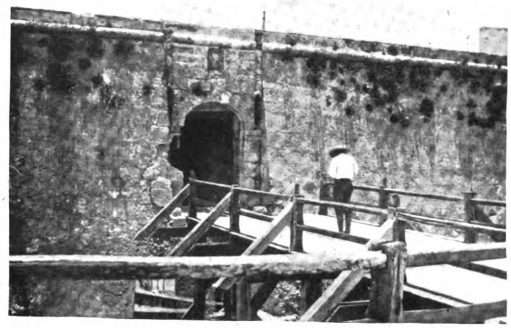
MINNESOTA STATE BUILDING.

NEW YORK STATE BUILDING.

KANSAS STATE BUILDING.



WISCONSIN STATE BUILDING.

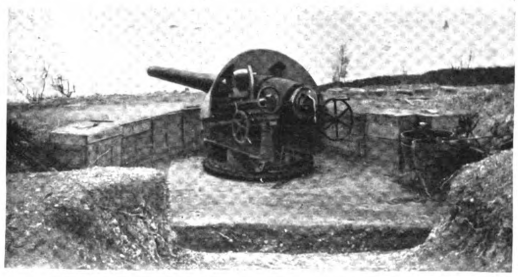


THE TRANS-MISSISSIPPI EXPOSITION AT OMAHA, NEBRASKA.

From Photographs, Copyright, 1898, by F. A. Rinehart.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ZOCAPA BATTERY—MORTAR.



MORRO CASTLE—ENTRANCE.

ZOCAPA BATTERY—MORTARS.

ON TOP OF MORRO CASTLE.

ZOCAPA BATTERY—16-CENTIMETRE MODERN RIFLE.

EASTERN BATTERY—GENERAL VIEW.

ZOCAPA BATTERY—BREASTWORKS.

EASTERN BATTERY—DEMOLISHED EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY GUN.

DEFENCES OF SANTIAGO.

PHOTOGRAPHS BY HAROLD MARTIN, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LIFE AND LETTERS

OUR SPANISH PRISONERS AT PORTSMOUTH.

Two or three weeks ago our cruisers, the St. Louis and the Harvard, arrived at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, with sixteen or seventeen hundred Spanish prisoners from Santiago de Cuba. They were partly soldiers of the land forces picked up by our troops in the fights before the city, but by far the greater part were sailors and marines from Cervera's ill-fated fleet. I have not much stomach for any war, and little or none at all for a war which began for humanity, and then, by the ruling of an inscrutable Providence, or perhaps an ironical destiny, became a war for territory, or at least for coaling-stations. But the poetry of the fact I have stated made a very potent appeal to me on my literary side, and I did not hold out against it longer than to let the St. Louis get away with Cervera to Annapolis, when only her less dignified captives remained with those of the Harvard to feed either the vainglory or the pensive curiosity of the spectator. Then I went over from our summer colony to Kittery Point, and got a boat, and sailed out to have a look at these subordinate enemies in the first hours of their imprisonment.

I.

It was an afternoon of the brilliancy known only to an afternoon of the American summer, and the water of the swift Piscataqua glittered in the sun with a really incomparable brilliancy. But nothing could light up the great monster of a ship, painted the dismal lead-color which our White Squadrons put on with the outbreak of the war, and she lay sullen in the stream with a look of ponderous repose, to which the activities of the coaling-barges at her side, and of the sailors washing her decks, seemed quite unrelated. A long gun forward and a long gun aft threatened the fleet of launches, tugs, dories, and cat-boats which fluttered about her, but the Harvard looked tired and bored, and seemed as if asleep. She had in fact finished her mission. The captives whom death had released had been carried out and sunk in the sea; those who survived to a further imprisonment had all been taken to the pretty island a mile further up in the river, where the tide rushes back and forth through the Narrows like a torrent. Its defiant rapidity has won it there the graphic name of Pull-and-be-Damned; and we could only hope to reach the island by a series of skilful tacks, which should humor both the wind and the tide, both dead against us. Our boatman, one of those shore New-Englanders who are born with a knowledge of sailing, was easily master of the art of this, but it took time, and gave me more than the leisure I wanted for trying to see the shore with the strange eyes of the captives who had just looked upon it. It was beautiful, I had to own, even in my quality of exile and prisoner. The meadows and the orchards came down to the water, or where the wandering line of the land was broken and lifted in black fronts of rock, they crept to the edge of the cliff and peered over it. A summer hotel stretched its verandas along a lovely level; everywhere in clovery hollows and on breezy knolls were gray old farm-houses, and summer cottages—like weather-beaten birds' nests, and like freshly painted marten-boxes; but all of a cold New England neatness which made me homesick for my malodorous Spanish fishing-village, shambling down in stony lanes to the warm tides of my native seas. Here, every place looked as if it had been newly scrubbed with soap and water, and rubbed down with a course towel, and was of an antipathetic alertness. The sweet, keen breeze made me shiver, and the northern sky, from which my blinding southern sun was blazing, was as hard as sapphire.

I tried to bewilder myself in the ignorance of a Catalonian or Asturian fisherman, and to wonder with his darkened mind why it should all or any of it have been, and why I should have escaped from the iron hell in which I had fought no quarrel of my own to fall into the hands of strangers, and to be haled overseas to these alien shores for a captivity of unknown term. But I need not have been at so much pains; the intelligence (I do not wish to boast) of an American author would have sufficed; for if there is anything more grotesque than another in war it is its monstrous inconsequence. If we had a grief with the Spanish government, and if it was so mortal we must do murder for it, we might have sent a joint committee of the House and Senate, and with the improved means of assassination which modern science has put at our command, killed off the Spanish cabinet, and even the Queen-Mother and the little King. This would have been consequent, logical, and in a sort reasonable; but to butcher and capture a lot of wretched Spanish peasants and fishermen, hapless conscripts to whom personally and nationally we were as so many men in the moon, was that melancholy and humiliating necessity of war which makes it homicide in which there is not even the saving grace of hate, or the excuse of hot blood.

I was able to console myself perhaps a little better for the captivity of the Spaniards than if I had really been one of them, as we drew nearer and nearer their prison isle, and it opened its knotty points and little ravines, overrun with sweet-fern, blueberry-bushes, bay, and low blackberry-vines, and rigidly traversed with a high stockade of yellow pine boards. Six or eight long low wooden barracks stretched side by side across the general slope, with the captive officers' quarters sheathed in weather-proof black paper, at one end of them. About their doors swarmed the common prisoners, spilling out over the steps and on the grass, where some of them lounged smoking. One operatic figure in a long blanket stalked athwart an open space; but there was such poverty of drama in the spectacle at the distance we were keeping that we were glad of so much as a shirt-sleeved contractor driving out of the stockade in his buggy. On the heights overlooking the enclosure Gatling guns were posted at three or four points, and every thirty or forty feet sentries met and parted, so indifferent to us, apparently, that we wondered if we might get nearer. We ventured, but at a certain moment a sentry called to us, "Fifty yards off, please!" Our young skipper answered, "All right," and as the sentry had a gun on his shoulder which we had every reason to believe was loaded, it was easily our pleasure to retreat to the specified limit. In fact, we came away altogether, after that, so little promise was there of our being able to satisfy our curiosity farther. We came away carefully nursing such impression as we had got of a spectacle whose historical quality we did our poor best to feel. It related us, after considerable solicitation, to the wars against the Moors, against the Mexicans and Peruvians, against the Dutch; to the Italian campaigns of the Gran Capitan, to the Siege of Florence, to the Sack of Rome, to the wars of the Spanish Succession, and I do not know what others. I do not deny that there was a certain æsthetic joy in having the Spanish prisoners there for this effect; we came away duly grateful for what we had seen of them; and we had long duly resigned ourselves to seeing no more, when word was sent to us that our young skipper had got a permit to visit the island, and wished us to go with him.

II.

It was just such another afternoon when we went again, the other day; but this time we took the joyous trolley-car, and bounded and pirouetted along as far as the Navy Yard of Kittery, and there we dismounted and walked among the vast, ghostly ship-sheds, so long empty of ships. The grass grows in the Kittery Navy Yard, where it is popularly believed that influences which we call corruption in the Spanish government and pull in our own, have prevented any ship-building for many years; but it is all the pleasanter for the grass, and those pale, silent sheds are far more impressive in their silence than they would have been if resonant with saw and hammer. At several points, an unarmed marine left his leisure somewhere, and lunged across our path with a mute appeal for our permit; but we were nowhere delayed till we came to the office where it had to be countersigned, and after that we had presently crossed a bridge, by shady, rustic ways, and were on the prison island. Here, if possible, the sense of something pastoral deepened; a man driving a file of cows passed before us under kindly trees, and the bell which the foremost of these milky motherly wore about her silken throat sent forth its clear, tender note as if from the depth of some grassy bosk, and instantly witched me away to the woods-pastures which my boyhood knew in southern Ohio. Even when we got to what seemed fortifications they turned out to be the walls of an old reservoir, and bore on their gate a paternal warning that children unaccompanied by adults, were not allowed within.

We mounted some stone steps over this portal, and were met by a young marine, who left his Gatling gun for a moment to ask for our permit, and then went back satisfied. But here we found ourselves in the presence of a sentry with a rifle on his shoulder, who was rather more exacting. Still, he only wished to be convinced, and when he had pointed out the headquarters where we were next to go, he let us over his beat. At the headquarters there was another sentry, equally serious, but equally civil, and with the intervention of an orderly our leader saw the officer of the day. He came out of the quarters looking rather blank, for he had learnt that his pass admitted our party to the lines, but not to the stockade, which we might approach, at a certain point of vantage and look over into, but not penetrate. We resigned ourselves, as we must, and made what we could of the nearest prison barrack, whose door overflowed and whose windows swarmed with swarthy captives. Here they were, at such close quarters that their black, eager eyes easily pierced the pockets full of cigarettes which we had brought for them. They looked mostly very young, and there was one smiling rogue at the first window who was obviously prepared to catch anything thrown to him. He caught, in fact, the first box of cigarettes shied over the stockade; the next box flew open, and spilled its precious contents outside the dead-line under the window, where I hope some compassionate guard gathered them up and gave them to the captives.

Our fellows looked capable of any kindness to their wards short of letting them go. They were a most friendly company, with an effect of picnicking there among the sweet-fern and blueberries, where they had pitched their wooden tents with as little disturbance to the shrubbery as possible. They were very polite to us, and when, after that misadventure with the cigarettes (I had put our young leader up to throwing the box, merely supplying the corpus delicti myself), I wandered vaguely toward a Gatling gun planted on an earthen platform where the laurel and the dog-roses had been cut away for it, the man in charge explained with a smile of apology that I must not pass a certain path I had already crossed.

One always accepts the apologies of a man with a Gatling gun to back them, and I retreated. That seemed the end; and we were going crestfallenly away when the officer of the day came out and allowed us to make his acquaintance. He permitted us, with laughing reluctance, to learn that he had been in the fight at Santiago, and had come with the prisoners, and he was most obligingly sorry that our permit did not let us into the stockade. I said I had some cigarettes for the prisoners, and I supposed I might send them in, but he said he could not allow this, for they had money to buy tobacco; and he answered another of our party, who had not a soul above buttons, and who asked if she could get one from the Spaniards, that so far from promoting her wish, he would have been obliged to take away any buttons she might have got from them

"The fact is," he explained, "you've come to the wrong end for transactions in buttons and tobacco."

But perhaps innocence so great as ours had wrought upon him. When we said we were going, and thanked him for his unavailing good-will, he looked at his watch and said they were just going to feed the prisoners; and after some parley he suddenly called out, "Music of the guard!" Instead of a regimental band, which I had supposed summoned, a single corporal ran out the barracks, touching his cap.

"Take this party round to the gate," the officer said, and he promised us that he would see us there, and hoped we would not mind a rough walk. We could have answered that to see his prisoners fed we would wade through fathoms of red-tape; but in fact we were arrested at the last point by nothing worse than the barbed wire which fortified the outer gate. Here two marines were willing to tell us how well the prisoners lived, while we stared into the stockade through an inner gate of plank which was run back for us. They said the Spaniards had a breakfast of coffee, and hash, or stew, and potatoes, and a dinner of soup and roast; and now at five o'clock they were to have bread and coffee, which indeed we saw the white-capped, white-jacketed cooks bringing out in huge tin wash-boilers. Our marines were of opinion, and no doubt rightly, that these poor Spaniards had never known in their lives before what it was to have full stomachs. But the marines said they never acknowledged it, and the one who had a German accent intimated that gratitude was not a virtue of any Roman (I suppose he meant Latin) people. But I do not know that if I were a prisoner, for no fault of my own, I should be very explicitly thankful for being unusually well fed. I thought (or I think now) that a fig or a bunch of grapes would have been more acceptable to me under my own vine and fig-tree than the stew and roast of captors who were indeed showing themselves less my enemies than my own government, but were still not quite my hosts.

III.

How is it the great pieces of good luck fall to us? The clock strikes twelve as it strikes two, and with no more premonition. As we stood there expecting nothing better of it than three at the most, it suddenly struck twelve. Our officer appeared at the inner gate and bade our marines slide away the gate of barbed wire, and let us into the enclosure, where he welcomed us to seats on the grass against the stockade, with many polite regrets that the tough little knots of earth beside it were not chairs.

The prisoners were already filing out of their quarters, at a rapid trot towards the benches where those great wash-boilers of coffee were set. Each man had a soup-plate and bowl of enamelled tin, and each in his turn received quarter of a loaf of fresh bread and a big ladleful of steaming coffee, which he made off with to his place at one of the long tables under a shed at the side of the stockade. One young fellow tried to get a place not his own in the shade, and our officer when he came back explained that he was a guerrillero, and rather unruly. We heard that eight of the prisoners were in irons, by sentence of their own officers, for misconduct, but all save this guerrillero here were docile and obedient enough, and seemed only too glad to get peaceably at their bread and coffee.

First among them came the men of the Cristóbal Colon, and these were the best-looking of all the captives. From their pretty fair average the others varied to worse and worse, till a very scrub lot, said to be ex-convicts, brought up the rear. They were nearly all little fellows, and very dark, though here and there a six-footer towered up, or a blond showed among them. They were joking and laughing together, harmlessly enough, but I must own that they looked a crew of rather sorry jail-birds; though whether any run of humanity clad in the misfits of our navy, blue and white, and other chance garments, with close-shaven heads, and sometimes bare feet, would have looked much less like jail-birds I am not sure. Still, they were not prepossessing, and though some of them were pathetically young, they had none of the charm of boyhood. No doubt they did not do themselves justice, and to be herded there like cattle did not improve their chances of making a favorable impression on the observer. They were kindly used by our officer and his subordinates, who mixed among them, and straightened out the confusion they got into at times, and perhaps sometimes wilfully. Their guards employed a few handy words of Spanish with them; where these did not avail, they took them by the arm and directed them; but I did not hear a harsh tone, and I saw no violence, or even so much indignity offered them as the ordinary cable-car passenger is subjected to in Broadway. At a certain bugle-call they dispersed, when they had finished their bread and coffee, and scattered about over the grass, or returned to their barracks. We were told that these children of the sun dreaded its heat, and kept out of it whenever they could, even in its decline; but they seemed not so much to withdraw and hide themselves from that, as to vanish into the history of "old, unhappy, far-off" times, where prisoners of war properly belong. I roused myself with a start as if I had lost them in the past.

Our officer came toward us and said gayly, "Well, you have seen the animals fed," and let us take our grateful leave. I think we were rather a loss, in our going, to the marines, who seemed glad of a chance to talk. I am sure we were a loss to the man on guard at the inner gate, who walked his beat with reluctance when it took him from us, and eagerly when it brought him back. Then he delayed for a rapid and comprehensive exchange of opinions and ideas, successfully blending military subordination with American equality in his manner.

The whole thing was very American in the perfect decorum and the utter absence of ceremony. Those good fellows were in the clothes they wore through the fights at Santiago, and they could not have put on much splendor if they had wished, but apparently they did not wish. They were simple, straightforward and adequate. There was some dry joking about the superiority of the prisoners' rations and lodgings, and our officer ironically professed his intention of messing with the Spanish officers. But there was no grudge, and not a shadow of ill will, or of that stupid and atrocious hate toward the public enemy which abominable newspapers and politicians have tried to breed in the popular mind. There was nothing manifest but a sort of cheerful purpose to live up to that military ideal of duty which is so much nobler than the civil ideal of self-interest. Perhaps duty will yet become the civil ideal, when the peoples shall have learned to live for the common good, and are united for the operation of the industries as they now are for the hostilities.

IV.

Shall I say that a sense of something domestic, something homelike, imparted itself from what I had seen? Or was this more properly an effect from our visit, on the way back, to the hospital, where a hundred and fifty of the prisoners lay sick of wounds and fevers? I cannot say that a humaner spirit prevailed here than in the camp; it was only a more positive humanity which was at work. Most of the sufferers were stretched on the clean cots of two long, airy wooden sheds, which received them,

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

four days after the orders for their reception had come, with every equipment for their comfort. At five o'clock when we passed down the aisles between their beds many of them had a gay, nonchalant effect of having toothpicks or cigarettes in their mouths; but it was really the thermometers with which the nurses were taking their temperature. It suggested a possibility to me, however, and I asked if they were allowed to smoke, and being answered that they did smoke, anyway, whenever they could, I got rid at last of those boxes of cigarettes which had been burning, as it were, all afternoon in my pockets. I gave them to such as I was told were the most deserving among the sick captives, but Heaven knows I would as willingly have given them to the least. They took my largesse gravely, as became Spaniards; one said, smiling sadly, "Muchas gracias," but the others merely smiled sadly; and I looked in vain for the response which would have twinkled up in the faces of even moribund Italians at our looks of pity. Italians would have met our sympathy half-way; but these poor fellows were of another tradition, and in fact not all the Latin peoples are the same, though we sometimes conveniently group them together for our detestation. Perhaps there are even personal distinctions among their several nationalities, and there are some Spaniards who are as true and kind as some Americans. When we remember Cortez, let us not forget Las Casas.

They lay in their beds there, these little Spanish men, whose dark faces their sickness could not blanch to more than a sickly sallow, and as they turned their dull black eyes upon us, I must own that I could not "support the government" so fiercely as I might have done elsewhere. But the truth is, I was demoralized by the looks of these poor little men, who, in spite of their character of public enemies, did look so much like somebody's brothers, and even children. I may have been infected by the air of compassion, of scientific compassion, which prevailed in the place. There it was as wholly business to be kind and to cure as in another branch of the service it was business to be cruel and to kill. How droll these things are! The surgeons had their favorites among the patients, to all of whom they were equally devoted; inarticulate friendships had sprung up between them and certain of their hapless foes, whom they spoke of as "a sort of pets." One of these was very useful in making the mutinous take their medicine; another was liked apparently because he was so likable. At a certain cot the chief surgeon stopped and said, "We did not expect this boy to live through the night." He took the boy's wrist between his thumb and finger, and asked tenderly as he leaned over him, "Poco mejor?" The boy could not speak to say that he was a little better; he tried to smile.—Such things do move the witness; nor does the sight of a man whose bandaged cheek has been half chopped away by a machete tend to restore one's composure.

IV.

Since I began to write, the tidings of peace have come, and these captives will presently be sent back to their homes, such of them as do not go to their long homes. Spain has accepted such terms as we would give; she would have accepted them if they had been worse; and we may well leave those who made the war to be proud of its results. I content myself with being proud of those who fought it, for I have seen a little with my own eyes how much better the victors could be than any victory.

W. D. Howells.

THE PUERTO RICO EXPEDITION.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

On Board the U. S. S. "St. Louis," within sight of Puerto Rico, July 31, 1898.

It is one thing to go to war against Spain in Cuba, and another thing to go to war against Spain in Puerto Rico. Before we left the United States, General Miles had cabled that the climate and scenery were delightful in Puerto Rico. The men on the troop-ships for Puerto Rico have a different demeanor from those who sailed for Santiago from Tampa. There is not that appearance of dejection, that unconscious show of dread, that feeling that perhaps hundreds or thousands may never come back, that uncertainty whether bullets or yellow fever will be the more deadly.

The preparations for leaving for Puerto Rico were much the same as those for leaving for Cuba. This expedition started from Hampton Roads. The dark hulls of the transports stood out high above the water, the smoke poured out of the stacks of the ships, men toiled and tugged in stowing away supplies, the troops clambered aboard and growled and swore when they found that betweendecks and further below the ships were like raging furnaces. At last all was ready to start, but we did not go. It was Tuesday afternoon; we got away on Thursday. Cause for the delay? Ask Washington. Find out who is the evil genius who sometimes changes orders half a dozen times in a day and makes officers bite their lips, rather than say things contrary to military discipline, and the troops not hesitate to make remarks that would look well in print, and a mysterious puzzle will have been solved.

In England, where they have had experience in loading transports, it may be an easy thing to get one started for a campaign in a tropical country. It has not been easy in this country. One would think off-hand that the first thing would be to get your steamer and supplies at the dock, and the next would be to load ship expeditiously, just as they do in a day or two at a New York pier, and after that all that was necessary would be to march your soldiers on board, ring the signal to the engine-rooms, and off you go. You have supplies, soldiers, horses, ships' crew, on board, and there you are, watching the bow of the vessel cutting the water and leaving a wake behind, linking thoughts of home, as the tossing wake seems to stretch back to land and take hold of it, to soldier lads who have a tinge of homesickness and who are too proud even to look it.

Loading a United States transport is not so easy. Only soldiers or sailors on board? Why, here on the St. Louis the human freight includes post-office officials, official photographers, undertakers, planters, relatives or friends of dead or wounded heroes on a mission to bring back certain of the dead or wounded to their native land; scientific men, experts in Spanish law, artists, correspondents, and civilian friends of those high in authority on a semi-military mission, and who want to see what war is like; and then the freight. The Massachusetts and Roumanian of our expedition were to carry 1500 horses for the cavalry. They were made ready for this work in New York. When they reached Hampton Roads it was found that there was room for only about 900 horses. It was found that by packing the horses closely, as cattle are packed on freight-cars, all of them could be taken. Partitions came down, new ones were put in, and then the horses were put on board, to remain in a temperature of 120 degrees for a long sea-voyage, and with scarcely room to remove those that died on the way. It may have been cruel, but it was war, or one way of going to war on transports.

The rank and file were packed as closely as the horses. Their hammocks were new and comfortable. But how much room did they have in which to swing? Just eighteen inches. In the drill regulations of the army the width of a man is estimated at twenty-two inches. It is not pleasant to have four inches of your twenty-two cut off when you are trying to sleep in terrific heat, and the ship is rolling in the bargain. The troops on the Roumanian and the City of Washington were simply packed on board, and they suffered some. They didn't complain. Why should they? Weren't they going to war, or something resembling it—and why should

(Continued on page 828.)

Advice to Mothers.—Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

BEST BECAUSE NATURAL.

The market is flooded with so-called baby foods. Experience demonstrates that scientifically prepared cow's milk is the best when the natural supply fails. Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is the best infant food.—[Adv.]

Ladies are greatly benefited by Dr. Siegert's Angostura Bitters, the South American Tonic. —[Adv.]

"Many men of many minds," many bitters of many kinds. One right kind: Abbott's, the Original Angostura. —[Adv.]

Use Brown's Camphorated Saponaceous Dentifrice for the Teeth. 25 cents a jar.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HUNTER BALTIMORE RYE

10 YEARS OLD.

WARRANTED A

PURE, TONICAL STIMULANT.

Recommended by Physicians and known as the

CHOICEST WHISKEY

Sold at all First-class Cafes and by Jobbers.

WM. LANAHAN & SON, Baltimore, Md.

Williams' Shaving Soaps were adopted as the "Standard for quality" by the U. S. Naval Department nearly fifty years ago. They are used exclusively at Annapolis, and on all U. S. Naval Vessels, at West Point and the principal Army Posts. Their rich, creamy lather has made Williams' Shaving Soaps Standard of the World.

Williams' Shaving Soaps are sold everywhere, but sent by mail if your dealer does not supply you.

Williams' Shaving Stick, 25 cents. Luxury Shaving Tablet, 25 cents.
Genuine Yankee Shaving Soap, 10 cents. Swiss Violet Shaving Cream, 50 cents.
Williams' Shaving Soap (Barbers'), 6 round cakes, 1 lb., 40 cts. Exquisite also for toilet.
Williams' Glycerated Tar Soap, 15 cents.

THE J. B. WILLIAMS CO., Glastonbury, Conn.

LONDON, 64 Great Russell St., W. C. SYDNEY, AUSTRALIA, 161 Clarence St.

The Prudential offers the best of all that is good in Life Insurance, and under conditions suited to the requirements of the whole family.

THE PRUDENTIAL
INSURANCE COMPANY OF AMERICA.

John F. Dryden, Pres. Home Office, Newark, N.J.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

Brown Brothers & Co.,

Bankers, No. 59 Wall Street.

BOKER'S BITTERS

The oldest and best Specific against dyspepsia; an appetizer and a promoter of digestion.

Ask your Grocer, Liquor Dealer, or Druggist.

Harper's Catalogue

Descriptive list of their publications, with portraits of authors, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

Harper's Periodicals

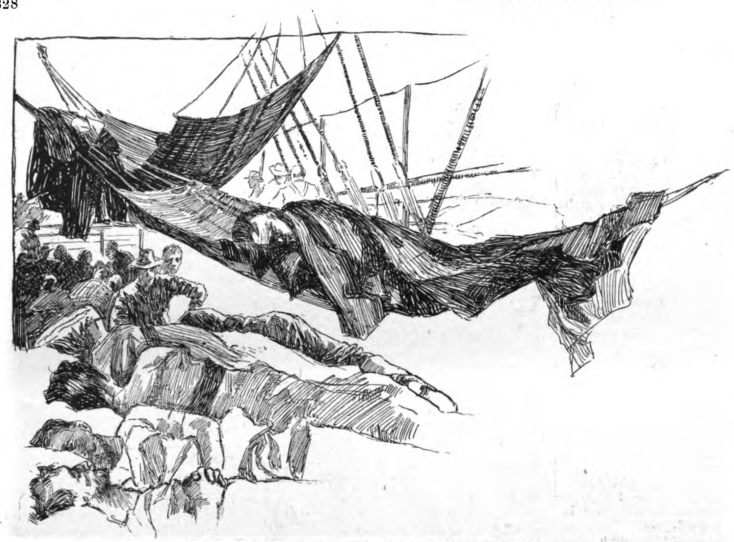
| | |
|---|---|
| MAGAZINE | $4 00 a Year |
| WEEKLY | 4 00 a Year |
| BAZAR | 4 00 a Year |
| LITERATURE | 4 00 a Year |
| ROUND TABLE | 1 00 a Year |

THE CELEBRATED

SOHMER

Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade. Our name spells—



S—O—H—M—E—R

New York Warerooms — SOHMER BUILDING — Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

ON THE WAY TO PUERTO RICO—FEVER PATIENTS ABOARD THE "ST. LOUIS."
DRAWN BY T. DART WALKER, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

(Continued from page 827.)

they expect home or even sea comforts at such a time? The long delay and uncertainty as to starting were over, and discomfort could be endured because of that. The point of view makes a difference in the perspective.

The men on the St. Louis and the St. Paul really had some sea comforts, however. They had room in which to sleep. Then, too, these ships were scrupulously clean—at least the St. Louis was. Captain Goodrich of the St. Louis is not the kind of a man to tolerate even a suspicion of dirt. No troop-ship horrors for him! His complete forethought, in providing all requisite necessaries and in making his ship absolutely wholesome throughout, was much appreciated by all on board. The large deck space on the St. Louis and the St. Paul gave the soldiers comfort. One night proved its advantages. Sleep was impossible in the hot cabins and hotter bunks—well ventilated though the ships were. The second night found hundreds of men on the St. Louis, privates and officers, stretched out in a confused jumble on the spacious decks, all wrapped up in blankets. Here and there white-clad sailors picked their ways about silently. The soldiers heeded them not; their fatigue inducing the soundest kind of slumber. Nor did the troops move about much in the daytime. In fact, for three days and three nights each man seemed to lie in the same place. They were resting, simply resting; and the fact that they lay still indicated that indeed they needed rest.

There was very little seasickness on the trip down—on this ship at least. Only about a dozen fever cases were developed, a fact which reveals the thorough work of Captain Goodrich in making careful preparation of the vessel for her human cargo. The days were hot, but the nights were delightfully cool; and there were no especial incidents, other than those which are common on all military transports, where the men laugh and sing and joke and speculate as to the future, and eat and sleep and write home.

T. DART WALKER.

FIFTEEN YEARS AT THE GALLEYS.

LIKE the historic denial of the presence of snakes in Ireland, there are no galleys, to be sure. Only in Les Misérables and one or two even stronger studies can one appreciate what Toulon and similar convict stations were under their old dispensation of justice and horror. But Guiana and New Caledonia leave not much to be desired in the article of unhealthfulness, and few return from their hideous climates. There has just returned to France a convict named Cyvoct, after fifteen solid years of penitential misery at Nouméa. Cyvoct was "pardoned out" by President Faure last January. He is thirty-seven years old. He was sentenced to New Caledonia, in 1883, as an anarchist who had taken special share in the dastardly bomb explosion in the café on the Place Bellecour at Lyons. He obstinately denied it, and even partially proved an alibi. But the jury were excited and inflexible. Cyvoct was sentenced to death. His fate was commuted to transportation, and at twenty two he went to Nouméa, where he has been by turns gardener, joiner, porter, and much else. He has the good fortune to find most of his family still living, and has returned to Lyons.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

(Continued from page 811.)

points. This will enable General Miles, if serious resistance is offered on the military road from Ponce to the capital, to despatch cavalry and artillery from one of the eastern ports, and thus, catching the enemy between two superior forces, to make even a strong position untenable.

And what measure of resistance is to be expected?.... Reports flatly contradict each other. "Captain-General Macias has instructions from Madrid not to waste the lives of his soldiers." "Captain-General Macias declares he can drive off the Americans again—as he did Sampson!" But Captain-General Macias expects to be taken—not at his word.

Saturday, August 6.—Despatches from Madrid, London, and Washington agree in the statement that a decision has been reached by the Spanish government, with the approval of the Queen-Regent and after consultation with Conservative and Liberal party leaders, to accept peace on the terms of Mr. McKinley's note. Señor Sagasta's organ, the Correo, observes that Spain has expended $374,-800,000 and 100,000 lives during the last three years "in the futile attempt to keep its colonial empire intact." So far as money is concerned, these figures do not seem heroic, for a current (though, it is hoped, a too liberal) estimate of the cost of the four months' war to us is nearly a billion dollars.

But it is important to note that these reports of an early agreement have not yet checked military operations. "We are proceeding now on a war basis," said Secretary Alger to-day, "as if there were no negotiations for peace....The provisional regiments will be sent to Cuba to take the place of Shafter's army, and all preparations will be shaped toward the Havana campaign in the fall, as if no peace negotiations were in hand."

As though in confirmation of the Secretary's statement, a message of this date from General Miles says: "General Brooke reports Hains's brigade, Fourth Ohio and Third Illinois, captured Guayama yesterday. Slight skirmish with enemy in and about town. Enemy's strength estimated about 500." A despatch to the New York Sun gives a lively description of the skirmish, in which three of our men were slightly wounded, and of the unconditional surrender of the town with its 16,000 inhabitants. A flag of truce had been shown, and General Hains with his staff rode through Guayama's streets. Then "all of the houses were closed, and the place looked like a deserted town. Not a person was in sight. General Hains rode to the public building, and by the time he got there the houses began to open. Everywhere heads were poked out of doors and quickly withdrawn. They were poked out again in a moment and again withdrawn, but this time the withdrawal was much slower. The third time the heads staid out, and were followed by shoulders and then bodies. Some one yelled, in a stentorian voice, 'Vivan los Americanos!' Then, as if by magic, the people came out and rushed toward the general and his staff, shouting the same words. Some prostrated themselves in the road and grabbed the Americans around the knees, while others threw their arms around the necks of the soldiers and kissed them, all the time shouting, 'Vivan los Americanos!' etc. Their enthusiasm seemed unbounded, and the scene at the surrender of Ponce was eclipsed."

Sunday, August 7.—From Guayama a portion of General Brooke's command advanced toward Cayey, the nearest point on the military road that connects Ponce with San Juan, while General Wilson has drawn nearer to the same point, proceeding along the military road from Ponce to Coamo. Simultaneous advances have been made in the western half of the island by General Schwan, who has started for Mayaguez, on the west coast, and General Henry, whose goal is Arecibo, a town on the north coast due west of the capital. If this plan is carried out successfully, all of the Spanish forces in the island will be driven back upon San Juan, and there hemmed in by our land forces, while vessels of our navy lie off the harbor, ready to bombard the place if it is not promptly surrendered.

Spain's note replying to Mr. McKinley's statement of the terms of peace was sent to Paris for transmission to Washington. The note suggests the expediency of a suspension of hostilities to make the negotiations easier. That it accepts the four preliminary conditions of peace is now admitted, but its precise terms will not be known for several days. The European edition of the Herald says, "In this answer the Spanish government reserves the utmost possible power of discussing details hereafter, in hopes of making better terms."

Monday, August 8.—Spain's reply, in the official correspondence relating to peace negotiations, was received at the French Embassy.

At Santiago the two armies that were hostile have been hungry together and have had the same fevers. Now they part company. General Shafter telegraphs: "Miami, Mattewan, and Vigilancia sailed this morning, having on board First Volunteer Cavalry [Rough Riders], First Regular Cavalry, Battery H, Fourth Artillery, Thirteenth Infantry, and Sixth Infantry." And the Quartermaster-General learned this morning that the Spanish transatlantic liner Alicante had arrived at Santiago, and was taking on board a thousand Spanish prisoners. The Americans are for Long Island, the Spaniards for Galicia. The sick Spaniards "were brought from the hospitals on stretchers, in wagons, and upon the backs of their comrades, often scarcely stronger than the sick men they bore. The docks were lined with officers and soldiers, who supported or carried their wives and daughters. The American wagons and ambulances brought cartloads of miserable colorless skeletons. The steam-lighters were literally covered with the stretchers and litters. The embarkation was partly effected in the midst of a drenching rain, but absolute order was maintained, and dignified soldierly silence."

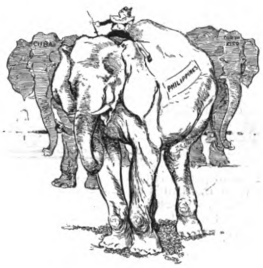
Tuesday, August 9.—The first news was received of a severe engagement between the Spaniards and Americans near Manila. General Merritt's despatch says, in part: "To gain approach to city, Greene's outposts were advanced to continue line from the Camino Real to beach. On Sunday night [July 31] Spanish attacked sharply. Artillery outposts behaved well. Held position. Necessary to call out brigade. Spanish loss rumored heavy." There was another attack the next night, and the enemy was again driven off. Our loss was thirteen killed and forty-seven wounded.

At three points in Puerto Rico there has also been fighting, to-day and yesterday. (1.) The town of Coamo was captured this morning, with a loss of seven men wounded—one fatally. On the Spanish side the commander, two captains, and nine privates were killed, thirty-five wounded, and one hundred and eighty made prisoners. (2.) At an early hour this morning eight hundred Spaniards attempted to retake the light-house at Cape San Juan, from which they retreated last week. Forty of our sailors held it, and were supported by the guns of the Leyden, Amphitrite, and Cincinnati. The attacking force lost heavily. (3.) Yesterday afternoon a skirmish occurred a few miles beyond Guayama. Five of the Fourth Ohio Volunteers were wounded.

Secretary Day made the following statement this afternoon: "We have agreed upon a protocol embodying the proposed terms for the negotiation of a treaty of peace, including the evacuation of Cuba and Puerto Rico, and it is expected that this protocol will be executed." In this important sentence the first word embraces three persons—Mr. McKinley, Judge Day, and M. Cambon.

MARRION WILCOX.

General Brooke. General Sheridan.



OFF FOR PUERTO RICO—GENERAL BROOKE AND STAFF GOING ABOARD THE "ST. LOUIS."
DRAWN BY T. DART WALKER, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Oh, there once was a King,
As minstrels sing,

Who a herd of elephants had;

And a man next door,
But by no means poor,
He wanted an elephant bad.

So the very weak King
Did a very sly thing
By giving his neighbor one;

And sky-blue ruin
At once began brewin'
'For that luckless Jonathan:

For the elephant ate all night!
And the elephant ate all day!
Do what he would

To furnish it food,
Its cry was still, "More hay!"
Till he tore his hair in wild despair

And piped his lachrymal glands.
Oh! he was sad because he had
That elephant on his hands.

"AN ELEPHANT ON HIS HANDS."

(The "Elephant Song" from "Wang," adapted to fit the possible Annexation of the Philippines.)

THE TAKING OF GUAM.

[Special Correspondence of "Harper's Weekly."]

U. S. Transport "Australia," en route to Manila.
At Sea, June 11.

If any venturesome individual contemplates a voyage on a troop-ship which he can just as well avoid, there is one word which covers the whole situation—don't! The prospect has allurements for any possessor of a roving foot. But if he is also the possessor of an appreciation of personal cleanliness and comfort, he will let his restless foot ache unsatisfied.

Life "runs large" on a troop-ship—or rather it runs at large—at least on this trooper. Some of it, in fact, does not run; it crawls. Mattresses go overboard, blankets are dragged in the sea for hours at a time, bichloride of mercury in strong solution adds to the repulsing influences of carbolic acid, the steam-boilers boil and boil, and blue shirts and soldier trousers go into them in an endless stream, and are fished out again, and yet that crawling life keeps on crawling. It advances with irresistible tenacity. It has crawled out of the steerage, up the after-companionway, up over the superstructure to the hurricane-deck, and is just aft of the main companionway. The fo'c's'le has surrendered to it; and in their little restricted space just forward of amidships the officers are making their last stand—and Manila is still two weeks away.

Life begins early in the day on this troop-ship. Four o'clock starts the sailor-men to washing down the decks. God knows the decks need it—they need it every hour! The soldiers follow the sailors, a few accompanying them, for there is a shower from the hose to be had that way. Then, no sooner is the hurricane-deck scrubbed down than the morning dancing class meets, directly over the heads of the officers. Why that is endured is one of the "things no feller can find out" which abound on this ship. After the dance, the hurricane-deck is settled at once for the next twenty-four hours. Breakfast is served there to the lucky fellows who have captured places. What they don't want of the breakfast—potato skins, and hardtack, and a few grease spots by way of decoration, with perhaps a bit of bacon—they throw on the deck. The magazines they read they use on one another's heads when they grow weary of reading. This is rough on the bindings, but it adds to the litter and increases the picturesque effect. As the day progresses cigars and cigarettes, half smoked or more, with a liberal amount of tobacco juice, are added to the mess. An occasional fight stirs things up for a few minutes, but the excitement dies out when the combatants are haled to the guard-house.

The galley of this ship, and the steam-room, where the "grub" of the soldiers is cooked, would make the fortune of any man who had it in New York. It's the finest thing in the Turkish-bath line ever produced, and it reeks with more odors than ever arose from an August meeting of sweat-shop strikers. Its energy is something tremendous. It pervades the ship, and in the quiet northeast trades, which blow just as fast as we go, so that we have no breeze whatever, the ramifications of that galley possess our little world—and Manila is two weeks away.

It is hot, and that's not in the least surprising. In latitude 15°, north or south, one expects to find high temperature, and he is not disappointed. Also it is humid. That too is to be expected at sea. A large fortune awaits the man who will discover an expedient for making it otherwise. Why should one complain, if it is hot, when there is ice? It is easy to make ice. All one needs is a machine. The most beautiful ice-machine mortal ingenuity ever contrived is a part of the fitting of this ship. With perfect simplicity, infallible regularity, and absolute incorruptibility it jams the temperature down to 38 degrees, and there it sticks. The warm salt seas that swash over the forecastle when she rolls—and she's a beauty at rolling, the finest in the Pacific—trickle down the fore-hatch into the commissary's improvised cold-storage room, and those seventy tons of ice he put in at Honolulu, at $15 a ton, ooze out in little streams. O glorious ice-machine! Some day some philanthropist will buy that machine and take it over to the Sahara. He will set it up beside an oasis, and make the desert so cold that the sand-fleas will evolute into polar bears. But there is even a hope that we shall be in Manila before that.

More men live in smaller space aboard our war-ships than there are, in proportion, on this ship, and the gleaming sides of the ships of the "White Squadron" were not more immaculately clean than their interiors. It is not the crowd, but the crowd's habits. And such habits can be stopped if there are officers who care or can command. If an officer happens, however, to think that letting his men wallow in filth is looking out for their comfort, so that the only way to make his men take proper care of themselves is for the general to see to it himself, it complicates matters, for the general is the last person on the ship to hear of such things. They do not happen on the ship where the regulars are. Last Sunday the chaplain preached to the men that "cleanliness is next to godliness," and the men whom he most wanted to reach sat on the outskirts of the crowd and played cards.

About the discomforts legitimately incident to the sort of trip we're making there is not the least complaint, but there is scarcely one of the things that are making life aboard this transport a little hell that could not have been prevented, that cannot be remedied, or for which there is the least excuse.

Monday, June 27.

To-day's observation showed us to be in latitude 17° 9′ north, longitude 126° 26′ east. Three days more, perhaps only two, and we shall see the flags waving over Dewey's ships in Manila Bay. It has been a long, hard trip, broken only twice—at Honolulu and at San Luis d'Apra—but each was a memorable occasion. It was the day after we left Honolulu that we first heard of Guam. That day Captain Glass of the Charleston, which has convoyed the troop-ships from the Hawaiian Islands, opened the sealed orders which he had been instructed to read when out of sight of land after leaving Honolulu. These orders directed him to call at Guam, one of the Mariana, or Ladrone, Islands, capture the governor and all officials and soldiers, and destroy any fortifications at Agaña, the capital, or in the harbor of San Luis d'Apra, the port of Agaña.

The message from Captain Glass wigwagged to the transports, making public these orders, stirred up a lot of enthusiasm among the soldiers. Straightway charts and Pacific directories were hauled out and studied for information about the Ladrones and Guam. But it quickly became apparent that most of our information would be obtained by personal contact, for the directories knew precious little. The ships held a steady and uninterrupted course toward the little island, unbroken by the sight of a single sail, and varied only by the occasional target practice of the Charleston, until the afternoon of June 15, when there was a time. The practice of the cruiser had been particularly interesting, as it indicated—or we thought it did, and that served as well—that Captain Glass expected to have to use his guns in capturing Guam. But this afternoon it was not subcalibre at boxes tossed over from the Peking and floating by, but regular practice with the big guns and service charges, at a regular pyramidal cloth target set adrift from the cruiser herself. This surely was preliminary to fort-destruction. Besides this practice, there was a conference of all the captains and General Anderson on the Australia, and arrangements for the attack on Guam were completed.

Considering the fact that the Charleston's crew is composed largely of green men, the shooting was very good. The range was about two miles, and every shot would have struck a ship, except possibly the first. Two rounds were fired from each of the 6-inch guns in the port and starboard broadside batteries, and from the bow and stern 8-inch rifles. Captain Glass was greatly pleased with the practice.

Early on the morning of Monday, June 20, land was seen. The convoy had come to the westward of the island of Guam, thereby avoiding the signal station at Point Ritidian, and caught sight first of the rocky shore north of Agaña Bay. The Charleston cleared for action, and with the men at general quarters went into Agaña Bay to look around. The morning was thick with frequent rain squalls, which blotted out everything even at a short distance from the ship. The Charleston went boldly into the harbor, and as close to the shore line as the dangerous coral reefs would allow, but the bay was empty. Then down past Devil's Point and Apepas Island she steamed, with the transports trailing behind and half a mile or more further out to sea.

As the cruiser passed Apepas Island her officers made out, over the low-lying rock, the spars of a vessel at anchor in the bay of San Luis d'Apra. Apepas Island cleared, the vessel showed full and white, and Captain Glass

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google thought he had a Spanish gunboat, but she set the Japanese flag as soon as she made out the war-ship, and proved to be the copra-trading brigantine Minatogawa, of Tokio. The cruiser went on past Luminan Reefs, and turned in by Point Orote, along the north shore of the little peninsula. The cliffs rise sharp out of the water, like the Palisades of the Hudson, and against them the Charleston, in war-paint, was hardly visible. Old Fort S. Iago, on the point, dismantled long ago, made no opposition to the cruiser's advance, but as she rounded the next point, and saw Fort Santa Cruz ahead, hope revived in the hearts of the silent men at the guns. Then Captain Glass gave the order to try out the old fort with the 3-pounders, and the men were happy. The firing began at 3000 yards, and for four minutes the little shells burst in and around Fort Santa Cruz in a fashion which made the solitary Chamorro setting his fish-traps behind the fort row for his life to get out of range. Thirteen shells were fired, the last at 2600 yards, and there being no response, the action of Guam ended. The troop-ships could see but not hear the shooting, and every shell got a round of wild cheers.

The shelling of Santa Cruz brought a fairly prompt response in the persons of Lieutenant Garcia Gutierrez, of the Spanish navy, captain of the port of San Luis d'Apra, and Dr. Romero of the Spanish army, health officer, who rowed out in their boats, flying the Spanish flag, to see if the health of the Charleston were good, and to promise to return Captain Glass's salute as soon as they could borrow some powder for a couple of old guns they had ashore. They were thunderstruck at being informed of the real situation, and when told that Manila was in Dewey's hands, practically, the Spanish fleet destroyed, and that they were prisoners of war, they were most unhappy. Francis Portusac, a native of Guam and an Agaña merchant, who was naturalized in Chicago in 1888, was with the officials to act as interpreter, but Captain Glass used him more as a bureau of information about the island. Finally the captain paroled the Spaniards for the day, and sent them away in their boats with a verbal message to the governor, Lieutenant-Colonel Don José Marina y Vega, to hurry up and pay his official call. That evening Governor Marina sent Captain Glass a message to the effect that the military regulations of Spain forbade him to set foot on a foreign vessel, but he would be pleased to see the captain at his office in the morning. Captain Glass replied that he would see the governor himself, or send an officer to represent him.

The next morning Lieutenant William Braunersreuther, the navigator of the Charleston, with Ensign Waldo Evans and five men, went ashore. Lieutenant Braunersreuther carried a formal note to the governor from Captain Glass, which gave him thirty minutes in which to surrender unconditionally. The guns of the Charleston were ready to enforce the demands. Lieutenant Braunersreuther met the governor at the landing-place at the native village of Piti. With the governor were Captain Duarte of the Spanish army, his secretary, the port captain, Lieutenant Gutierrez, and Dr. Romero. In presenting the note from Captain Glass, Lieutenant Braunersreuther said, in Spanish:

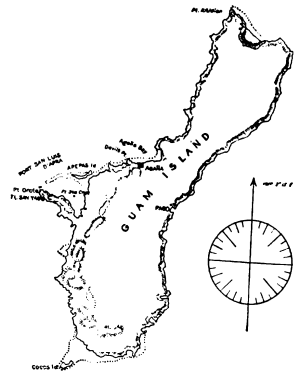
"I have the honor to present a communication from my commandant. I am authorized to wait one half-hour for your reply. In presenting this communication I call your attention to the fact that we have, as you see, three large ships in the harbor, and a fourth [the Sydney had remained outside] outside ready to come in. One of these ships is a modern war-vessel of high power, with large guns. The others are transports full of soldiers. We have a large force here. I call your attention to these facts in order that you may not make any hasty or ill-considered reply to the note of my commandant."

Governor Marina bowed and thanked Lieutenant Braunersreuther, took the note, and retired with his staff into his office. From its window, if he chanced to look out, he could see the steam-launch of the Charleston towing a string of boats full of men up toward the landing-place. In the boats were Lieutenant Myers, U.S.M.C., of the Charleston, with forty marines from the ship, and part of Company A, Second Oregon, Captain H. L. Heath, from the Australia. This was the first detachment of the landing force General Anderson and Captain Glass had agreed on the night before. The rest of Company A, and Company D, Captain A. T. Prescott, were waiting on the Australia for the launch to return and tow them to land. To their intense disgust, not a man of them set foot on land. The first detachment tied up to the Japanese brigantine while the launch went back for the rest, and before it came back the work had all been done.

For twenty-nine minutes Lieutenant Braunersreuther waited, watch in hand, for the reply. Then Governor Marina came out of his office with a sealed letter addressed to Captain Glass. "It is for your commandant," he said, as Lieutenant Braunersreuther broke it open. "I represent my commandant here," was the reply. Governor Marina had written:

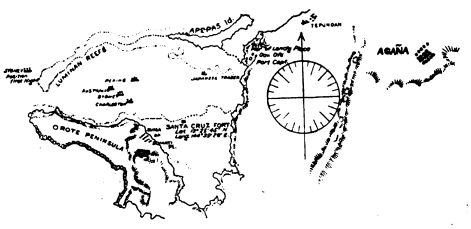
SIR,—In the absence of any notification from my government concerning the relations of war between the United States and Spain, and without any means of defence, or the possibility of defence in the face of such a large opposing force, I feel compelled, in the interests of humanity and to save life, to make a complete surrender of all under my jurisdiction. Trusting to your mercy and justice,

I have the honor to be, etc., etc.



So Guam was surrendered, with all the Mariana Islands. The unhappy governor had no notion that the force which had threatened him was intended really for Manila, and thought that it had been sent out solely against the Mariana group. He had but fifty-four Spanish regulars and a company of Chamorros, and was, as he said, quite without means of making a defence. Lieutenant Braunersreuther required him to write an order to Lieutenant Ramos, in command of the troops at Agaña, to have them on the pier at Piti, with all arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, and the four Spanish flags in the island, at four o'clock that afternoon. That done, the governor wrote a long farewell to his wife, telling her to send his clothing and personal effects to Piti at once. He offered the letter to Lieutenant Braunersreuther to read, as he had done the order to Lieutenant Ramos. The Charleston's officer waved the letter away, and said,

"No, no; that is not for me."



Apparently that courtesy was more than the governor had expected. He put his head down on his desk and fairly broke down and cried. When he regained his composure, he and his staff took places in the Charleston's boat, and were taken aboard the cruiser. On the way the boat passed the two detachments of the landing-party, and ordered them back to the Australia.

Soon after the arrival of the prisoners on the Charleston, Captain Glass took a large United States flag and went in his barge to Fort Santa Cruz, where he hoisted the stars and stripes on the old Spanish staff. As the first broad red stripe rose over the ruined battlements, the six-inch rifles of the Charleston roared out the national salute. Formal possession had been taken of Guam. At the same time the bands on the Australia and Peking played the "Star-spangled Banner," and the soldiers and sailors on the troop-ships and cruiser gave three times three for Uncle Sam's new island.

The Sydney had been ordered to come in from outside the reef, and as soon as Captain Glass got back from raising the flag over Santa Cruz, he made arrangements with Captain Pillsbury, with General Anderson's permission, to quarter his prisoners on the transport. Lieutenant Braunersreuther then took the Charleston's marines, under Lieutenant Myers, and with Ensign Evans and Dr. Farenholt went into Piti to receive the surrender of the Spanish soldiers. The troops were waiting for him in the boat-house at the landing-place. With Lieutenant Ramos in command was Lieutenant Berruezo, both of the Spanish naval infantry. The company of regulars was drawn up in line on one side of the boat-house, and on the other side, facing them, were the fifty-four Chamorros. The regulars were armed with '96 model Mausers, and had two great boxes of ammunition. The natives carried Remington 45-90's, and had about two bushels of cartridges loose in a big box.

GUAM ISLAND.

DISPOSITION OF AMERICAN FLEET AT THE SURRENDER OF GUAM.

Lieutenant Myers took his marines through the boat-house, and formed them in line facing the water. The left of the line moved forward left oblique, turning the flank of the boat-house, and the Spaniards were helpless in a trap, if they had cherished any notion of making a last stand. But they had not. At Lieutenant Braunersreuther's command the regulars stepped forward, man by man, to Ensign Evans, who stood near the landing-stage, broke open their rifles, and showed them to be not loaded, then handed them to him. As Ensign Evans passed the guns on to bluejackets, who stowed them in one of the Charleston's boats, the soldiers passed over their belts, bayonets, and other accoutrements. When the regulars had been thus disarmed and had re-formed in line, the natives went through the same form.

Then Lieutenant Braunersreuther stepped out in front of the marines, followed by the two Spanish officers. The marines presented arms, and the Spaniards gave their swords and their revolvers to Lieutenant Braunersreuther.

Then the Spanish regulars learned for the first time that they were to be held as prisoners. Lieutenant Braunersreuther told them that they might say good-by to the Chamorros. There was a great outcry and much embracing. The natives could hardly repress the evidences of their satisfaction, and as soon as they were sure that they were to be set free from the Spanish yoke, they began ripping the Spanish buttons off their uniforms and the little insignia of their service from their collars. Buttons and collar marks they threw away by handfuls, and the Charleston's marines and bluejackets picked them up as souvenirs. The Chamorros took the farewell messages of their old comrades and scattered. Then the Spaniards were put in a big barge and taken out to the Charleston. The two officers and the four Spanish flags went in Lieutenant Braunersreuther's boat. The Sydney had anchored near the Charleston by this time, and all the prisoners were put aboard her at once. The officers were put two in a state-room, and the men were sent below. Armed guards watched them while the ship was in the harbor, but they all had plenty of freedom to move about. The officers' baggage came out to the ship the next morning, and some of the clothing of the men. The captured ammunition consisted of fifty-four Mauser and fifty four Remington rifles, with belts, cartridge-boxes, and bayonets, 7500 rounds of Mauser ammunition, and about as much for the Remingtons.

While this was going on, the Charleston had been taking coal from the Peking. It was put in sacks in the Peking's bunkers, hoisted into a boat, and towed over to the cruiser. There the sacks were hoisted on board and dumped into the bunkers, and then they were sent back for more. Working constantly for two days, the cruiser got 125 tons from the troop-ship, and on the morning of Wednesday, June 22, four weeks from the day we left San Francisco, we were ready to leave Guam on the last stretch of the road to Manila.

The island of Guam is the largest and most populous of the Mariana group. When the great Magellan discovered the islands in the early part of the sixteenth century he called them the Lateens, from the lateen sails of the prahms of the thieving inhabitants. Afterward the piratical propensities of the natives so impressed the Spaniards that they called the islands the Ladrones, or thieves' islands. The name Mariana was given to them finally in honor of Maria Anna of Austria, widow of Philip IV. of Spain. The first conquest by the Spaniards practically destroyed all the natives, and the people who now make their homes in the Ladrones are mostly of Malay origin. There are between 8000 and 12,000 of them on the island of Guam. They live mostly in small villages of from forty to sixty houses along the coast; but Agaña is a place of perhaps 4000 inhabitants, with stone buildings of considerable pretension. The village of Suma, or Somayi, on the point opposite where the Charleston lay, was the only one, besides Piti at the landing-place, visited by this expedition. There was not time, in Captain Glass's opinion, to go into Agaña.

Suma has about sixty houses, a few of them of stone, but mostly of a heavy dark red wood that looks like mahogany, which the natives call "iffet." Nearly all the men in Suma speak a little English, which they have picked up from American whalers, which call at San Luis d'Apra, as the port is called, for wood, water, and fruit. The first stories of the stone houses of Suma are used as storehouses and pig-pens. The living-rooms are on the second floor. The wooden houses are built up on posts, so that the floor is about four feet from the ground. Back of each house there is a lean-to, similarly built up from the ground, and connected with the house by a running-board at the floor-level. This lean-to has a sort of forge-fireplace in one corner, where the cooking is done. The village is laid off in regular squares of small blocks. The streets are straight and fairly clean; those running east and west are broad, but the others are narrow. The roofs of all the houses are made of a thatch of cocoanut palm leaves, on bamboo rafters and stringers. Usually there are but four houses in a block, each with its little back yard and outlying kitchen, surrounded by its own picket fences. In some blocks there is also a stone bake-oven, shaped like a bee-hive, and protected by a thatched roof. At the end of the main street there is an old stone church, about forty feet long by twenty wide, before the altar of which there never ceases to burn a cocoanut-oil lamp. Beside the church stands the Escuela Publica, also built of stone, where the old Spanish padre, who spends half his time in Agat, across the Orote Peninsula, teaches the Chamorro children when he is in Suma.

The Chamorros are mostly small in stature. They are not so flat of feature as the Hawaiians, and there is more red in the color of their skins. Some of the men are exactly of the shade of polished copper. Their hands are small and slender; but their feet, from constantly going barefoot and much wading over coral reefs, are large and thick and tough. The women, especially the younger ones, are rather good-looking, and some of them are strikingly handsome. The men wear thin cotton clothes, usually just a sort of blouse-shirt and short trousers, with hats made of cocoanut-palm leaves, more tough and durable than a Panama, or even a Kona hat from Hawaii. The little pot-bellied children wear a single coatlike garment of thin cotton, usually unbuttoned all the way to the throat. The women wear a one-piece garment wrapped about them, and tied in a knot over the right hip. Their hair is long, straight, and glossy black, and their eyes a soft, beautiful, deep brown.

The land in Guam is of a reddish clayey nature, and very fertile. The natives grow sugar-cane, rice, corn, and mellons. Cocoanuts, pineapples, bananas, limes, lemons, oranges, and bread-fruit grow wild in greatest profusion. It rains nearly all the time—half a dozen squalls of from ten to thirty minutes every day—but no one minds that. It keeps the temperature down and makes everything grow. It is a fine coffee country—but there is almost no attention paid to the industry. The principal product is copra. The Spanish have taxed the life out of everything. Every birth, death, burial, marriage, is taxed; every sale, every killing of a hog or chicken or beef, pays something. It costs seventy-five cents a head every six months simply to exist. Under decent laws it will take small energy to accumulate a fortune in Guam, and the climate is as fair as that of Honolulu.

OSCAR KING DAVIS

ROYAL GEOGRAPHY.

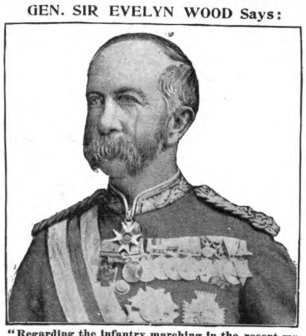
THE youthful Queen Wilhelmine of Holland some years ago had misbehaved to her governess, an English lady. The governess, as a penance, bade her unruly pupil draw a sketch map of Europe, with the principal cities and natural features indicated. In course of an hour the young culprit presented herself and her map to the task-master. Holland was drawn with vastly disproportioned territory and careful detail. England was represented as an island too small in size for anything but its name; Ireland was made rather more significant, and across the margin of the work was written, "The actual English territory is too limited to allow details—W." The sentiments of the governess are not of record.



Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

NEVER HAS ANYTHING BEEN SO HIGHLY AND SO JUSTLY PRAISED AS

VIN MARIANI

MARIANI WINE, the FAMOUS TONIC for BODY, NERVES and BRAIN.

GEN. SIR EVELYN WOOD Says:

"Regarding the infantry marching in the recent manœuvres, it was the best seen during my command at Aldershot. Many officers availed themselves of the tonic and reconstituent properties of the well-known Mariani Wine, the most certain as well as the most palatable method of inducing resistance to fatigue."
From "The London Sketch."

MAX O'RELL,
The Renowned Writer and Lecturer, Writes:

Your Vin Mariani is positively marvellous; one glass put me on my feet; one bottle made a new man of me. Yours gratefully, MAX O'RELL.

ALL DRUGGISTS.

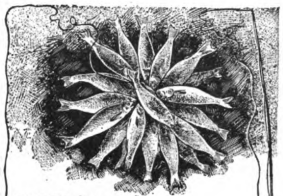
PARIS: 41 Boulevard Haussmann. LONDON: 83 Mortimer Street.

MARIANI WINE is invaluable at this season of the year, when, owing to trying climatic conditions, the system is especially susceptible to attacks of debility and prostration.

VIN MARIANI (MARIANI WINE) has stood the test of thirty-five years' trial. It has written endorsements from more than 8000 American physicians, in addition to having received cordial recommendations from royalty, princes of the Church and of the State, and many notable personages.

MARIANI WINE is a tonic prepared upon careful scientific principles. It contains absolutely no injurious properties. It gives power to the brain, strength to the entire nervous system, firmness and elasticity to the muscles, and richness to the blood. It has been aptly described as a promoter of good health and longevity.

MARIANI WINE is specially indicated for General Debility, Weakness from whatever causes, Overwork, Profound Depression and Exhaustion, Throat and Lung Diseases, Consumption, Malaria and La Grippe.



MARIANI WINE is an adjuvant in convalescence and a powerful rejuvenator. For Overworked Men, Delicate Women, Sickly Children it Works Wonders. Taken with cracked ice, it relieves Summer Prostration quickly and effectually. It soothes, strengthens and sustains the system.

To those who will kindly write to MARIANI & CO., 52 West 15th Street, New York City, will be sent, free, book containing portraits with endorsements of Emperors, Empress, Princes, Cardinals, Archbishops, and other interesting matter.

AVOID SUBSTITUTIONS.

MONTREAL: 28-30 Hospital Street.

---

LEECH LAKE
in Minnesota abounds in
BLACK BASS and
MUSCALLONGE.
An Outing there will be inexpensive.
GOOD HOTELS,
GOOD FISHING,
GOOD HEALTH,
LOTS OF FUN.
Send Six Cents for Northern Pacific's WONDERLAND '98 and investigate.
CHAS. S. FEE, Gen. Pass. Agt., St. Paul, Minn.

---

MAGIC LANTERNS WANTED AND FOR SALE OR EXCHANGE. HARBACH & CO. 809 Filbert St. Phila. Pa.

---

You throw away half your cigar — half the time! Why not get the full benefit of what you pay for?

Van Bibber Little Cigars

are excellent little cigars for all ordinary short smokes. They are made of the very best imported whole leaf tobacco and never vary in quality. Any intelligent smoker who will try them will adopt them as a part of his smoking outfit.

Ask your dealer for them or send 25c. (stamps) and 10 of them will be sent, in special pocket pouch, by return mail, prepaid, wherever you live.

H. ELLIS & Co., Baltimore, Md.
The American Tobacco Co., Successor

---

A better Cocktail at home than is served over any bar in the World.

THE CLUB COCKTAILS

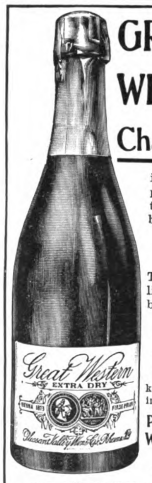
MANHATTAN, MARTINI,
WHISKEY, HOLLAND GIN,
TOM GIN, VERMOUTH and YORK.

We guarantee these Cocktails to be made of absolutely pure and well matured liquors and the mixing equal to the best cocktails served over any bar in the world. Being compounded in accurate proportions, they will always be found of uniform quality.

Connoisseurs agree that of two cocktails made of the same material and proportions the one which is aged must be the better.

Try our YORK Cocktail made without any sweetening—dry and delicious.



For Sale on the Dining and Buffet Cars of the principal railroads of the U. S.

AVOID IMITATIONS.

For Sale by all Druggists and Dealers.

G. F. HEUBLEIN & BRO., Sole Props.,
39 Broadway, N. Y., Hartford, Conn. 20 Piccadilly, W. London, Eng.

---

GREAT WESTERN Champagne

is more acceptable to palate and stomach than imported wines, because of its

UNQUESTIONED PURITY.

Touches the pocket lightly—yet fills the bill.

Served at all first class Clubs, Cafes and Buffets everywhere.

The vintage now marketed is especially pleasing and very dry.

Pleasant Valley Wine Co.,
SOLE MAKERS,
Rheims, - N. Y.

Sold by { H. B. Kirke & Co., New York. S. S. Pierce Co., Boston.

---

H.C. CURTIS & CO. TROY. N.Y.

---

There is no Kodak but the Eastman Kodak

Half the charm of a photographic outing is lost if one carries along several pounds of glass plates and holders and has every moment filled with anxiety for their safety.

Kodaks

use non-breakable film cartridges, which weigh ounces where plates weigh pounds.

KODAKS $5.00 to $35.00.

Catalogues free at agencies or by mail.

EASTMAN KODAK CO.
Rochester, N. Y.

---

WONDERFUL TRIËDER BINOCULARS

½ Actual Size.

Have 8 to 10 times the power of the best of the old-style field and opera glasses.

Pocket size—invaluable for Army and Navy, War Correspondents, Race Meets, Regattas, Travel, and the Theatre.

Send for Descriptive Catalogue. For sale by leading jewelers and opticians throughout the United States. Among them:

New York—Theodore B. Starr, F. G. Schmidt, Gall & Lembke.
Brooklyn—J. B. Hoecker, 312 Fulton St.
Chicago—C. D. Peacock, Spaulding & Co., Hyman, Berg & Co., N. Wattz, H. Bofrich.
Philadelphia—Queen & Co., Bonschur & Holmes, Williams, Brown & Earle.
Washington—Franklin & Co., Moore & Leding, D. N. Walford.
Boston—Pinkham & Smith.
St. Louis—A. S. Aloe Co., Erker Bros.
San Francisco—Hirsch & Kayser, Henry Kahn & Co., Geo. H. Ream.

Prices Range from $44.50 to $72.50.

C. P. GOERZ, 52 Union Sq. (East), N. Y. City

---

Gold Seal
Champagne

Best Natural Sparkling Wine produced in America.

Pronounced by Connoisseurs as a Superior Article for Household Consumption.

For Sale by all leading wine dealers and grocers, or at the cellars,

URBANA WINE CO., Urbana, N.Y.

Also a full line of well-ripened and pure Sweet Catawba, Dry Catawba, Pure Sherry, Clarets, and Brandies.

---

LITERATURE'S

Portrait Supplement

For August 17

Mrs. ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE

Editor of The New Biographical Edition of Thackeray.

10 cents a copy. LITERATURE $4 00 a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York

---

KLONDIKE NECESSITIES

Under certain circumstances a heavy calibre

SMITH & WESSON may be of more value than your nuggets. Don't take any chances.

Catalogue of desirable weapons for heavy use mailed on application.

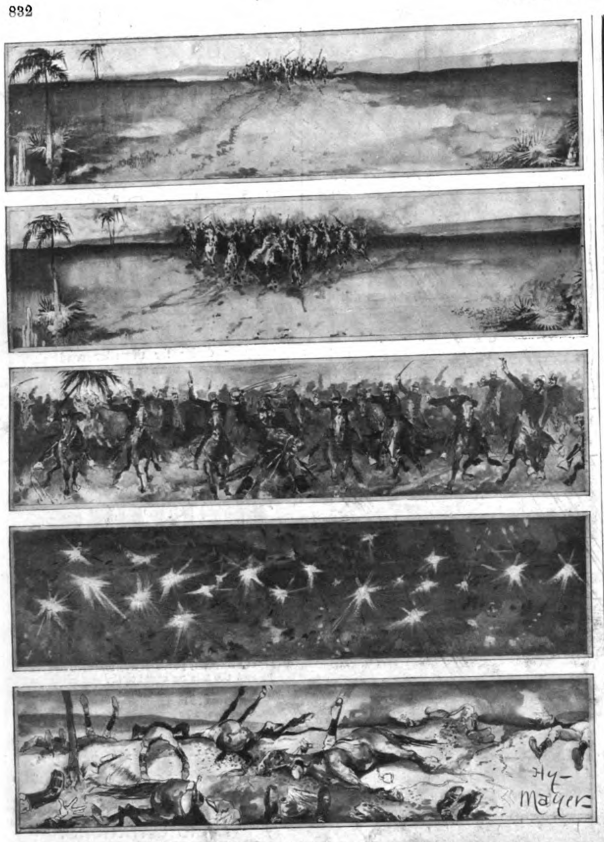
SMITH & WESSON,
15 Stockbridge St., Springfield, Mass.

---

A NEW POCO.
The Folding Gem.

The neatest, smallest, most carefully built of all the low-priced cameras. A marvel of compactness weighing one pound, and only an inch and a-half thick, closed. Automatically locks itself at proper focusing distance. Closes by touching a spring.

TAKES A PICTURE 4 X 5
As perfect at edges as at centre.



COMPLETE, $7.00.

ROCHESTER CAMERA CO.
43 ELIZABETH ST., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

---

HARPER'S CATALOGUE thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

A KINETOSCOPIC VIEW OF A SPANISH CAVALRY CHARGE.

ROYAL

The absolutely pure

BAKING POWDER

Highest of all in leavening strength.

ROYAL BAKING POWDER CO., NEW YORK.

Vigoral

"Concentrated Beef"

Delicately seasoned for culinary use. Also used as a beverage.
It strengthens, nourishes, sustains.

Our Chafing Dish Recipe Book, sent free on request, tells of many ways for using it advantageously.

ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

Pepsalt...

is the best of table salt, into every grain of which is incorporated digestive substances natural to the stomach. Fill your salt-cellar with Pepsalt and use it in place of salt at your meals. If you have indigestion your stomach does not supply the necessary amount of the dissolving or digestive juices. Pepsalt taken in place of salt at your meals makes good this deficiency, as you take with every mouthful of your food a similar substance to that which is required and at the right time, and your indigestion is a thing of the past.

Send for sample in salt-shaker bottle and try it.

Price 25 cents, postpaid.

THE VAUPEL SAMARITAN CO., 45 Sheriff St., Cleveland, Ohio.

Indigestion Has No Terrors For Him
That salt-shaker is filled with Pepsalt

PEPSALT CURES AND PREVENTS INDIGESTION

"A PERFECT FOOD—as Wholesome as it is Delicious."

Walter Baker & Co.'s

Breakfast

Cocoa

The Standard for Purity and Excellence....

Trade-Mark.

Costs less than one cent a cup.

Our Trade-Mark on Every Package.

Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.
DORCHESTER, MASS.
ESTABLISHED 1780.

Campers and Yachtsmen

can have home comforts by providing themselves with our "PERFECTION" AIR MATTRESSES and CUSHIONS. Waterproof—Light—Convenient. Made in any shape or size desired.

Illustrated catalogue sent free on application.

MECHANICAL FABRIC CO.,
Air-Goods Department. PROVIDENCE, R. I.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Upholstery.

Velour Glacé.

Tapestry Silk Damask,
for Curtains and Furniture Covering.

Real Lace Curtains.

Arabian, Marie Antoinette, Brussels, and Renaissance.

Tamboured Lace and Muslin for Sash Curtains.

Broadway & 19th st.
NEW YORK.

The Only Dandruff Cure

The Captol Hair Tonic is a new and invaluable discovery made by the well-known authority on diseases of the scalp, Dr. P. J. Eichhoff, Professor of Dermatology, Elberfeld, Germany.

Captol completely eradicates scurf and dandruff in 10 to 14 days, and is a sure preventive of baldness. (See Deutsche Medicin. Wochenschrift, 1897, No. 41.)

Experience has shown that all other specifics recommended for these purposes have proved failures.

SOLE U. S. AGENTS,
MÜLHENS & KROPFF, . . NEW YORK.

Joseph Gillott's

STEEL PENS.

GOLD MEDAL, PARIS EXPOSITION, 1889, AND THE CHICAGO EXPOSITION AWARD.

THE MOST PERFECT OF PENS.

CHEW

Beeman's

The Original

Pepsin Gum

Cures Indigestion and Sea-sickness.

All Others Are Imitations.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,

BANKERS.

ESTABLISHED 1873.

2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.

Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.

Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.

A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.

Correspondence solicited.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE,

thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

TRADE E&W MARK EARL & WILSON'S LINEN COLLARS & CUFFS BEST IN THE WORLD.

Harper & Brothers' New Books

SKETCH BOOKS; The Paris Sketch Book of Mr. M. A. Titmarsh; The Irish Sketch Book; and Notes of a Journey from Cornhill to Grand Cairo. Edited by Mrs. ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE. With Sixteen Full-page Illustrations and Ten Wood-cuts by the Author. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, $1 75. (In Biographical Edition of Thackeray.)

LABOR COPARTNERSHIP. Notes of a Visit to Co-operative Workshops, Factories, and Farms in Great Britain and Ireland, in which Employer, Employé, and Consumer share in Ownership, Management, and Results. By HENRY DEMAREST LLOYD, Author of "Wealth against Commonwealth." Illustrated. Post 8vo, Cloth, $1 00.

THE PATERNAL STATE IN FRANCE AND GERMANY. By HENRY GAULLIEUR. Post 8vo, Cloth, $1 25.

EARLY LETTERS OF GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS to JOHN S. DWIGHT: Brook Farm and Concord. Edited by GEORGE WILLIS COOKE. Post 8vo, Cloth, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, $1 50.

THE MORAL IMBECILES. A Novel. By SARAH P. McL. GREENE. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

New York HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers London

"AMERICA'S GREAT RESORTS," 48 pages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent stamp by GEORGE H. DANIELS, G. P. A. New York Central, New York.

Digitized by Google
PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—NO. 2175.

Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS.
All Rights Reserved.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 27, 1898.

TEN CENTS A COPY.
FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.

UNCLE SAM'S NEW CLASS IN THE ART OF SELF-GOVERNMENT.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, AUGUST 27, 1898

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

This Paper is the best Pictorial History of the War with Spain, as it was of the War of 1861. Its Special Artists and Correspondents have followed the Army and Navy, and notable Events in Washington and elsewhere have been accurately portrayed.

Messrs. RUFUS F. ZOGBAUM and T. DART WALKER are at Puerto Rico, Messrs. FRANK D. MILLET, JOHN F. BASS, and O. K. DAVIS are in Manila, and Mr. HAROLD MARTIN is at Santiago.

SPORTING circles on both sides of the water feel the exhilarating revival of interest caused by the challenge of the Royal Ulster Yacht Club, which wants to win the America cup, for which transatlantic yachts have been contending at various times since 1851. Sir THOMAS LIPTON, who recently visited this country, has brought about the issuance of the challenge, and has ordered the construction of a cutter-yacht at Belfast, to be named the Shamrock, and to be Irish-manned. Members of the New York Yacht Club and aquatic circles generally welcome the challenge. No conditions will be attached to it by Sir THOMAS, and this is a courtesy and mark of confidence which our sportsmen will thoroughly appreciate. It is certainly the antithesis of the conduct of the last challenger, and will tend to promote a generous disposition on both sides, which will be the best possible guaranty that no misunderstanding will mar the details of the contest.

GERMANY may have something to explain to this country as to the reason Captain-General AUGUSTIN was permitted to escape from Manila on the German cruiser Kaiserin Augusta, when he should have been permitted to remain and be taken by General MERRITT and Admiral DEWEY as a prisoner of war. There is some doubt as to whether there was a breach of international obligations on the part of Germany; and even if there was, there is not enough malice in it to make it the occasion of a serious difficulty. At its best, and at its worst, it seems to illustrate a certain unfriendliness towards us on the part of German naval officers, which is strongly disavowed by the Emperor and the German press. The conduct of the Germans at Manila seems to have been annoying because it was boorish and impolite, but all this may be easily removed by the German Emperor and the German nation, and we trust that certain kindly signs that have been given forth in the German press since the signing of the protocol are not misleading.

THE selection of Mr. JOHN HAY as Secretary of State to succeed Secretary DAY is excellent. Mr. HAY is, by long odds, the best equipped man in the Republican party for this position; he has not only had great experience, for an American, having served in France as Secretary of Legation and in the State Department before as Assistant Secretary, but, in addition, has a wide knowledge of public affairs and a wide acquaintance with public men on both sides of the water. Moreover, he is a man possessed of social graces, and one who can maintain fittingly the dignity of the place. He is also, we believe, a firm friend of England, and one who believes in the maintenance and in the increase of the present kindly relations between the United States and Great Britain, which are so full of promise for the future. Mr. MCKINLEY is to be congratulated that Mr. HAY is willing to accept the position. We understood, when he was made ambassador to England, that he stipulated that he should not be recalled as Mr. SHERMAN'S successor. Although nothing but good is to be said of Mr. HAY'S appointment, we may be pardoned, in speaking of it, if we express regret at the loss of Secretary DAY. This gentleman, who came to Washington an entirely unknown lawyer from a small Ohio city, has made a large place for himself in the diplomatic history of the country.

COLONEL THEODORE ROOSEVELT has displayed greater tact and more political sagacity at the present crisis than he has ever shown before, and we hope, for his sake and for the sake of the State, that he will continue to refuse to talk about himself and his chances for the gubernatorial nomination, and to confine himself to expressions of enthusiasm over the fighting qualities of his regiment. If there is virtue enough left in the Republican party of this State to make an impression upon the sordid soul or upon the fears of Mr. THOMAS C. PLATT, it is quite likely that Colonel ROOSEVELT'S nomination will be forced upon the boss. We can assure Mr. PLATT that, whatever the result may be to him, Colonel ROOSEVELT'S nomination and election as Governor would be a great good to this commonwealth and a great gain to the Republican party. Thousands of Democrats are willing to cast their votes for Colonel ROOSEVELT, and we do not know of any one else likely to receive the Republican nomination who will make so good a run as he will make. If Mr. PLATT nominates Governor BLACK or any one of his creatures, the issue between the Republican and Democratic parties will be of really very little importance, and the contest will once more be a question between evils —that is, between CROKER and PLATT—and therefore the war will have done no good to the politics of this State.

MR. CECIL RHODES bids fair to come off as victor in the contest now going on in Cape Colony, where issues momentous for all South Africa are to be decided by the vote on September 4. Mr. RHODES is the animating force behind the Progressives, whose programme, as might be anticipated, includes British supremacy in South Africa, a repudiation of the independence of the Transvaal in the sphere of foreign relations, and a more liberal domestic policy than has prevailed in the recent past. The anti-RHODES party is composed chiefly of the Africander or the Dutch element at the Cape. A portion of the Africander party formerly supported Mr. RHODES, but the reaction caused by the JAMIESON raid and England's hostility to the Transvaal drove them into opposition. It has been charged against them that they are intriguing with and receiving financial support from the Transvaal, and recently some admissions made by Africander leaders have weakened their influence with the electors. Charges and countercharges are freely made, and a great deal of bitterness has characterized the campaign. The latest reports go to show that the chances in favor of the Progressives have greatly increased. If they succeed, Mr. RHODES will in all probability resume his former position as premier, and the consequences are sure to be far-reaching. He is a restless spirit, wholly dominated by one idea, and with immense force of will and power of resource devoted to its realization.

IT is always to be regretted when a battle takes place after peace has been declared or an armistice proclaimed between the interested parties. There was some fighting both in Cuba and Puerto Rico after the protocol was signed by the representatives of the Spanish and United States governments, and life was lost, but the most serious event was the bombardment and capture of Manila before the news of peace had reached there. No one, of course, was to blame on either side; the news simply had not reached the military commanders. The event, however, has given the advocates of Philippine annexation a false argument. They now say that as Manila has been taken, and has not surrendered to be held pending negotiations for peace under the protocol, the city and bay belong to the United States, and if not kept must be "given up." This is not only false reasoning, but it is distinctly dishonest. The fact is that an armistice had been declared. The two countries were at peace. The battle and capture were a mistake due to the failure of the news of the peace to reach General MERRITT and Admiral DEWEY. But if the United States should seek to take advantage of its own inability to prevent the continuance of military operations by its own commanders, its conduct would be shystering, pure and simple, and we are glad to believe that no one connected with the administration would connive at any such conduct.

THE Constitution of the United States gives to President MCKINLEY the power to make treaties. This power of the President has been encroached upon unduly and wrongfully, and to the injury of the country, by the Senate, which has the power of ratification. We believe it to be the duty of the President to insist most firmly upon his right to negotiate and conclude treaties, and to insist, further, that the Senate shall confine itself to the task of ratification. Now, of all times, the country needs that the Executive shall maintain not only the dignity but the power of his office, and shall, so far as he can, put the legislative branch of the government in its proper place. To ask the Senate, or responsible Senators, to preside at the negotiation of treaties is to encourage undue encroachment upon the Executive power. We are quite sure that a treaty negotiated by Mr. MCKINLEY would be a much better treaty for this country in every way than any treaty that may be negotiated by members of the United States Senate. We have more faith in Mr. MCKINLEY'S judgment, in his tact, and in his purposes than we have in the judgment or the purposes of the Jingoes of the United States Senate. Mr. MCKINLEY, of course, is right in leaving the negotiation of the treaty to commissioners, but we hope that he will appoint a commission which will represent him and his views. And after he has negotiated and signed the treaty, if the United States Senate wishes to take the responsibility of refusing to ratify it, let the onus be upon it. Congress has not played a very admirable part in this war. It robbed Mr. MCKINLEY at the beginning of it of a diplomatic victory—it forced a war upon the country before the country was prepared—and the less it has to do with arranging the terms of peace, the better for all concerned. It may be necessary to appoint Senator DAVIS on the commission, for various reasons, but if he is to be a member he should be counterbalanced by ex-Senator EDMUNDS, or some one of the like opinions. Before all, it is necessary that the commission should represent Mr. MCKINLEY, and should express his views.

THE question as to who is responsible for the conditions prevailing at Tampa and other camps and at Santiago by reason of which the troops suffered from lack of food, while the sick among them lacked proper medical attendance and medical supplies, must not be allowed to rest. It is quite probable that a good many persons are more or less responsible for failure to avail themselves of supplies that had been furnished by the heads of the various departments at Washington, and whoever has been guilty of negligence and incapacity should be severely dealt with. Medical officers or quartermasters or commissaries should be held to answer for the cruel results of any remissness or of any lack of intelligence and solicitude on their part. No one who has caused unnecessary suffering to the soldiers can be pardoned; but whatever may be the result of an investigation, the great criminal in this case is Congress. It is due to its own incapacity, its own niggardliness, its own failure to realize the necessities of the military services, its own refusal to permit the building up of staff corps for capable and efficient action in an emergency, and to its own interference with such staff corps as we possess, to the successful efforts of its members in obtaining places in those corps for their favorites, that we owe the fact that our staff corps are not as efficient as they should be, even when we consider their size and the material with which Congress has supplied them. And Congress is the criminal for forcing the country into a war without having undertaken to make any adequate preparation for it. This criminal will not be revealed, of course, by a Congressional investigation; and this being the case, it seems to be the duty of the press to point out clearly the fact that whatever the incompetency of which the administrative branches of the government may be guilty, it is Congress which, in the first place, has treated the army and the navy—but the army more than the navy—with indifference, with injustice, and with ignorant disregard of consequences, and, in the second place, it is Congress which shouted itself and the country into a war long before we were ready for it.

RESULTS OF THE WAR.

THE end of the war finds the country with some serious and complicated problems, and some teachings which, it is to be hoped, Congress will be sufficiently humble to take to heart. If, however, the present race of politicians do not rise to their task, which is not only onerous, but which also must compel some measure of self-renunciation and of confession, the people will eventually discover men worthier of the new task which conquest has imposed upon the nation. But it is with our new problems that we are now concerned, and the lessons which the war offers for the politicians may be postponed for the time.

President MCKINLEY has played his diplomatic part well and skilfully from the beginning to the end of this unhappy episode in the nation's history. He did his utmost to prevent the war, and Congress robbed him of one of the most brilliant diplomatic victories ever won by an American statesman. And now when he resumes the work of negotiation after the victories of the army and the navy have been won, he is again displaying the qualities which gained success for him in the ante bellum diplomacy. Probably Secretary DAY is entitled to a share of the credit for the exposition with which the preliminary discussion with

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

the French ambassador was conducted, but the stamp of the President must be recognized here as in the earlier crisis, for the simple reason that the business methods of both occasions bear so strong a resemblance to each other. We wish that Mr. McKINLEY might have seen his way clear to a declaration against the folly of holding the Philippines, but it cannot be denied that delay and inquiry into the resources of the islands, and as to the character of their people, will be likely to bring about the desired result without that exasperation of an already excited public mind which would be likely to follow a strong antagonistic declaration by the Executive at present.

The end of the war finds us with Cuba and Puerto Rico and all the islands that Spain has held in the Caribbean Sea for four hundred years in our possession. This old Middle-Age power, whose flag first floated over American territory, is at last and definitely driven out of the Western Hemisphere, and her successor is the young and lusty republic with which, for centuries, the bigoted old monarchy had lived on friendly terms. What will the new master do with its possessions? For all of them will remain its possessions for many years to come. Puerto Rico is to be ours without question, and we will be obliged to retain Cuba until, in the language of the resolution under which this war was begun, a stable government has been established by the people of the island. It is the intention of the administration to carry out this purpose of the resolution in its fullest and broadest significance. The people of Spain and of the United States have rights in Cuba which must be respected and guarded, and the Cuban insurgents, whatever may be said of them by their apologists, have not yet shown that they ought to be intrusted with the control of the island; that the property or the persons of those who were once their enemies, or of those who are likely to become their enemies, can be safely put within their power. How long it will take these islanders to prove not only that they can govern themselves, but that they can treat with justice and humanity those who, by reason of our victory over Spain, are now living under the protection of the United States, is a question that time alone can answer. This we do know, that the United States cannot turn over its recent enemies to Cuban vengeance, and it cannot consent, either, to surrender rule to the Cubans until they have shown themselves ready to make good laws and to administer them wisely, for not only have the Spanish a right to our thoughtfulness, but our own citizens whose interests are in Cuba have the right to demand that we shall be careful of them. We have turned out Spain, and the responsibility for the establishment of a new government that shall take the place of the old rests upon us. Barbarous and hard as was the rule of the old monarchy, we cannot permit its successor to be worse, or even so bad. The result must be that we shall continue to occupy Cuba under military rule for a long time to come. Perhaps this occupation will endure for years. It is quite within the range of possibility that Cuba will remain a colony of the United States. We should regret this exceedingly. When the war began very few intelligent Americans wished to retain Cuba, and we doubt if the number of annexationists has been increased by the knowledge which the war has given us of the character of the Cuban insurgents. Congress was doubtless honest in resolving against a war of aggrandizement, and doubtless also expected that the government of the island could be turned over to its people soon after the conclusion of the war. But events have determined somewhat otherwise, as the more clear-sighted foresaw would be the case. We are loaded down with an island that we did not want. We must hold it until a good government shall be established, or for all time. For many years we must maintain there a large military force, which ought probably to be part of our standing armies. This will add greatly to our taxes; but the duty must be met; and if we are finally forced to accept the island as a colony, we must provide for it a system of government much better and stronger than any method of administration that we now possess for ourselves.

For the present we possess also the city and harbor of Manila, and we shall hold them with a military force until the final government and control of the Philippines shall be determined by treaty. The settlement of this question is the most difficult task to be performed by the Peace Commissioners whom Mr. McKINLEY will appoint. From what we have said as to our duties in Cuba, which will apply in some degree to our task in Puerto Rico, and from what we know concerning our task in Hawaii, it would seem as though we had assumed sufficiently heavy obligations already, and that it would not be the part of prudence to take on the additional burden of providing and carrying on the government of the savage Philippines. This, we are sure, is the opinion of the President, and likewise it is, we think, the belief of the administration that the inquiries as to population, resources, commerce, harbor facilities, etc., which Admiral DEWEY and others have been instructed to make, will convince the country, after the shouting has ceased, that the Philippines are not worth while, and that even if we were an old colonial power, these islands would not be to our advantage.

As to all tropical colonies and their value to this country, we refer our readers to the admirable letter of our London correspondent, Mr. ARNOLD WHITE, who discusses Great Britain and her colonists on another page. No true and intelligent friend of America here or on the other side of the Atlantic wants us to imitate Great Britain's failures, or to follow in the pathway of blind Continental Europe, whose rulers are not enlightened even by the fate which has at last overtaken Spain. The Englishmen who are urging us to take the Philippines are moved by a desire to have us at hand to help them in their possible war with Russia.

THE DEMOCRATS IN NEW YORK.

THAT ex-Governor and ex-Senator HILL should have become the champion of the respectable and conservative part of the Democratic party of New York is perhaps the strangest fact in the political situation of the State. It is one of the strangest of political transmutations. Times have changed since Governor HILL was standing by MAYNARD and urging his appointment to a judicial position as a reward for a piece of party service which the people of the State condemned by an almost unprecedented majority when the moral quality of it became an issue in an election. It is almost as strange to reflect that the ex-Governor and ex-Senator should have acquired his new position by the simple process of sulking in his tent. For the change is due to the fact that, after having opposed with vigor the more crazy planks in the national platform, he sat still and held his tongue and his pen during the ensuing campaign.

Mr. HILL'S rival for the boss-ship of the party in the State is Mr. RICHARD CROKER, who stands, of course, upon a much lower plane than that of a merely scheming and unscrupulous and ambitious politician. Mr. CROKER is in politics for the sole purpose of looting the city of New York by various modes of blackmail, and especially by the sale of indulgences to commit crime. There is, indeed, no reason why the Tammany boss should trouble himself at all about the politics of the State, except to make secure his opportunity for the exploitation of the city. He cares no more than he knows about the interests or the sentiments of "up the State," except as they may affect his hold upon the criminal classes of the city, including all those who are willing to pay money in order to be allowed to violate the law. No boss of Tammany has thus far attained the eminence of a party boss in the State. When JOHN KELLY, flown with insolence, attempted the larger rôle, his collapse was immediate and inglorious. There is no reason to expect a better fate for his successor.

It is plain that Mr. HILL is much better qualified than Mr. CROKER to lead an effective campaign upon State issues—that is the campaign which it is to the interest of the Democrats to make. They cannot make a campaign upon national issues, for the reason that they have no such issues. The one distinctive point of party policy made in their last national platform is the free and unlimited coinage of silver at sixteen to one, and nobody but a lunatic would presume to put that issue forward in a State election in New York. On the other hand, the Republicans have provided the Democrats with a State issue of the most desirable kind. They stand before the people arraigned and in effect convicted of having at least wasted millions upon a scheme for the improvement of the canals which is worthless without the expenditure of many more millions, and of having concealed from the people the necessity of this additional expenditure. But the appearance of Mr. CROKER as the leader of a campaign against the waste or peculation of money, either public or private, would be quite too absurd.

In any case, the issue is a germane and legitimate issue, and the Republicans are distinctly upon the wrong side of it. The party interest of the Republicans is to shift the issue to national politics, and to try to carry the election by an appeal to the successful conduct of the war. That can be done only by nominating a Republican with a brilliant "war record," if any such be available. One such and only one such there is available. THEODORE ROOSEVELT would undoubtedly make the voters forget, while he was a candidate, about the "canal steal," while he would undoubtedly himself remember it to some purpose after he became Governor. It would be obviously "good politics" in the party sense for the Republicans to nominate him, but it might be very bad for the personal interests of some Republican politicians.

THE NEW VICEROY OF INDIA.

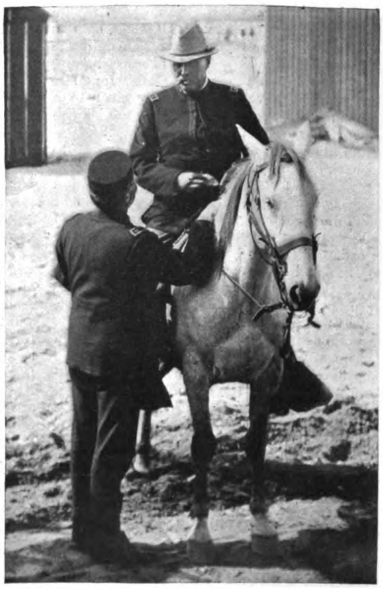
THE appointment of the Hon. GEORGE NATHANIEL CURZON to the Viceroyalty of India at a time when the great dependency is passing through a crisis almost as severe as and considerably more complicated than the rebellion of '57, is about as interesting a leap in the dark as DISRAELI'S choice of Lord LYTTON for the same office. Mr. CURZON is chiefly known for his omniscience. He has been everywhere and seen everything, knows all the men and reads all the books, has written most of them and abstracted the rest—to quote the criticism of a fellow-member who was intensely annoyed by Mr. CURZON'S superior airs. That may or may not have been a little too harsh, but it is doing the late Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs no injustice to say that the outside world so far has seen in him only a very clever young man, whose passion for statesmanship and knowledge of Eastern affairs have yet to bear visible fruit. His appointment must be taken largely on trust.

Foremost among the questions which the war, famine, and pestilence of the last two years have brought to the front is what has come to be known as the Forward Policy, and with it are bound up the state of Indian finances and the overwhelming authority of the military men. Nature has provided the northwestern frontier of India with a wide and desolate barrier of mountain land, inhabited by tribes to whom independence, varied with a little internecine fighting, is everything. The old English policy was to stay on the hither side of this barrier, and as much as possible leave the tribes to themselves. If the Afridis or the Mohmands or the Swatis attacked a British outpost, a force was sent into their territory, a wholesome chastisement followed, and the troops returned to their old quarters. No attempt was made to bring the insurgents under British authority or meddle with their independence. They were simply conquered and fined, and taught to remember who were the rulers of India. The policy was not dazzling or brilliantly aggressive; but it was cheap, which meant much, and it was just, which meant more. It was an open and understood arrangement on both sides.



This safe and quietly progressive policy, the work of the civil administrators of the Punjab, has been done away with by the political generals at Simla, who know next to nothing of frontier government, and cannot bear the idea of retreating from a conquered territory. Their plan now is to establish outposts in this mountain wilderness, drive military roads through the rebellious districts, and "overawe the tribes" by a permanent display of force. The Liberal government pledged itself in 1894 to retire from Chitral. The Conservatives were no sooner in office than they allowed themselves to be dictated to by the military faction in Simla, and ordered the retention of Chitral. Naturally, as all the civil-service experts had foretold, the natives could not reconcile the constant presence of a British garrison with the independence which had been formally guaranteed to them. The revolts all along the frontier last year were not due to the Amir of Afghanistan, nor to the Sultan's successes over Greece, nor to a revival of Islamism, nor to the preachings of a mad mulla, but simply to Great Britain's act of bad faith in garrisoning a district from which she had promised to retire.

The first thing that is expected of the new Viceroy is the abandonment of the forward policy. Mr. CURZON is an Imperialist through and through, but some of his speeches during the height of the Afridi campaign showed that he understood and regretted the real cause of the uprising. Whether he will have the courage to resist the pressure of military opinion, and put his trust in the civil servants, whose life-work is frontier administration, is more dubious. There is nothing in the forward policy but a love of military aggrandizement. It facilitates rather than guards against an invasion from the north; it converts indifferent tribesmen into active enemies; and it is ruinously costly. Already India is taxed to a point where any further imposition might easily provoke an insurrection. The unusual expenses of the last two years have left her with a heavy deficit, and comparative peace on the border—there is never an actual peace—is necessary to save her from bankruptcy. According to the belief of some of the best judges in England, the subordination of the military party is essential to India's salvation, and Mr. CURZON'S Viceroyalty is likely to be decisive one way or the other.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

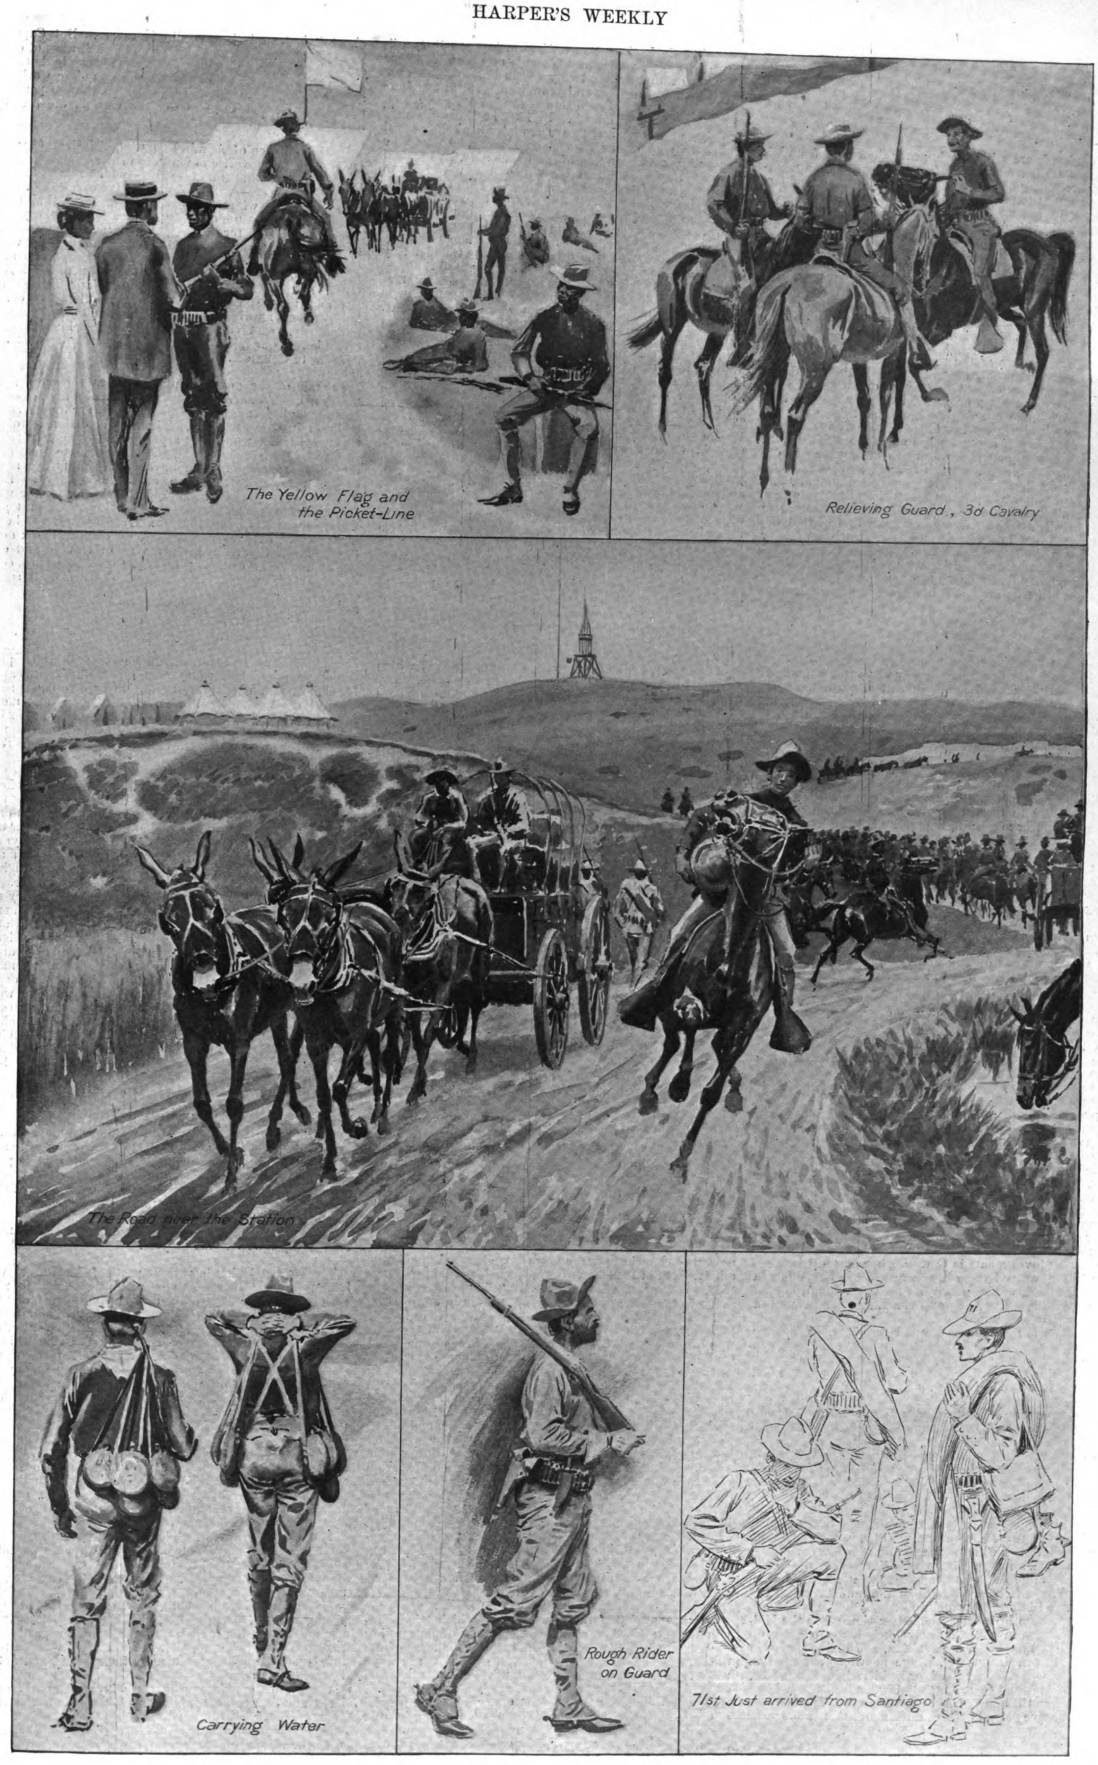
GENERAL WHEELER AND COLONEL ROOSEVELT RIDING INTO CAMP.
General Wheeler on Right.

MAJOR-GENERAL YOUNG, COMMANDING CAMP WIKOFF.

THE 3D CAVALRY MARCHING TO THE DETENTION CAMP.

THE 9TH CAVALRY ON GUARD AT THE QUARANTINE LINE.

CAPTAIN HIGGINS OF THE 15TH (PENN.) SIGNAL CORPS.



ON THE WAY TO CAMP.

A SCENE IN CAMP—WATERING MULES WHILE DRAWING SUPPLY-WAGONS.

SCENES AT CAMP WIKOFF, MONTAUK POINT, LONG ISLAND.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

SCENES AT CAMP WIKOFF, MONTAUK POINT, LONG ISLAND.—Drawn by Max F. Klepper.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

Wise heads are still wagging over the report from Vienna of the discovery, by Professor Lilienfeld, of a method of producing albumen from the products of coal-tar. The chemists tell us that albumen is the indispensable property in animal food that makes us eat it; so the deduction has been drawn that if we can get our albumen from coal-tar, we will not have to eat meat. That sort of deduction is better adapted to make attractive head-lines to a cable despatch than to carry conviction to the soul of a hungry man, so there was hardly need of the warning which has followed the original news, that while Dr. Lilienfeld has doubtless made a valuable chemical discovery, the usefulness of artificial albumen as food is still to be determined.

The investigation of the war promises to make more trouble and to induce harder fighting than the war itself. The desire is very earnest that every one who did anything that was wrong or omitted to do anything that should have been done shall be caught and punished. It makes a serious prospect, and any citizen who finds that his vacation comes opportunely for him to abstain from reading the newspapers for a month after peace is declared will doubtless miss much reading that would tend to make his spirit grieve. It seems possible that there may be overmuch enthusiasm about fixing blame on individuals. There may be some individuals who need to be overhauled, but the average citizen will feel that the great purpose of investigation and the great warrant for publicity in all that concerns our war-making is the correction of the system, and the improvement of our methods of military administration, so that when we have another war to conduct we may do it in a workmanlike manner.

The report, which seems not at this writing to have been successfully contradicted, that a member of General Merritt's staff has become engaged to be married to a Honolulu princess, brings with it premonitions of the novel sensations that may be in store for American society as a result of the enlargement of our boundaries. General Merritt and his staff made only a short stay at Honolulu. If one engagement has resulted from that passing visit, what are we to look for as the result of a protracted experience of the society of Manila? Some very obstinate bachelors went with General Merritt; but it is one thing to be an obstinate bachelor in the United States, and another and possibly a more difficult thing to be one in the Philippines. For one thing, we are told that it costs so little to live in Manila that even the poorest American officer might safely permit his thoughts to turn toward domestication. And then the Philippine ladies have some extraordinary special recommendations. They don't wear stockings or bonnets, and they glory more in their hair than in their clothes. It is true each of them wants a pino-cloth gown, and pino cloth is dear; but there is not very much to a Philippine lady's gown, and as the fashions do not change much in the Philippines, a best gown lasts very much longer there than here.

Whether there are native princesses in the Philippines, and what are their quality and circumstances, does not appear, but doubtless we shall know when General Merritt's staff gets back.

In view of the probability that Sir Thomas Lipton's Shamrock will be the next yacht to sail for the America's cup, it is expedient that we make Sir Thomas's acquaintance and try to discern what manner of man he is. The announcement came by cable, almost simultaneously with the news of the prospect of a challenge, that he had given a hundred thousand pounds to a Princess-of-Wales fund to provide cheap meals for London working-men. We may infer from that that he has money to spare and is not averse to spending it, provided the occasion appeals to him.

He is an Irishman by derivation, though born in Glasgow, Scotland. He laid the foundation of his fortune by selling Irish bacon to the Scotch. When Irish bacon ceased to be procurable in quantities big enough to supply the markets he found for it, he fell back on Chicago, where he has long had large interests in the pork-packing industry. His fortune is said to have been very greatly swelled by investments in Ceylon, where, after the coffee-bug had destroyed the coffee plantations, he bought a number of estates that came into the market and planted them with tea. It was an experiment, and turned out to be successful and very profitable.

Besides being rich, shrewd, and benevolent, Sir Thomas is credited with being a very lively sportsman, who will make the best race that British wits and British money can provide for, and will prove in all respects a good and reasonable man to sail against.

The promotion of Ambassador Hay to succeed Judge Day as Secretary of State calls attention once more to the unusual proportion of plums in Colonel Hay's cake. No one questions that the new Secretary is an able and deserving person, or that he has shown himself equal to difficult jobs of great variety and importance. If there is a man in the country who is handy with his intellectuals, Colonel Hay is that person; but he has been a lucky man, too. One gets the impression, from running over the facts of his career, that he has managed, in a very unusual degree, to combine a pleasing maximum of achievement and distinction with a minimum of disagreeable drudgery. Of course there has been drudgery, but it seems to have been nearly all either pleasant or done under exceeding stirring and interesting conditions.

He was born in Indiana in 1838—a time when the Middle West was in a particularly likely state to grow up with. His father was a physician, and in due time sent him to Brown University, where he was graduated in 1858. His grandfather lived, or had lived, in Springfield, Illinois. He went there to study law, and in 1859 became a student in the office of Abraham Lincoln. If there was an instructive place in the country about that time it was Lincoln's law-office. Mr. Hay learned politics there, and when Lincoln went to Washington his law clerk went with him. For the next five years Mr. Hay undoubtedly worked hard. In the course of the war he got a little military experience, and earned his title of Colonel. After Lincoln's death he spent two years in Paris as secretary of legation, and then several years in Madrid in the same capacity, one fruit of which was Castilian Days, which still ranks as a good book. In 1868 he became chargé d'affaires at Vienna, and two years later came home and joined the staff of the New York Tribune. In 1879 he became Assistant Secretary of State under Mr. Evarts, and when the Hayes administration went out he went back to the Tribune, which he edited, in the absence of Mr. Reid, during the critical period of the quarrel between Garfield and Conkling. Editing a New York newspaper in those days was a different job from what it is now, and was done somewhat less with the nose than of late years and somewhat more with the other faculties. Colonel Hay edited the Tribune to the satisfaction of Mr. Reid.

Meanwhile Colonel Hay had married the daughter of Mr. Stone of Cleveland, a rich and discerning man, who had so many uses for an able son-in-law that, in 1881, Colonel Hay stopped newspapering in New York and went to live in Cleveland. It is suspected that while there he wrote the successful novel The Bread-winners, but that has never been proved. Mr. Stone died and left him his executor, with very large business interests to look after. Colonel Hay looked after them, and built a notable house in Washington, where he spent his winters. There he and Mr. Nicolay wrote their Life of Lincoln. What Colonel Hay busied himself about between the completion of that labor and his appointment to London is not all clear, but some of his time seems to have been profitably spent in helping to bring about the nomination and election of Major McKinley. He has been a successful Ambassador to England, and will doubtless make an efficient Secretary of State, though it may seem to him rather a hardship to be promoted from the most agreeable place in the President's gift to one that promises for some time to come to be exceptionally laborious and difficult.

In the New York Herald of August 15 was a report of some of the impressions and conclusions that have resulted from the protracted experiences of Dr. Richard Hodgson, of the Society of Psychical Research in England, with Mrs. Piper, the famous medium of Arlington, Massachusetts. Mrs. Piper has been much talked about, and more or less written about, and is known as a medium through whom very wonderful and perplexing things are done. Dr. Hodgson's record of such of her exploits and experiences as have come under his observation is reported to have been turned over to the Psychical Research Society, and is stated to be very curious and engaging reading. The departed person who for the last five years has appeared to communicate through Mrs. Piper with persons in this world is described in the Herald as "G. P., a young literary man, who met his death accidentally in New York in 1892." This "G. P.," who seems easily identified as George Pellew, was a friend of Dr. Hodgson, and had discussed psychical matters with him. Though not believing in a future life, he had shown interest in that problem, and had volunteered to assure Dr. Hodgson that if he should die in time he would make every effort to communicate with him through Mrs. Piper. Before "G. P.'s" death Mrs. Piper's familiar spirit was one Dr. Pennuit, who gave himself out as a French physician. This person was ousted by "G. P.," who seems now to have monopolized the medium's facilities for communication.

Dr. Hodgson complains that he cannot report and publish some of the most convincing of the phenomena that came to his notice, because the communications made had to do with such very private personal affairs. His conclusion, so far as he has gone, seems to be that there is no hypothesis that would account for what he has observed which would not be more preposterous and incredible than the theory that he has had communication with the spirit of a departed person. At present, therefore, he admits a belief in spiritism. Professor William James, of Harvard, has been a careful observer of Mrs. Piper, and he agrees absolutely with Dr. Hodgson that, whatever other explanation may be made of her performances, the theory of fraud is not to be entertained. Mrs. Piper has been under notice by skilled and distrustful scientific observers for fifteen years. Dr. Hodgson's report alone covers nearly five hundred instances of phenomena in which she was concerned.

Rear-Admiral William A. Kirkland, who died at the Mare Island Navy Yard in San Francisco, was born in North Carolina in 1836, and began his long service in the navy when he was fourteen years old. He became passed-midshipman in 1856, and was commissioned lieutenant in 1858. During most of the civil war he was stationed away from home, with the Brazil Squadron until 1862, and at the China station and in the East Indies until 1864, but he was ordered back in time to take part in the capture of Mobile in 1864. In later years he was in command of the Brooklyn Navy Yard (1885), was supervisor of New York Harbor (1889), and was commandant of the League Island Navy Yard at Philadelphia. He was commissioned commodore in 1893, rear-admiral in 1894, and commanded the European station for more than a year, until November, 1895. In July, 1896, he was put in command of the navy-yard at San Francisco, and though he was retired last July, the intention was that he should retain his command until the end of the war with Spain. He died from the effect of a surgical operation. He was reprimanded by Secretary Herbert for sending a letter of congratulation to President Faure on his election as President of France, but he held that the letter was a personal one which grew out of his acquaintance with M. Faure. Some comments he made in a newspaper interview on the American missionaries in Syria brought him a good deal of hostile criticism; but his naval record was good, and he was regarded as a highly efficient officer.

It is rumored that the court martial which tried Captain Oberlin M. Carter found him guilty of defrauding the government, and sentenced him to be dismissed from the army, to be imprisoned for not less than ten or more than twenty years, and to suffer further penalties and disgrace. It will be remembered that Captain Carter's trial began some months before the war with Spain broke out, and that the findings of the court have long been in the hands of the Secretary of War. The sentence, whatever it may be, has not yet been approved, and how much of it will take effect remains to be seen. If the report about it is true, it is exceedingly severe. But Captain Carter's offence, if he was guilty, as charged, was not only exceedingly grave, but extremely unusual. Dishonesty in engineer officers who have charge of public works is almost unknown, and it has been stated, though perhaps not correctly, that Captain Carter's case is the first of its kind on record.

In the absence of Admiral Dewey, Admiral Cervera seems to be the favorite naval hero of the hour. The return of the fleet that sunk his ships—which at this writing is still in prospect—will doubtless be the occasion of new demonstrations which may overshadow those that have attended him, but undoubtedly he has had all the polite attention he cared for, and perhaps somewhat more than was absolutely consistent with entire politeness or with his personal comfort. His progress to Portsmouth and back was, all things considered, altogether unparalleled in the emotions that characterized it, and indeed the good-will and immense interest the kind admiral excited came finally to be somewhat amusing. At Portsmouth, the newspapers say, he kissed a baby. Nothing but his return to Spain before our fall elections can insure him against being sent to Congress.

Friends of the government boast that the gum now used on Uncle Sam's adhesive stamps is of a much better quality than formerly, and that stamps no longer stick together in damp weather. This last assertion is to be taken with allowances, but persons who have carried stamps to the sea-shore, and exposed them to fogs and dampness, report that they have continued usable most of the time, and that it is not as necessary as formerly to take special precautions with them. Time was when summer boarders at the sea-shore kept their postage-stamps overnight in a cup of water, as some persons keep their teeth. It is not necessary to do so now, and Uncle Sam himself reports a great saving of trouble and expense because his own supplies of postage-stamps in sheets do not stick together in storage. There is still some grumbling about the taste of the gum, but much of that is due to force of habit. The government mucilage is not intended to be edible, and the back of the stamps ought not to taste so good as to be a temptation to children. Most persons can lick three or four contemporary stamps without discomfort. For more squeamish persons there might be a profit in stamps with sugar-coated backs, but that may safely be left to private enterprise. There is no foundation at all for the libellous statement sometimes heard that the present government gum has intoxicating properties and undermines the habits of stamp clerks. It can be used with entire safety so far as is reasonably necessary.

The growth of suburban trolley lines promises to affect the habits of the American people about as much as the invention of the bicycle. At first the trolley merely superseded the horse as a means of hauling street cars in the cities, but it long ago passed that use and sped far beyond the boundaries of cities, until now, from being a mere means of necessary transportation it has come to do an immense business in carrying folks who ride for pleasure. A few years ago driving on country roads was a luxury reserved for persons who had horses or could hire them. Then the bicyclists claimed their share of the country and everywhere made their claim good. Now all over the land the trolley makes long country rides possible to thousands of persons who are too young, or too old, or too infirm or lazy to ride bicycles, and too poor or too timid to drive horses. Trolleying through a pretty country in good weather is an admirable amusement. It is cool, clean, safe, and refreshing. We are told that its effect is observable, in many places, in the improved health of city babies, whose mothers are able to carry them now on long rides, where they get good air and cool off. Trolleying is a standard summer resource in Washington, where it affords the easiest means of keeping cool. It is a recognized resource in New York, and, apparently, everywhere else. Between Boston and Mount Desert, along the New England coast, with its remarkable succession of summer hotels, there is now almost a continuous line of trolley railroads. They run from village to village, and from port to port, and wherever the seafaring pleasure-seeker goes ashore he finds summer boarders trolleying in shoals up and down the country, and getting the most for their money that summer boarders ever got. A great institution is the trolley-car. It beats the livery horse out of sight, and is the worthy fellow of the bicycle.

The boys and girls in various parts of the country who have interested themselves in various schemes to raise money to build a battle-ship may easily find some outlet for their energy which is better suited to their tender years, and the accomplishment of which is less absurdly disproportionate to their strength. Two Cincinnati boys, Willy Good and Harry Price, are reported to be travelling about from city to city, raising money among the school-children to build a ship to replace the Maine. They went to Washington and called on the President, who, instead of giving them true fatherly advice, expressed great interest in their plan and gave them a letter of recommendation. It was reported a fortnight ago that they had already raised $35,000. Nevertheless, Willy and Harry would do well to return to Cincinnati and to private life, and let Uncle Sam build his ships with his own money. His need of a new ship is not violently pressing just at the present moment, and he has several good ones a-making and will soon start some more.

Miss Mary Mears, of Chicago, is also reported to be fired with the ambition to raise money for a new battle-ship among American girls; she does not want the girls to be outdone by the boys. In evidence of her capacity, it is recorded by a contemporary newspaper that she is a pianist of considerable skill, and teaches a Bible-class of young men. None the less, building battle-ships is too big a task for her, and unsuitable in other particulars. She would do better to stick to her Bible-class, and teach her boys that fighting is usually inexpedient and not infrequently wrong.

So also of the unknown person who has started an endless chain that carries dimes for a battle ship to Secretary Long. That is a bad plan, too, and bothers the Secretary, who won't receive the dimes, and don't know what to do with them.

E. S. Martin.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LONDON.

August 6, 1898.

THE recent Parliamentary discussion on the question of British influence in the Yang-tse Valley has touched only the surface of the question. The subject of national extension or expansion is one that affects in different ways, but at the same time, the future of the Anglo-Saxon race on both sides of the Atlantic. The proposals of American statesmen with regard to the Philippines affect Great Britain in much the same way as the latter's treatment of the question of the "open door" in China affects the United States. It is worth while to explore the question of British expansion more thoroughly than is possible in a debate in the House of Commons, where the interests of political parties are apt to supersede considerations of national welfare. There are seven reasons which have induced Great Britain and other nations in former times to embark on the policy of extension. Four of these causes have now ceased to operate in the British Empire. The first cause of extension was the foundation of colonies as penal settlements. New South Wales, Norfolk Island, and Tasmania were originally intended expressly as penal settlements, and they were used as Siberia and New Caledonia are now used by Russia and France respectively. In former years the West Indies were supplied with labor from convict sources. Neither England nor America now requires penal colonies; but the fact of France continuing to transport convicts to French islands in the Pacific is a present and future source of trouble between the Latin and the Anglo-Saxon races.

The second object has been the foundation of colonies as an outlet for political or religious exiles. To this cause was due the foundation of Maryland by the Roman Catholics and the New England States by the Puritans. This cause has practically ceased to operate in Britain, except in the case of Irishmen, who avoid, however, for the most part, emigration to the British colonies.

The third object was the formation of military garrisons. This was the idea with which most of the Roman colonies were founded; and it is also operative in maintaining a way of communication—that is, coaling-stations—between London and the extremities of the empire. Gibraltar and Aden are examples of military garrisons which are maintained solely to keep up the nervous system of the empire. Gibraltar and Aden, therefore, really depend not upon their own intrinsic value, but on British rule and British interests in India, Australia, and China.

The fourth and commonest cause of extension has been to feed the mother-country with tribute, exclusive trade, or direct revenue. Such tribute was collected by Athens and Persia in olden times, and by Spain and Portugal up to the present year. Since 1776 England has learned that not ascendency but equality is the only means of maintaining the integrity of the empire. To sum up, the Anglo-Saxon race does not require to use colonies as penal settlements, does not collect tribute from them, does not value them as outlets for a discontented population, while, so far as England is concerned, the naval and military chain of communications is pretty well established, and requires no substantial additions. So much for the obsolete reasons for colonization, which operate no longer either in England or America.

The positive value of extension is to be divided under three heads: first, increase of trade; second, a healthy outlet for surplus population; third, because the union between the English who live in England and those who live in the colonies gives to every subject of the Queen a better position in the world than he would have as the inhabitant of a little, an independent, but an isolated state. That these advantages are real is shown by the fact that the British Empire, outside the United Kingdom, takes more than one-third of the goods manufactured in these islands for exportation. Secondly, man for man, even under the operation of free trade, the inhabitants of Britain beyond the seas consume an amount of British manufactures out of all proportion to the consumption of foreigners. Thirdly, the markets in important outlying parts of the British Empire are rapidly increasing, while alien markets are as rapidly diminishing. Fourthly, since protection seems to be the rule of all the large states, the advantage to Britain of trade with the colonies, on such lines as those laid down by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the case of Canada, is likely to be of great value in the future.

This rapid glance at the British colonial position may enable Americans to judge for themselves how far the policy of extension meets their own national wants. If America requires no penal settlements, exiles no religious or political refugees, does not hanker after military garrisons in isolated posts, and rejects the idea of collecting tribute from newly acquired possessions, the only reasons for the formation of American colonies are for an outlet for a surplus population, to enhance the position already occupied in the world by the United States, or to increase American trade. Every one knows that India and Egypt do not add to the strength of Britain. It is true that Lord Beaconsfield sent Indian troops to Malta, and Sikh regiments have repeatedly been sent to the Soudan or to Uganda. But India can never be denuded of troops, the garrison of 289,238 officers and men being barely sufficient to maintain the British Raj. Furthermore, the Indian Empire constantly entails upon Britain great anxiety in the field of foreign politics. Our difficulties with Russia are all traceable to our position in India. Whatever power holds India must either hold its own in Egypt, Persia, or China, or submit to a process of gradual but certain extinction.

Apart, therefore, from the glory, prestige, or reputation derived from mere territorial possession, the advantage which we get from the ownership of India is purely commercial. Heavy though the burden be, expulsion from India, or its abandonment, would mean the death-knell of the British Empire. A fatal blow to the purchasing power of India would be struck in the desperate conflict which would rage before we were defeated. Anarchy on a colossal scale would follow the retirement of Britain from India and Egypt. The material prosperity of the two countries would disappear. No bad times ever known in England would be even a pale reflection of what would ensue in Lancashire, Yorkshire, and the Midlands. Whole countries would be utterly ruined. The material importance of our connection with India necessitates instant readiness for war, enormous and increasing expenditure on armaments. The expenditure throughout the British Empire during the current year for naval and military forces alone is little short of $350,000,000. This expenditure is necessary, and, enormous though it be, is scarcely felt. It is the premium of insurance paid upon the trade which is essential to our existence, owing to our dependence on regions outside the British Isles.

The truth of the matter is that the idea of expansion is rarely thought out; certainly not in Great Britain. So long as the temperate places on the earth's surface were unoccupied there could be no question as to the wisdom of their settlement by people of the English-speaking race, but the old bad system of British colonization was an irrational jumble of two conflicting ideas. Before America became a nation the old colonial system claimed to rule the colonists because they were Englishmen and brothers, yet sought to rule them as if they were subjugated Indians—that is, as Germany and France rule their colonies to-day. While therefore it treated them as an inferior or a conquered people, it gave them so much liberty that they could easily rebel. This hybrid conception of colonial empire was responsible for England's delay in breaking off from the Spanish or Venetian conception of the true functions of a dependency. No one ever thought of inquiring whether Middlesex or Aberdeenshire rendered any sufficient return for the money laid out upon them, and until Canada, Australia, and the Cape became to us as Kent and Cornwall, no real tie united the various and widely separated parts of the British Empire.

In other words, the British Empire to-day is, spite of appearances, not merely held together by considerations of profit and loss, but by a bond analogous to that which unites the members of a family. To speak, therefore, of the "colonial possessions" of England is a misnomer. England has no colonies. She has not a square mile of territory in any temperate climate in the world to which she can send, as of right, her surplus population. It is because Spain has treated Cuba and Puerto Rico as possessions that she is losing them. In no sense can one English-speaking population be spoken of as the possession of another population of the same race. Some of the colonial premiers who were in England last year for the Queen's Jubilee were by no means reticent in expressing their dislike for the terms "colony" and "colonist." Sir Wilfrid Laurier claimed "nationhood" for Canada, and in so doing advanced the cause of imperial federation. The word "colony" or "colonial possession" is inapplicable to the daughter states of Britain, because at the bottom of it is the idea that a colony is an estate which has to be worked for the benefit of the mother-country. Since all the colonies of Spain were, in a certain sense, conquered dependencies, it is evident how the barbaric principle pervaded her colonial system, and how it lurked there, poisoning the happiness of men, until it died a violent death at the hand of President McKinley and his government.

Properly speaking, and certainly if we exclude India, the British Empire is not an empire at all. It is merely a nation so widely dispersed that before the age of the three-cylinder engine and cheap telegraphy the bonds of language, race, common law, and religious faith were practically cut by sheer distance. As soon as the obstacle of distance began to disappear by the advance of science, political union over vast areas began to be possible; and as Greater Britain has had eighty years' start over the Latins, the Teutons, and the Slavs, the British nation is not only a reality, but a far more robust reality than the conglomeration of Slavs, Turkomans, Poles, Germans, Finns, Armenians, Greeks, Buddhists, Mussulmans, Catholics, and Protestants which goes by the name of Russia.

If what is written above is correctly stated, it follows that the British Empire outside the British Islands consists of two parts: the one, the temperate regions, inhabited by English-speakers, which add both to the political strength and the material wealth of the nation; and the other, the tropical regions, which are a source of political weakness, and involve enormous outlay, but contribute to the wage fund, indispensable to a manufacturing nation dependent for food and necessaries grown in other lands. Since the destiny of the bulk of the temperate regions of the earth's surface has been in the hands of English-speaking people for a century or more, it is interesting to note that the future government of tropical or sub-tropical regions of the earth seems likely to fall into the same system of control. As Mr. Benjamin Kidd has pointed out in a remarkable contribution to the London Times, on the subject of the "Control of the Tropics," we are living in a period of new and higher standards of national duty in our relations to the tropics. If the United States pursues the path of extension, it seems likely that American experience of tropical control will be identical with that of this country. That experience may be briefly summed up as necessitating the creation of a high-minded, unselfish, incorruptible, and continuous civil service for the administration of the affairs of people of a different and lower race than that of their masters. Expansion, furthermore, involves anxious responsibilities in foreign politics; collision with ambitious powers; the adoption of the European principle of militarism; a standing army; a powerful navy; continual temptation to the policy of adventure, and the tendency towards constant expansion as the only alternative to national contraction and retreat.

Tropical expansion is a necessity of life to England, but it makes readiness for and organized victory in war the two conditions of existence. How far the United States will be satisfied with the policy of extension when it is discovered that the burdens entailed thereby are palpably out of all proportion greater than the material advantages to be derived, is a matter upon which the impartial historian of the future may probably have much to say. Every Englishman of weight with whom I have conversed on the matter, without exception, has expressed unfeigned delight at the prospect of American extension. This joy is the result not of altruistic affection, but of natural pleasure that the prospect of a collision in the Far East between the rulers of Siberia and of India is not likely to find the English unfriended and alone. The preparations of the universal world for a great killing were never more complete. Amity or Armageddon—which is the end?

Armageddon, notwithstanding the "open door" in China, is a necessity of existence. Millions of unborn English children will either live comfortably on the product of trade with the future inhabitants of the teeming Yang-tse Valley, or they will be compelled to drag on a joyless and hungry existence. If Britain were ousted from Persia and China, the present generation would immediately feel the blow, while its successor would be deprived of much of its sources of income; but since men will fight rather than famish, the certainty of a collision between Russia and England for the mastery of Asia does not hang on the opinions of ministers or the tastes of the monarch, but on the bread-and-butter question, which is the dominant factor in social problems. So far British policy has dismally failed in China, while, at the same time, it has scored signal successes in Egypt, and if Kitchener is successful in his September battle at Omdurman, a further triumph of British policy in Egypt will be recorded. The contrast is startling, but not difficult to explain. The Queen heartily approves of the Egyptian policy of advance, while her Majesty is apprehensive of the result of an adventurous policy in China. Both in Egypt and China the hand which guides British policy is the same; the rival influences to be encountered are the same; the difficulties to be overcome are identical; yet, while in Egypt the British are accustomed to look for success in their diplomacy, finance, and arms, we open our newspapers with the expectation of finding a new rebuff to British policy in the Far East with the morning chop, toast, and tea.

The only defence made by ministers for the humiliating failure of their policy in China is the record of a number of details in which England may be held to have profited. The speech in which Mr. George Curzon defended the government was torn to pieces in the course of an able and impartial survey of the situation by Sir Edward Grey, who filled the position of Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs under the last government. Sir Edward Grey has long been marked out for high office, and from the time I first heard him speak I have always believed that he would some day be Prime Minister of England. Mr. Gladstone once spoke in conversation of Sir Edward Grey as "a man who combined greater capacity and less inclination for public affairs" than any one he ever knew. Sir Edward Grey's summary of the situation in China is generally accepted as accurate. We are being gradually but most effectually squeezed out. The "open door" is shut in Manchuria. When Great Britain obtained the lease of Wei-hai-wei, the British government quite spontaneously disclaimed all right to construct railways in the territory behind that port. In the German sphere of influence, therefore, the door was slammed in his own face by Lord Salisbury himself. In the South the French are claiming exclusive privileges, which, if granted, will shut off Burmah precisely as Sierra Leone is closed in by the French Hinterland in West Africa. Worst of all, the Yang-tse Valley, which we were given to understand by the statements of ministers to be English, turns out to be less English than it is Russian or German. Matters are approaching a crisis, and although John Bull is ponderously slow to act, and most unwilling to bestir himself, there is no doubt whatever that the test case has now arisen in which either England or Russia must retreat. There is not the least danger of Russia fighting until her Siberian railway is complete, but if Count Muravieff and his bellicose entourage were ill advised enough to court a conflict, it would be far better for England that the struggle should take place at once than that it should be postponed until Russia has strengthened her fleet and completed her communications with the Far East. I am informed to-day that one wire to St. Petersburg has been monopolized by government for the last twenty-four hours.

The mysteries of the Hooley case which have followed the revelations of the fallen company-promoter have given rise to startling developments beyond all anticipation. Mr. Hooley is giving his evidence on oath, and has sworn that in the course of his transactions he has bought the city editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, a journal owned by Mr. W. W. Astor, and also dealt in other lesser luminaries of the financial world. The reputations of the Earl of Albemarle, of Earl Delawarr, and other company-directors of noble birth are in everybody's mouth. The examination takes place for a few hours on one day in the week. If Mr. Hooley is telling the truth, it is a pity that the whole truth is not brought out more rapidly. If he is not telling the truth, it is a gross injustice to the people whose reputations are aspersed that they are left powerless to rebut the reflections on their characters until some period of time in the dim and distant future. Probity in her public men is the sheet-anchor of Britain. The maintenance of a high standard in public life is essential not only to the welfare but to the existence of the British Empire. It is every one's interest to see that this standard is maintained and improved. The noble lords and other eminent personages who are compromised in the Hooley revelations will therefore be compelled to clear themselves or retire from public life. Upon the completeness of the process England will be justly judged by foreign opinion. France has had her Panama scandal, and is now wallowing in the mud of the Dreyfus business. She has not dared to probe either of these iniquities to the bottom. It is therefore the duty of honest men generally to bring to bear upon their rulers all the influence they can command for the purpose of preserving purity in public life. Parliamentary government is connected with the Hooley scandal, from the fact that several peers of Parliament are compromised. But the safeguards to English liberties, which are so intimately bound up with pure character in our legislators, have no worthier or more strenuous champions than the heads of the great houses whose names and traditions belong to England no less than to themselves and their families. The instinct of self-preservation will therefore move all thoughtful men to insist that public life shall be kept pure, and the black sheep in the high ranks be more, and not less, severely punished than middle-class or wage-earning offenders. In support of this view, Lord William Nevill, the scion of one of the proudest houses in the English peerage, was recently condemned to a term of imprisonment for fraud twice or thrice the length that would have been imposed on him if he had been a cheese-monger or a working-man.

ARNOLD WHITE.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

ENDING THE WAR—M. JULES CAMBON, THE FRENCH AMBASSADOR, SIGNING THE PEACE PROTOCOL ON BEHALF OF SPAIN.—Drawn by T. de Thulstrup.

Original from PENN STATE

NEWS FROM THE KLONDIKE.

LETTER AND ILLUSTRATIONS FROM TAPPAN ADNEY, SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."

LAKE BENNETT TO DAWSON.

AT the date we left Lake Bennett, the 9th day of October, we had no right to expect that a boat could reach Dawson before the closing of the river. We did not realize this truth then. The 7th had been clear, and we packed our stuff across from the foot of Lindeman. A large outfit also arrived on Indians' backs, over the Dyea trail, three days out. In contrast to this, nineteen mules and horses were sent back from Bennett to find an outfit delayed at some point unknown on the Skaguay trail. A number of boats got under way down the lake, which lies between lofty snow-capped mountains, a narrow passageway stretching into the distance as far as one can see. Eight or ten boats from Lindeman had been getting started to one with Skaguay outfits. Next day it rained, then turned into snow, in the midst of which we had to repitch the boat where the warm sun had lately melted the coating off.

On the 9th a gale is roaring down the gap, kicking up a great sea down the lake; but we ventured to start, not daring to wait longer. We rig the little spritsail; Brown tends sheet, while I take a big steering-oar in the stern. In a few moments we are among the white-caps, and the seas are boarding us, so we promptly run under the lee of a rocky point a mile from the starting-place. Half a dozen big boats with huge square sails go by us at railroad speed. We wait an hour or so, pick berries, which are very plentiful in patches among the rocks, and then push off again. We square away in great shape. There is so little freeboard amidships that if we should get in the trough of the sea we would swamp instantly. Our mast is tough pine, but when the wind snatches the rag of a sail it bends as if it would break.

Now begins the fight. The little sail, small though it is, begins to pull us to one side, and it takes all the strength of one pair of arms on a twelve-foot ash steering-oar to keep her head on. Now and then a big comber comes over the stern. In a few moments we have to bail out. There is not a cove or shelter in sight, and the sea keeps getting worse. Fresh water, being lighter, kicks up higher than salt, and we have every bit we want.

A little way on we pass a camp on shore where they are drying goods—a capsize, no doubt. Pretty soon, under the lee of little rocky capes, boats are drawn out on shore and parties are camped, driven in by the storm. The raw wind and the spray begin to make the fingers cold, but it is impossible to let go and put mittens on. We are overhauling the little boats, and pass three or four, but the big ones show us clean heels.

WHITE HORSE RAPIDS—LOOKING DOWN RIVER.

About twelve miles down, the lake narrows to about half a mile, and here the waves are terrific, and the cross-waves break over the tarpaulin covering the goods amidships. In the midst of it all the mast goes overboard with a snap. Brown gathers in the sail, and still scudding, we drop in behind a point fortunately close at hand. Here we are able to get a new and larger mast. One of the boats we had passed follows us in. It contains a New York party of two. When we start again they will not follow, on account of their heavy boat-load.

At evening we run into a little cove opposite the west arm of Bennett, with a smooth sandy beach, where there are other boats. A few minutes later a big Peterboro canoe containing two men in yellow mackinaws runs in under a small sail. It is the United States mail for Circle City. Around the camp fire that night eager questions are plied these two men to know just what is going on at Dawson; for they had left Dawson only thirty-odd days before!

The boats had not got up when they left, and flour was six dollars a sack.

"Would there be starvation?"

We get this reply, spoken slowly and deliberately: "I have been eleven years in Alaska, and there hasn't been a year yet when everybody wasn't going to starve, but no one has starved yet."

"How cold is it?"

"Cold, but not so cold but that a man can stand it. I spent one winter in a tent."

All of which is comforting. The mail-carriers put up no tent, but lie down on a tarpaulin, with one over them, and are off at daylight. They have oars rigged to the canoe, and expect to reach Dawson in six or seven days.

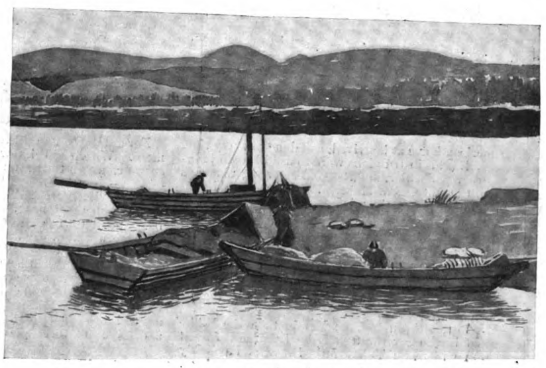
We ourselves get under way not long after. The wind has moderated, but a heavy sea is still on. The lake is wide now, and we run along easily; we pass one boat that had got out ahead of us, and are making every inch of the little sail pull in order to overtake another. The lines of the bateau give it a tremendous advantage over the clumsy whipsawed boats built at the lakes.

We are running along about a quarter of a mile from the right-hand bank, which rises high and steep into the clouds, when we see a tent pitched on the shelving beach, with blankets and goods spread out in the sun. There are a black dog and a man, and a smallish boat drawn up on the shore. As we draw near, the man runs down to the edge of the water and fires off a gun, and then gets into the boat. We run in closer; and as we draw near, the man comes out, rowing frantically, and when we get near enough he calls out:

"Brown! Brown!"

We put the bateau around, bow into the wind, and wait. When he gets within fifty yards we can see that he is much excited.

"My partners!" says he; "I haven't seen them—it was blowing too hard—and Pete went to take it out—and fell overboard—and McManus went after him!"



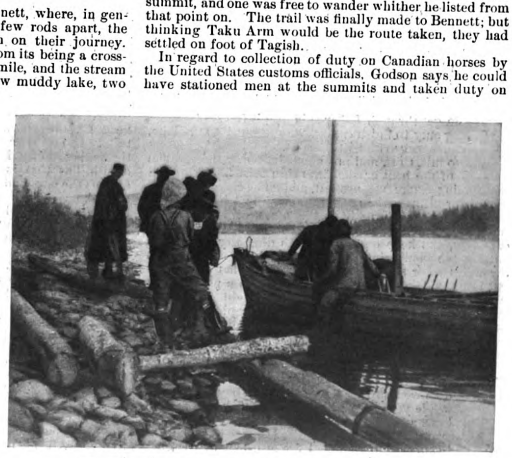
It is John, a Russian from San Francisco, who, with another Russian and poor McManus, had worked so hard on the trail. We had seen them all often, but did not know their full names. We gather bit by bit from his incoherent talk that their sail had been nailed fast. The yard would not lower, and in trying to unstep the mast during the hard blow of two days before, Pete had been carried overboard, and McManus had gone into the icy water to rescue him. It was nearly or quite dark at the time of this accident, and they were never seen again.

How the Russian managed to get ashore is a wonder. He had stopped several parties. They had advised him to go home, but he is anxious to get to Dawson. He offers Brown half the outfit to leave me and go with him. Brown refuses. The outfit consists of 3500 pounds of grub, and there are valuable furs and clothing. Finally, being able to do him no good, we turn on down the lake, and last see him awkwardly trying to row his ungainly craft ashore. He reported at the Canadian custom-house later, and it was rumored, though with what truth we cannot determine, that in the endeavor to get down in the ice he had frozen his hands and feet.

By noon we are at the foot of Bennett, where, in gentler currents, between low banks a few rods apart, the green waters of the lake start again on their journey. This is Caribou Crossing, so called from its being a crossing-place for the caribou. About a mile, and the stream turns to the right into a very shallow muddy lake, two or three miles long, called Lake Nares, and then through another thoroughfare into Tagish Lake.

Tagish Lake is the name given to what is almost a group of lakes, or long arms, deep-set amid high mountains. The scenery in these lakes is magnificent. The wind, what there is, is now dead ahead. We put a trolling-line out, while Brown takes the oars. As we approach the junction of Windy Arm, which enters Tagish from the southward, we expect a blow, and a battle with the cross-seas, that are said never to be absent. Extraordinary fortune is with us, for we row across the mouth of Windy Arm as on a looking-glass, in which the tall hills are doubled.

There is a tug at the trolling-line—a large salmon-trout, such as is used on Vancouver Island—and when we pull it in we have a fine large trout, in length about twenty inches, belly milk white, sides a drab gray, with large irregular, often triangular, spots of light; pectoral fins steel blue, ventrals tipped with light yellow—a strikingly handsome fish. We only hook this one, but get several bites. Where we camp that night, with several other boats, near the end of the lake, past the Taku Arm, one party had caught seven trout, weighing two or three pounds apiece. My own trout had a six-inch white-fish inside of it.



BOAT IN EDDY BELOW WHITE HORSE RAPIDS.

We are later than the others breaking camp next morning. We not only have a faculty for late rising, but have to reload the whole outfit on account of the leaking. All the boats are leaking badly. But our boat runs so easily that when we have what Brown facetiously terms a good "ash breeze" we can overtake and pass them all. The other boats are clumsy, and though they have often four oars to a boat, the oars are so heavy that they can only take short dips, and with a head-wind make no headway whatever. The lower end of the lake is full of ducks on their southward migration—hundreds of them. Having only a rifle, we miss a good opportunity. However, by a lucky shot, one drops while on the wing, to the little 30-30. We pass all the five boats we were with last night. The lake suddenly narrows, and we find ourselves in a slack current, and drifting about two miles, with flock after flock of ducks getting up.

We can see ahead, against a bank of evergreen on the right, the red flag of Britain and some tents, and make landing in shallow water at the Canadian customs office. We make camp, and before dark the others drop in and camp. There is a squad of Northwestern Mounted Police here, under Inspector Strickland, who is also postmaster. There are, besides, John Godson, the customs officer, and several assistants. The police are building a large log barracks, and the scene reminds one of the timber woods of the East; for we have reached a region of small but plentiful timber and varied animal life. The timber grows littler as one goes down river; elevation affects growth more than latitude. It is a pretty spot they have chosen, commanding a view of the river both ways. The police have taken some huge white-fish in a weir. They caught on a troll one nineteen-and-a-half-pound trout at the outlet of Tagish. They tell me that a twenty-five-pounder has been taken on Touchi (or Too-tschai) Lake.

Mr. Godson explains why they have selected a point so far from the end of the trail. The first exploration party had come over the Skaguay Trail, had proceeded down Shallow Lake, thence over to Touchi, and down to Taku Arm. This they supposed to be the end of the trail. It happened, indeed, that there was no trail at all over the summit, and one was free to wander whither he listed from that point on. The trail was finally made to Bennett; but thinking Taku Arm would be the route taken, they had settled on foot of Tagish.

In regard to collection of duty on Canadian horses by the United States customs officials, Godson says he could have stationed men at the summits and taken duty on

TRADING WITH INDIANS AT LITTLE SALMON RIVER.

NOTE.—This letter was delayed in transmission, and reached us after our receipt of the letter published in the WEEKLY of July 9. It takes up the story of Mr. Adney's trip from Lake Bennett to DAWSON.—EDITOR.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

LANDING AT CUSTOM-HOUSE, TAGISH.

every American horse as it arrived, and done so every time it arrived. But his instructions were to use his own judgment in every particular, and, beyond asserting Canada's right to collect duty, as at Montreal or Victoria, to inflict no needless hardship on the miners. Having this in mind, he knows that many coming through are short of money, and it is his intention only to make those pay who can pay. Godson goes around in the evening by the light of the camp fires and takes the inventories of all Americans with dutiable goods, in order not to delay them in the morning.

An old-timer, familiar with the river, tells us all that he doubts if we will get through.

"You will get through Lake Marsh, then the White Horse; and if you get through Lake Labarge before it freezes, you will make Thirty Mile River, and possibly Pelly River; and if you get that far you may get down with the mush ice."

What is the mush ice?

He urges us all to "hurry! hurry!" So do all the officers — to start to-night if possible, before the wind changes. The other boys, therefore, after some discussion, get their stuff aboard and start at midnight. We wait, however, until afternoon the next day, in the hope that Burnham and his flotilla of canoes may turn up, and then we too get under way. We think a good deal over what Inspector Strickland tells us—that on the 13th of October for the past three years the Klondike was frozen tight. It is now the 12th.

Marsh Lake, at whose head we virtually are now, is about nineteen miles long, narrow, like the rest, and shallow. The sky is clear, and we row on until dark sets in. It grows cold, and we have to bundle up to keep warm, except the one who rows. About nine o'clock we put inshore, and find the shore ice out twenty feet; but we discover a place where there is dry land, build a big camp fire, and cook supper. The shore ice, as it rises and falls in the gently undulating surface of the water, creaks and cries for all the world like a hundred frogs in springtime, and it is indeed a dismal sound that bodes us no good.

CUSTOM-HOUSE AT TAGISH.

"If you get through Labarge before it freezes!"

Waiting only to finish eating, we put out into the lake, whose shores we can dimly make out. We head for a point about two miles off, and are about half-way there, when the bow of the boat crashes into thin ice. Thinking we are running ashore, we turn out, and come clear of the ice. Judge our dismay when again we crash into ice! We cut through this, and turn still further out, until we are crosswise of the lake. Again we strike into ice. I am at the oars now, and keep on pulling with difficulty, each time cutting the blades into the ice for a hold, and we pass through two or three distinct belts of ice that extend far out into the lake. We are now almost in a panic, for it seems as if the outlet must be frozen up tight. When we get to clear water we head north again, keeping out from the shore, and towards morning we land and spread our blankets on the ground among some small spruces on a low bank. There are several inches of snow on the ground. After a short nap we start again, at an early hour. There are no other boats in sight. It is not a great way to the outlet, which we know by the current that begins to carry us along while yet well within the lake, and we are soon floating down a black stream several hundred feet across, with low wooded banks.

An odd thing occurs here. I fire at a teal that is hugging the shore, and miss. I fire again as it rises up stream, and the bullet drops back of it. By this time it has gone thirty feet, and the third bullet also falls back of it. The fourth knocks it into the water, and as the feathers float down, a mink runs out and attempts to get it. I go ashore, and find nothing but feathers—the effect of the soft-nosed bullet. Chancing to look backward, I see the mink on its haunches, looking and smelling. A shot under the chin gets him too.

Snow is on the ground everywhere. The current is easy, the river winding about among banks of sand some two hundred feet high. Along these are the holes of countless thousands of swallows, which, as Schwatka writes, are a notable feature of the river when they are back at their nesting-sites in summer.

For a day we go on thus, the river winding more and more. We do not know how far the canyon is away, so we camp on the ground under a big spruce two feet in diameter; awake wet with soft snow, and after an hour's run in swift current, during which we pass a fine boat smashed on a rock in mid-stream, we hear a shout, and see boats lined up in a large eddy on the right hand, below which is a wall of dark rock and an insignificant opening, which we are persuaded is the entrance to the canyon. The shout warns us that we will be into the canyon if we don't look out, so we pull into the eddy. These are some of the boats which left us at Tagish, and some new ones. They are taking in the situation, and most of them are unloading part of their goods and packing it around, a distance of three-quarters of a mile. We go up the trail to a spot where we can stand on the brink of the canyon and look directly down into its seething waters.

FIVE-FINGER RAPIDS.

It is about a hundred feet wide and fifty or sixty feet deep, the whole body of the Lewes River pouring at a high rate of speed between the steep perpendicular walls of the gorge. The rock is basaltic, and takes the original formation that is familiar to those who have seen pictures of the famous Fingal's Cave. Half-way down the canyon widens, and there is a large eddy which the boats are told to avoid by keeping the crest of the waves, and then continuing as before. A boat starts in as we are looking, manned by two men at the oars, and with a bow and a stern steering-oar.

After our trip through Lake Bennett in the storm we feel pretty sure of our boat, so we conclude not to carry any of our stuff around. We tuck the tarpaulin down close and make everything snug, and when Brown has seated himself at the oar, and said "All ready," we push off and head for the gateway. I think I notice a slight tightening of Brown's mouth, but that is all, as he dips the oars and begins to make the long stroke; but he might retaliate by saying some unkind thing of me at this time. As soon as we are at the very brink we know it is too late to turn back, so when we drop down the first pitch I head her for the very seething crest. At the first leap she takes into the soapsuds the spray flies several feet off the flaring sides, and we know then we shall ride it. A dozen or two huge lunges and we land in the crest of the wave and send the water flying. All at once — it must be we are not exactly in the middle—the boat's nose catches in an eddy and we are swung around, head up stream. It is a simple matter to turn her nose again into the torrent, and then we go on again, leaping and jumping with terrific force. Brown, who manages the oars splendidly, keeps dipping them, and in a few moments we emerge from between the narrow walls into an open basin.

There are a number of boats here too, but we have nothing to stop for, so we keep on; but suddenly remembering that the White Horse Rapids is only one and a half miles below the canyon, we drop ashore above what is called Squaw Rapids. There are at least two dozen boats in all ashore. The White Horse is just beyond the turn where the river goes to the left along the steep hill. It will be necessary to cross to the other side. We start again into the quick water, and then, cutting across a low bar at the head of the White Horse, make a landing on a low point, from which goods are carried around below these very dangerous rapids.

A view of the rapids is the first thing to be had. The river has made a quick bend to the left, and then turning to the right, goes down through basaltic walls twenty to thirty feet high and several times the width of the canyon. Lashing itself into a purple fury, it narrows into a gorge a span wide, when, with a jumping and tossing, it bursts through, and then spreads out serene, once more the wide, generous river. From a vantage-point we can see it all, the foaming crest of the final and worst pitch half a mile away. A boat is just going through, and we watch it until it emerges into the quiet water and makes a landing.

IN CARIBOU CROSSING.

We resolve to take out part of our cargo here, so as to give us more freeboard, but undertake to drop below into a sort of eddy at the very brink of the rapids, so as to have a shorter carry. I get into the boat, while Brown drops it down with the painter. We have to go outside a reef of rock thirty feet off shore, and when we are out there the rope pulls out of Brown's hands, leaving me and the loaded boat in the fast water. I quarter the boat inshore, and then, by the hardest sort of paddling, the current swings the boat in, until I can get out into the water and take it ashore. We have taken only an inch of water in the canoe. It is an exceedingly close call.

We put all our personal baggage ashore, leaving an even thousand pounds in the boat, which gives us six inches or more of freeboard, and then turn her nose into the current.

Following the roughest water, to avoid the rocks, we are pitched into the dancing waves. The waves grow bigger, and we begin to pitch worse by far than in the canyon. We go up the sides of the waves, and when we drop it seems positively as if boat and all would keep right on through to the bottom of the river. The water begins to pour in, and it is plain that the boat will never live through. But one thought for a moment comes to comfort us: even if we are chock full of water, the fearful impetus with which we are moving must surely take us bodily through and out, and then—we can make the shore somehow. I begin to count the seconds we will be going through that last and worst part into which we are now driving.

Forced from both sides, the river enters the gorge; and the effect to the eye, as one goes into the great white-caps, is that of a jumping, not only up and down, but from the sides to the middle.

PAYING CUSTOMS DUTIES.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Now we are into the waves. From all sides and ends a sheet of water pours over, drenching Brown and filling the boat; the same instant, it seems, a big side-wave takes the little craft, spins her like a top, quick as a wink, throws her into a boiling eddy on the left—and we are through and safe, with a little more work to get ashore.

Men who were watching us from the bank said that we disappeared from sight in the trough. Brown is wet up to his waist. Everything is afloat. We land here, and when we have bailed out some of the water, drop the boat down to the usual landing-place, a little sandy cove, where we unload, pitch tent, and while tripping back for our five hundred pounds of goods, watch the other boats come through. They are all big ones, and all get through without mishap.

We hear of pilots, both here and at the canyon, but every man takes his own boat through. The pilots take boats through the canyon for from ten to twenty dollars, and through the White Horse for twenty dollars. Two partners stopped two weeks earlier in the season and made enough to buy in on a claim on Bonanza. Those who unload have the worst of it. The heavy boats go through best. The double-ender swings so easily that it is hard to steer, and is rather small for the business.

The White Horse is a bit of water I have considerable respect for. I ask the imperturbable Brown how he felt—if he was scared.

"Why, no," he replies. "You said it was all right; I suppose you know—it's your boat and your outfit."

The compliment is altogether too extravagant. I believe that if a charge of dynamite were to explode under Brown, he would not wink an eyelash. Many say they took more water aboard in the canyon than in the White Horse, while Squaw Rapids is worse than the canyon. There is a dog in Dawson that swam the canyon. He probably tried to follow his master's boat, instead of walking around. He is a water-spaniel, though; but he must have had more ups and downs than he dreamed of when he started in the quiet water above.

There have been no drownings in the White Horse so far as known this year, and nearly every boat was run through. The trail around the rapids is lined with trees blazed and inscribed with the heroic deeds of those gone before. They are written on trees, on scraps of paper tacked on broken oar-blades, etc. Here is one: "Sept. 8, 1897. Boat Cora and Meda. 20 ft long. 8 ft 3 in beam. 26 in deep. safely shot the White Horse Rapids loaded with 4000 pounds." And this:

> Gudmond Jensen
> G. G. Tripp
> Tom
> Mike went > threw all right.

It is a great load off our minds when we are at last safely through. We care not how swift the river runs now; there is only Five Fingers, a long way off yet.

Another day brings us at dark to the head of Lake Labarge, up which a wind is blowing, with a big head-sea. Lights show up at a place on the left, and we steer towards this. It is totally dark when we get there, but when close inshore we run into fish-weirs, and hear the laughter and crying of children and the barking of dogs, and then we know that it is an Indian village, so we turn up shore, and after a mile, off around a turn, land on a beach by a huge pile of drift-wood. Attracted by our big fire, two or three other boats drop in, and we have a merry time. In an hour four Indians come over with furs to sell or trade for sugar. These Indians are Tinné. They hunt moose, mountain-sheep, bears, and fur-bearing animals. After hanging around awhile they go away. I should not care to leave a boat-load of provisions in the neighborhood of these Siwashes. Experiences later with the same breed down-river justify the precautions we take.

Lake Labarge, named for Labarge, one of the explorers for the long-ago projected Russo-American telegraph line, is about thirty miles in length, and it is rare that a strong wind is not blowing there, so fiercely that the miners are often delayed, as at Windy Arm. It is as smooth as glass next morning. The shores are of moderate height, of a diversified rounded form of gray stone. Seen as we see it, it is a most picturesque body of water, and very clear. As we near the end a wind catches us, and as there is no shelter we have to keep on in the darkness. For several hours we see friendly beacons, and when we get to them we find a camp of friends who had left several days ahead of us. Next morning finds us near the outlet of the lake, and a short pull brings us in to Thirty Mile River, as the Lewes is known until it joins the Teslintoo, or Hootalinqua of the miners. The latter stream follows the structural valley of the river. The Lewes has a much smaller sectional arc, but discharges more water. The Teslintoo is the larger, and the true source of the Yukon. Schwatka is responsible for the prevailing notion that Lindeman is the source of the Yukon, because he stated that, starting at Lindeman, he had followed the Yukon "to its mouth." The Lewes breaks through a barrier of hills at right angles. Looking up river, any one would say the Teslintoo was the main river. The country seems different. The water, no longer clear, is tinged with the mud of the latter river. White birches now appear.

MAKING A LANDING BELOW WHITE HORSE RAPIDS.

Big Salmon, Little Salmon, are successively passed, the latter 285 miles from Dyea. We take no account of this. Our chief diversion is in seeing how quick we can overtake a boat when once we get a sight of it, and also in keeping up with a certain other boat, whose occupants cook on board, rise earlier, and go into camp later than we do. There is now about eight inches of snow, and we have to scrape a hole and line it well with boughs when we camp.

A very short way below the Little Salmon we see (and it should be observed that we hear at the same time) a number of people beckoning and signalling from the shore. We stop at a platform of hewn boards built out in the water, and are at once surrounded by a horde of dirty, uncouth, wild-looking savages, of all sizes and shapes, each with something to trade. They want to buy everything in sight. We have left some things uncovered; they seize on these things, and shove into our faces a dirty fur cap or a moose-hide or a bear-skin. I haven't the smallest notion what they want with my camera. I have to push them off my end of the boat, but they hang on front, back, and sides, pulling and tugging to draw attention to their wares. I have never seen such fierce trading in my life. We know nothing like it in civilized life. A person could keep himself warm at 60 degrees below, trading as they do. I try to get away, but Brown has opened up some tobacco he had, so into an inside channel, and have to wade out and tow up and around. When at length we reach the mouth of the Pelly River, it looks as if we shall reach Dawson. We have been cautioned about Pelly. On the left, below the mouth of Pelly, are an Indian village, a mission, and the house and store of Mr. Harper. We land here to camp. The camping-place is really several miles below; but Mr. Pitts, the storekeeper in charge, will have nothing of the kind. He puts us into one of Mr. Harper's houses, with a stove, and a good dry floor to lie on, and his own kerosene-lamp, all of them luxuries. He treats us handsomely, as well as giving us the first authentic information of the country to which we are going.

CHARACTERISTIC VIEW ON YUKON RIVER.

We relate our experience with the Indians at Little Salmon. He tells us that those on the Yukon proper are different altogether; they are honest, and in a degree virtuous, whereas those further up river have been mistreated so long by the Chilkats that whenever opportunity offers they treat others the same way.

There is nothing left of the old Hudson Bay Fort, burned down in that raid of the Chilkats in 1852. The post, supplied at great cost and hazard viâ Upper Pelly and the Liard River, was never re-established. The spot is still called Fort Selkirk.

In the store there are a dozen silver-gray fox-skins and one black fox, which in this country are more plentiful than anywhere else in comparison with the red fox, of which they are varieties. Formerly one could buy snow-shoes and fur robes here, but this year the rush has cleaned out all but a few moose-hides, some of which Mr. Pitts is for sending to Dawson by us; but he does not, fearing we may not get there. The thermometer registers two above zero at seven o'clock in the morning.

What do we see when we look out?

On the far side of the river, a procession of blocks of something white—the mush, or slush, ice!

It is coming out of Pelly. We take the left side of the river, where it is clear, and at night find a good camping-place. The timber seems to grow better and better on the flats and islands. The nights and days are cold.

The first night out from Pelly we make the boat fast on the side free from ice. The bank here is about twelve feet high, and the tent is several yards back. We are lying before an open fire, about to go to sleep. The air is still, and we can hear the ominous "s-s-sh" of the ice in the river.

Suddenly there is a dull prolonged roar under the bank. I jump up, and down the bank, in time to see a floe forty feet long go by, having scraped the entire length of the boat; and the river is full of floes, large and small, rushing and grinding against one another. Calling for Brown, it is but a few moments' work to unload the boat and haul it out. Next morning the whole river is full of ice, rushing along like a mill-race. This is the mush ice—ice formed on the bottom, soft and slushy. It hardens into floes, and floe freezes to floe to make larger ones.

We put out into the ice, getting into the current, keeping barely clear with the paddles, and whenever a lead opens up we make the most of it with the oars, and soon find that by reason of her double end we can work her about where we choose. There is no stopping at noon now; we eat a bite of cold beans and hardtack. After noon we come upon six boats ranged on the shore of a wooded island. It seems time to land, which we do at considerable risk, for the ice is setting hard against the shore.

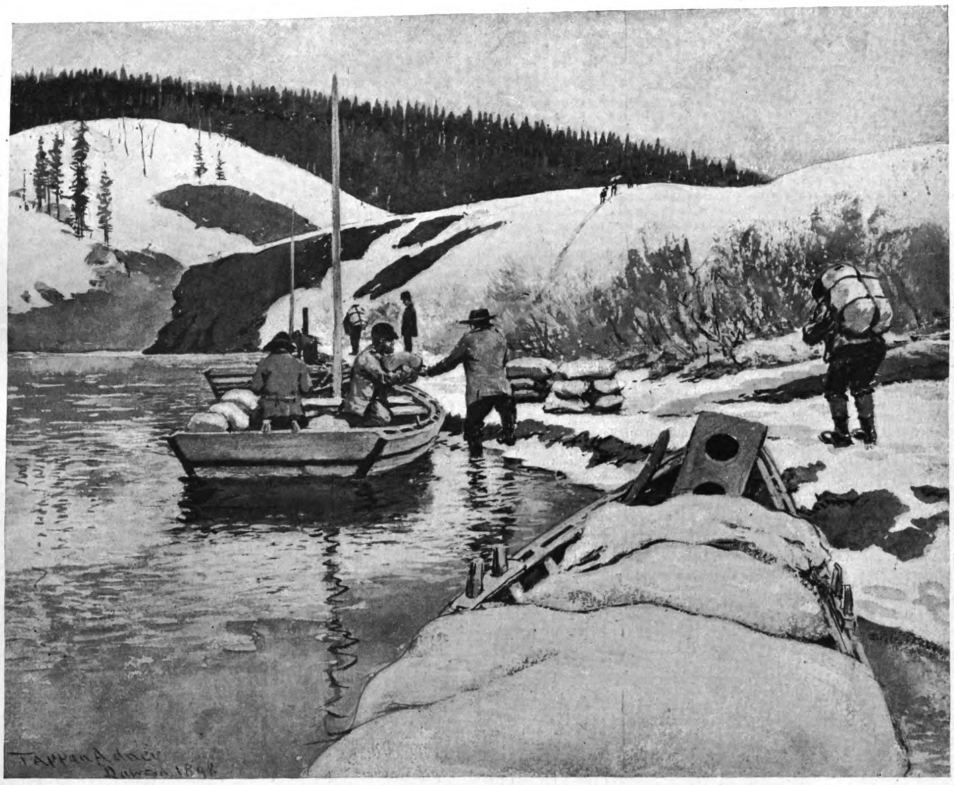
Around a camp fire in the woods are about twenty men, some of them friends who had left a week ahead of us. They are prepared to stay, they said, until the ice runs out. I tell them that they will wait till spring; that I am going on. It is a sore temptation to stop by their cheerful fire, but I reason that the camp fire is an accidental circumstance; had the boats not been there I should have kept on. So we do. None of them followed for three or four days, when they saw other boats passing, and realized their folly. Some of the men were eager to start, but in nearly every boat was some nervous partner. That night we find a safe camping-place in an eddy free of ice, and cut a channel for the boat into the ice, which now extends a number of feet from shore.

Camp-making is now reduced to the simplest method. At first we would carefully pitch the wall-tent. Now all we do is to take the two oars and three pine poles, tie the ends together tight and fast with a rope, walk around them with the tent, and build an open fire in front. Often we dispense with the tent entirely. Bread, salt, and beans

THE MAIN CHANNEL—FIVE FINGER RAPIDS.

Five Finger Rapids, 344 miles from Dyea, is reached in company with a small fleet of boats. We are all distinctly apprehensive, not knowing whether we are five or fifty miles from the rapids. When they come into view, the row of huge square blocks of rock standing like the piers of a bridge across the stream, they are unmistakable.

We run our boat into the eddy above the right-hand entrance, while the other boats line down from above. There is a short sudden drop and a nasty upward swirl, it is true, but nothing to care about, so we shoot in, all the rest, I suppose, following. We take a little water, and then enter a series of rapids, which shortly brings us to another object of apprehension, Rink Rapids. There is nothing here but a reef, with good easy current on the right hand. Just below, a great congregation of ravens indicates where the cattle have been driven in and butchered and rafted down.

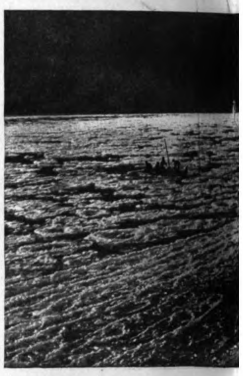


The river is full of islands, and it is the hardest sort of work keeping off the bars. More than once we get we are in for it. There are about twenty aboard our little boat. I buy a pair of fur-trimmed mittens; and then, with astonishing finesse, the fellow tries to beat me out of the mittens, pretending he has given them to me. So I get out on the platform, take him by the arm, and forcibly extract the two silver dollars from his fist. While this is going on another boat stops, and shortly there is a hubbub; the Indians run up, and a crowd rushes down from the village on the bank beyond. I ask the trouble.

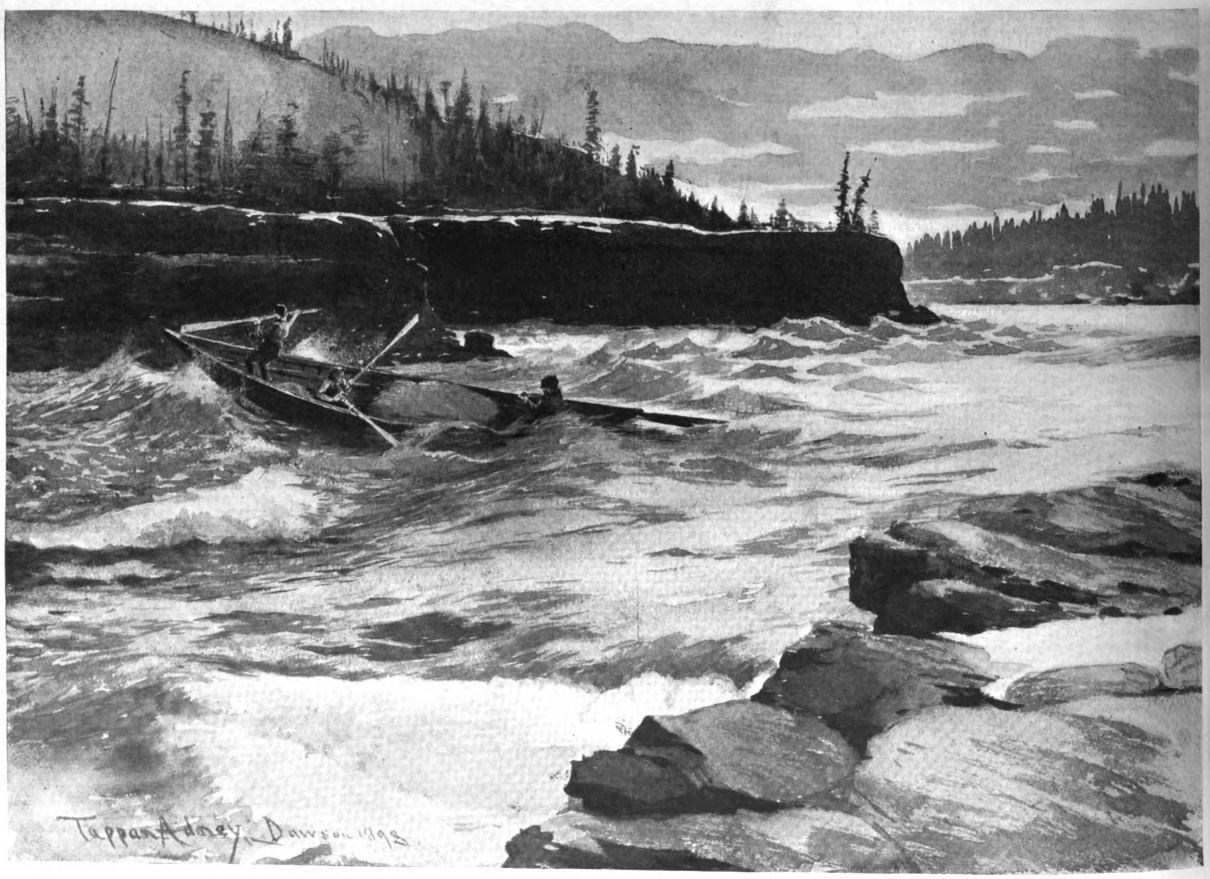
"Just Injun talk," an Indian replies.

That night I learn the cause. An Indian had showed a watch, and had himself dropped it and broken the crystal. With great wit, he handed it to one of the white boys, and then raising the cry that they had broken it, demanded $5. The boys not having arms handy, and the Indian having two shot-guns, they paid the five dollars.

As we are leaving, the Indian who had tried to cheat me comes running to the boat, tosses the lost mittens aboard, and I give him the money. But on taking stock I find myself out a pair of scissors, a box of tobacco, and a candle.



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



PORTAGING GOODS AT THE CANYON.

KLONDIKE CITY—KLONDIKE RI

THE YUKON AT DAWSON IN RUNNING THE WHITE HORSE RAPIDS.

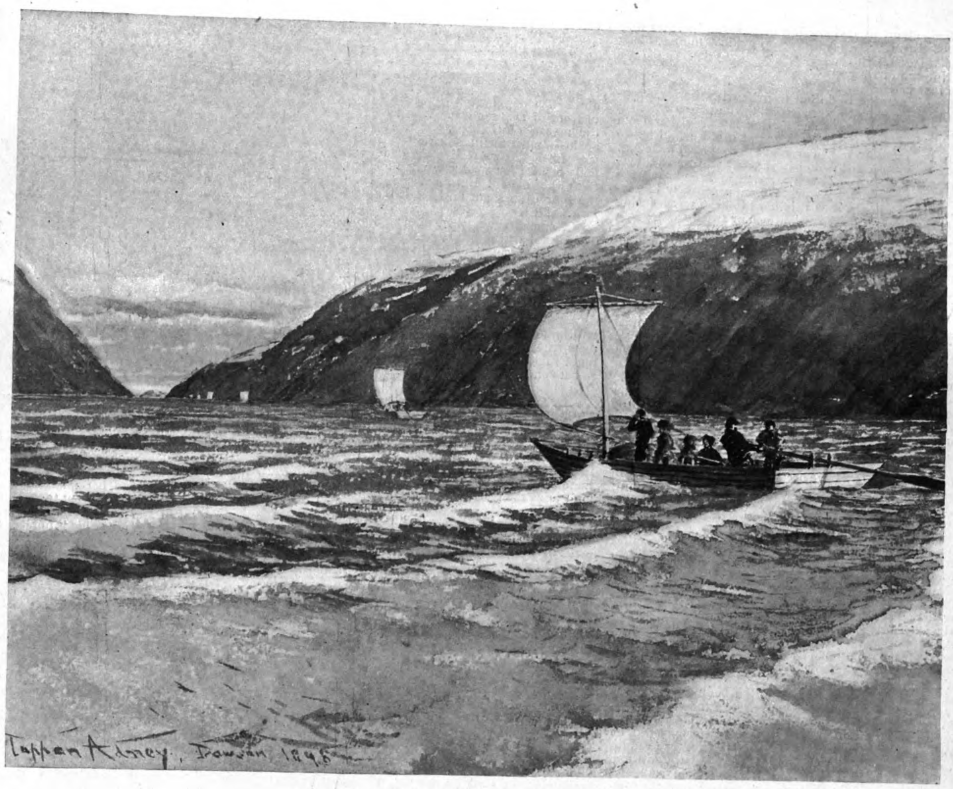
SCENES ON THE ROAD

PHOTOGRAPHS AND SKETCHES BY TAPPAN ADNEY, SPECIAL COR



Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

KLONDIKE CITY—RIVER ENTERS ON RIGHT.

THE YUKON AT DAWSON—THE EARLY WINTER.

SAILING DOWN LAKE BENNETT.

DOG-TRAINS LEAVING DAWSON FOR DYEA.

ES ON THE PAN ADNEY, SO

TO THE KLONDIKE.

ESPONDENT OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY" IN THE GOLD-FIELDS.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google are frozen hard as rocks. We meet several parties with hand-sleds and canoes working up against the ice, along the shore, going out.

"No grub in Dawson."

So that is the truth!

There is nothing to do but to drift with the ice, keeping the channel and opens, avoiding the places where it sets against the shore. The thermometer registers from 10 to 5 degrees above zero. Even at this we find six to ten feet of thick ice frozen around the boat each morning, and our first task is to chop it out, but still much sticks to the sides, the water near by freezes, and the boat sinks lower and lower in the water. We are practically in winter clothes, and even then it is hard to keep warm facing a wind in the cold. We get fifteen or twenty miles in a day. Nervousness is disappearing. We no longer mind the crunching and punching of the floes. There is nearly always a boat in sight now.

When about twenty miles, we judge, above White River, which we look for on the left, and which we expect will put a lot more ice into the Yukon, we see a boat on the right-hand shore—a large boat with a stove cooking. As we draw near, it proves to be a party known as the "Christie" party, from the Skaguay trail. They have a Japanese cook and two ladies aboard. The Indians on Lake Labarge would not believe the Jap was not an Indian. "You Injun?" "No!" "You mamma Injun?" "No!" "You papa Injun?" "No! no!" protested the Jap; "me odder country."

With the Christie party is the New York Times correspondent, Pelletier. They are eating lunch, and at the same time trying to fend off the floes. They have been having trouble all the way down. They have only just come off an island where they have been three days. After this we keep them company, with this difference, that they hug the shore, while we keep out. It was easy for them to step out, but the boat is in imminent risk of being crushed by the heavy ice.

We pass White River without knowing it, and ten miles on we come to a straight reach, where on the right are thirty or forty boats drawn out on the ice, and tents set up, and cabins.

This is Stewart River. It seems as if every one is stopping here, except some who cannot get through the ice in time. They have stopped either to remain and prospect, or from fear of ice, and also to hear whether it is safe to take their outfits to Dawson. Wild stories are coming up river, and we know not what to expect.

We go on at noon the next day. One thing the ice does. It piles up on the heads of the bars, and now it is easy to avoid them, and to see the set of the water. We keep to the right-hand channel, among the many islands. Several miles below Stewart a bar, with ice as usual piled up on the head of it, looms up. For our lives we cannot see, even by standing up, which way the water runs. While hesitating, we are borne directly on the island, and when we try to avoid that, we are carried directly towards the great mass of ice. Only one thing saves us: a floe happens to be between us when we strike. It crushes, and we slip along the side and slide out into deep water. Nothing else under heaven could have kept us from going under the ice.

We make shore quickly after this, by a big pile of drift-wood, and have hardly got our tent up and a place chopped for the boat when another boat heaves in sight, and calls to us to take a line. It is the Christie party, and they have met with an accident.

NEARING DAWSON.

Hugging the shore, as usual, they had run upon some sweepers hanging over the water. All hands jumped for the bottom. The boat was stern down stream when it struck. The sweeper caught the steering-sweep and swept the boat clear, stove-pipe and all. Christie had failed to find a point of safety, and had been doubled up and nearly killed.

We take their line, and they camp with us. After that, at last, that boat keeps clear of the shore.

Navigation is getting more difficult; the channels are growing so narrow that a boat can hardly go through. We can only drift and keep the sides of the boat clear. We have been told to keep to the right from Sixty Mile Creek down. On that side we can see scores of parties going out with sleds. By this time we have discovered one thing—that we are better off taking nobody's advice about camping-places, so we have taken the other side, and do not know how near Dawson we are.

On the 29th of October, judging ourselves to be about ten miles away, we make camp and set about fixing up a sled, stay there two days, then start once more. When we have the covers nicely tucked around for a big trip we turn suddenly to the left, and see on the right bank ahead a large number of tents, houses, and boats, some of them in the water, others drawn out.

"How far to Dawson?" we ask.

"This is Dawson," is the reply; "you'd better hurry, or you'll be carried past."

We make a landing in good order, and tie fast to the shore. We are not yet in Dawson proper. This is but a suburb, on the site of the old Indian village, and known as Klondike City, or Lousetown.

Four days later the river jammed, then it moved on again, and closed for good on the 7th of November. It had closed in front of Dawson on about the 15th of the month of October, but had broken again—a most fortunate circumstance for us. Little did we realize the danger we had been in, for we knew not then how the Yukon closed. Burnham's party, with the four canoes, got no farther than Selkirk. Major Walsh's party lost three boats, one after another, under the ice. The last parties to reach Dawson had miraculous escapes, which have been detailed before. Yet there was only one death in the ice, so far as is known. When it is remembered how through the length of the upper river there were hundreds taking the greatest chances, first with water, then with ice, it would almost seem true, as has been said, that a guarding Providence watched over the newcomers on the Yukon this year.

MINERS LEAVING DAWSON BECAUSE OF FOOD SHORTAGE.

HOW ADNEY GOT THROUGH.

The "man leading the horses," mentioned by Tappan Adney in one of his late letters (June 4, 1898) from Dawson, has a vivid recollection of the chance meeting referred to, at the foot of Lake Lindeman, where the Skaguay trail of agony and mud joins the original thoroughfare to the gold-fields, viâ Chilkoot Pass.

As I came down the sandy hill-side to the lake, I saw at the landing two men unloading a trim-looking double-ender boat of distinct individuality that it needed only a glance to show was vastly superior to the ordinary Yukon type. One of the men was a slender six-footer, with a face wind-tanned the color of sole-leather.

He wore weather-stained clothes, that, judging from the general suggestion, no doubt still carried a little of the smoky smell and balsam aroma from camps in the green woods of New Brunswick. His feet were moccasined, and his black hair straggled from under a red toboggan cap. Not only was his rig suggestive of the aborigine, but his every action proved him to be so thoroughly at home in his untamed environment that it is little wonder at first glance I took him to be an Indian, and that it required several minutes after his jolly smile and voluble greeting to dispel the illusion.

Adney was a hustler of the most advanced type. Though just recovering from an attack of the prevailing malady of the trail, he carried across the portage packs weighing as much as 125 pounds that evening and the following day, and in an extremely short time had his boat emptied of her cargo and ready for the trip from Lindeman to Bennett. These lakes are connected by a rapid stream, with a rocky, obstructed channel. White men let their boats down by ropes—a process known as "lining." The Indians, who are familiar with the stream, shoot a portion of the rapids, but near the lower end they land, and make a short portage past a particularly dangerous place, where the current dashes tumultuously over and around a number of large bowlders lying in the bed of the stream. Above on the bank is the grave of a man who lost his outfit and in his despair committed suicide.

Adney was an expert at river navigation; and his companion, though inexperienced in this kind of work, was a champion oarsman, cool-headed, and gritty. On a later occasion I happened to be on the trail near the point referred to when I heard some men calling out from the top of the canyonlike bank that the HARPER'S WEEKLY man was shooting the rapids. I ran across just in time to see the boat swept by with the speed of a bolt from a crossbow, leaping from wave-crest to wave-crest, and drenching its occupants with sheets of spray. Adney and Brown were standing erect in bow and stern, each wielding a single oar used as a paddle, and from their masterly course it was evident that they had their boat well under control. It was all over in a very small fraction of time. They had avoided by the narrowest margin jagged bowlders that it seemed impossible to pass, and in a slather of foam shot out into the smooth water below.

I overheard one man remark on the daredevil skill of the newspaper man, to which his companion replied: "Oh, that's the kind of a fellow Adney is. I knew him at Sheep Camp."

J. B. BURNHAM.

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS.*

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON.

AUTHOR OF "THE GREAT STONE OF SARDIS," ETC.

XIX.—MARGERY'S BREAKFAST.

VERY early the next morning Margery pushed wide open the window of her studio chamber. The sash was a large one, and opened outward on hinges. She looked out upon the dewy foliage, she inhaled the fragrance of the moist morning air, she listened to the song of some early birds, and then, being dressed for the day, she got on a chair, stepped on the window-sill, and jumped out. She walked quietly round the cabin and went out toward the lake. She had never seen the woods so early in the day. All the space between the earth and the sky seemed filled with an intoxicating coolness. She took off her hat and carried it in her hand; the sun was not yet high enough to make it necessary to put anything between him and her.

"This is what I am," said Margery to herself as she stepped blithely on. "I never knew before what I am. I am really a dryad under difficulties."

Presently, to her amazement and his amazement, she saw Martin. She went toward him.

"Oh, Martin," she said, "are you up so early?"

He smiled. "This is not early for me," he answered.

"And Mr. Matlack, is he up?"

"Oh yes, he is up, and gone off to attend to some business."

"Well, really!" exclaimed Margery. "I thought I was the first one out in the world to-day. And now, Martin, don't you want to do something for me? I did not think it would happen, but I am really dreadfully hungry, and couldn't you give me my breakfast now, by myself, before anybody else? I am not particular what I have—anything that is easy to get ready will do—and I would like it down at the very edge of the lake."

"You shall have it," exclaimed Martin, eagerly. "I will get it ready for you very soon, and will bring it to you. I know you like bread and butter and jam, and there is some cold meat, and I will boil you an egg and make some coffee."

"That will be lovely," said Margery, "and I will go down by the lake and wait. I do believe," she said to herself as she hurried away, "that this hermit business is the only sensible thing that ever came into the head of that classic statue with the glass fronts."

Very soon Martin appeared with a rug, which he said she would want if she were going to sit on the ground; and then he ran away, but soon came back with the breakfast. Margery was surprised to see how tastefully it was served.

"You could not have done it better," she said, "if you had been a"— she was about to say waiter, but as she gazed at the bright, handsome face of the young man she felt that it would hurt his feelings to use such a word, so she suddenly changed it to woman.

"If it is done well," he said, "it is not because I am like a woman, but because you are one."

"What does that mean?" thought Margery; but she did not stop to consider. "Thank you very much," she said. "Here is where I am going to eat, and nobody will disturb me."

"Is there anything else?" he asked.

"No," said she. "I have everything I want; you know I take only one cup of coffee."

He did know it; he knew everything she took, and he felt that there was no excuse for him to stay there any longer, so he slowly walked away.

The place Margery had chosen was a nice little nook for a nice little hermit. It was a bit of low beach, very narrow, and flanked on the shore side by a row of bushes, which soon turned and grew down to the water's edge, thus completely cutting off one end of the beach. At the other end the distance between the shrubbery and the water was but a few feet, so that Margery could eat her breakfast without being disturbed by the rest of the world.

Reclining on the rug with the tray on the ground before her, with some green leaves and a few pale wild flowers peeping over the edge of it to see what she had for breakfast, Margery gave herself up to the enjoyment of life.

"Each, one," she said aloud; "I am one, and beautiful nature is another. Just two of us, and each, one. Go away, sir," she said to a big buzzing creature with transparent wings; "you are another, but you don't count."

Arthur Raybold was perhaps the member of the party who was the best satisfied to be himself. He had vowed, as he left the camp fire the night before, that his sister had at last evolved an idea which had some value. Be himself? He should think so! He firmly believed that he was the only person in the camp capable of truly acting his own part in life.

Clyde had told him that on this morning he was going to move the tent over to their own camp, and though he had objected very forcibly, he found that Clyde was not to be moved, and that the tent would be. In an angry mood he had been the first one of the Associated Hermits to assert his individuality. He made up his mind that he would not leave the immediate atmosphere of Margery. He would revolve about her in his waking hours and in his dreams, and in the latter case he would revolve in a hammock hung between two trees not far from his sister's tent; and as he was not one who delayed the execution of his plans, he had put up the hammock that night, although his tent was still in Camp Rob. He had not slept very well, because he was not used to repose in a hammock; and he had risen early, because, though wrapped in a blanket, he had found himself a little chilly.

Starting out for a brisk walk to warm himself, he had not gone far before he thought he heard something which

* Begun in HARPER'S WEEKLY No. 2167.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google sounded like the clicking of knife and fork and dish. He stopped, listened, and then approached the source of the sounds, and soon stood at the open end of Margery's little beach. For a few moments she did not know he was there, so engrossed was her mind with the far-away shadows on the lake, and with the piece of bread-and-jam she held in her hand.

"Oh, happy Fates!" he exclaimed. "How have ye befriended me! Could I have believed such rare fortune was in store for me?"

At the sound of his voice Margery turned her head and started, and in the same instant she was on her feet.

"Margery," he said, without approaching her, but extending his arms so that one hand touched the bushes and the other reached over the water, "I have you a gentle prisoner. I consider this the most fortunate hour of my whole existence. All I ask of you is to listen to me for ten minutes, and then I will cease to stand guard at the entrance to your little haven, and although you will be free to go where you please, I know you will not go away from me."

Margery's face was on fire. She was so angry she could scarcely speak, but she managed to bring some words to her lips to express her condition of mind.

"Mr. Raybold," she cried, "if I ever hear any more of that horrid trash from you I will speak to Mr. Archibald, and have him drive you out of this camp. I haven't spoken to him before because I thought it would make trouble and interfere with people who have not done anything but what is perfectly right, but this is the last time I am going to let you off, and I would like you to remember that. Now go away this instant, or else step aside and let me pass."

Raybold did not change his position, but with a smile of indulgent condescension he remarked:

"Now, then, you are angry; but I don't mind that, and I am quite sure you do not mean it. You see, you have never heard all that I have to say to you. When I have fully spoken to you, then I have no fear—"

He had not finished his sentence, when Margery dashed into the water, utterly regardless of her clothes, and before the astonished intruder could advance towards her she had rushed past him, and had run up on dry land a yard or two behind him. The water on the shelving beach was not more than a foot deep, but her mad bounds made a splashing and a spattering of spray as if a live shark had been dropped into the shallow water. In a moment she had left the beach and was face to face with Martin, pale with fright.

"I thought you had tumbled in!" he cried. "What on earth is the matter?"

She had no breath to answer, but she turned her head toward the lake, and as Martin looked that way he saw Raybold advancing from behind the bushes. It required no appreciable time for the young guide to understand the situation. His whole form quivered, his hands involuntarily clinched, his brows knitted, and he made one quick step forward; but only one, for Margery seized him by the wrist. Without knowing what he was doing, he struggled to free himself from her, but she was strong and held him fast.

"I must go to my tent," she gasped. "I am all wet. Now promise me that you will not say a thing or do a thing until I see you again. Promise!"

For a moment he seemed undecided, and then he ceased his efforts to get away, and said, "I'll promise."

Margery dropped his arm and hurried toward the cabin, hoping earnestly that the Archibalds were not yet up.

"This is a gay and lively beginning for a hermit," she thought, as she made her way around the house; "and I don't see how on earth I am ever going to get through that window again. There is nothing to stand on. I did not expect to go back until they were all up."

But when she reached the window there was a stout wooden stool placed below it.

"Martin did that," she thought, "while I was at my breakfast. He knew I must have come through the window, and might want to go back that way. Oh dear!" she sighed; "but I am sure I can't help it." And so, mounting from the stool to the window-sill, she entered her room.

Having given his promise, Martin turned his back upon the sombre young man, who, with folded arms and clouded brow, was stalking toward the tents at the other end of the camp.

"If I look at him," said Martin, "it may be that I could not keep my promise."

It was about half an hour afterward, when Martin, still excited and still pale, was getting ready for the general breakfast, forgetting entirely that he was a hermit, and that some of the other hermits might have peculiar ideas about their morning meal, that Phil Matlack arrived on the scene. Martin was very much engrossed in his own thoughts, but he could not repress an inquiring interest in his companion.

"Well," said he, "did you bounce him?"

Matlack made no answer, but began to cut out the top of a tin can.

"I say," repeated Martin, "did you bounce him, or did he go without it?"

Without turning toward the younger man, Matlack remarked: "I was mistaken. That ain't fat; it's muscle."

"You don't mean to say," exclaimed Martin, in astonishment, "that he bounced you out of that camp!"

"I don't mean to say nothin'," was the reply, "except what I do say; and what I say is that that ain't fat; it's muscle. When I make a mistake I don't mind standin' up and sayin' so."

Martin could not understand the situation. He knew Matlack to be a man of great courage and strength, and one who, if he should engage in a personal conflict, would not give it up until he had done his very best. But the guide's appearance gave no signs of any struggle. His clothes were in their usual order, and his countenance was quiet and composed.

"Look here," cried Martin; "how did you find out all that about the bishop?"

Matlack turned on him with a grim smile. "Didn't you tell me that day you was talkin' to me about the boat that he was a tough sort of a fellow?"

"Yes, I did," said the other.

"Well," said Matlack, "how did you find that out?"

Martin laughed. "I shouldn't wonder," he said, "if we were about square. Well, if you will tell me how you found it out, I will tell you how I did."

"Go ahead," said the other.

"The long and short of my business with him," said Martin, "was this: I went with him down to the lake, and there I gave him a piece of my mind; and when I had finished, he turned on me and grabbed me with his two hands and chucked me out into the water, just as if I had been a bag of bad meal that he wanted to get rid of. When I got out I was going to fight him, but he advised me not to, and when I took a look at him and remembered the feel of the swing he gave me, I took his advice. Now what did he do to you?"

"He didn't do nothin'," said Matlack. "When I got to the little tent he sleeps in, there he was sittin' in front of it, as smilin' as a basket of chips, and he bade me good-mornin' as if I had been a tenant comin' to pay him his rent; and then he said that before we went on with the business between us, there was some things he would like to show me, and he had them all ready. So he steps off to a place a little behind the tent, and there was three great bowlders, whopping big stones, which he said he had brought out of the woods. I could hardly believe him, but there they was. 'You don't mean,' says I, 'that you are goin' to fight with stones; because, if you are, you ought to give me a chance to get some,' and I thought to myself that I would pick up rocks that could be heaved. 'Oh no,' says he, with one of them smiles of his—'oh no; I just want to open our conference with a little gymnastic exhibition.' And so sayin', he rolled up his shirt sleeves—he hadn't no coat on—and he picked up one of them rocks with both hands, and then he gave it a swing with one hand, like you swing a tenpin ball, and he sent that rock about thirty feet.

"It nearly took my breath away, for if I had to move such a stone I'd want a wheelbarrow. Then he took another of the rocks and hurled it right on top of the first one, and it came down so hard that it split itself in half. And then he took up the third one, which was the biggest, and threw it nearly as far, but it didn't hit the others. 'Now, Mr. Matlack,' says he, 'that's the first part of my little programme. I have only one or two more things, and I don't want to keep you long.' Then he went and got a hickory sapling that he'd cut down. It was just the trunk part of it, and must have been at least three inches thick. He put the middle of it at the back of his neck, and then he took hold of the two ends with his hands and pulled forward, and, by George! he broke that stick right in half!

"'Then, says he, 'Would you mind steppin' down to the lake?' I didn't mind, and went with him, and when we got down to the water there was their boat drawed up on the shore and pretty nigh full of water. 'Mr. Clyde brought this boat back the other day,' says he, 'from a place where he left it some distance down the lake, and I wonder he didn't sink before he got here. We must try and calk up some of the open seams; but first we've got to get the water out of her.' So sayin', he squatted down on the ground in front of that boat and took hold of it, one hand on one side of the bow and one on the other, and then he gave a big twist, and just turned that boat clean over, water and all, so that it lay with its bottom up, and the water running down into the lake like a little deluge.

"'That ought to have been done long ago,' says he, 'and I'll come down after a while and calk it before the sun gets on it.' Then he walked back to camp as spry as a robin, and then says he, 'Mr. Matlack, my little exhibition is over, and so we'll go ahead with the business you proposed.' I looked around, and says I: 'Do you find that little tent you sleep in comfortable? It seems to me as if your feet must stick out of it.' 'They do,' says he, 'and I sometimes throw a blanket over them to keep them dry. But we are goin' to make different arrangements here. Mr. Clyde and I will bring down his tent after breakfast, and if Mr. Raybold doesn't choose to occupy it, Mr. Clyde says I may share it with him. At any rate, I've engaged to attend to the cookin' and to things in general in this camp durin' the rest of the time we stay here.'

"'And so Mr. Clyde is tired of trespassin', is he?' says I. 'Yes, he is,' says he; 'he's a high-minded young fellow, and doesn't fancy that sort of thing. Mr. Raybold slept last night in a hammock, and if that suits him he may keep it up.' 'If I was you,' says I, 'if he does come back to the camp, I'd make him sleep in that little tent. It would fit him better than it does you.' 'Oh no,' says he, 'I don't want to make no trouble. I'm willin' to sleep anywhere. I'm used to roughin' it, and I could make myself comfortable in any tent I ever saw.' 'Well,' says I, 'that was a very pretty exhibition you gave me, and I am much obliged to you, but I must be goin' over to my camp to help get breakfast.' 'If you see Mr. Clyde,' says he, 'will you kindly tell him that I will come over and help him with his tent in about an hour?' To which I said I would, and I left. Now then, hurry up. Them hermits will want their breakfasts, for they can't starve."

XX.—MARTIN ASSERTS HIS INDIVIDUALITY.

"GOOD-MORNING," said Mr. Clyde, as he approached Mr. and Mrs. Archibald, seated opposite each other at their breakfast table. "So you still eat together? Don't ask me to join you; I have had my breakfast."

"Yes," said Mr. Archibald; "we did think that, as we were hermits, we ought to eat in some separate, out-of-the-way fashion; but we could not think of any, and as we were both hungry and liked the same things, we concluded to postpone the assertion of our individualities."

"And Miss Dearborn?" asked Clyde.

"Oh, she had her breakfast long ago, so she told us," said Mrs. Archibald. "I suppose she took some bread and jam, for I do not know what else she could have had."

"As for me," said Clyde, "I thought I would do something of the sort. I like an early breakfast, and so I turned out more than an hour ago and went to look up Mrs. Perkenpine; and I might as well say, sir, that I am now looking for the bishop to come and help me carry our tent back to our own camp, where he is going to cook for us. I never wanted to be a trespasser on your premises, and I don't intend to be any longer."

"That's the right feeling," said Mr. Archibald; "although, in fact, it doesn't make any difference to us whether your party camps here or not. At first I thought it would, but I find it does not."

"By which he means," said Mrs. Archibald, "that if you want to go away he is perfectly willing to have you stay, but if you don't want to go away he doesn't like it, and would have you move."

Clyde laughed. "I haven't anything to say for the others," he answered, "but as long as I have a camp of my own I think I ought to live there."

"But how about Mrs. Perkenpine?" asked Mrs. Archibald. "Did you find her willing to wait on you one at a time?"

"Not exactly," said Clyde. "I discovered her, by her kitchen tent, hard at work eating her own breakfast. I must have looked surprised, for she lost no time in telling me that she was a hermit, and was living for one person at a time—herself first—and that she was mighty glad to get a chance to have her breakfast before anybody else, for she was always hungry and hated waiting. I looked at the table, and saw that she had the breakfast ready for the whole party; so I said, 'I am a hermit too, and I am living for myself, and so I am going to sit down and eat.' 'Squat,' said she, and down I sat; and I had the best meal of her cooking that I have yet tasted. I told her so, and she said she shouldn't wonder. 'Because,' said she, 'I cooked this breakfast for myself—me, one—and as I wasn't thinkin' what other people 'd like, I got things a little more tasty than common, I guess.'"

"And what does she expect Miss Raybold and her brother to do?" asked Mrs. Archibald.

"When she had finished she got up," Clyde answered, "and went away, merely remarking that the victuals were there, and when the others were ready for them they might come and get them."

"I hope," said Mr. Archibald, "that Matlack will not fancy that sort of a hermit life. But as for me, I am greatly taken with the scheme. I think I shall like it. Is Miss Raybold about yet?"

"I see nothing of her," said Clyde, looking over toward her tent.

"Good!" said Mr. Archibald, rising. "Harriet, if you want me, I shall be in my cave."

"And where is that?" she asked.

"Oh, I can't say exactly where it will be," he answered, "but if you will go down to the shore of the lake and blow four times on the dinner-horn I'll come to you, cave and all. I can easily pull it over the water."

"You forget," said Mrs. Archibald, with a smile, "that we are associate hermits."

"No, I do not," said her husband; "I remember it, and that is the reason I am off before Miss Raybold emerges upon the scene."

"I do not know," said Mrs. Archibald to Clyde, "exactly how I am going to assert myself to-day, but I shall do it one way or the other; I am not going to be left out in the cold."

Clyde smiled, but he had no suggestion to offer; his mind was filled with the conjecture as to what sort of a hermit life Margery was going to lead, and if she had already begun it. But just then the bishop came up, and together they went to carry the tent back to Camp Roy.

It was at least an hour afterward, and Mrs. Archibald was comfortably seated in the shade darning stockings, and an open book in her lap. Sometimes she would read a little in the book, and then she would make some long and careful stitches in the stocking, and then she would look about her as if she greatly enjoyed combining her work and her recreation in such a lovely place on such a lovely summer morning. During one of these periods of observation she perceived Corona Raybold approaching.

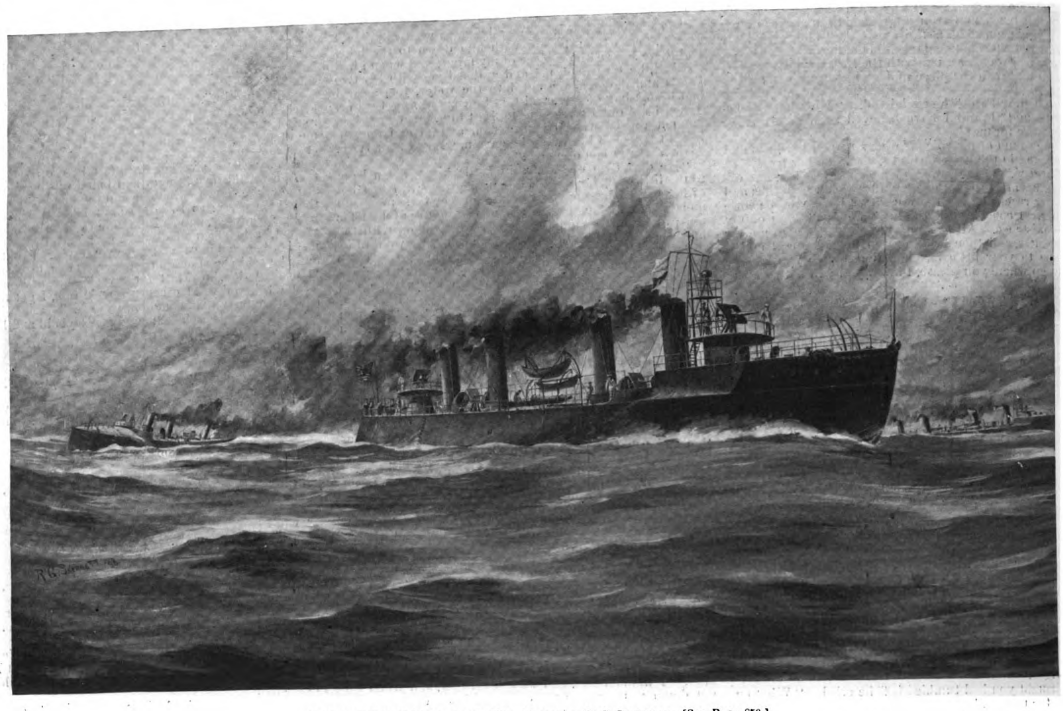
"Good-morning," said the elder lady. "Is this your first appearance?"

"Yes," said Corona, with a gentle smile. "When I woke this morning I found myself to be an individual who liked to lie in bed and gaze out through an open fold in my tent upon the world beyond, and so I lay and dozed and gazed, until I felt like getting up, and then I got up, and you cannot imagine how bright and happy I felt as I thought of what I had been doing. For one morning at least I had been true to myself, without regard to other people or what they might think about it. Now to-morrow, if I feel like it, I shall rise at dawn, and go out and look at the stars struggling with Aurora. Whatever my personal instincts happen to be, I shall be loyal to them. Now how do you propose to assert your individuality?"

"Unfortunately," said Mrs. Archibald, "I cannot do that exactly as I would like to. If we had not promised my daughter and her husband that we would stay away for a month, I should go directly home and superintend my jelly-making and fruit-preserving; but as I cannot do that, I have determined to act out my own self here. I shall darn stockings and sew or read, and try to make myself comfortable and happy, just as I would if I were sitting on my broad piazza at home."

"Good!" said Corona. "I think it likely that you will be more true to yourself than any of us. Doubtless you were born to be the head of a domestic household, and if you followed your own inclination you would be that if you were adrift with your family on a raft in the middle of the ocean. Now I am going away to see what further suggestions my nature has to offer me. What is Mr. Archibald doing?"

Mrs. Archibald smiled. She knew what Corona's nature would suggest if she met a man who could talk, or rather listen. "Oh, his nature has prompted him to hie away to the haunts of game, and to stay there until he is half starved."



Miss Raybold heaved a little sigh. "I see very few persons about here," she said—"only the two guides, in fact."

"Yes," said Mrs. Archibald; "the bishop has gone to help Mr. Clyde with his tent."

Corona moved slowly away, and as she walked her nature suggested that she had better eat something; so she repaired to the scene of Mrs. Perkenpine's ordinary operations. There she found that good woman stretched flat on her back on the ground, fast asleep. Her face and body were shaded by some overhanging branches, but her great feet were illumined and gilded by the blazing sun. On a camp table near by were the remains of the breakfast. It had been there for two or three hours. Arthur Raybold had taken what he wanted and had gone, and before composing herself for her nap Mrs. Perkenpine had thrown over it a piece of mosquito-netting.

Corona smiled. "Their natures are coming out beautifully," she said. "It really does me good to see how admirably the scheme is unfolding itself." She sat down and ate what she could find to her taste, but it was not much. "I shall send for some fruit and some biscuit and some other little things," she thought, "that I can keep in my tent and eat when I please. That will suit me much better than the ordinary meals." Then, without awaken-

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

OUR LATEST TORPEDO CRAFT.—Drawn by R. G. Skerrett.—[See Page 850.]

ing Mrs. Perkenpine, she strolled away, directing her steps toward Camp Roy.

When Margery had gone to her room, and had changed her wet clothes, she was thoroughly miserable. For some time she sat on the side of her little cot, unwilling to go out, on account of a nervous fear that she might meet Mr. Raybold. Of course, if he should again speak to her as he had done, she would immediately appeal to Mr. Archibald, but she did not want to do this, for she had a very strong desire not to make any trouble or divisions in the camp, and she lay down to think over the matter, and in less than two minutes she was asleep. Mrs. Archibald had come to call her to breakfast, but upon being told that she had been up ever so long, and had had her breakfast, she left the girl to her nap.

"I shall sleep here," thought Margery, "until they have all gone to do whatever it is they want to do, and then perhaps I may have a little peace."

When she awoke it was nearly eleven o'clock, and she went immediately to her little side window, from which she could see the lake and a good deal of the camp-ground. The first thing which met her reconnoitring gaze was a small boat some distance out on the lake. Its oars were revolving slowly, something like a pair of wheels with one paddle each, and it was occupied by one person. This person was Arthur Raybold, who had found the bishop calking the boat, and as soon as this work was finished, had moodily declared that he would take a row in her. He had not yet had a chance to row a boat which was in a decent condition. He wanted to be alone with his aspirations. He thought it would be scarcely wise to attempt to speak to Margery again that morning; he would give her time for her anger to cool. She was only a woman, and he knew women!

"It's that Raybold," said Margery. "He knows no more about rowing than a cat, and he's floating sideways down the lake. Good! Now I can go out and hope to be let alone. I don't know when he will ever get that boat back again. Perhaps never."

She was not a wicked girl, and she did not desire that the awkward rower might never get back; but still she did not have that dread of an accident which might have come over her had the occupant of the boat been a brother or any one she cared very much about. She took a novel, of which, during her whole stay in camp, she had read perhaps ten pages, and left the cabin, this time by the door.

"How does your individuality treat you?" asked Mrs. Archibald, as Margery approached her.

"Oh, horribly, so far," was the answer; "but I think it is going to do better. I shall find some nice place where I can read and be undisturbed. I can think of nothing pleasanter such a morning as this."

"I am very much mistaken in your nature," thought Mrs. Archibald, "if that is the sort of thing that suits you."

"Martin," said Margery, not in the least surprised that she should meet the young guide within the next three minutes, "do you know of some really nice secluded spot where I can sit and read, and not be bothered? I don't mean that place where you hung the hammock. I don't want to go there again."

Martin was pale, and his voice trembled as he spoke. "Miss Dearborn," said he, "I think it is a wicked and a burning shame that you should be forced to look for a hiding-place where you may hope to rest undisturbed if that scoundrel in the boat out there should happen to fancy to come ashore. But you needn't do it. There is no necessity for it. Go where you please, sit where you please, and do what you please, and I will see to it that you are not disturbed."

"Oh, no, no!" exclaimed Margery. "That would never do. I know very well that you could keep him away from me, and I am quite sure that you would be glad to do it, but there mustn't be anything of that kind. He is Miss Raybold's brother and—and in a way one of our camping party, and I don't want any disturbances or quarrels."

Martin's breast heaved, and he breathed heavily. "I have no doubt you are right," he said—"of course you are. But I can tell you this: if I see that fellow troubling you again I'll kill him, or—"

"Martin! Martin!" exclaimed Margery. "What do you mean? What makes you talk in this way?"

"What makes me?" he exclaimed, as if impossible to restrain his words. "My heart makes me, my soul makes me. I—"

"Your heart? Your soul?" interrupted Margery. "I don't understand."

For a moment he looked at the astonished girl in silence, and then he said: "Miss Dearborn, it's of no use for me to try to hide what I feel. If I hadn't got so angry I might have been able to keep quiet, but I can't do it now. If that man thinks he loves you, his love is like a grain of sand compared to mine."

"Yours?" cried Margery.

"Yes," said Martin, his face pallid and his eyes sparkling, "mine. You may think it is an insult for me to talk this way, but love is love, and it will spring up where it pleases; and besides, I am not the common sort of a fellow you may think I am. After saying what I have said, I am bound to say more. I belong to a good family, and am college bred. I am poor, and I love nature. I am working to make money to travel and become a naturalist. I prefer this sort of work because it takes me into the heart of nature. I am not ashamed of what I am, I am not ashamed of my work, and my object in life is a nobler one, I think, than the practice of the law, or a great many other things like it."

Margery stood and looked at him with wide-open eyes. "Do you mean to say," she said, "that you want to marry me? It would take years and years and years for you to become naturalist enough to support a wife."

"I have made no plans," he said, quickly, "I have no purpose. I did not intend to tell you now that I love you, but since I have said that I will say also that with you to fight for, there could be no doubt about my success. I should be bound to succeed. It would be impossible for me to fail. And as for the years, I would wait, no matter how many they should be."

He spoke with such hot earnestness that Margery involuntarily drew herself a little away from him. At this the flush went out of his face.

"Oh, Miss Dearborn," he exclaimed, "don't think that I am like that man out there! Don't think that I will persecute you if you don't wish to hear me, that I will follow you about and make your life miserable. If you say to me that you do not wish to see me again, you will never see me again. Say what you please, and you will find that I am a gentleman."

She could see that now. She felt sure that if she told him she did not wish ever to see him again he would never appear before her. But what would he do? She was not in the least afraid of him, but his fierce earnestness frightened her, not for herself, but for him. Suddenly a thought struck her.

"Martin," said she, "I don't doubt in the least that what you have said to me about yourself is true. You are as good as other people, although you do happen now to be a guide, and perhaps after a while you may be very well off, but for all that you are a guide, and you are in Mr. Sadler's employment, and Mr. Sadler's rights and powers are just like gas escaping from a pipe; they are everywhere from cellar to garret, so to speak, and you couldn't escape them. It would be a bad, bad thing for you, Martin, if he were to hear that you make propositions of the kind you have made, to the ladies that he pays you to take out into the woods and guide and protect."

Martin was on the point of a violent expostulation, but she stopped him.

"Now I know what you are going to say," she exclaimed, "but it isn't of any use. You are in his employment, and you are bound to honor and respect him; that is the way a guide can show himself to be a gentleman."

"But suppose," said Martin, quickly, "that he, knowing my family as he does, should think I had done wisely in speaking to you."

A cloud came over her brow. It annoyed her that he should thus parry her thrust.

"Well, you can ask him," she said, abruptly; "and if he doesn't object, you can go to see my mother, when she gets home, and ask her. And here comes Mr. Matlack. I think he has been calling you. And now don't say another word, unless it is about fish."

But Matlack did not come; he stopped and called, and Martin went to him.

Margery walked languidly toward the woods and sat down on the projecting root of a large tree. Then leaning back against the trunk, she sighed.

"It is a perfectly dreadful thing to be a girl," she said; "but I am glad I did not speak to him as I did to Mr. Raybold. I believe he would have jumped into the lake."

[To be continued.]

COLONEL ROOSEVELT'S PRIDE.

I have been amused over Colonel Roosevelt's claims for the worth and efficiency of his Rough Riders. It is such an old soldier trick.

Also, the curious effect it has had on the public, who, not understanding soldiers, take it seriously.

All soldiers, the world over and history through, will claim every virtue for their own regiments, privates as well as colonels, and so, too, will "Jackies" for their particular ships. Privates and Jackies will clip you on the nose if you even presume to question their claims.

Regimental affection is a grand thing, too. It means so much to the members. It involves their past and their pride.

What a poor stick a colonel would be who did not think his regiment was the best in the world, ancient or modern! And you may be sure a private who won't stand up for his regiment is wrong somehow; probably no good.

And soldiers retain this affection for their old regiments, although they may be long out of them. General Miles won't go anywhere without the Fifth Infantry if he can help it; and I firmly believe General Merritt would hang any one who said aught against the Fifth Cavalry.

By the same token soldiers and sailors will stand up for their colonel (and when they won't, it is a sure sign that the officer is sadly lacking) or their captain "to a finish" anywhere, any place, any time.

I hope the Rough Riders will never have to lick all the people that their belligerent colonel thinks they can lick. Yet it wouldn't do at all for you to go near a Rough Rider camp and say anything derogatory of Roosevelt. You would have to make good on the spot.

Frederic Remington.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

WITH OUR TROOPS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

DRAWN BY CHARLES BROUGHTON AFTER SKETCHES BY JOHN T. MCCUTCHEON, SPECIAL ARTIST WITH THE AMERICAN FORCES.

1. Soldiers drilling on the Parade-ground. 2. Outer Gate of the Arsenal-yard, Cavité—Spanish Wrecks in the Distance. 3. Barracks of Spanish Marines, near main Gate of Arsenal.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

TO THE WAR LORD.

A despatch from Berlin states that the Emperor William was thrown from his horse while returning to the palace yesterday. The animal was frightened by bouquets thrown at the Emperor by ladies who stood on the sidewalk while his Maje-ty was passing.—Daily Paper.

O August Potentate, Most Glorious Me,
King of the first Person, Self of Majesty,
Lord by a Right Divine, Emperor Serene,
Placed on a throne by God, what can this mean?

Does the Polar Star e'er fall to grovelling Earth
Because of a misfit, misplaced saddle-girth?
Hath grim Gibraltar slipped e'er from its base,
Or even budged from its appointed place?

Hath seething old Niagara stubbed its toe
And landed with an ignominious splash below;
Hath dark Thermopylæ, deep stained in blood,
E'er stumbled o'er itself with sickening thud,

Because some lady fair on festal day
Hath deigned to pelt it with a small bouquet?
Hath the grim stone face up in the Hampshire Hills
E'er had to blush because of earthly ills?

Yet these, my Lord, each one like unto thee,
Are full of grandeur, full of Majesty,
Placed as they are by Him who placed thee where Man may admire, may marvel at and stare.

Of God's superb creations, why of all,
O Kaiser great, art thou the first to fall?
And not by some convulsion in fair Nature's course,
But chucked—oh, shameful tale—chucked from a horse!

John Kendrick Bangs.

OUR LATEST TORPEDO-CRAFT.

Despite the untimely ending of Spain's boasted torpedo-boat-destroyers before Santiago, and the fact that some naval critics are disposed to consider such craft of little avail at any time, still we have not lost faith in the usefulness of the type, and on the 23d of the present month bids will be opened at the Navy Department for the construction of a dozen torpedo-boats and of sixteen "destroyers" of the most improved order.

Heretofore the department has not prepared plans for the "destroyer" class, and those of the bidders have been either wholly planned abroad, or so closely fashioned upon the lines of those of Great Britain and France that no claim for American ingenuity could be raised through them; but now the Navy Department has drawn up its own design, and the boats promise to be improvements upon the best of those abroad, especially in the all-important elements of seaworthiness and powers of offence.

The boats will be 175 feet long on the load water-line, will have a maximum beam of 17 feet, and draw about seven feet of water on a normal displacement of 165 to 170 tons.

The boats will carry a battery of at least three rapid-fire guns, and an ammunition supply of three and a half tons. The design contemplates 3-pounders, but the calibre of the guns will depend somewhat upon future settlement, and there is reason to believe some of the pieces will be of the 1-pounder automatic type, much on the order of those highly effective Maxim guns. The torpedo outfit will consist of three short torpedo-tubes and a supply of five torpedoes. The tubes will be placed either abreast or en échelon on either side amidships, with the third tube on the centre line 'way aft. This disposition gives the greatest effective service for three tubes, especially where the broadside tubes cannot be trained athwartships.

The boats will have two conning-towers, each fashioned of half-inch nickel-steel plating. From the forward tower most of the navigating work will be done, and the steering-gear there will be effected by steam control, while the after-tower will be fitted only with the ordinary hand-wheel arrangement. On the forward tower there will be an electric search-light of considerable power—a feature distinctly novel to our torpedo-boats, and a facility of great usefulness during much of the service of craft of this kind. An electric plant will also supply energy for a set of night signals, for the running lights, and also for all interior illumination.

So far as possible within the narrow limits of such vessels the comfort of officers and crew has been considerately studied, and every effort has been made to make the boats both comfortable and healthful, even under the stress of bad weather, when hatches are battened down, and only the blowers can be induced to draw down the fresh air from without. Folding-berths have been provided for twenty-four enlisted men, and these will be turned up out of the way when not in use. The crew are placed aft, where they will be less affected by the movements of the boats in a heavy seaway. Forward there are accommodations for a commanding officer, an engineer officer, and two petty officers; and it is some evidence to the cunning of the plan that bathing accommodations have been provided for both the officers and the crew.

The boats will be driven by two sets of triple-expansion engines of the four-cylinder type, and for those who love figures it may be well to state that the high-pressure cylinder of each engine will have a diameter of 14 inches, the intermediate cylinder a diameter of 22 inches, and each of the two low-pressure cylinders a diameter of 25½ inches, while all will have a common stroke of 18 inches. When making about 350 revolutions a minute, the engines will develop quite 3000 indicated horse-power, and the boats should make then between twenty-six and twenty-seven knots. Steam will be supplied by three good-sized water-tube boilers, in two separate water-tight compartments—forward and aft of the two engine-rooms—and the working pressure will be 250 pounds to the square inch. At least forty tons of coal must be provided for in the bunker space, and the department's design contemplates its distribution abreast the engines and boilers for protection.

A cost limit of $170,000 is placed upon the torpedo-boats, and no bid will be considered that does not promise a speed of at least twenty-six knots; and it is needless to remark that the department's boat has a margin considerably in excess of this.

THE DESTROYERS.

The torpedo boat destroyers are exceptionally fine boats, and in compass considerably overreach anything now built or building abroad. They may really be said to be the Spanish "destroyers" bettered.

The department's design covers a craft 245 feet long, of beautiful model, having a maximum beam of only 23 feet, and drawing, upon a trial displacement of 420 tons, practically eight feet of water. The usual turtle-back has given way to a flush forecastle-deck, promising fine seagoing qualities, and affording at the same time superior accommodations for the crew of sixty persons. There are two conning-towers, one on the forecastle-deck and one 'way aft on the main-deck, and the vessel can be handled from either, although only the forward tower will have its steering-gear worked by steam. On top of each of the towers there will be a 12-pounder rapid-fire gun, and a very wide arch of fire is assured each. On an extension of the bridge upon the forward tower there will be a third steering-wheel, by which most of the navigating will be done in reasonable weather, and on a stand reared above this steering-station there will be placed an effective search-light.

The boats will be lighted throughout by electricity, and the running lights and the night signal code will be worked in the same way. There are fine ventilating arrangements in the shape of numerous blowers; and an extensive pumping plant, connecting with each of the numerous separate water-tight compartments, provides against all reasonable demands in case of either fire or leak. All wood-work will be carefully fireproofed, and the decks will be covered with linoleum instead of the usual planking. The crew will be placed forward, and the officers aft. The captain will have a state-room and a cabin, while each of the other officers will have a comfortable state-room. There are quarters aft, too, for a dozen petty officers.

The armament will consist of two 12-pounder and four 6-pounder rapid-fire guns and two large torpedo-tubes. The 6-pounder guns will be mounted in convenient places on the main-deck, two of them having a bow fire; and the torpedo-tubes, one amidships and one 'way aft, each on the centre-line, will be able to fire on either side and through wide arcs of train. For the rapid-fire guns seven tons of ammunition will be carried, and the power of that battery, where each gun is capable of a rate of twenty aimed shots a minute, can easily be estimated, and there are but few gunboats that could stand up before so wicked a storm of shell.

The boats will have twin screws driven by two triple-expansion engines of the four-cylinder type, each in a separate compartment, and will develop 8000 indicated horse-power when making 327 revolutions a minute. Steam will be supplied by four water-tube boilers, two forward and two aft of the engine spaces, and at a working pressure of 300 pounds. A coal-supply of at least 100 tons, stowed abreast the boilers and engines, will give an effective radius of action. The layman can hardly appreciate the power of these engines, the weight of which, together with the boilers and auxiliaries, is practically half the displacement of the vessels, but they develop a driving force for these boats four-fifths as great as that required to propel one of our 11,500-ton battle-ships at a rate of 16 knots. The care and proper management of such machinery and boilers require the highest kind of skill, and the navigation of such craft is very much akin to the control of a locomotive loose upon an untracked surface, where but the slightest initiative movement would involve a delirious sweep. To fall overboard from such a boat would certainly mean a broken neck, and to make the most of her at top-rate speed demands the greatest precision of judgment from every working member of her complement—from the navigator at the wheel to the humblest stoker in the fire-room.

The average cost limit for the destroyers is $295,000, and substantial advantage is promised the bidders guaranteeing the highest speeds, the best sea-going qualities, and the promptest deliveries, either upon the department's design or upon plans of their own.

August 20, 1898. Robert G. Skerrett.

EXTRACT FROM A PRIVATE LETTER RECEIVED FROM A MEMBER OF TROOP "A."

"On Board Transport 'Massachusetts.'

"This is Monday, and we expect to be in sight of Puerto Rico this afternoon, and our journey is almost over. You have really no idea of what a transport is, and especially one that is over-crowded. It is really a hell on earth—or rather on water! Thank Heaven, the weather has been fine, and I have slept on deck every night, not even going below when it rained. I never felt better in my life, and have come to the conclusion that I can stand anything. As I have not been at all seasick, I volunteered for the stable police, who have to clean up below decks where the horses are. If you could put all the terrible smells in the world together, you would get some idea of what it is. We can only stand it for about a half an hour at a time, and then have to take a spell on deck to recover. If we had a storm I am afraid it would go hard with some of the lads, as a good many are pretty seasick now. The food is fierce, and we only have condensed steam to drink, which is almost hot; but still I seem to thrive upon it. Every morning we get up at five, and form a line in our birthday-suits and have a great hose played on us. Then we have breakfast, and after that comes target practice at boxes over the stern. I am so sunburnt that you would not know me, and, as I said before, feel out of sight. The hardest time we ever had was the day before we started; the loading up was simply awful, and I was so tired that I just lay down on a bale of hay and went to sleep. The horses have stood the trip very well, and I don't think we will lose a single one."

"Ponce, August 4, 1898.

"We got in sight of land day before yesterday morning at about 7 A.M., and at three o'clock in the afternoon came in sight of the harbor of Ponce. It was a wonderful sight, for the town had only surrendered two days before, and the harbor was full of war-vessels and transports. Well, we were sailing proudly along, when, just at the entrance of the harbor, we ran aground on a reef, and stuck there in spite of every effort to get us off. We staid there until yesterday afternoon, almost dead from the heat, and not a drop of water to drink, when they took us over to the Prairie, where we spent the night. I tell you that transport was as near hell as any place could be, and I will never forget it. We were on fire three times in two days, and only had hardtack and rotten coffee to eat and a little dirty water to drink. I cannot imagine what it would have been if there had been a storm. We had beautiful weather, and most of us slept on deck every night. We came ashore this morning, and we got the first square meal in a week. This is the quaintest little place I ever saw, and the natives are very friendly to the Americans. We changed some of our money to-day, and got two dollars in Spanish money for one American dollar. There are thousands of troops here, and they say the Spaniards cannot run away fast enough. The weather here is much cooler than I have felt in New York lots of times, and I am feeling very well. Our horses are coming ashore this afternoon. We are camped right in front of a little church that is 150 years old."

FROM: A VISION OF RECONCILEMENT.

BY EDWARD McQUEEN GRAY.

Men of the Anglo-Saxon Race:

Across a thousand leagues of sea
Ye may not parley face to face,
But yet your generous hearts are free
To interchange a generous thought;
Or else in vain your splendid seers
Have to their listening brethren sought
To teach the lesson of the years.

This is the hour of human stress;
Surging against the clanging door
Of doom bewildered millions press
Together on a dwindling floor
Where still the elemental war
Is waged between the Day and Night;
The powers that aid, the powers that bar
Their struggling fellows from the light.
Oppugnant forces on the earth
Have set humanity at stake;
Here Liberty is choked at birth;
There Freedom bids the soul awake.

All are involved, for none may shun
That issue, and mankind can mark
How some are turning to the sun
And some are huddling in the dark.
And some are trampling others down
And some are hurling others back;
Here a new nation wins renown;
There drifts a dynasty to wrack.
And closer, as the narrowing space
Drives each upon the other, grows
The grip of wrestling race with race,
The grapple of instinctive foes.

What course to take? What cause espouse?
Self-interest or common weal?
Madman or saint alone avows
What steadier intellects but feel.

Yet, by the things that make you great:
The wrath that stirs you at the cry
Of freemen overborne: your hate
Of wrong: your scorn of treachery:
Ye stand engaged at Tyranny
To strike; earth's fallen to uplift;
Are ye not heirs of Liberty
And stewards of her priceless gift?
'Tis not for nothing in your veins
The ichor of the Viking runs
That bids you firmly grasp the reins
Of rule, bequeathing to your sons
A birthright of supremacy
By deep deserving strongly stayed;
No germ of fatuous ecstasy.
But on the prime foundation laid.
Ye are the vanguard of the bright
Battalions of progressive Time;
March onward, upward to the light;
Fulfil your destiny sublime
To be the marshallers of Peace
And Progress in their blest career;
From Ignorance to wrest release;
To vanquish Enmity and Fear.

Mine eyes may not behold it, but
Some day shall rise a nobly planned
Valhalla where with Farragut
Shall Collingwood and Nelson stand.
The stars and stripes and crosses flaunt
Their mingled blazons through the dome
Where Wellington shall welcome Grant,
Sherman and Wolfe shall find a home.
There, Freedom's sleepless warder, shall
His wings a mighty Eagle spread
Above that fane; within that hall
A Lion guards the sacred dead.
And highest in that House of Fame
Shall stand Virginia's deathless son;
And England write her noblest name
After the name of Washington.

DIARY OF THE WAR.

Wednesday, August 10.—The first American soldier who has been killed by the enemy in Puerto Rico fell in an engagement near Hormigueros to-day. General Schwan's command, proceeding along the Mayaguez road, was opposed by a force of about 1200 Spaniards. The enemy was driven back with heavy loss, and our advance continued. Our loss, one killed and sixteen wounded.

Friday, August 12.—M. Cambon received authority to sign the protocol on behalf of Spain, at one o'clock this afternoon. At 4.23 his signature and that of Secretary Day were affixed in the Cabinet Room of the White House. The provisions of the document are these: (1.) Spain will relinquish all claim of sovereignty over and title to Cuba. (2.) Puerto Rico and other Spanish islands in the West Indies, and an island in the Ladrones to be selected by the United States, shall be ceded to the latter. (3.) The

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

United States will occupy and hold the city, bay, and harbor of Manila, pending the conclusion of a treaty of peace which shall determine the control, disposition, and government of the Philippines. (4.) Cuba, Puerto Rico, and other Spanish islands in the West Indies shall be immediately evacuated, and commissioners, to be appointed within ten days, shall, within thirty days from the signing of the protocol, meet at Havana and San Juan, respectively, to arrange and execute the details of the evacuation. (5.) The United States and Spain will each appoint not more than five commissioners to negotiate and conclude a treaty of peace. The commissioners are to meet at Paris not later than the 1st of October. (6.) On the signing of the protocol, hostilities will be suspended, and notice to that effect will be given as soon as possible by each government to the commanders of its military and naval forces.

A proclamation by President McKinley was issued, which stated that the governments of the United States and Spain had formally agreed upon the terms on which negotiations for the establishment of peace between the two countries should be undertaken, and added: "Now, therefore, I, William McKinley, President of the United States, do, in accordance with the stipulations of the protocol, declare and proclaim on the part of the United States a suspension of hostilities, and do hereby command that orders be immediately given through the proper channels, to the commanders of the military and naval forces of the United States, to abstain from all acts inconsistent with this proclamation." Orders for carrying this direction into effect issued from Washington.

A bombardment of Manzanillo by the Newark, Suwanee, Osceola, Hist, and Alvarado, which began this afternoon about an hour before the protocol was signed, was reported to-night, and efforts were made to send news to that point in regard to the cessation of hostilities.

At Havana a few shells were fired by the batteries early this morning. One shell struck the San Francisco.

In Puerto Rico, General Wilson has sent artillery to dislodge a Spanish force near Aibonito. An inconclusive skirmish took place, in which one of our men was killed and several wounded. There was also skirmishing along General Wilson's line on the military road to San Juan.

Saturday, August 13.—Madrid sends word that "a feeling of profound relief pervades all classes," and "there is not a political man in Spain strong enough to dare suggest a continuation of war." While some of the Spanish newspapers express sorrow and bitter resentment in view of the terms of the protocol, this dissent is no more than might have been anticipated; indeed, it is less, both in volume and in violence, than was generally expected.

Captain Goodrich of the Newark was notified early this morning of the suspension of hostilities. In the bombardment at Manzanillo, thus brought to an end, it is reported that six persons in the town were killed and seventeen wounded, and sixty-five houses were destroyed.

Near Guayama, Puerto Rico, the news of peace stopped a battle, not a moment too soon. A despatch says that General Brooke had thrown out three strong columns to the left of Guayama, his plan being to force his way to a junction with General Wilson at Cayey. "Three miles out beyond the scene of Monday's fight the enemy was discovered, intrenched in a splendid defensive position on the top of a hill. Light-battery B of Pennsylvania had been ordered into position to begin the engagement. The guns of the first section had been brought up and a gun had been unlimbered; a shell had been placed in the chamber; a Pennsylvanian stood ready to fire.

"Suddenly there was a loud shout from the rear. Two men on horseback dashed into view, frantically waving their arms. The men at the guns waited." A message from General Miles had been received by General Brooke, directing that all hostile military operations should be stopped. "The Pennsylvanians, officers and men, howled with disgust, and [when ordered to return to camp] sullenly wheeled the guns about and went, grumbling, to the rear."

The defences of Manila were bombarded by our fleet while the trenches were stormed by our soldiers. News of the armistice had not been received. Captain-General Augustin, carried in a launch to the German cruiser Kaiserin Augusta, took passage on that vessel to Hong-kong. Admiral Dewey's despatch of this date says:

"Manila surrendered to-day to the American land and naval forces after a combined attack. A division of the squadron shelled the forts and intrenchments at Malate, on the south side of the city, driving back the enemy, our army advancing from that side at the same time. The city surrendered about five o'clock, the American flag being hoisted by Lieutenant Brumby. About 7000 prisoners were taken. The squadron had no casualties; no vessels were injured. On August 7 General Merritt and I formally demanded the surrender of the city, which the Spanish Governor-General refused."

Sunday, August 14.—Four transports from Santiago reached Montauk Point, Long Island. The Miami had on board Colonel Roosevelt with six troops of Rough Riders, and General Joseph Wheeler with four troops of the Third Cavalry.

Tuesday, August 16.—The members of the commissions to adjust details of the evacuation of Cuba and Puerto Rico by the Spanish troops were appointed by President McKinley. Their names follow: For Cuba—Major-General James F. Wade, Rear-Admiral William T. Sampson, Major-General Matthew C. Butler. For Puerto Rico—Major-General John R. Brooke, Rear-Admiral Winfield Scott Schley, Brigadier-General William Washington Gordon.

Ambassador Hay, at London, accepted the office of Secretary of State, to replace Secretary Day, who will serve on the Peace Commission.

Wednesday, August 17.—A despatch to the London Times from Manila adds details of especial interest to the story of the surrender of that city last Saturday. "When the bombardment had lasted an hour," the correspondent says, "the ships were ordered to stop firing. A fierce fight was proceeding in the trenches; the Spaniards were driven back to their second line of defence, and fifteen minutes later they retreated into the walled city, where resistance was hopeless." Soon afterwards a white flag was raised, and then "the Belgian consul boarded the Olympia, Admiral Dewey's flag-ship, and returned with an American lieutenant [Brumby] to the Spanish military governor, who agreed to surrender. General Merritt went to the palace at 3.30, where the Spaniards formed in line and laid down their arms."

Apparently an hour or more was consumed in these ceremonies, for Dewey's despatch says that the surrender took place about five o'clock.

"The American loss," this correspondent continues, "was from six to eight killed and forty wounded. The Spanish losses are unknown, but are considerable. The trenches were filled with badly wounded men. Manila is now under martial law, and General Merritt is military governor. The Red Cross Society from California is rendering valuable aid to the sick and wounded."

MARRION WILCOX.

ADVICE TO MOTHERS.—MRS. WINSLOW'S SOOTHING SYRUP should always be used for children teething. It soothes the child, softens the gums, allays all pain, cures wind colic, and is the best remedy for diarrhœa. —[Adv.]

A VALUABLE BOOK.

"INFANT HEALTH," sent out by the N. Y. Condensed Milk Co., New York, Proprietors of the Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk. It is a valuable book, that should be in every home.—[Adv.]

GOOD alike for young and old. Old feel young, young feel younger, all feel youngest they ever did—after fair trial of ABBOTT'S—The Original Angostura Bitters. —[Adv.]

NOTHING contributes more towards a sound digestion than DR. SIEGERT'S ANGOSTURA BITTERS.—[Adv.]

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Pears'

It is a wonderful soap that takes hold quick and does no harm.

No harm! It leaves the skin soft like a baby's; no alkali in it, nothing but soap. The harm is done by alkali. Still more harm is done by not washing. So, bad soap is better than none.

What is bad soap? Imperfectly made; the fat and alkali not well balanced or not combined.

What is good soap? Pears'.

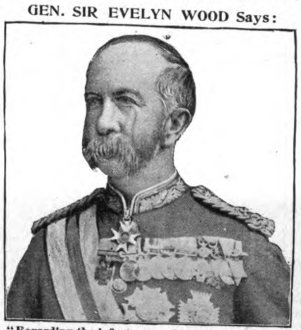
All sorts of stores sell it, especially druggists; all sorts of people use it.

Financial

Letters of Credit.

Bills of Exchange bought and sold. Cable Transfers to Europe and South Africa. Commercial and Travellers' Letters of Credit. Collections made.

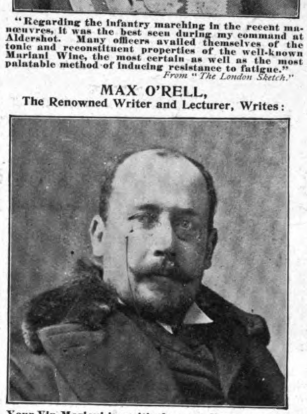
Brown Brothers & Co.,



BANKERS, No. 59 WALL STREET.

NEVER HAS ANYTHING BEEN SO HIGHLY AND SO JUSTLY PRAISED AS

VIN MARIANI



MARIANI WINE, the FAMOUS TONIC for BODY, NERVES and BRAIN.

GEN. SIR EVELYN WOOD Says:

"Regarding the infantry marching in the recent manœuvres, it was the best seen during my command at Aldershot. Many officers availed themselves of the tonic and reconstituent properties of the well-known Mariani Wine, the most certain as well as the most palatable method of inducing resistance to fatigue."
From "The London Sketch."

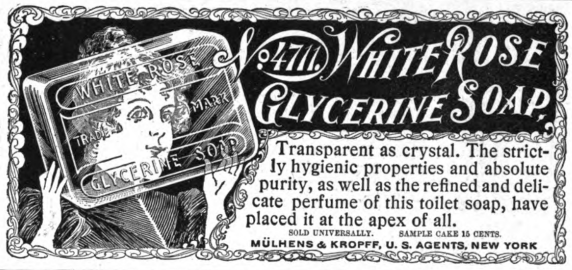
MAX O'RELL,
The Renowned Writer and Lecturer, Writes:

Your Vin Mariani is positively marvellous; one glass put me on my feet; one bottle made a new man of me.
Yours gratefully, MAX O'RELL.

ALL DRUGGISTS.
PARIS: 41 Boulevard Haussmann. LONDON: 83 Mortimer Street.

MARIANI WINE is invaluable at this season of the year, when, owing to trying climatic conditions, the system is especially susceptible to attacks of debility and prostration.

VIN MARIANI (MARIANI WINE) has stood the test of thirty-five years' trial. It has written endorsements from more than 8000 American physicians, in addition to having received cordial recommendations from royalty, princes of the Church and of the State, and many notable personages.



MARIANI WINE is a tonic prepared upon careful scientific principles. It contains absolutely no injurious properties. It gives power to the brain, strength to the entire nervous system, firmness and elasticity to the muscles, and richness to the blood. It has been aptly described as a promoter of good health and longevity.

MARIANI WINE is specially indicated for General Debility, Weakness from whatever causes, Overwork, Profound Depression and Exhaustion, Throat and Lung Diseases, Consumption, Malaria and La Grippe.

MARIANI WINE is an adjuvant in convalescence and a powerful rejuvenator. For Overworked Men, Delicate Women, Sickly Children it Works Wonders. Taken with cracked ice, it relieves Summer Prostration quickly and effectually. It soothes, strengthens and sustains the system.

To those who will kindly write to MARIANI & CO., 52 West 15th Street, New York City, will be sent, free, book containing portraits with endorsements of Emperors, Empress, Princes, Cardinals, Archbishops, and other interesting matter.

AVOID SUBSTITUTIONS.
MONTREAL: 28-30 Hospital Street.

No. 4711. WHITE ROSE GLYCERINE SOAP.

Transparent as crystal. The strictly hygienic properties and absolute purity, as well as the refined and delicate perfume of this toilet soap, have placed it at the apex of all.

SOLD UNIVERSALLY. SAMPLE CAKE 15 CENTS.
MÜLHENS & KROPFF, U. S. AGENTS, NEW YORK

GETTYSBURG BATTLEFIELD

Low-Rate Personally-Conducted Tour via Pennsylvania Railroad.

The recent triumphs of our arms by sea and land revives the interest in that greatest of all American battlefields, Gettysburg. In order that the residents of New York, Philadelphia, and neighboring cities may visit this great battlefield in the most satisfactory manner, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has arranged for a three-day personally conducted tour on Saturday, September 3.

| | | Rate. |
|---|---|---|
| Leave | New York..... 8.50 A.M. | $13 00 |
| " | Trenton.....10.58 " | 11 50 |
| " | Philadelphia..12.20 P.M. | 9 00 |

Proportionate rates from other points.

Rate includes transportation in each direction, dinner at Philadelphia going and returning to passengers from New York and Trenton, one and three-fourths days' hotel accommodations, and carriage drive over the entire battlefield under the direction of Capt. James T. Long, the celebrated guide, who will describe the battle at the prominent points of the field. A tourist agent and chaperon will accompany the party. A Pullman parlor-car will be run through from Philadelphia to Gettysburg and return.

For itineraries, tickets, and full information apply to nearest ticket agent; Tourist Agents, 1196 Broadway, New York, and 789 Broad Street, Newark, N.J.; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Philadelphia.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE,

thoroughly revised and classified, will be sent by mail to any address on receipt of ten cents.

7,000 Guns in Stock

WE SELL GUNS of every reputable American and foreign make, and give wholesale prices to everybody. We carry in stock

Fishing Tackle and Sporting Goods amounting to a quarter of a million dollars. We can please the fancy of millionaires, or meet the demands of the poorest sportsman and angler. Write for prices, or ask us to send you our Sporting Goods Catalogue. We load and sell over

1,000,000 Hand Loaded Shells a Year

Ask us to send you our price card of hand and machine loaded shells. We have

The largest Gun Repair Shop in America

We make guns, re-bore, re-stock, repair—in fact, alter a gun to suit the owner, and guarantee satisfaction. Write for prices.

MONTGOMERY WARD & CO.

Originators of the Catalogue Business
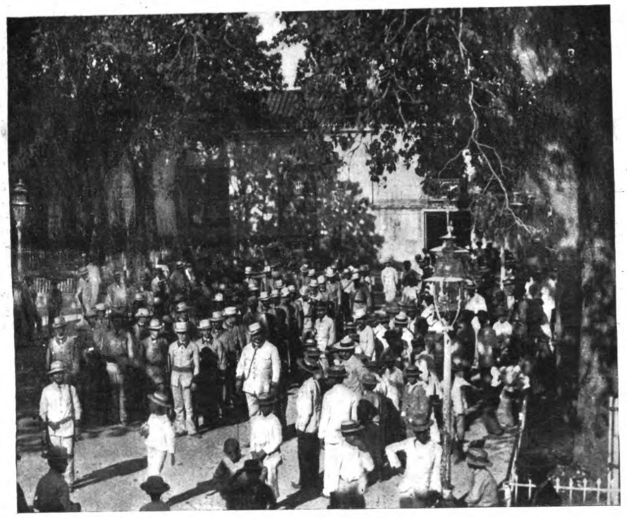
111 to 120 Michigan Ave, cor. Madison St., Chicago
MENTION THIS PUBLICATION WHEN WRITING

THE CELEBRATED

SOHMER

Heads the List of the Highest-Grade Pianos.

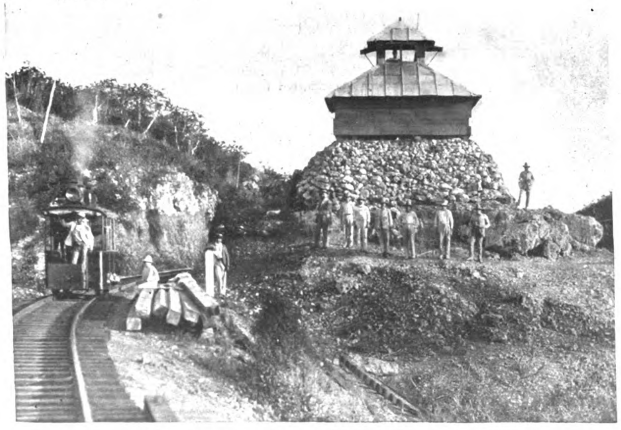
Caution.—The buying public will please not confound the genuine SOHMER Piano with one of a similar-sounding name of a cheap grade.
Our name spells—



S—O—H—M—E—R

New York Warerooms
SOHMER BUILDING
Fifth Ave., cor 22d St.

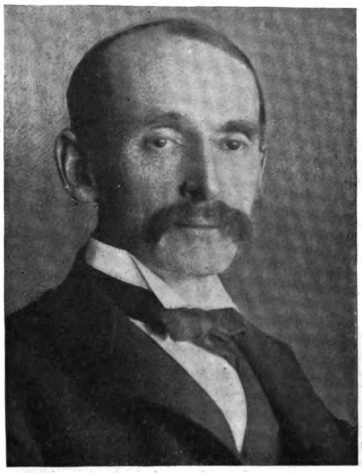
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



RAISING THE AMERICAN FLAG ON THE CASA MUNICIPAL.

PLAZA DE ARMAS.

GENERAL VARA DEL REY, KILLED AT THE BATTLE OF CANEY.

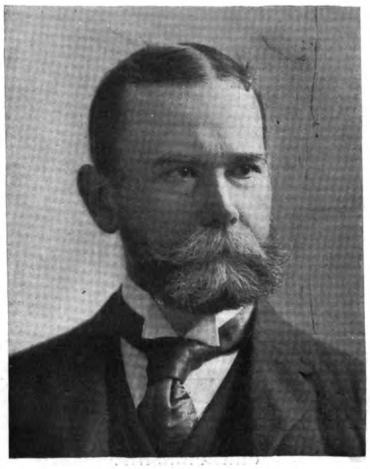


BLOCK-HOUSE PROTECTING SAN LUIS RAILWAY.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL LINARES, SPANISH COMMANDER IN EASTERN CUBA.

SANTIAGO.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



HON. WILLIAM R. DAY.

JUDGE DAY.

WILLIAM R. DAY, who is about to resign his position as Secretary of State to accept the chairmanship of the Peace Commission that is to determine the terms on which the United States shall resume relations with Spain, was born at Ravenna, Ohio, April 17, 1849, and is the son of Judge Luther Day, of the Supreme Court of Ohio. He graduated from the University of Wisconsin with the class of '70, and was admitted to the bar of his State in July, 1872. He established himself in Canton, where fourteen years later he was elected Judge of the Court of Common Pleas of the Ninth Judicial District; but as he had not sought the office and was averse to the routine of the bench, he resumed practice the following year. Under the administration of President Harrison, Judge Day was nominated to be United States District Judge for the Northern District of Ohio, but he declined the honor, because of his health. Living for so many years in Canton, and having so many interests in common with Mr. McKinley, it is natural that Judge Day should have become an intimate friend of the President, who soon learned to appreciate the sound character of his townsman, and presently to place great confidence in his judgment and opinions. While never active in politics himself, Judge Day was always of great service to Mr. McKinley, especially during the period of the latter's Governorship of Ohio and at the time of the last Presidential campaign. There is no doubt, therefore, that Judge Day might have had almost any appointment within the gift of the administration, had he chosen to express such a desire, and it is very probable that several posts of trust and honor were offered to him after Mr. McKinley's election; but he declined all; until, at the very trying period some months previous to the declaration of war, he consented to accept the Assistant-Secretaryship of State—a position which at that time required a man of cool judgment and courage. Here Judge Day displayed so much energy and ability that, upon the resignation of Secretary Sherman, he was promoted to be chief of the department of which for some months he had in fact been the actual head. As Secretary of State, Judge Day, although unversed in diplomacy and untrained in the ways of international intercourse, but sound in his judgments and principles and learned in law, so conducted the affairs of the nation at one of the most critical stages of our recent history that he earned the respect and confidence even of those who had doubted the capacity of the man they termed a country lawyer.

THE NEW SECRETARY OF STATE.

JOHN HAY, Ambassador to the Court of St. James, who has just been appointed by the President to succeed Judge Day as Secretary of State, was born at Salem, Indiana, October 8, 1838. He graduated from Brown University in 1858, and was admitted to the Illinois bar in 1861. Immediately afterwards he embarked upon the career which has eminently fitted him for the post he is about to assume. He was first appointed assistant secretary to President Lincoln, and in the civil war, which soon followed, he attained the rank of Colonel and Assistant Adjutant-General. His diplomatic career began in 1865, when he was sent to Paris as Secretary of Legation. In 1868 he became Chargé d'Affaires at Vienna, and in 1869 Mr. Hay was made Secretary of Legation at Madrid. As a result of his observations while living in Spain, he wrote a book, entitled Castilian Days. In 1870 Mr. Hay became one of the editors of the New York Tribune, a position which he occupied almost continuously until 1879, when he was appointed Assistant Secretary of State. Upon his election to the Presidency, Mr. McKinley sent Mr. Hay to London as Ambassador of the United States, and during his brief sojourn in England Mr. Hay has strengthened the ties which are gradually binding the two great Anglo-Saxon nations into a closer and firmer friendship.

HON. JOHN HAY.

THE MILITARY COMMISSIONERS.

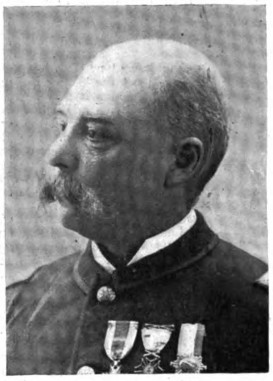
THE President has nominated the following commissioners to serve on the military boards that are to arrange the terms for the evacuation of Cuba and Puerto Rico:

For Cuba—Major-General James F. Wade, Rear-Admiral William T. Sampson, and Major-General M. C. Butler.

For Puerto Rico—Major-General John R. Brooke, Rear-Admiral Winfield S. Schley, and Brigadier-General W. W. Gordon.

General Wade is a native of Ohio, and was born in 1843. At the age of eighteen he received a commission as Second Lieutenant in the Sixth United States Cavalry, from which he rose to be Captain, and subsequently Lieutenant-Colonel of the Tenth Cavalry, and in 1887 Colonel of the Fifth Cavalry. Upon the outbreak of hostilities, General Wade took command of the camp at Tampa.



General Butler was born near Greenville, South Carolina, in 1836. He studied law, and at the outbreak of the civil war joined the Confederate army as a Captain of cavalry. He rose rapidly, and at the close of the contest had attained the rank of Major-General, to which rank he was reappointed by the President at the beginning of the war with Spain. Previous to this resumption of a military career General Butler had been prominent in politics, and represented his State in the United States Senate.

REAR-ADMIRAL WM. T. SAMPSON, U.S.N.

MAJOR-GENERAL MATTHEW C. BUTLER, U.S.V.

MAJOR-GENERAL JAMES F. WADE, U.S.V.

COMMISSIONERS FOR CUBA.

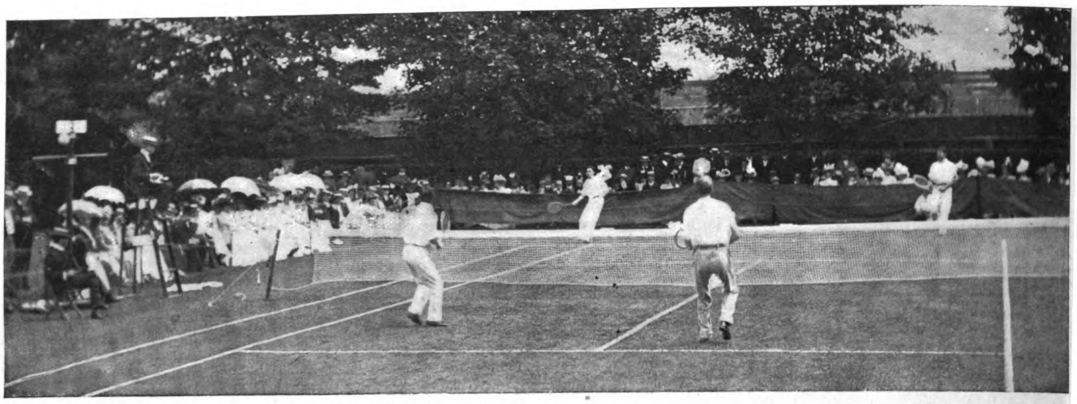
REAR-ADMIRAL WINFIELD S. SCHLEY, U.S.N.

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN R. BROOKE, U.S.A.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL WM. W. GORDON, U.S.V.

COMMISSIONERS FOR PUERTO RICO.

Admiral Sampson's recent record is so well known that it is unnecessary to go into the details of his life beyond stating that he was born at Palmyra, New York, in 1840, and graduated from the Naval Academy in 1860.



General Brooke was born in Pottsville, Pennsylvania, in 1838, and began his military career as Captain in the Fourth Pennsylvania Regiment in 1861. In 1888 he was made Brigadier-General in the United States army, and assigned to the command of the Department of the Platte. At the outbreak of the war with Spain, General Brooke was placed in command of Camp Thomas, Georgia, and he is now in Puerto Rico.

General Gordon was born in Savannah, Georgia, in 1834. He graduated from Yale with the class of '54, and entered the Confederate service in 1861. Subsequently he went into business, and in 1884 was elected to the State Legislature. The President made General Gordon a Brigadier-General of Volunteers soon after hostilities began.

Like Admiral Sampson, Commodore Schley has been too prominently in the public eye of late to require any extensive biographical introduction. He was born in Maryland in 1839, was appointed to the Naval Academy in 1856, and took a prominent part in the naval actions of the civil war. He commanded the Greely relief expedition.

AMERICAN COMMISSIONERS FOR THE EVACUATION OF CUBA AND PUERTO RICO.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE CHAMPIONSHIP DOUBLES—EAST VS. WEST.

THE NATIONAL TENNIS CHAMPIONSHIP.

There were but fifty-three entries for the National meeting at Newport this year, as against sixty-two in 1897. But it is rather in the quality than in the length of the entry list that the meeting of 1898 suffers by comparison with the one that preceded it. A year ago both R. D. Wrenn and W. A. Larned were in the field, and the presence of Eaves, Nisbet, and Mahoney gave the event a quasi-international character and assuredly a supreme interest.

The accident of war is distinctly chargeable with the absence of champion Wrenn and of W. A. Larned, his most prominent rival for first honors. Wrenn may well be satisfied to retire with the glory that he has won, but Larned has still to earn the blue ribbon of the tennis world, and a year lost means something when a player is at the very top of his game. On the other hand, Larned's success would have been inconclusive if he had won the title through the champion's default, and nothing but an actual victory over Wrenn could set the fitting seal upon his tennis career. In this connection it may be noted that a third invasion of British players might have been an accomplished fact but for the war, and the consequent withdrawal of our two leading men. The Englishmen had the sportsmanlike feeling that they wanted to win only over the best tennis that America could show, and it can hardly be doubted that either Nisbet or Dr. Eaves could have walked off with the nominal title had they chosen to take advantage of this off year.

East versus West in the double event was a misnomer, for both Ward and Davis and Whitman and Wrenn were really Eastern teams. The Western players were supposed to make their sectional selection at the Kenwood tournament held at Chicago the third week in July, while the Eastern couples fought it out at Longwood a week later. No player could enter both tournaments, but there was nothing to prevent an Eastern team from choosing to compete at Chicago rather than at Longwood, and this is what actually happened. Ward and Davis, a team of Harvard Juniors, entered at Kenwood and beat out Bond and Collins for the right to meet the Longwood winners in East versus West at Newport. Now if it is really intended that this event should have a genuine sectional flavor, it is surely absurd that the spirit of the law should be so glaringly violated. Ward and Davis should not have been permitted to enter at Kenwood. They should have competed at Longwood or not at all. The so-called sectional and State championships are expressly devised for the purpose of bringing out young and local talent, and this purpose is quickly defeated if players from all over the country are allowed to compete. It is a reduction to absurdity when we see that Paret of New York is an ex-champion of Maine, while Ward and Davis of Harvard are the titular Western team.

M. D. WHITMAN.

Whitman and Wrenn made a surprisingly poor showing before their younger rivals, and Ward and Davis met Ware and Sheldon, the title-holders, on Wednesday. It was a most exciting contest, and three times the challengers were within one stroke of the set and match. It was only Ware's magnificent "getting" that finally enabled the champions to pull out. Sheldon has played but little this season, and the pair had only appeared together in two of the season's tournaments. On both occasions they were beaten, and Ward and Davis won from them in straight sets at Magnolia a week ago.

The single matches were interrupted by the rain on Friday, and up to the time of going to press the final result was in doubt. Whitman has ranked as favorite all through the tournament, and on his true form should win.

The weeding-out process was uninteresting, although the matches in which Richard Stevens was drawn all showed good tennis. The veteran's fierce ground strokes are as effective as ever, and it was a genuine surprise when he finally went down before the clever net-play of Dwight Davis. Bond, the Western player, also did well, and is fancied to meet the winner of the Whitman-Ware match in the finals.

It is extraordinary how Harvard University continues to figure in the annual distribution of tennis honors. It has been so from the days of R. D. Sears down to the triple championship of Bob Wrenn, and the crimson was certainly well represented in this year's event. The three teams that competed for the double championship were all composed of Harvard men, and of the four players in the semi-finals three were from the university at Cambridge.

W. G. VAN T. S.

The Husband's Return to Spain. "Dost thou not know me, sweet Inez? I was a little thing like thee when I left. See what the Americanos have done to your Pedro."

"Where's my dinner? The Americanos never kept me waiting."

"What! only soup? I am used to five courses. This is only a starter."

"I'll go to market myself. My wife don't buy enough to feed a cat."

"Ah! This is the first square meal since I've been home. It puts me in mind of that land of plenty and humanity, Uncle Sam."

"Ha! There's Americanos ship. I'll get a passage for Inez and me. Inez will starve here, poor thing."

Makes up a party of two other ex-captives, and with Inez goes back to America. "Vivan los Americanos!"

HOW UNCLE SAM'S TREATMENT OF THE CAPTIVE SPANISH SAILORS AFFECTED THEM ON THEIR RETURN TO SPAIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

The Standard Brand of the Best Whiskey is

HUNTER BALTIMORE RYE.

Rich, Pure Flavor.

Perfectly Matured and Mellow, Tonical and Restorative.

Sold at all First-class Cafes and by Jobbers.
WM. LANAHAN & SON, Baltimore, Md.

"Heaven's last, best gift, my ever new delight."
—MILTON.

A smoker's "outfit" is not complete unless it has a box of

Yale Mixture

A Gentleman's Smoke

for, while it costs a trifle more than inferior kinds, it is the most satisfying

PIPE TOBACCO.

STATEMENT
OF
THE TRAVELERS
Life and Accident Insurance Company,
OF HARTFORD, CONN.
Chartered 1864. [Stock.] Life and Accident Insurance.
JAMES G. BATTERSON, Pres't.

Hartford, Conn., January 1, 1898.

PAID-UP CAPITAL, - $1,000,000.00

| | |
|---|---|
| Assets (Accident Premiums in the hands of Agents not included.) | $22,868,994.16 |
| Liabilities, | 19,146,359.04 |
| Excess Security to Policy-holders, | $3,722,635.12 |

July 1, 1898.

| | |
|---|---|
| Total Assets (Accident Premiums in the hands of Agents not included.) | $24,103,986.67 |
| Total Liabilities, | 19,859,291.43 |
| Excess Security to Policy-holders, | $4,244,695.24 |
| Paid to Policy-holders since 1864, | $35,660,940.19 |
| Paid to Policy-holders January–July, '98, | 1,300,493.68 |
| Loaned to Policy-holders on Policies (Life), | 1,161,705.00 |
| Life Insurance in Force, | 94,646,669.00 |

GAINS.

6 Months—January to July, 1898.

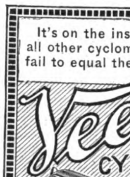
| | |
|---|---|
| In Assets, | $1,234,992.51 |
| In Surplus (to Policy-holders), | 522,060.12 |
| In Insurance in Force (Life Department only), | 2,764,459.00 |
| Increase in Reserves, | 705,642.18 |
| Premiums Received, 6 Months, | 2,937,492.77 |

JOHN E. MORRIS, Secretary.
EDWARD V. PRESTON, Sup't of Agencies.
J. B. LEWIS, M.D. Medical Director and Adjuster.
SYLVESTER C. DUNHAM, Counsel.
NEW YORK OFFICE, 31 Nassau St.

VICI Leather Dressing

The best Shoe Dressing in the world. The genuine is made only by Robert H. Foerderer, Philadelphia, manufacturer of the famous



VICI KID

Ask your dealer for Vici Leather Dressing, and be sure the trade-mark with the name of the maker, is on each box or bottle. Imitations may ruin your shoes.

A book about buying, wearing and caring for shoes, mailed free Address
ROBERT H. FOERDERER, Philada., Pa.

It's on the inside that all other cyclometers fail to equal the

Veeder CYCLOMETER

DUST PROOF
WATER PROOF
POSITIVE ACTION
CATALOGUE FREE

VEEDER MFG. CO. HARTFORD CONN.

See that Hole?

WHAT IS IT FOR?

To insert a pointed instrument and eject the pen from the holder. Prevents the ink from flowing back into the holder and soiling the fingers.

Samples on receipt of return postage. Ask for Vertical No. 37.

The perfection of pens, slightly stiff, smooth points, durable, and uniform.

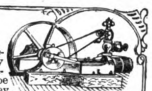
SPENCERIAN PEN CO.
450 Broome St., New York, N. Y.



On your Summer Outing take a box of Huyler's

Sent Everywhere by mail or express.
863 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

DELICIOUS BONBONS CHOCOLATES

MONEY

is not more surely a defence against poverty than technical knowledge that can always be converted into money. You can learn now without leaving home. Success guaranteed. Best text books free.

STEAM ENGINEERING

Bridge, Electrical or Civil Engineering; Mathematics; Chemistry; Mining; Architectural or Mechanical Drawing; Surveying; Plumbing; Architecture; Metal Pattern Drafting; Prospecting; Book-keeping; Shorthand; English Branches

TAUGHT BY MAIL

Circular free. State subject you wish to study. Estab. 1891. 45,000 students and graduates.
The International Correspondence Schools, Box 1159 Scranton, Pa.

$2.00 a Month

IF YOU'RE A PIPE SMOKER A TRIAL WILL CONVINCE THAT

GOLDEN SCEPTRE

IS PERFECTION

SEND 10cts FOR SAMPLE PACKAGE — PRICES 1lb 1.30, ½lb 40cts POSTAGE PAID. CATALOGUE FREE.

SURBRUG, 159 FULTON ST., N.Y. CITY.

THE BEST PENS ARE

ESTERBROOK'S

LEADING NUMBERS:
048, 14, 130, 239, 313, Al, 556.

PENS IN ALL STYLES, FOR EVERY PURPOSE.
FOR SALE BY ALL STATIONERS.
The Esterbrook Steel Pen Co.
26 John St., N.Y. Works, Camden, N. J.

PENS

ESTERBROOK & CO. PROFESSIONAL PEN

CHICKEN

NOVEL MEXICAN DELICACY.

Minced chicken, highly seasoned with Mexican spices, and wrapped in corn husks. Unique, delightful. At grocers, or ½ pound can mailed for 10 cts in stamps. Booklet sent on request.

TAMALE

ARMOUR PACKING CO.
DEPARTMENT H
KANSAS CITY, MO. U.S.A.

IT ONLY WEIGHS 10 POUNDS

Makes a small package when deflated, and can be carried anywhere by anybody.

"PERFECTION" Air Mattresses

are a modern invention for Campers and Yachtsmen—they are waterproof, never become musty—and make a most comfortable and luxurious bed. Made to fit any irregular shape of bunks or cockpits.

Send for our illustrated catalogue.
MECHANICAL FABRIC CO.
Air Goods Department, Providence, R. I.

BRASS BAND

Instruments, Drums, Uniforms, Equipments for Bands and Drum Corps. Lowest prices ever quoted. Fine Catalog, 400 Illustrations, mailed free; it gives Band Music & Instructions for Amateur Bands.
LYON & HEALY 17 Adams St., Chicago.

WILL POWER and Personal Magnetism insure the otherwise impossible, making friends and business success. All possess this power. We show you how to use it. Key to Power, 30c., or 12c. and addresses of three ministers, teachers, or physicians. Circulars free. Address PROF. L. H. ANDERSON, H. Y., 88 Masonic Temple, Chicago.

In these half-dozen stories of the golf-links the reader will recognize some familiar types; he may even see himself, although he may not choose to acknowledge the likeness outside of the kindly seclusion of the family circle.

THE GOLFICIDE

And Other Tales of the Fair Green

By W. G. VAN T. SUTPHEN

With Illustrations. 16mo, Half Cloth, Colored Top, $1 00.

Lovers of King James's famous game will welcome this bright and inimitably humorous collection of golf stories.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

The tales are crisp, the humor is not strained, and there is about the volume that air of distinction which comports well with the place which the game holds in the world of sport. The complications which the eternal feminine adds to the ethical side of the game are well brought out.—Brooklyn Eagle.

New York HARPER & BROTHERS London
PUBLISHERS

THIRTY-SECOND NATIONAL ENCAMPMENT OF G. A. R. AT CINCINNATI, O.

Reduced Rates via Pennsylvania Railroad.

For the thirty-second National Encampment of G. A. R., to be held at Cincinnati, O., September 5 to 10, 1898, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will sell excursion tickets at rate of single fare for the round trip.

These tickets will be sold on September 3, 4, and 5, and will be good to leave Cincinnati returning not earlier than September 6 nor later than September 13, except that by depositing ticket with Joint Agent at Cincinnati on September 5, 6, 7, 8, or 9, and on payment of twenty-five cents, return limit may be extended so that passengers may remain at Cincinnati until October 2.

Shade Won't Work
Because it isn't mounted on
THE IMPROVED
HARTSHORN
SHADE ROLLER.
A perfect article. No tacks required. Notice name on roller when buying your shades.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

MALAPROPOS.

Miss Elderly. "That, Captain Fuddleton, is a portrait of my grandfather; he fought all through the War of Independence."

Captain Fuddleton. "Deah me, how—aw—frightfully—aw—anxious you must have been!"

Armour's Extract of Beef

"has that rich, beefy flavor."

For preparing soups, sauces, gravies, etc. "Culinary Wrinkles" gives many ways of using Extract. It's mailed free for the asking.

ARMOUR & COMPANY, CHICAGO.

Arnold Constable & Co.

Upholstery.

Velour Glacé.

Tapestry Silk Damask, for Curtains and Furniture Covering.

Real Lace Curtains.

Arabian, Marie Antoinette, Brussels, and Renaissance.

Tamboured Lace and Muslin for Sash Curtains.

Broadway & 19th st.

NEW YORK.

Nathan B. Goodnow & Co.,

BANKERS.

ESTABLISHED 1873.

2 Post Office Sq., Boston, Mass.

Transact a General Banking Business, including the Purchase and Sale of Stocks, Bonds, and Grain, for Investment or on Margin.

Dealers in Government and Railroad Bonds.

Books containing Four-Year Range of Prices, Dividends, and Earnings sent free on request.

A Permanently Invested Fund of over TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FOUR THOUSAND DOLLARS is held as a Guaranteed Security for all persons having business with us.

Correspondence solicited.

STEVENS

Favorite No. 17.

"STEVENS FAVORITE" RIFLE.

"Take Down" model, 22-inch barrel, weight 4½ pounds. Carefully bored and tested. For .22, .25, and .32 rim-fire cartridges.

17, Plain open sights, $6.00
18, Target sights, $8.50
19, Lyman sights, $9.00

Ask your dealer for the "FAVORITE." If he doesn't keep it, we will send, prepaid, on receipt of price.

Send stamp for our complete catalogue.

J. Stevens Arms & Tool Co.,

POST-OFFICE BOX 210,

Chicopee Falls, Mass.

Divide a cake of Ivory Soap with a stout thread and you have two perfectly formed cakes of convenient size for the toilet.

WARNING.—There are many white soaps, each represented to be "just as good as the 'Ivory';" they ARE NOT, but like all counterfeits, lack the peculiar and remarkable qualities of the genuine. Ask for "Ivory" Soap and insist upon getting it.

Copyright, 1897, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati.

BELLES-LETTRES

Early Letters of George William Curtis

To John S. Dwight: Brook Farm and Concord. Edited by George Willis Cooke. Post 8vo, Cloth, Uncut Edges and Gilt Top, $1 50.

Collections and Recollections

By One Who Has Kept a Diary (George W. E. Russell). With One Illustration. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, Deckel Edges and Gilt Top, $2 50.

Memories of a Rear-Admiral

Who has Served for More than Half a Century in the Navy of the United States. By S. R. Franklin, Rear-Admiral U. S. Navy (Retired). Illustrated. 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, Deckel Edges and Gilt Top, $3 00.

Social Pictorial Satire

Reminiscences and Appreciations of English Illustrators of the Past Generation. By George du Maurier. With Illustrations. Post 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 50.

A Boy I Knew

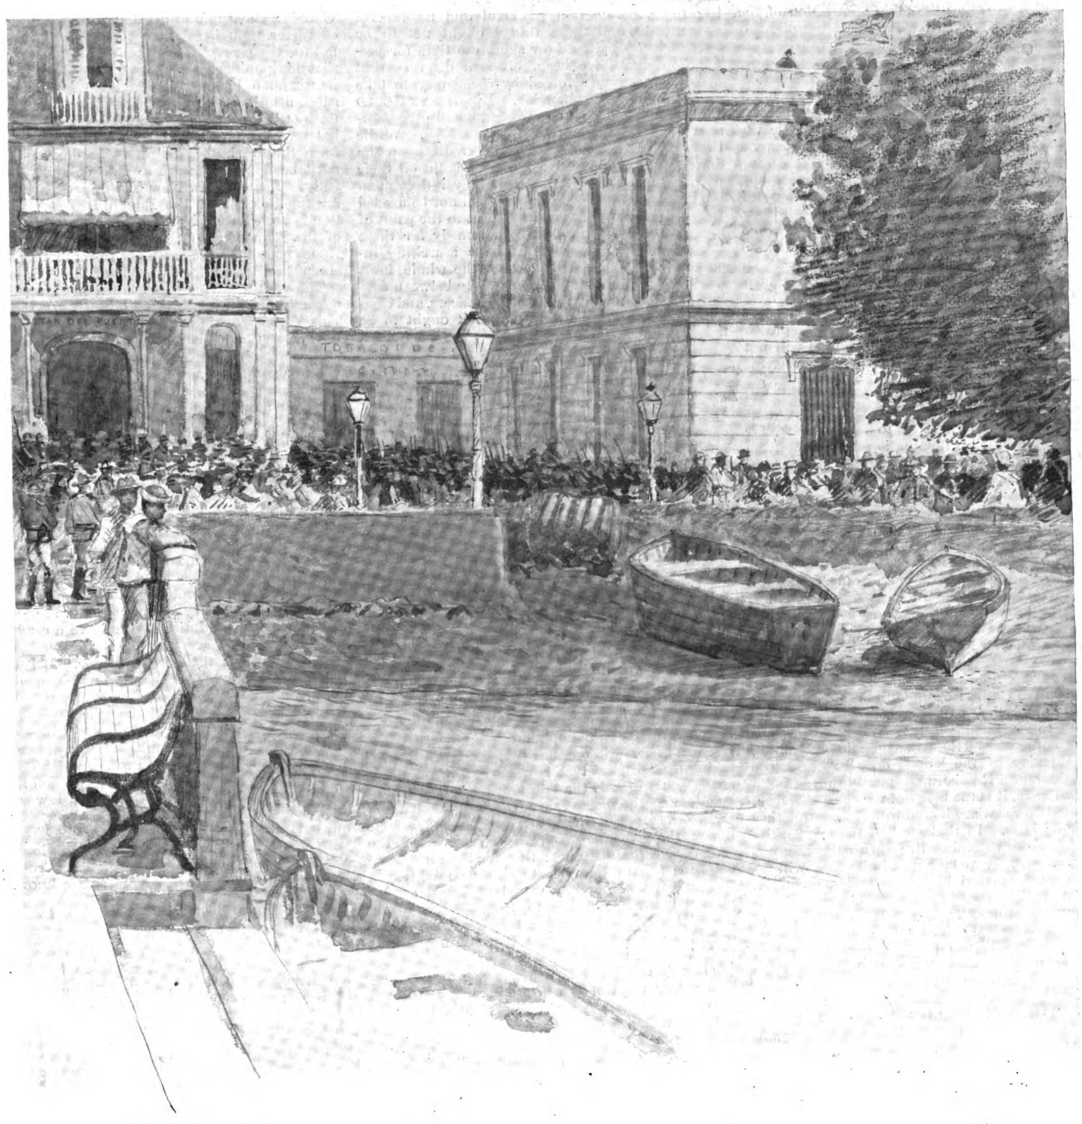
And Four Dogs. By Laurence Hutton. Profusely Illustrated. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Ornamental, $1 25.

NEW YORK HARPER & BROTHERS LONDON

PUBLISHERS

"AMERICA'S GREAT RESORTS," 48 pages, with map, sent free on receipt of a two-cent stamp by GEORGE H. DANIELS, G. P. A. New York Central, New York.

Digitized by Google



Original from PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE WELCOME TO THE BATTLE-SHIPS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XLII.—No. 2176. NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1898. TEN CENTS A COPY. FOUR DOLLARS A YEAR.
Copyright, 1898, by HARPER & BROTHERS. All Rights Reserved.

THE OCCUPATION OF PONCE.

DRAWN BY CARLTON T. CHAPMAN, SPECIAL ARTIST FOR "HARPER'S WEEKLY" WITH GENERAL MILES'S FORCES.—[SEE PAGE 863.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

HARPER'S WEEKLY

(TWENTY-FOUR PAGES)

NEW YORK CITY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1898

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS

New York City: Franklin Square

The Amateur Sport Department will be resumed before the end of the year, probably on the return of Mr. CASPAR WHITNEY from the Hawaiian Islands, where he has gone on a mission for HARPER'S WEEKLY. In the mean time he is preparing his promised papers on the present condition of Sport in France, Germany, and England, and also a series of articles, entitled "The Jungle-Hunter," in which he will give the results of his shooting-trips in Siam, Malaya, and Sumatra.

THE descriptions that have come to us of the ceremonies attending the taking possession of the Hawaiian Islands by this country are not pleasant reading. There was a silent, almost solemn protest on the part of the natives against the change, which shows that we are ruling there over a hostile people, who look upon us not only as interlopers, but as plunderers of their land. The best that we can hope for is that time and the character of the government we establish there will reconcile the natives to our rule.

WE are already beginning to get a glimpse of the questions that may arise by reason of our new possessions in the West Indies. Canada wants to know whether she can ship fish to Puerto Rico and Cuba free, and has suggested a trade with us of the inshore fishery rights in Canada in return for free fish in the Antilles. We have not yet heard from Gloucester on this subject, and when we do we will learn that there are still some trade questions, owing to our tariff law, which will not help along our growing friendship with Great Britain.

IT is very good news for the whole State that Mr. ROOSEVELT has consented to be a candidate for Governor, even if his nomination shall come from the hands of PLATT. What Mr. QUIGG said to him, and what he said to Mr. QUIGG in reply, when the latter made his pilgrimage to Oyster Bay to see the Colonel of the Rough Riders, we do not know, of course, but we are perfectly sure that Mr. ROOSEVELT did not in any way compromise himself with QUIGG or with PLATT. He is a Republican and a politician, and he is also a gentleman and a man of honor; and if he should be elected Governor, we are quite sure that no independent or Democrat who may vote for him will be disappointed by finding him a truckler to the boss or to his machine.

WHETHER or not England and Russia are to come to blows over China it is difficult to say. It seems now as though the two nations are doomed, sooner or later, to an armed conflict. Whether the cause of the coming war be Russian aggressions in China, or the policy of the "open door" against the closed door, or a Russian movement towards India or into Persia, it is the belief of the close observers that the two races are bound to fight one another sooner or later. In that conflict the sympathies of the American people will be with the Englishmen; but whether we take part in it or not will depend upon our material interests, and our material interests will be largely determined by our holdings in the Pacific. To-day, Russian possession of China would be better for us than Chinese possession, and while British possession would be still better for us, the gain would not be so great as to warrant our participation in a war.

UNDOUBTEDLY it is only necessary to call the attention of the good people of this country to General YOUNG'S plea for the regulars at Montauk Point to remedy the wrong of which he complains. It is natural that the people at home should think first of the volunteers, who have so recently left them. They are their friends, their relatives, and their neighbors. It is natural that the first delicacies should go to the sick volunteers at Montauk, but it will be disgraceful if the regulars there continue to be neglected. We are sure that this neglect will not continue, now that the attention of the charitable and patriotic is called to the fact that the sick and wounded men who did most of the fighting, who won our victory for us, and upon whom we must depend in every war, are actually suffering for lack of ordinary comforts and delicacies. That these men, who are suffering in silence and in obedience, should still be living on hard-tack and bacon, some of that being mouldy, is the fault of the government; but if the government thus neglects its brave citizens we are sure that the people will not, and that those who have carried food and comforts to the volunteers will see to it that the regulars no longer lack.

WE sincerely trust that the President and Mr. ALGER will succeed in finding out who is responsible for the conditions prevailing at Montauk Point. Judging from newspaper reports, they are not only disgraceful, but criminal. Sick soldiers are brought to Camp Wikoff only to find a lack of hospital accommodations, and insufficient and incompetent surgeons. Not only that, but sometimes the sick go for many hours, sometimes for more than a day, without necessary nourishment. Sick and dying men, it is said, are lying upon the floor for lack of cots. The milk which is necessary for their sustenance sours because there are no refrigerators. The water at Camp Wikoff is insufficient in quantity and bad in quality, and the consequence is that typhoid fever is progressing there. This is a powerful and resourceful government, and these things ought not to be true of it, no matter how short the time for preparation may have been. It is a disgrace that private citizens are forced by sheer pity to take care of the government's sick. Miss HELEN GOULD has generously contributed $25,000, and other persons have given according to their means. While these contributions reflect great credit upon the donors, and indicate the sincerity both of their patriotism and their humanity, they reflect upon the government, because they would not be needed were the government not inefficient to the point of cruelty. There must first be a remedy for these things, and then there must be a searching inquiry. We do not believe that the whole fault lies with the doctors; but somewhere between doctors, quartermasters, commanding officers, and Congress rests the responsibility, and it ought to be determined.

OUR GOVERNMENT AND COLONIES.

THERE are few and not altogether satisfactory signs that the politicians realize that our changed conditions have created new duties and responsibilities for the government. It has, indeed, dawned upon some minds among them that the campaign at Santiago betrayed a sickening degree of incapacity in the staff corps of the army; that while the fighting arm of the service has won renown, the campaign beyond that has brought us little credit. It has occurred to some, too, that we shall now need a much larger army and a much larger navy than we have hitherto possessed; that we must have means for defending our distant possessions, and to keep in order our subject peoples, who do not yet take kindly to our rule. Beyond these crude and obvious suggestions the minds of our politicians do not travel.

We have already under our control Cuba, Puerto Rico, and Hawaii. We may eventually take the Philippines. It is not certain that we shall, but it is likely, unless public opinion becomes wiser than it seems to be. No one has yet given a reason for taking these islands that is worthy of the slightest consideration. All the talk that we have heard of our duty to the distant savages who inhabit them and to the world at large is vaporing. The facts remain that, commercially, they are not worth the cost of their maintenance; that for the little trade which a few of our private citizens might gain there, the whole country would be forced to pay annual taxes amounting to from $20,000,000 to more than $100,000,000; that they will not be colonized by white men; that they cannot be exploited except by the forced labor of subject races—and this is mainly true of all our new possessions; that most of the islands and most of the millions of savages of the Philippines know no rule but their own, being only theoretically under the rule of Spain; and that we shall be at the same time at war with them for many years, and responsible for every act of violence which any of them may commit against friendly foreigners. The idea of annexing the Philippines is folly bordering upon madness, and we trust that delay will be accompanied by thoughtfulness, for thoughtfulness, we are sure, will prevent the consummation of a folly which, besides the other evils it will bring upon us, will make us a probable participant in the barbarous war threatened in Asia for the alleged expansion of civilization—meaning what all the colonization of our day means, the expansion of trade and commerce, an expansion which, it is true, does often mean the spreading abroad of civilization and order, justice and religion, but which has only been directly wholesome when not forced upon unwilling peoples by bloody wars.

The Philippines aside, the country has assumed new duties and responsibilities which will severely tax our system of government, and our politicians are showing no adequate conception of the magnitude or character of the momentous change. It is easily and airily said that we Americans will rise to the occasion, and will be found adequate to the new tasks which we have assumed. But it is forgotten that "we Americans" do not control our government, and we have shown little sign of any intention to take the first step toward rising to our responsibilities. Only in New York can the war be said to have affected politics, and here it is likely that a popular hero, who happens also to be an honest politician, will be forced upon the Republican machine as a candidate for Governor. But it is not because of any of the statesmanlike qualities which he possesses that THEODORE ROOSEVELT is likely to be made Governor; it is because he is a picturesque and brave figure at the head of a picturesque and brave regiment, made up of kindred spirits from all ranks, conditions, and races of our country's society. Let us not be misunderstood, Mr. ROOSEVELT is a statesman of great intelligence and high character, though of some eccentricities; but it is not for the possession of these admirable qualities that his popularity is sweeping both PLATT and BLACK out of his way! And if this government is to succeed in its new tasks, men must be chosen to office not because they happen to be popular heroes, but because they are capable and willing to perform the work that ought to be done, and that must be done, if we are to rule colonies successfully. But even in New York, in this rising of for the Colonel of the Rough Riders, no intention is betrayed of depriving PLATT of the control of the Republican machine; the purpose of Mr. ROOSEVELT'S friends is simply to compel PLATT to accept their candidate as his own.

The very first step to be taken in rising to our new responsibilities is to rid ourselves of the boss. This democracy is to become responsible to the world for the management of distant lands that touch some of the sorest spots in European frontiers. While we may permit the boss to stand between us and our government so long as we manage only our own affairs, we ought not to permit him to exercise our power when we must accept the responsibility for all that he does in our colonies and in our relations with foreign governments. When we see the beginnings of a general revolt against this irresponsible and uncrowned king, we shall believe that the day has come when the people are beginning to rise to their responsibilities.

It is, however, the government and not the people who must carry on the work and perform the task. And what signs have been given by the men who make up the essential part of the government—Congress—that they are prepared or are preparing for their new duties? We have a crude and dangerous monetary system. Its discussion has been suspended, but the evil remains. It is likely to trouble us in our new relations with commercial powers. It is likely to come up at any time when large numbers of the people feel the stress of hard times, and then our colonial system will complicate and enhance our difficulties. Is any politician, with power, talking of the necessity of an immediate definite settlement of this question? We have a barbarous and foolish tariff law which does not yield sufficient revenue, and which, with our colonies, already threatens our new friendship with Great Britain. No politician has noticed this. We have no system for administering colonies. No member of Congress, so far as we know, has suggested the necessity of establishing a permanent colonial service. The reason is, undoubtedly, that most of them hope that colonies will increase the number of places into which they can inject their heelers and strikers. Even in the case of the army and navy, nothing has been suggested looking to the adoption of the fundamental and essential reforms. The curse of the army is Congressional control. The navy is far from being free from this evil, but it suffers much less from it than the army; and its efficiency is greater than that of its kindred service in proportion as political interference with it is less. We have seen no suggestion looking to the establishment of the army on a purely military basis, to the surrender by civilian politicians of the power which they have exercised to the detriment of the service, and even to the killing of brave soldiers. On the contrary, in the midst of war, when patriotism called upon these politicians to surrender powers for the exercise of which they are unfit, and to legislate for the good of both army and navy, Congress refused, and neglected to perform its obvious duty.

In the face of contemporary political conditions none but hopeful and thoughtless babblers can content themselves with saying that we Americans

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000002041148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google rise to our responsibilities and perform our new tasks to the satisfaction of the world. We do not perform our present tasks; and while the failure of the government to act has not been an unmixed evil, since inaction has helped to leave the individual unhampered, this cannot be true when we find ourselves the governors of other peoples. Then we must have a government that will act firmly, promptly, and certainly. We must have an executive independent in all its branches of Congressional meddling. We must have not only a sufficient army and navy, but an army and navy under the command of soldiers and sailors. When the country begins to recognize the extent of its task, and the character of the changes that must take place; when it learns that another breed of men than those who now compose Congress must be sent to Washington, and that the executive power must advance while the legislative power retires—then we may expect to find the democracy able to govern colonies. That the day will come at some time in the future we sincerely believe, but it is not here, nor is it near; and it is the duty of men who know and who write to prepare the country for its work, not to flatter it into the belief that, with its present politics and politicians, it is already so well prepared for it that it may safely assume the government of all the colonies offered to it.

"THE NEW CHIVALRY."

THAT is a very happy expression in which Mr. LABOUCHERE characterizes and praises the conduct of the war on the part of the United States. He explains what he means by "the new chivalry" as "manly, honest, generous, and chivalrous conduct." But "chivalry" is an element incapable of further reduction. What is "new" in American chivalry is its combination with the most practical and businesslike habits of mind. These seem to cursory observers to exclude it, and when it is found in connection with them and is not based upon illusion at all, the surprise of such observers leads them to call it "new."

To be terrible in war and generous after victory is not a modern ideal. It long antedates the age of chivalry. It was the motto of the Roman people, as expressed in one of the most famous lines of their greatest poet, Parcere subjectis, et debellare superbos.

But it is gratifying to find that Europe recognizes it in the most energetically industrial of modern nations. Most gratifying of all is it to have it recognized by those whom we have beaten and then spared. Such a recognition has come to us in a fuller measure than it ever came from vanquished to victors before in the history of the world. The published letter in which Admiral CERVERA has given formal expression to what he had often expressed in conversation, in which he bears testimony to the "royal" treatment which he and his officers and men have received from their captors, and says that he can take home "nothing but the kindest remembrances of such a people," is a trophy, so to say, worth preserving in the national archives. Another prisoner, a commander in the Spanish navy, supplements his admiral's statement with one upon his own account, saying that the victorious country has never in any way made him and his companions "feel as conquered prisoners. Although our enemy in war," he says, "in personal relations the American people do not know what hate is." More extraordinary and less precedented still is the message sent through General SHAFTER "to the American army," in which "PEDRO LOPEZ DE CASTILLO, private of infantry," on behalf of "11,000 Spanish soldiers," thanks the conquerors for their humanity and courtesy, and wishes them "all happiness and health in this land which will no longer belong to our dear Spain."

These are tributes such as no nation has ever received before from an enemy at the first bitterness of defeat. They do us great honor. But we ought not to forget that they are "equally honorable to both parties." We do not doubt that American naval officers in the position of the Spanish naval officers would rise to the same magnanimity, and not permit the sting of defeat to prevent them from bearing testimony to the magnanimity of the conquerors. They might do as well; they could not do better. But how many American privates of infantry would make it a point of self-respect to bear public testimony to the virtue of their conquerors? "We would not be fulfilling our duty as well-born men, in whose breasts there live gratitude and courtesy," begins Private PEDRO LOPEZ DE CASTILLO, "should we embark for our beloved Spain without sending to you our most cordial and sincere good wishes and farewell." Decidedly CERVANTES did not "smile Spain's chivalry away," as BYRON untruly declared. It may not be "new," but there is still real substance in it.

But the Jingoes and the blatherskites have no part in the achievements which have raised the American name. The American magnanimity which is acclaimed by Spanish magnanimity is not theirs. While the prostrate victim is applauding his conqueror, they are maturing schemes for ransacking his pockets. The question whether we shall retain the respect of mankind will depend upon the use we make of our victory. If we use it clearly and indisputably in the interest of civilization, keeping the solemn pledge we made at the outset of the war that it was not to be a war of aggrandizement or conquest, we shall not only retain, we shall increase the admiration our conduct of the war has won. If, in violation of our pledges, we use it to loot Spain of her possessions, whether we really want them or not, the admiration of the world will be turned to a just contempt.

OUR GAINS IN THE WORLD'S COMMERCE.

RECENT returns have proved the immense advance of the export trade of the United States, and these are now supplemented by facts giving an international comparison, extending over a considerable period, and revealing our present position and perspective among the industrial powers of the world. The Swedish government recently issued a series of carefully prepared statistical tables covering the production and commerce of the world during five-year periods, beginning with 1871–5. Mr. CONSTABLE, the British consul at Stockholm, made a thorough examination of these tables, and reported the result to the British government, and a copy of the report has been received by the Bureau of Statistics at Washington. It deals chiefly with the production and growth of trade in iron, coal, cotton, and wheat; the comparative expansion of railways; the output of the world's gold and silver mines, and the total commerce of the leading nations. In this great array of figures the showing made by the United States is highly gratifying, and may be justly held to warrant in the near future an increase in the number of great staples in which we now hold the first place in production and commerce.

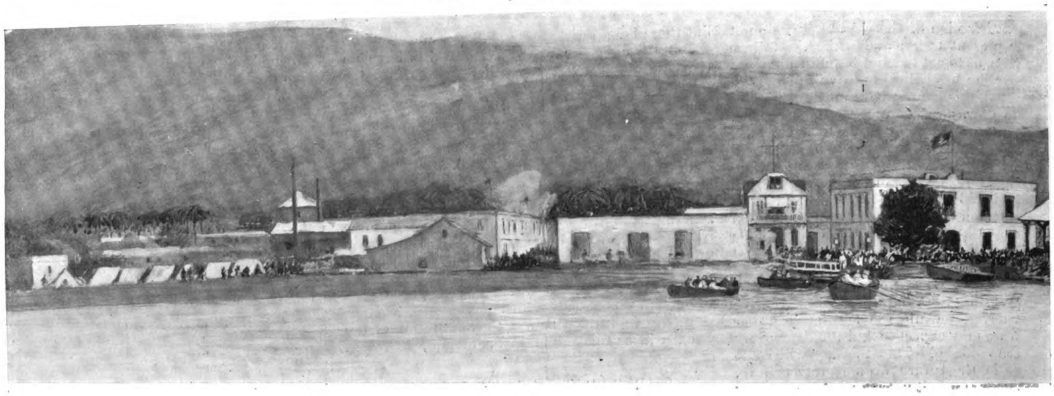
Taking the United States, Great Britain, France, and Germany as the chief pig-iron-producing countries, our progress is shown by the different averages of annual production. For example, in 1871–5 the average annual production of pig-iron in France was 1,265,000 tons, and in 1891–5 this had increased to 2,006,000 tons; Germany's production in 1871–5 was 1,946,000 tons, and in 1891–5 it was 5,082,000; Great Britain had increased from 6,562,000 tons in 1871–5 to 7,361,000 tons in 1891–5; while the annual production of the United States increased from 2,284,000 tons in 1871–5 to 8,263,000 tons in 1891–5, an increase of from 16.1 per cent. to 30.9 per cent. in our proportional share of the world's production. During the same period Great Britain's proportional share decreased from 40.3 to 27.5 per cent. In iron ore the comparison is equally decisive in our favor, Great Britain's production having decreased from 16,087,000 tons in 1871–5 to 12,249,000 tons in 1891–5, while the production of this country increased from 4,532,000 tons in 1871–5 to 14,288,000 tons in 1891–5.

In coal Great Britain is still first, her average annual output exceeding ours by nearly 24,000,000 tons; but here again the rate of increase is in our favor. Great Britain's annual output in 1871–5 was 126,972,000 tons, against 184,819,000 tons in 1891–5, while the output of the United States has increased from 45,283,000 tons in 1871–5 to 160,832,000 tons in 1891–5. Great Britain's annual output in 1871–5 was 47 per cent. of the world's total coal production, but now it is only 34 per cent., while our advance during the same period has been from 17 to nearly 30 per cent. of the world's annual production.

In the production of raw cotton our primacy is so preponderant as not to need any illustration, but in the consumption of this staple we have been running a well-contested race with Great Britain, especially since 1870. In this case the figures go back to 1830–40, since when Great Britain's average annual consumption has increased from 1,590,000 tons to 7,091,000 tons in 1891–4, while during the same period our increase has been from 376,000 to 5,522,000 tons per annum. Since 1870 Great Britain's annual consumption has increased by a fourth, while ours has doubled. We are by far the greatest grower of raw cotton, and stand next to Great Britain as a manufacturer of cotton goods.

A comparison of production in the different wheat-growing countries shows that the United States produce nearly one-fifth, the British colonies more than one-eighth, and Germany less than one-twentieth of the total wheat of the world.

In gold and silver the comparison is made between the United States, Germany, and the British colonies and dependencies. At present the United States produce 22 per cent. of the world's gold and 35 per cent. of its silver; while the United States together with the British colonies and dependencies produce more than one-half the world's annual output of gold, and nearly one-half the world's annual output of silver.



In discussing the growth of railways, the report notes the progress made by Great Britain, Germany, Russia, France, and the United States. Between 1870 and 1895 the length of railway lines in Great Britain and Ireland has increased by 9000 kilometres, in Russia by nearly 24,500 kilometres, in Germany by 27,624 kilometres, and in France by 22,486 kilometres, while in this country the increase is over 207,000 kilometres, which is nearly eight times the increase in Germany, and twenty-three times that in Great Britain and Ireland.

Of the world's commerce, Great Britain and Ireland's annual average increased from £573,888,888 in 1881–5 to £589,166,166 in 1891–5; Germany's commerce increased from an annual average of £306,611,111 to £352,777,777 within the same period; while the increase of the United States was from £302,333,333 to £347,333,333. Consul CONSTABLE has the following comment on these figures: "Thus during this period Great Britain's trade has increased by slightly more than 2½ per cent., that of Germany and the United States each by 15 per cent., while the trade of France has steadily declined. The volume of trade has, it need scarcely be said, increased to a much greater degree than is indicated by these figures, but, owing to the almost universal fall in the prices of commodities, the increase in the value of exports and imports has been less than might have been expected." The facts above set forth will prove to be a surprise, we venture to say, even to those who were prepared for a revelation of manufacturing and commercial strength; but their deep significance lies in the promise of greater things to come, and the further advance of a world-wide trade which needs no annexation of territory, but only a free commercial policy, and the enterprise and skill of our manufacturers and merchants, to secure the primacy it is destined to attain.

RED CROSS AND RED-TAPE.

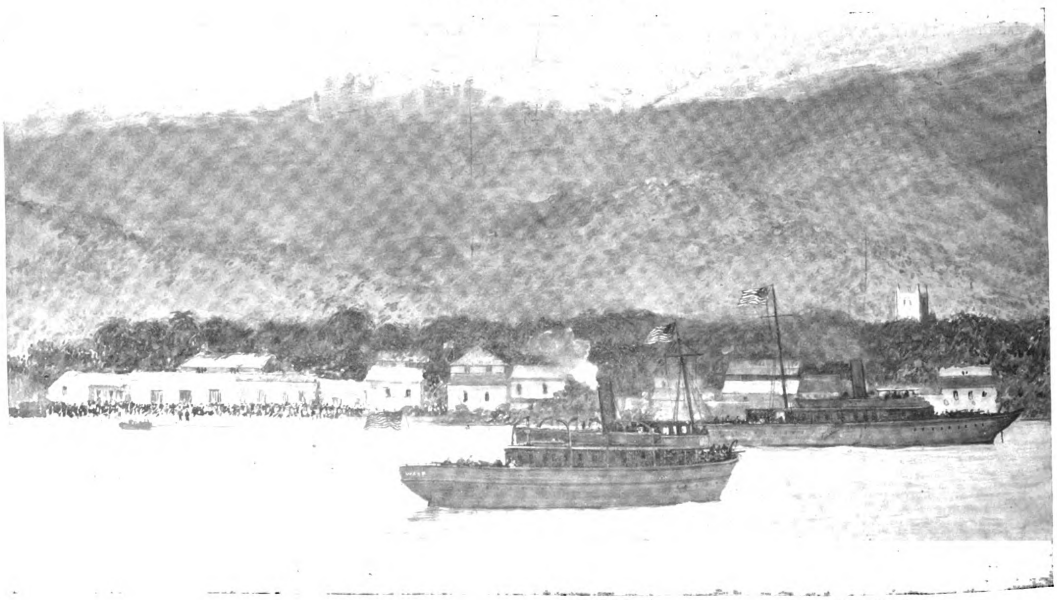
THERE has been a good deal of apparent friction between the Red Cross and the medical authorities of the army, but we are inclined to think that it has been more apparent than real. We know that many of the best surgeons of the army have accepted the Red Cross aid and relief, not only willingly, but gladly, and we have read testimonials written from the front by regular surgeons to the efficiency of Miss BARTON and her aids. A good deal of trouble has been caused by the red-tape system prevailing in the army, but this system is not to be charged to the medical department, although it is responsible for much, or to any executive department. It comes from the disposition of Congress to interfere in every administrative function of the government. The result of this interference is that not a dollar can be expended, and not a bit of the property of the government used, without following certain minute directions contained in statutes, except at the personal risk of the man primarily responsible. An instance of the petty character of Congressional interference in administrative functions is furnished by a story, which we have recently heard, of an officer who hired a tug in an emergency for the purpose of hauling into the stream a ship that was on fire, and which threatened some very valuable government stores upon the wharf, which were in his charge. This was illegal—that is, unstatutory—on the part of the officer, who, under the law, should have advertised for bids for hauling out the vessel. The consequences to him were very unfortunate. He paid the captain of the tug out of his own pocket, and a grateful country—meaning Congress—did not appropriate the money to repay him until two years had gone by. The medical department is hampered and tied up, as all other administrative departments are, by Congressional acts, such as that which made this officer smart for his diligence. The Red Cross has encountered this kind of entanglement, and we trust that its officers and aids know where the responsibility lies. As to the Red Cross itself, and Miss BARTON in particular, most noble work has been done, great self-sacrifices have been made, and enormous good has been accomplished. Miss BARTON is one of the heroic figures of this war, and the suggestion that she should be the first woman ever thanked by Congress is one worthy of serious consideration.

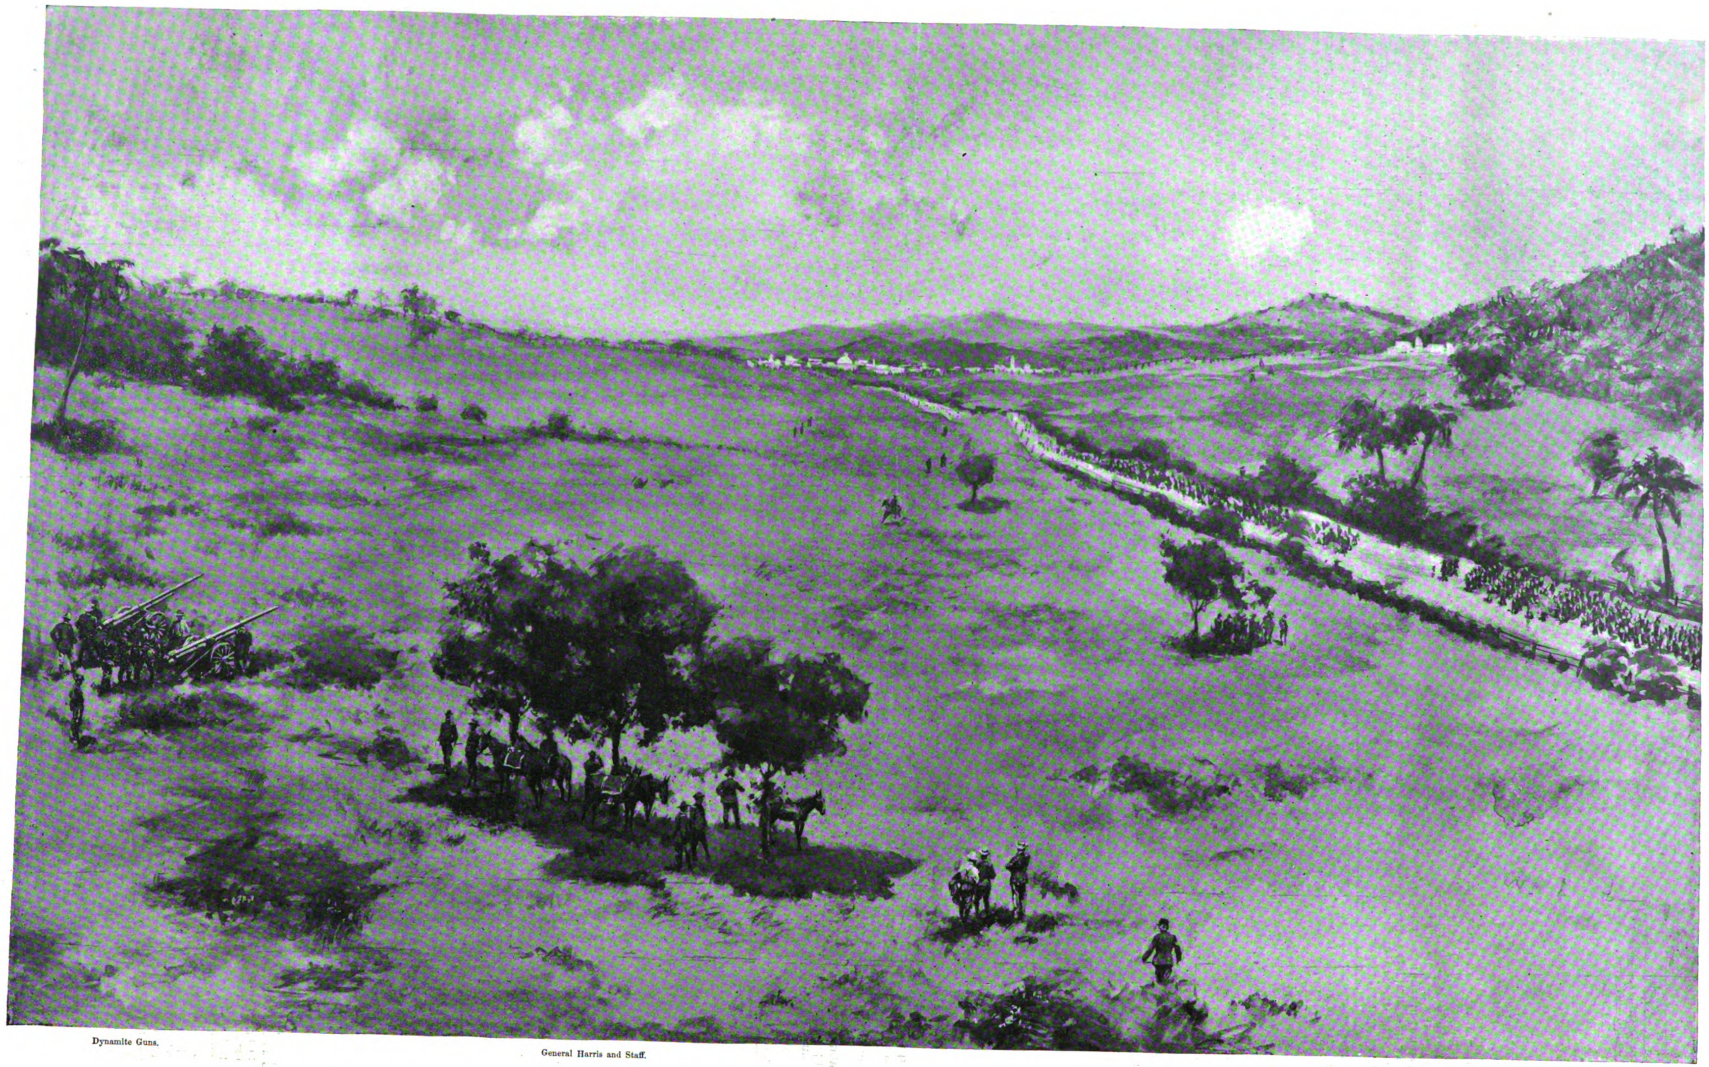
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



Warehouses. Main Street. Tobacco Warehouse. House of Captain of the Port. Custom-house.

PONCE, FROM THE HARBOR.

IN THE HARBOR OF PONCE.



"Wasp." "Gloucester."

HOW THE AMERICAN FLAG CAME TO ARROYO.

WITH OUR ARMY IN PUERTO RICO.

Drawn by Carlton T. Chapman, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly" with General Miles's Forces.—[See Pages 863 and 874.]

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE ADVANCE ON GUAYAMA, PUERTO RICO.

From a Sketch by T. Dart Walker, Special Artist for "Harper's Weekly" with General Miles's Forces, made on the Morning of Friday, August 5, 1898.

Original from PENN STATE
Digitized by Google
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THIS BUSY WORLD

THERE is an interesting significance in a newspaper despatch, dated August 17, which says that Chicago's National Business League, in making new plans for a peace jubilee late in October, has resolved to put the thing through if possible, and to use every effort to secure the presence of the President, Admiral Dewey, and Colonel Roosevelt and his Rough Riders. There is not any doubt that for spectacular uses the usefulest battle-scarred hero we have, next to Dewey, is Roosevelt. Perhaps it ought not to be so, but so it is. The National Business League of Chicago has merely recognized an existing fact.

The little sail-boat race in Canada between the representatives of the Seawanhaka-Corinthian Yacht Club of New York and the Royal St. Lawrence Yacht Club of Canada has proved a large enough teapot to hold a very disagreeable tempest. We have all read how the Canadian club entered a craft modelled like a catamaran, which surprised and displeased the American contestants, who felt, rightfully enough, that while the rules of the race did not expressly prohibit catamarans, common-sense and sound sportsmanship did prohibit them. Nevertheless, the American boat sailed against the Canadian freak and was beaten. But, under instructions received by telegraph from the Seawanhaka-Corinthian committee, Mr. Gibson, the club's official representative, declined to receive public hospitalities after the race, absented himself from the hop given in honor of the visitors by the Canadians, and went home in a state of ostentatious displeasure.

Hence we have a very sickly and grewsome international episode. The Canadians are angry, and say they will send the cup to New York and let it stay there, which is the expression of a natural feeling. The best opinion on our side of the river seems to be that our men might with propriety have declined to race the little catamaran, but, so long as they did race, they should have taken all the consequences, including a full round of Canadian hospitalities, and kept their experiences for future use. Squabbles over international yacht-races have so deeply disgusted and irritated the American people that they have no toleration for even a little one.

Our most important imports this last month seem to have been malarial and typhoid fevers brought back from Santiago, and it is small consolation to know that they have been offset by large exportations of typhoid germs from our camps to Puerto Rico, and by a very large increase in domestic production of the same germs for home consumption. All over the country there has been more anxiety about the health of soldiers since the war stopped than there was at any time during its continuance. It is a small family circle that has not got a sick soldier member on its hands, or in a hospital somewhere, or that is not very uneasy at the prospect of soon having one. We hear so much of fever cases and sick men that it seems as if the majority of our soldiers must be ailing. It isn't so bad as that. A large majority of them are still fit for service, and many of those even who were at Santiago are all right. A recent visitor to Montauk Point was impressed with the superior condition of the regular troops he saw there as compared with the volunteers—a condition ascribed to the superior ability of the regulars to take care of themselves in Cuban camps, and their willingness to go without food, if necessary, rather than imperil the constancy of their insides by indulgences in tropical fruits.

A conspicuous example of a Santiago veteran who keeps his legs is Colonel Roosevelt. He continues, to all appearances, as "disgracefully well" as when he landed, and if he has any mutinous germs in him he keeps them in subjection. The desire that he shall run for Governor appears at present to be widespread and irrepressible, and is based not only on the opinion that he could easily be elected, but that he would make a first-rate Governor. Cautious persons might object to Colonel Roosevelt as a candidate for President on the ground that he might want to annex Europe, whip Germany, build a bigger fleet than England has, keep a bigger standing army than the Czar's, and set up a wholesale administration business to regulate the affairs of the world. But as Governor of New York the colonel's scope would be limited, and though he might annex Nantucket and fortify the Erie Canal, most of his energies would be bent on promoting good civil government, killing bad laws, and appointing fit men to office. All that he could do to increase the efficiency of the standing army of the State would be well done, and he could not do too much.

The suggestion of nominating Captain William Astor Chanler for Governor or Lieutenant-Governor on the Democratic ticket to run against Colonel Roosevelt is interesting, though the basis of it is hardly visible enough as yet to entitle it to very grave consideration. Captain Chanler is a patriot of energy and ability, and a cordial supporter of Mr. Croker. He has not only a war record, but an interesting record as an explorer of the wilds of Africa. He is a good writer, a soldier commended for gallantry, and an agreeable gentleman. Nevertheless, an administrative office in New York State seems hardly suited as yet to Captain Chanler. Somewhere beyond the venue of the ten commandments—in some big outlying island of the Philippines perhaps—a man of his audacious enterprise might find a fitter field.

The makers of geographies ought to find a profit in the present nebulous condition of Uncle Sam's boundaries. The newspapers reported on August 18 that the New Hebrides had had a big earthquake, and that the island of Ambrym had been severely shaken, and covered seven inches deep with rain, and two with ashes from the volcano Lopevi. A few months ago we would have borne this news without a flutter; but coming when it did, it sent folks to the map to find out where on earth the New Hebrides might be, and whether Admiral Dewey captured them along with the rest of creation on the 1st of May. For years to come, apparently, when news comes by way of San Francisco of earthquakes, we shall wonder whether it was our volcano that got loose, and how big a bill Uncle Sam will have to pay in damages.

August 19 was pay-day at Camp Black, and the newspapers report that in the course of the evening the soldiers cleaned out all the camp canteens and also most of the saloons in the village of Hempstead. This was an effectual way to deal with the saloon evil, but it may be doubted if it was really so efficacious for the promotion of temperance as the course followed in the Seventh Army Corps at Camp Cuba Libre, near Jacksonville, Florida, where all company commanders have been instructed to recommend for discharge, on surgeon's certificate of disability, all cases of chronic alcoholism in their companies. The intention of this circular is to discourage whiskey-drinking. Alcoholism is rated as a disease not incurred in the line of duty, and a surgeon's certificate of discharge on that account would be of no value as a basis for a pension claim, and of no great use in proving the returning soldier's title to the esteem and gratitude of his home community.

Every day the newspapers have reports of disorder created and damage done by obstreperous or drunken volunteers. Bar-room brawls are common. There are, of course, many ne'er-do-wells and some criminals in our armies. In time the incorrigibles would be weeded out, and those amenable to correction would be improved by discipline. Meanwhile the ructions that our troops are responsible for are probably not more numerous or serious than we ought to expect. It is interesting and somewhat consoling to read that our British brethren have at Halifax a regiment of new Irish recruits which seems to be more disorderly than any of ours. During the week ending August 20 twenty-eight of its members were sentenced to imprisonment, and responsible men are so scarce among the rest of the rank and file that it has been necessary to send back to England for experienced sergeants to keep the men in order.

Word comes from Boston that Mayor Quincy and Water-Commissioner Murphy have established free ice-water fountains at various centres of their town, and have thereby incurred the protests of the neighboring saloon-keepers, hotel proprietors, soda-water venders, and dealers in soft drinks. The Mayor should have the doctors on his side. Free ice-water must make for the health of a city in hot weather. Certainly scarcely any drink that one can buy is a wholesomer hot-weather beverage than cold water, provided the water is good. In some cases interference with trade is a secondary consideration, and this would seem to be one of them.

On August 20, at Old Orchard, Maine, Parson Simpson of the Christian Alliance Convention made his annual call for funds for the spread of the gospel in heathen lands. It is stated that he took in about $55,000. Not so much by $10,000 as last year, not so much by $45,000 as in 1896, but still a large sum to raise at a missionary mass-meeting. The reports of Dr. Simpson's effort are not so full this year as formerly. The newspapers have still a great deal of ground to cover—Cuba, Puerto Rico, the Philippines, Spain, and Europe generally in a greater degree than of old, and all the great camps besides. That makes so lively a competition for space that only very important speeches, great disasters, and murders of exceptional interest can get in. Interesting murders, however, have abounded. Both the Grand Hotel murder and the candy-poisoning case have had enough mystery about them to give them intellectual interest.

The appointment of First-Lieutenant, Albert L. Mills, of the First United States Cavalry, to be superintendent of the Academy at West Point is so striking a departure from precedent that it has caused extreme surprise. The superintendent at West Point has usually been an officer of the engineer corps, and usually of a rank not lower than colonel, so that the appointment of a lieutenant of cavalry to that place is upsetting to preconceived notions of military propriety. Lieutenant Mills was chief of staff for General Young at Santiago, with the rank of captain, and greatly distinguished himself at the storming of San Juan heights, where he was severely wounded in the head and lost an eye. The appointment is understood to have been given him by the President as a reward for gallantry and good conduct. It is interesting to find the appointment especially commended by Major-General Wheeler in a message from Montauk Point to the Secretary of War. In evidence of Lieutenant Mills's special qualifications for the place, it is stated that he has served as instructor at the Military Academy and had charge last year of the department of strategy and tactics in the cavalry and infantry school at Fort Leavenworth. He was appointed to West Point from New York in 1874, and is stated to be nearly forty-five years old. A competent officer who has been twenty-four years in the army ought to be something more than a first lieutenant, and it is doubtless no fault of Lieutenant Mills's that he did not get his captaincy, at least, years ago. Whether it is expedient that the Military Academy should be put in charge of a lieutenant, however deserving, is a matter that will doubtless be as fully discussed beforehand as though the merits of the question were not in the way of being settled by experience.

It may not be too late yet to take note of the death of Isaac Hill Bromley, journalist, who died at Norwich, Connecticut, on August 11. He was born at Norwich in 1833, and was a member for two years of the somewhat famous class of '53 in Yale College. The record of his life is a record of many changes and shifts from various newspaper labors to various elective or appointive offices, under the government and otherwise. He studied law in Connecticut, was admitted to the bar in 1854, was clerk of the Connecticut Legislature for several years, and in 1858 established the Norwich Bulletin. He went to the war, and after the war to the Connecticut Legislature. Between 1868 and 1872 he edited the Hartford Post. After that he was connected for a time with the New York Sun, then (as editorial-writer) with the New York Tribune, and later edited the New York Commercial Advertiser for a short time before becoming a government director of the Union Pacific Railroad. In 1884 he took charge for a time of the Rochester Post-Express, and in October, 1891, after six years of service as secretary to the president of the Union Pacific Railroad, he rejoined the staff of the Tribune, and continued to be an editorial writer for that paper until a few months ago. He was a writer of unusual facility, and was particularly well known and valued for the quality of his humor. His gifts as an amusing and effective speaker were also very much appreciated, especially among the sons of Yale.

One of the most curious survivals which are open to inspection in this country is the continuance of croquet in Norwich, Connecticut. Croquet, as adult readers will remember, began during the civil war, reached its climax in the early seventies, and faded away as a fashionable pastime before lawn-tennis. Since then tennis has been dethroned by golf; but as it still maintains a hold upon the interest of some young and vigorous persons, so croquet has never absolutely died, but is still played by children, and in retired places by a few conservative grown-ups. There are still tennis tournaments in various places every year, though public interest in them is far from being what it was, but, so far as known, there is only one annual croquet tournament in this country—the one which is held every August in Norwich. Every year some of the newspapers report the Norwich croquet matches, and give the names and scores of the players, and tell where they come from. They are brought in, it seems, from Norwich and neighboring Connecticut towns, with sporadic recruits from Washington, Philadelphia, New Brunswick, Trenton, Cleveland, Pawtucket, Rhode Island, and other respectable places. It would seem that in the interest of science these curious matches ought to be more carefully observed and more fully reported than they are. We would like fuller information about the contestants and their appearance and habits, and how they came to be so. Also, whether they seem to be a dying race, and what prospect there is for the continuance of these weird encounters. The managers of our great natural-history museums will have reason to be mortified if they shall discover some day that they have allowed the race of adult croquet-players to become extinct without securing specimens for their collections.

Another strange band, the philatelists, had their annual conventions in New York, beginning August 23. There is no sign of decadence among the stamp-collectors. Their industry has its vicissitudes, like all others, and it is reported to have felt of late some ill effects from the war; but it is firmly established, with thousands of traders back of it, and only falls off to rise again, like the tides. Four distinct stamp-collecting societies have held conventions in New York within a fortnight. The most important of them is the American Philatelic Association, with 700 members. Any one who has ever been a collector can imagine how the stamp-collectors have gossiped about the concerns of their fad. Special subjects of interest were the effect of annexation on the price of old Hawaiian stamps, and the effects of the war upon the colonial stamps of Spain. It is stated that naval officers in time of peace (and Admiral Dewey among others) are especially interested in stamp-collecting.

There is a serious time ahead for American sculptors and all persons interested in American art, and especially for five well-known and worthy gentlemen who have agreed to be members of the Lafayette Monument Commission. The object of this commission is to set up in Paris a monument to Lafayette by an American sculptor. Commissioner-General Ferdinand W. Peck, of the Paris Exposition, seems to be the moving spirit in the matter, and the members of the commission who have agreed to serve have sent their acceptances to him. There may be nine of them; at last accounts (August 20) there were five: John W. Mackay, Senator Allison of Iowa, Dr. Edward Everett Hale, Frank Thompson, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and Alexander H. Revell, of Chicago. Certainly this is a competent quintette, and equal to a great variety of undertakings. The Chicago despatch which records their acceptance as commissioners says that the plan of action is to send letters to a lot of American sculptors, asking them to submit designs, and then to have the commission select the best design and prepare an inscription for the monument. It does not say that the plan is to have the monument done in time for the exposition, but that seems to be the intention. Undoubtedly designs can be obtained, a selection made, the work of construction "rushed," and a monument be furnished in time for the exposition; but whether it will be such a monument as the authorities of Paris will allow to be exhibited permanently in their town remains to be seen. In so far as present information goes, the prospect is not particularly favorable.

President Baldwin of the Long Island Railroad seems to have won a fair rating as a war hero by his enormous and successful efforts to connect Montauk Point at short notice with civilization. An admiring correspondent of the Sun, who seems to have had personal cognizance of Mr. Baldwin's achievements, says that he had only six days' notice of the government's selection of Montauk as a camp-ground, and in that time contrived marvels of preparation. There was very little at Montauk when the American eagle determined to perch there, and the choice was made in the midst of the Long Island Railroad's busy season. A week later there were freight-houses, sheds, and many miles of new-laid track, as well as a considerable collection of rolling stock hired in to meet the emergency. There has since been a vast deal of complaint about the backwardness of the government work at Montauk, and the inadequacy of the hospitals, and the scarcity of proper food, and all such matters; but, so far as the present paragrapher has noticed, there has been little or no reasonable complaint about the inability of the Long Island Railroad to handle its business. Judging from the absence of indications to the contrary, President Baldwin must have hustled to good purpose.

Persons who are disposed to consider that exercise and physical development are the things most needful to make life worth while must have been pained and perhaps disconcerted to read of the unusually bad condition of affairs in the family of James Corbett, the prize-fighter. After Patrick Corbett, the fighter's father, had killed his wife and then himself, a son, John, was released from State prison to attend the funeral of his parents. Misfortunes may pile up on the worthiest of families, but, on the whole, the inference seems justified that the identification of the Corbetts with the manly art of knocking out has not proved a source of moral strength.

E. S. MARTIN.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

THE OCCUPATION OF PONCE.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF "HARPER'S WEEKLY."]

PONCE, PUERTO RICO, U.S.A., August 1, 1898.

THE harbor of Ponce is simply an open roadstead, in which occasional vessels anchor to load with molasses, sugar, rum, or tobacco. A flat beach fringed with mangoes, that grow in dense, tangled, impenetrable masses, forms a kind of natural breakwater to the eastward, and stops, in a measure, the force of the heavy ground-swell and the eternal trade-wind.

Time has made few changes in the methods of doing business here; ships anchor for one month or six, and their cargoes are leisurely floated to and from the shore in lighters with flat bottoms and slanting ends—unwieldy things that are managed, however, with great skill by the native boatmen.

Along the flat beach the town stretches and spreads back into the country. One-story warehouses, substantially built, and painted in tints of pink, yellow, or pale blue, front the principal streets, filled with bales and bags of rice, sugar, tobacco, and flour; for a considerable business is done in this the port of entry for the handsome city of Ponce, which is back in the country, at the foot of gently sloping hills, and reached from the Playa by a broad level road, shaded by trees, and flanked by fertile fields, sugar factories, handsome houses set back from the road mid flowers and palms, or tumble-down wooden shanties—all sorts in the two-mile drive.

The house of the captain of the port is a two-and-a-half-story wooden affair, with signal pole and yards on top. Balconies and awnings give it an air of comfort. In front is a wooden pier, where boats can land with ease when there is no surf, and with difficulty when it runs high; a flying leap well done and you gain the platform, while the boat backs off for another chance or bangs against the pier. Across a narrow street is the custom-house, mayor's house, post-office, and headquarters of the civil government of the Playa del Ponce—a handsome two-story plastered building, with an open court running through the centre.

In front is a great mango-tree, whose dense foliage spreads over a little iron fountain, where horses are watered, and men loaf from morning till night, while the sun beats down on the white walls and hot gravelled square.

In front of the custom-house a dock has been recently built, covered with an open iron shed. Another shed adjoins to the right of the custom-house, and both these shelters came in very handily for the vast stores that followed the army ashore from the ships of the quartermaster's department.

When we first saw Ponce, shining in the early morning sunlight, the United States flag was flying from the staff on top of the custom-house and office of the captain of the port. The transports were getting in as close to the land as possible, and navy launches were towing lighters full of soldiers ashore. By ten o'clock General Miles had landed and made his headquarters in the custom-house, and the blue and gold headquarters flag flashed its colors beside the stars and stripes, each held and guarded by a husky soldier sitting on the roof of the old Spanish building.

On the wooden shutters of one of the windows was scrawled in pencil, dated the day previous, a touching farewell to the dear walls of the old Aduana, where so many happy days he had passed. I spelled it out slowly, and smiled at the expense of "Don José," whom the sight of Yankee ships on the horizon had compelled to take so hasty a departure.

Perhaps, however, he may have his place back in time; but he will not have so much leisure to smoke cigarettes and lounge over the balcony through the sleepy days, while the empty harbor sparkles in the sunlight. For a new order of things has come to Ponce. The busy life of the North has already touched with its magic this sleeping El Dorado. Wake it must to the new condition; touched with new life, inspirited by new energy, and strengthened by more just and equitable laws, its prosperity is assured. All that the boundless wealth of nature has so liberally given will be added too, until this fertile island and kindly people will form one of the richest and most valuable possessions of the greater United States.

On Monday, the 25th of July, the Columbia, carrying 300 men composing the first battalion of the Sixth Illinois Regiment, the Wasp, Gloucester, and Dixie, convoying a part of the troops of General Miles, consisting of the Sixth Massachusetts and Third Wisconsin volunteers, Eleventh regular infantry, and one battalion of engineers, had arrived at Guanica, on the southwest end of Puerto Rico.

Ever since the bombardment of San Juan by Admiral Sampson's fleet, on the 12th of May, preparations had been made for the reception of the American navy and army in case of a second attack. Fortifications had been strengthened, rifle-pits and batteries erected, and a warm greeting planned for los Americanos in case they came back. Misleading telegrams had been given to the press and sent from Guantanamo and Mole St. Nicholas by General Miles, stating that the American army of invasion would land at one of two places on the north coast of Puerto Rico. Cape San Juan was selected as one, and several ships were sent there in charge of a naval convoy to make a feint of landing. This was done with intention of deceiving the enemy, and succeeded admirably, for preparations were made in exactly the wrong place to meet the Americans, and Guanica, the first place really selected, was taken by surprise, and, undefended, offered no resistance to the landing.

The transports with the naval convoy arrived off Guanica early in the morning, and the Gloucester, ahead, felt her way slowly in, while the fleet remained outside. The little town was silent, but a Spanish flag flew on a tall staff near the shore; after firing a few shots the Gloucester sent in a landing party of about twenty men under Lieutenant Huse. They carried a Colt automatic gun with them, and when Lieutenant Huse ordered the Spanish flag hauled down and the stars and stripes hoisted, they were fired upon by a force of about eighty Spaniards secreted behind houses and corners of the streets. The fire was promptly returned. The Colt automatic was turned up the streets, and the Gloucester firing from her 6-pounders over and into and around the town, the place was soon completely deserted. None of our men was injured, but four Spanish soldiers were found dead, and probably a number of wounded were carried off.

The harbor of Guanica is landlocked and deep, so all the ships could come close in, and the work of landing the soldiers began at once, and by night the place was in full possession of our troops. Pickets were posted, and to many of them the enemy's country possessed many terrors that dark night. The gloomy hills and black masses of trees held hidden menace for untried men fresh from the crowded life of a transport. Firing began on the picket-line about midnight, and kept up at intervals during the night, keeping General Miles, out on the Yale, on the anxious-seat as to what it was all about. Morning proved that the cause of all the alarm was a group of cattle moving about in the gloom, and surviving with greatest indifference the fire of the pickets. The Lampasas had on board the battalion of engineers, and having practised at Guantanamo the art of building a pontoon bridge successfully at night, they were able to construct one very quickly. The ship was pulled in close to the beach, and a pontoon was built from her to the land; so by 11.30 at night men and horses were all ashore. Their camp fires lighted up beach and town and reflected on the dark transports in the harbor; the sound of arms and tread of marching men adding to the warlike scene.

On Tuesday word was brought to Ponce that the Americanos had come, and the volunteers, in their striped blue and white pajama suits with green trimmings, were summoned in hot haste to meet the invader. A more unwilling lot were never gathered together. They had no desire to fight for Spain or to risk their blood and bones in any sort of an encounter with the Americanos. Just the thing most of them wanted was to have the United States come and deliver them from paying 75-per-cent. taxes and wearing the blue and white pajama at the Queen's bidding.

In spite of the fact that the gracious Regent had built for them a fine barracks and a new military hospital on the hill above Ponce, where they could go if they were wounded (and could get there) in serving their country of Spain—I have the story from one of them who survived a desperate march to Yauco, and drove a hack two days afterward at double rates for his deliverers with unabated vivacity,—loud were the wails and great the consternation in Ponce, Playa and city, at the summons. The regulars would stay with the civil guard to defend the city, but forth the voluntarios must go to defend their country.

Some managed to hide and evade the summons, but most were caught and marched down the dusty road to Yauco. The railroad runs that far, and passes so near the sea that a man could jump from track to water. They did not use the train, however, but tramped, tramped like soldiers. No food, for they would soon put the Yankees to flight, and no water to drink en route, so their enthusiasm was dry when they arrived.

"We will hold the beach," said the comandante, "and they cannot land. Mine the track and blow them up if they dare to come by the cars, so convenient." So to work they turned and dug mines, a dozen or so, under the track. These they filled with powder, and laid a fuse twenty feet long to ignite them when the enemy should dare to arrive.

Over the land, seven miles or so away, was the Yankee fleet. They could see them plainly; dozens of ships they looked, and big they seemed against the western sun, greater than anything that had ever come to Ponce. Were they deceived? Had the Americanos so many ships and soldiers to spare from Cuba? But night was coming, and they were not yet arrived. Now there were those in Ponce who reflected that food and water and a little wine would do the volunteers some good, and carriages were got, and out came friends and food and drink and fresh courage; fires were lighted and supper prepared and eaten—and then what? Would it not be wise to withdraw till morning, and let these invaders go to work out their own ruin? It would indeed; but some must stay to fire the mines, at twenty feet, to blow them into the sea! So back the brave command went to join the regulars in Ponce, while those left to guard the mines and set them off thought better of their valor and fled back to the city, with tales of brave deeds. Many in the night march dropped out of line, preferring to let others do the fighting, that they might fight another day. So goes the story of the volunteers and the defence of Ponce; and it was all the defence that was made.

That same day into Ponce Harbor came the little Wasp, leading the way for the Annapolis, and for the Dixie, that had got ashore and vainly claimed by seniority the right to demand the surrender of the city. Now the charts were bad, the defences an unknown quantity, but the Wasp knew no fear and wanted to be first. So on they came, and anchored off the Playa. A boat was lowered, and Ensign Curtin put in charge to make demand for the immediate surrender of the port and city. Hundreds of people thronged the landing and the plaza in front of the alcaldia, gazed from windows and balconies, as the little ensign sprang from his boat and strode up the landing, his handkerchief tied on a stick for a flag of truce, his sword at his side, and the guns of his ship, including his own port forward 6-pounder, winking with wicked look towards the white town in the late afternoon sunlight and the crowds that thronged the way. "Vivan Americanos!" some said, while others said "Hush!" and all looked at the small young officer, eager in their hearts to welcome him and his flag.

"Where is the alcalde?" said Curtin.

"In jail," said some one, "for American sympathies," and his wife pressed forward to tell her story, tears streaming down her face.

"The capitan del puerto, then, where is he?" The way was quickly shown to the house and broad arched doorway. Once in the presence of the only civil authority to be found, Curtin stated his business quickly—a half-hour to surrender, or the fire of his ship and of the others coming in.

The town destroyed by the terrible American guns!

"But, señor, I cannot surrender. The governor at Ponce, he alone can give the surrender."

"Then he must be sent for at once. There is no time to lose if you wish to save the town."

Then a young man came to the front who spoke good English. "If the lieutenant will go."

"Very good, then; I will take you as interpreter."

"Oh no, never! The civil guard will kill me." For this was one of the volunteers who had run away, and would not have gone to Ponce for all the money in it. It meant the Americans or nothing to him.

After thinking it over, Curtin sent a message to the governor, at the risk and expense of the capitan del puerto, saying his Excellency must come in half an hour or the town be destroyed. Clever young man! That was a move worthy of a major-general. In the mean time the Wasp was getting anxious lest something had happened to the young officer. Signals were hoisted, saying: "Return aboard. Do you want help?" And as Curtin translated these to the captain, his nervousness became great; a telephone was brought into use, and then the message came, "The governor surrenders."

In the mean time the Dixie, having gotten off the rocks, sent a boat in with armed bluejackets and marines, and nearly undid Curtin's work with an offer of twenty-four hours of leeway. Fortunately the surrender had been given, and a flag was hoisted; but as the day turned into night the armed force from the Dixie was withdrawn to the Wasp, and slept on its arms till daylight, when it went ashore and took possession just as the army appeared.

Nothing could have been more peaceful. There was no intention of resistance so far as the people were concerned. Once sure the Americans had come to stay, their joy knew no bounds; they greeted them as friends, and shouted, "Vivan Americanos!"

Somewhere they got little American flags and buttons, and the fortunate possessor of the magic emblems was the envy of all other Puerto-Ricans.

Just as the night fell the Gloucester had come in from Guanica, and had set to work gathering up the lighters, of which there was a goodly number, and by morning had them towed out to the transports and ready for the work of landing.

As they had bargained to pay the crafty Don who owned the lighters a full legal price with bonus, he had no objections, since needs must, and gathered his men and his lighters with alacrity. Now if he had only objected, he would have had to do it all for nothing, and go to jail, besides, for hindering the army. So he vowed allegiance and moved his boats with eagerness, and was the first person to profit by the arrival of Uncle Sam in the island of Puerto Rico.

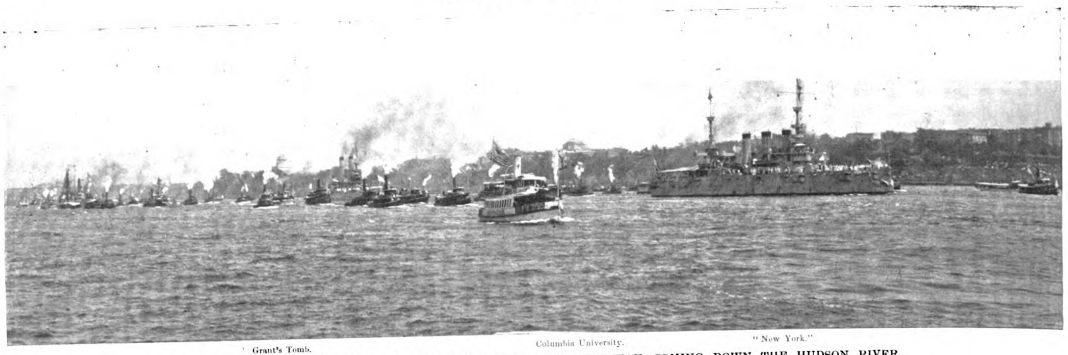
I went ashore in the afternoon with officers from the Wasp, and, after visiting headquarters and greeting friends, we got a carriage and drove out to the city. Squads of soldiers were marching, and guards had been posted all along the way and in the cross-streets. Already they fraternized with the people in a friendly, free-and-easy way characteristic of the American soldier. A guard sat in front of a barber shop under the shade of an awning, perspiration pouring down his face; gun in one hand, handkerchief in the other, he mopped his brow and chatted with the family and neighbors, who brought out chairs and gathered about, apparently very proud to have such a distinguished visitor. Half-way out we passed a soldier who, tired of lugging his heavy-marching outfit, had annexed a boy with a small cart; into that he dumped his knapsack and blanket, another boy carried his gun, and a third helped the other two, while the soldier walked behind, fanning himself with his hat and bossing his pack-train with vigorous words.

Ponce was already in possession of our troops, and they kept coming all the afternoon, part going into camp in the plaza, where they made good use of a large and gorgeous band-stand. The larger part of the force went into camp beyond the city; another camp was established halfway between the Playa and Ponce, with a guard at headquarters.

It was a great day for Ponce. Most of the houses were shut tight at first, and nearly all the stores; but when they found the soldiers would not harm them the whole city opened its doors and business began to boom. The little French-Spanish hotel was the first thing to fall into the hands of the enemy, and never in its history had it done so much business, or served so many breakfasts, or dispensed so many cooling drinks in so short a time. General Wilson established his headquarters in the house of the former governor, and that gentleman had fled with such haste as to show a most unpremeditated departure. A meal was found set upon the table, clean clothes laid out for the day; a broken roll, a full cup of coffee, a carving-knife that had but just begun to cut, proved clearly that the governor's appetite had been lost in an instant, and his retreat was so rapid as to distance his men by many miles.

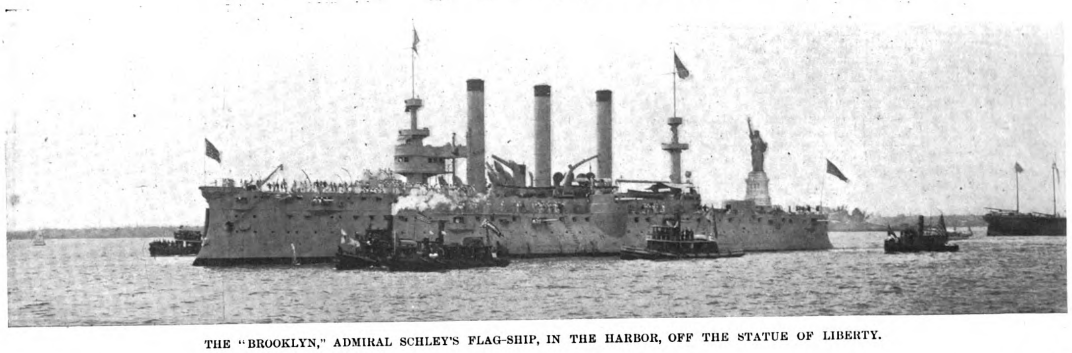
When the Spanish troops marched out of the city they first looted the largest dry-goods store and made armor-plating from anything that came to hand, stuffing it up their backs to protect them from Yankee bullets. Then they retreated in good order.

They have quite an extensive fire department in Ponce, with a building on the plaza and an old-fashioned hand-engine and hook-and-ladder, made in New York State, too. The firemen act also as a kind of policemen, and turned out in force that day, wearing their red shirts and broad belts and little caps. They were down at the Playa early in the day, and as the scene of excitement shifted to the city they marched back there. Then they got their band out, about four o'clock, and marched around the plaza playing some lively tunes. There were not enough to reach all the way across the square, so they just went round and round the cathedral corner, till they looked full twice as many—like the march of the Amazons in a comic opera. Their band did nobly, the people cheered, the soldiers laughed, and it was certainly more like the stage than real life.



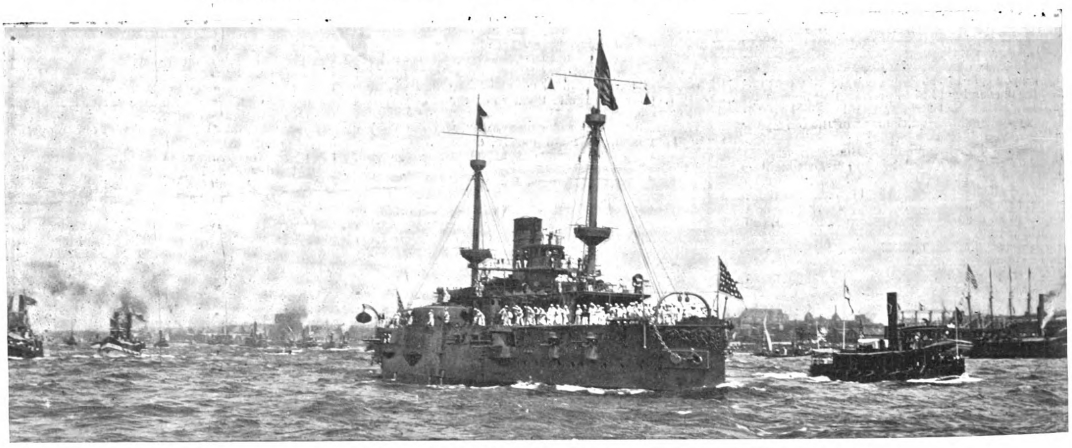
Up the street came a full regiment of dusty soldiers—long lines of rifle-barrels and shining bayonets and broad-chested, sturdy, blue-shirted, heavy-shod men. The tramp, tramp of their steady tread cleared the street, and as they came into view their band—the only one we had heard in Wilson's division—struck up "Marching through Georgia." With splendid rhythm the men kept time to the stirring notes of that old battle-song. It warmed our hearts—it was real; no holiday parade—and all the jesting effervescence of the crowd in the plaza melted out of sight as the column swung by and on to the green fields, where some of them were to lose their lives, and where all were willing to face whatever came.

Back we went to the port and the ship and the busy harbor, passing soldiers everywhere, their pickets guarding every road and corner, and their camp fires blazing out against the dark trees and the twilight sky.

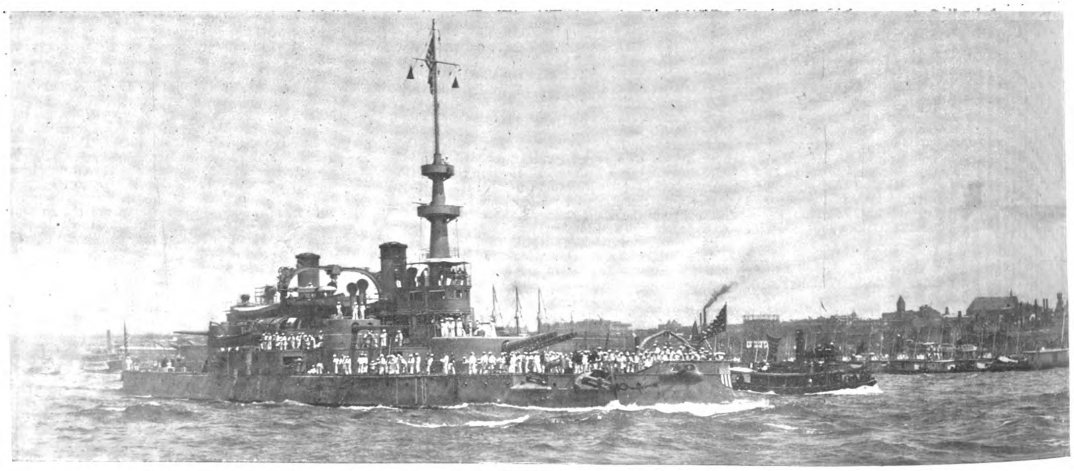


So far not a shot had been fired in this first day of the peaceful occupation of Ponce.

CARLTON T. CHAPMAN.

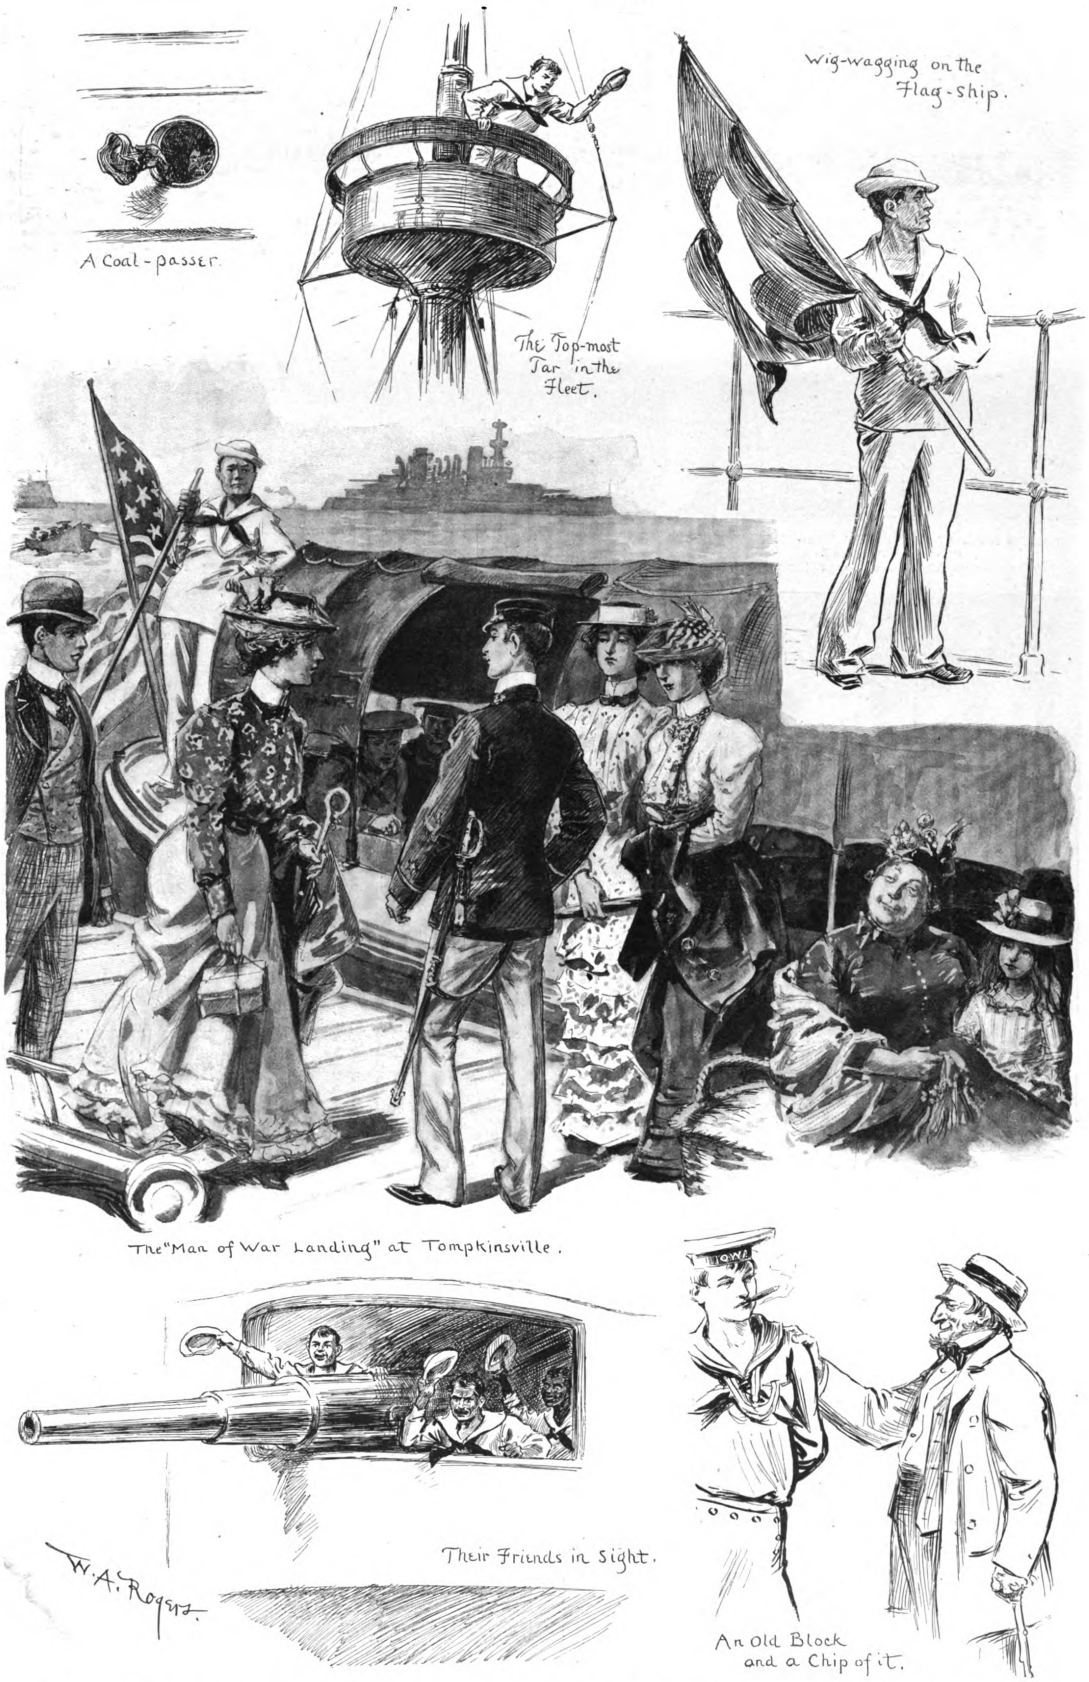


Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



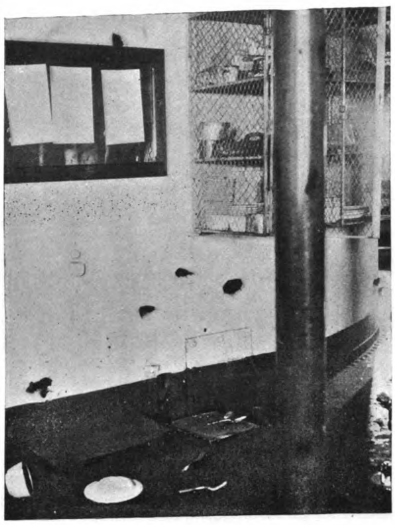
THE "NEW YORK," ADMIRAL SAMPSON'S FLAG-SHIP, LEADS THE WAY—COMING DOWN THE HUDSON RIVER.

THE "BROOKLYN," ADMIRAL SCHLEY'S FLAG-SHIP, IN THE HARBOR, OFF THE STATUE OF LIBERTY.



THE "TEXAS," COMMODORE PHILIP'S REFORMED HOODOO.

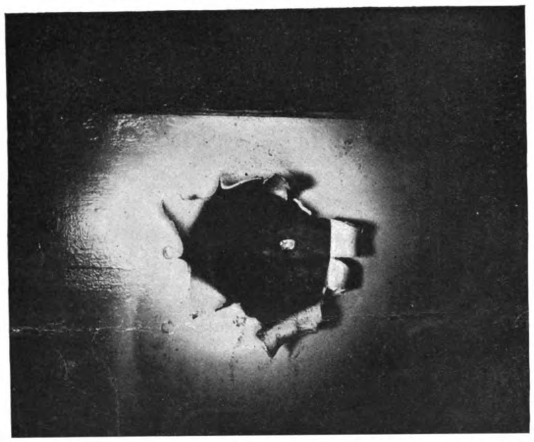
THE "OREGON," CAPTAIN CLARK'S "BATTLE-SHIP CRUISER."



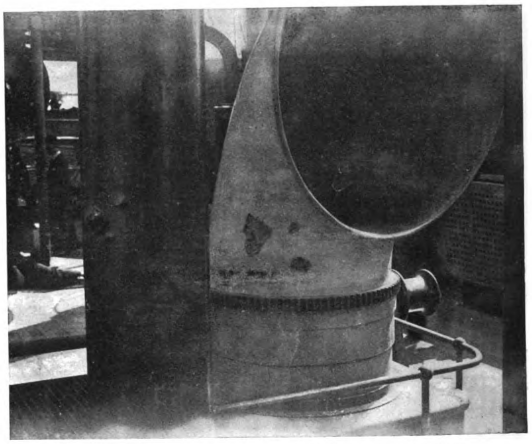
THE HOME-COMING OF THE FLEET—THE NAVAL PARADE, NEW YORK, AUGUST 20, 1898.
PHOTOGRAPHS BY HART.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

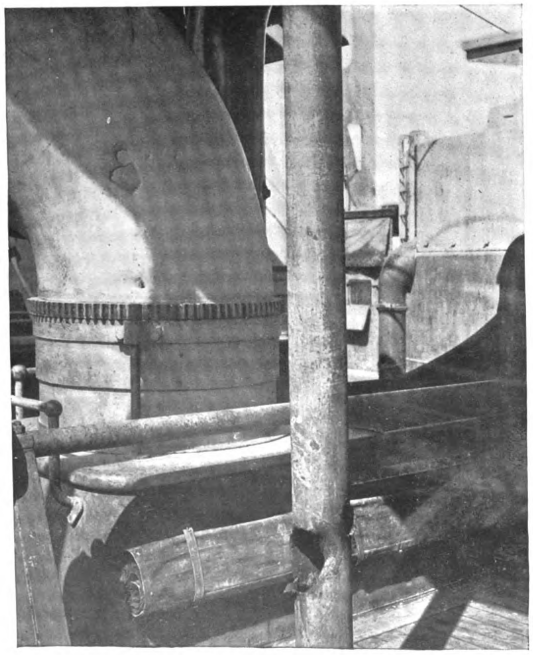
THE HOME-COMING OF THE FLEET—SCENES AND INCIDENTS OF THE NAVAL PARADE, NEW YORK, AUGUST 20, 1898.
DRAWN BY W. A. ROGERS.



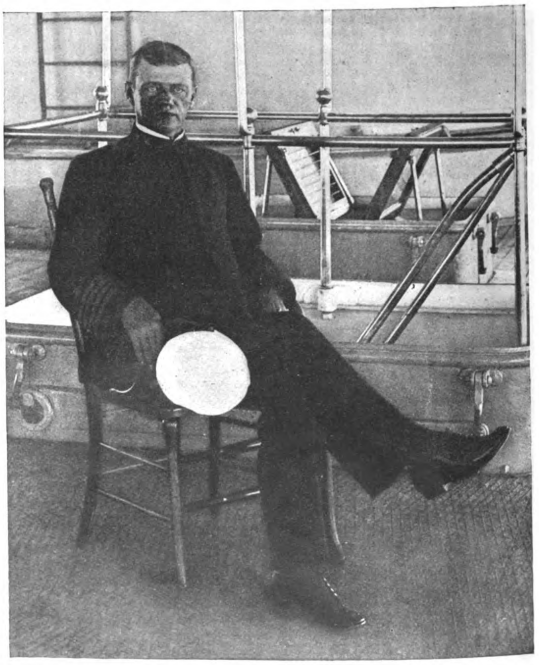
Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



1. HOLES MADE BY EXPLODING SHELL—FRAGMENTS GLANCING TO RIGHT.
Crockery in Cupboard was thrown about as here indicated.



2. HOLE SEEN FURTHEST TO THE RIGHT IN NO. 1.



3. HOLE MADE IN SIDE OF "IOWA" BY SPANISH SHELL PENETRATING, AND EXPLODING AS SHOWN IN NO. 1—VIEW FROM INSIDE.

4. VENTILATOR DAMAGED BY GLANCING SPANISH SHOT.

5. HOLE MADE IN STANCHION BY SPANISH SHOT, WHICH THEN GLANCED AND PENETRATED VENTILATOR.

6. CAPTAIN ROBLEY D. EVANS, U.S.N., COMMANDING U. S. BATTLE-SHIP "IOWA."

THE BATTLE-SHIP "IOWA'S" HONORABLE SCARS.
From Photographs by Hart, taken in New York Harbor August 21.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

CHART OF THE NAVAL BATTLE OF SANTIAGO.

WHAT really happened at the battle of Santiago? All the world knows, of course, that the Spanish squadron was destroyed by the American ships, and that forty minutes of sea-fighting occurred bigger with results than any forty minutes in the history of naval warfare. No one doubts that the flame which leaped to the sky when the first of the Spanish vessels went up in explosion was the dawn of peace. No one stops to think now what would have been the result had our ships been strewn blazing hulks along the Santiago coast, with the Spaniards, uninjured and victorious, free to steam their way to the American shores.

But what was the relation of ship to ship from the moment the Infanta Maria Teresa poked her black nose around Puntillo on that bright Sunday morning? When the Furor blew up, where was the Infanta Maria Teresa, which she had been following immediately? When the Oregon was abeam of two of the Spaniards at once, where were our other ships? Was an opening left at any time for one of the Spaniards to escape? Could the result have been affected by Cervera taking a different course—say, making for the eastward instead of the westward, as has been suggested frequently? Where did the Colon pass her consorts, and how did she escape thirty-seven miles further west, and practically uninjured?

In the multitude of accounts there is much apparent confusion. This is not surprising, when it is remembered that each account has been written either solely or for the far greater part from the view-point of one person or, at the most, one ship. In the heat of battle the observer naturally feels that he is the centre of operations. Stand on the bridge of a war-vessel and watch a land battery reply to your ship's fire, and you feel sure that each and every shell fired is aimed directly at your individual self. You may feel foolish, when you have ducked, to see the shell explode half a mile away, but you cannot get rid of the rooted conviction that the gunner meant that shell for you. Most individual accounts of a great battle, while honest as the sunlight, fail to leave a satisfying impression in the mind of the reader, because they are almost always written from the individual view-point alone. The purpose of the subjoined sketch, or map, is to tell the story of the battle of Santiago as a comprehensive whole. It shows the position of each ship in relation to all the others from the moment Cervera's squadron passed under the shadow of the Morro to the beaching of the Vizcaya. Add to this the hopeless flight of the Cristóbal Colon, with the Brooklyn, Oregon, and Texas in pursuit in continuation of their courses as shown on the map, and you have the whole battle of Santiago in a nutshell—or rather on a sheet of paper.

The map is mathematically and geographically correct, or as nearly so as it was humanly possible to make it under the circumstances. It was drawn on the Texas by Lieutenant Mark L. Bristol, aided by Assistant-Engineer Crank, in the days immediately following the battle. Its data were furnished by the personal observation of the officers of the Texas, revised, corrected, or corroborated by interviews with officers of the Brooklyn, Oregon, Iowa, Indiana, and Gloucester, an extended account written soon after the battle by an officer of the Vixen, and by notes taken by myself during the engagement. The times, relative and actual positions, and distances were worked out with the greatest care. As a comprehensive story, the map stands by itself, and needs no explanation.

Position 1, at 9.35 o'clock, when general signal 250, "The enemy is escaping," fluttered from the yard-arms of Sampson's vessels, finds the squadron in about its usual blockading position, in the general form of an arc of a circle with the Morro as its centre. The ships in order, beginning from the west, are Vixen, Brooklyn, Texas, Iowa, Oregon, Indiana, and Gloucester. The Texas, by actual observation, is 5100 yards from the Morro, and the others are approximately the same distance. The New York having gone to Siboney, and the Massachusetts to Guantanamo, the Vixen, Brooklyn, and Texas are moved somewhat eastward from their ordinary positions, the Iowa and Oregon somewhat further westward. The customary position of the Massachusetts was between the Iowa and Texas; that of the New York, between the Indiana and Gloucester.

The beginning of the battle (Position 2) shows the Spanish ships coming out of the Santiago Harbor entrance and veering westward. All the American ships have headed straight for them, closing in, until it was seen what course the enemy ultimately would take. The Spaniards are firing broadsides as they come out and swing westward, and the Americans are firing bow on. The next ten minutes was the hottest period of the battle. It was seen that the Spaniards meant to try to escape to the westward by hugging the shore, and the American commanders swung west in a parallel course for the running fight.

The end of this ten minutes (Position 3) shows four of our ships, Brooklyn, Texas, Oregon, and Iowa, well bunched. This is a feature which may afford ground for criticism to the foreign naval expert, the four ships together offering a magnificent target for the Spaniards; but it was merely the accident of speed, and lasted for only a moment or so. The Brooklyn, it will be seen, has swung about. The Texas is in the lead of the squadron; the Iowa is nearest inshore; the Indiana is coming up from her position on the far east as fast as the poor condition of her boilers will allow. The Oregon has begun her magnificent burst of speed and has caught up with the Iowa and Texas. The Gloucester is nearly abreast of Morro, in a straight line for the torpedo-boat-destroyers. The little Vixen has come about in a curve and is running west, well outside. Of the Spaniards, the Maria Teresa, Vizcaya, and Colon are also somewhat bunched, having proceeded about two miles from the harbor entrance. The flag-ship is still leading, with the Vizcaya close behind her, while the Colon is rapidly overhauling them, and has cut her course inshore, being thus protected by her consorts. The torpedo-boat-destroyers, it will be seen, have just cleared the harbor entrance.

Events followed very rapidly in the succeeding ten minutes, and Position 4 (ten o'clock) shows radical changes. Captain Clark's magnificent "battle-ship cruiser" Oregon has taken the lead of all the American ships except the Brooklyn, which is a little in advance of her, but considerably further out. The Iowa is overhauling the Texas, and is a little further inshore. The Indiana has come into good range with the torpedo-boats, and is preparing the way for the glorious hammering the tiny Gloucester gave them. Cervera's flag-ship is in difficulties (already her guns are clogged by dead and dying, and the Spanish officers are shooting their own men to keep the others at their work). She has dropped to third place in the column. The Vizcaya is leading, nearly a mile away, with the Colon at her heels. Both the Vizcaya and the Colon, it may be observed, are more than half a mile in advance of our foremost ships.

Another ten minutes and the Maria Teresa and Oquendo are both looking for a good place to run ashore, as shown by Position 5. The Colon has outstripped all her companions, and is crowding on all steam, more than a mile in advance of the Brooklyn and Oregon, with the Vizcaya a good second. The Furor and Pluton are wrecks. It is just forty minutes from the time Cervera was discovered coming out, and the battle is virtually over. Of our ships, the Iowa has drawn up abeam of the Texas, blanketing her fire for a moment, about a mile astern of the Oregon, which is abeam of the Oquendo and Maria Teresa. In a moment or two these two ships are surrendered and beached.

Position 6 takes us up to the surrender of the Vizcaya at Aseradero, showing the Brooklyn abeam and well outside, the Oregon slightly astern and nearest the prize, and the Texas considerably astern, but leading the Iowa about a mile. Schley, Clark, and Philip push on after the fleeing Colon, Evans stays by the Vizcaya, Taylor puts in to the wrecks of the Oquendo and Teresa, and the battle is over. The chase of the Colon, ending thirty-seven miles further in the surrender of the last of Cervera's vaunted squadron, was but a pleasant summer afternoon's cruise.

THOMAS M. DIEUAIDE.

A LAST WILL.

HE was stronger and cleverer, no doubt, than other men, and in many broad lines of business he had grown rich, until his wealth exceeded exaggeration. One morning, in his office, he directed a request to his confidential lawyer to come to him in the afternoon. He intended to have his will drawn. A will is a solemn matter, even with men whose life is given up to business, and who are by habit mindful of the future. After giving this direction he took up no other matter, but sat at his desk alone and in silence.

It was a day when summer was first new. The pale leaves upon the trees were starting forth upon the still unbending branches. The grass in the parks had a freshness in its green like the freshness of the blue in the sky and of the yellow of the sun—a freshness to make one wish that life might renew its youth. The clear breezes from the south wantoned about, and then were still, as if loath to go finally away. Half idly, half thoughtfully the rich man wrote upon the white paper before him, beginning what he wrote with capital letters, such as he had not made since, as a boy in school, he had taken pride in his skill with the pen:

"IN THE NAME OF GOD, AMEN. I, Charles Lounsbury, being of sound and disposing mind and memory [he lingered on the word memory], do now make and publish this my LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT, in order, as justly as I may, to distribute my interests in the world among succeeding men.

"And first, that part of my interests which is known in the law and recognized in the sheep-bound volumes as my property, being inconsiderable and of none account, I make no account of it in this my will.

"My right to live, it being but a life-estate, is not at my disposal, but, these things excepted, all else in the world I now proceed to devise and bequeath:

"Item.—And first, I give to good fathers and mothers, but in trust for their children, nevertheless, all good little words of praise and all quaint pet names, and I charge said parents to use them justly but generously as the needs of their children shall require.

"Item.—I leave to children exclusively, but only for the life of their childhood, all and every, the dandelions of the fields and the daisies thereof, with the right to play among them freely, according to the custom of children, warning them at the same time against the thistles. And I devise to children the yellow shores of creeks and the golden sands beneath the waters thereof, with the drugon-flies that skim the surface of said waters, and the odors of the willows that dip into said waters, and the white clouds that float high over the giant trees.

"And I leave to children the long, long days to be merry in, in a thousand ways, and the Night and the Moon and the train of the Milky Way to wonder at, but subject, nevertheless, to the rights hereinafter given to lovers; and I give to each child the right to choose a star that shall be his, and I direct that the child's father shall tell him the name of it, in order that the child shall always remember the name of that star after he has learned and forgotten astronomy.

"Item.—I devise to boys jointly all the useful idle fields and commons where ball may be played, and all snow-clad hills where one may coast, and all streams and ponds where one may skate, to have and to hold the same for the period of their boyhood. And all meadows, with the clover blooms and butterflies thereof; and all woods, with their appurtenances of squirrels and whirring birds and echoes and strange noises; and all distant places which may be visited, together with the adventures there found. I do give to said boys to be theirs. And I give to said boys each his own place at the fireside at night, with all pictures that may be seen in the burning wood or coal, to enjoy without let or hindrance and without any incumbrance of cares.

"Item.—To lovers I devise their imaginary world, with whatever they may need, as the stars of the sky, the red, red roses by the wall, the snow of the hawthorn, the sweet strains of music, or aught else they may desire to figure to each other the lastingness and beauty of their love.

"Item.—To young men jointly, being joined in a brave, mad crowd, I devise and bequeath all boisterous, inspiring sports of rivalry. I give to them the disdain of weakness and undaunted confidence in their own strength. Though they are rude and rough, I leave to them alone the power of making lasting friendships and of possessing companions; and to them exclusively I give all merry songs and brave choruses to sing, with smooth voices to troll them forth.

"Item.—And to those who are no longer children or youths or lovers I leave Memory, and I leave to them the volumes of the poems of Burns and Shakespeare, and of other poets, if there are others, to the end that they may live the old days over again freely and fully, without tithe or diminution; and to those who are no longer children or youths or lovers I leave, too, the knowledge of what a rare, rare world it is."

WILLISTON FISH.

AS TO WAR TAXES.

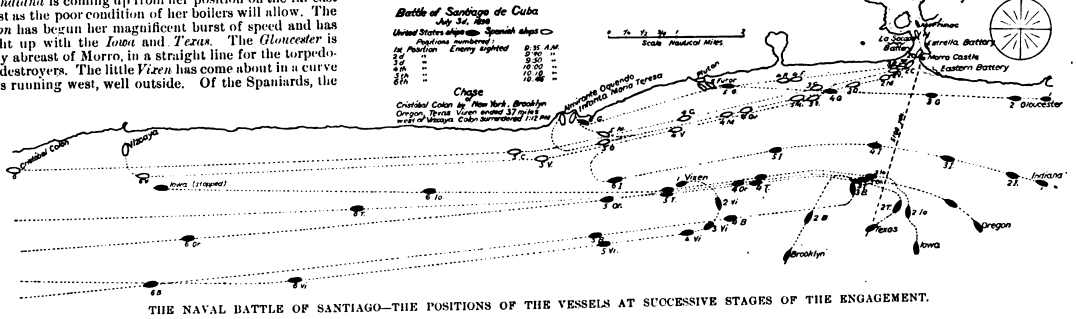
THEY'VE put a stamp upon our checks,
As well as on our beer;
They've taxed the note that often wrecks,
And things that bring good cheer.
They've taxed the mortgage on the roof,
They've taxed insurance too,
Until some folks have but reproof
For schemes for Revenue.

I've but a word of good advice
For those who make the tax:
Why not impose some of the ice
On more deserving backs?
Why make the man who pays a debt
Add something to his score,
When there are several millions yet
'Twere well not to ignore?



Tax nuisances, not virtues. There
Is sure no lack of these:
The man who talks while cutting hair,
The man demanding fees
For doing what he ought to do,
And others of his ilk;
Pray why ignore the pirate crew
And put so much on silk?

The Yellow Journalist should be Compelled to pay two cents
On every one-cent extra he Brings out with lines immense.
Tax all the fibs this fellow tells;
I think you'll surely find
That you've at last removed the spells
That weak finances bind.

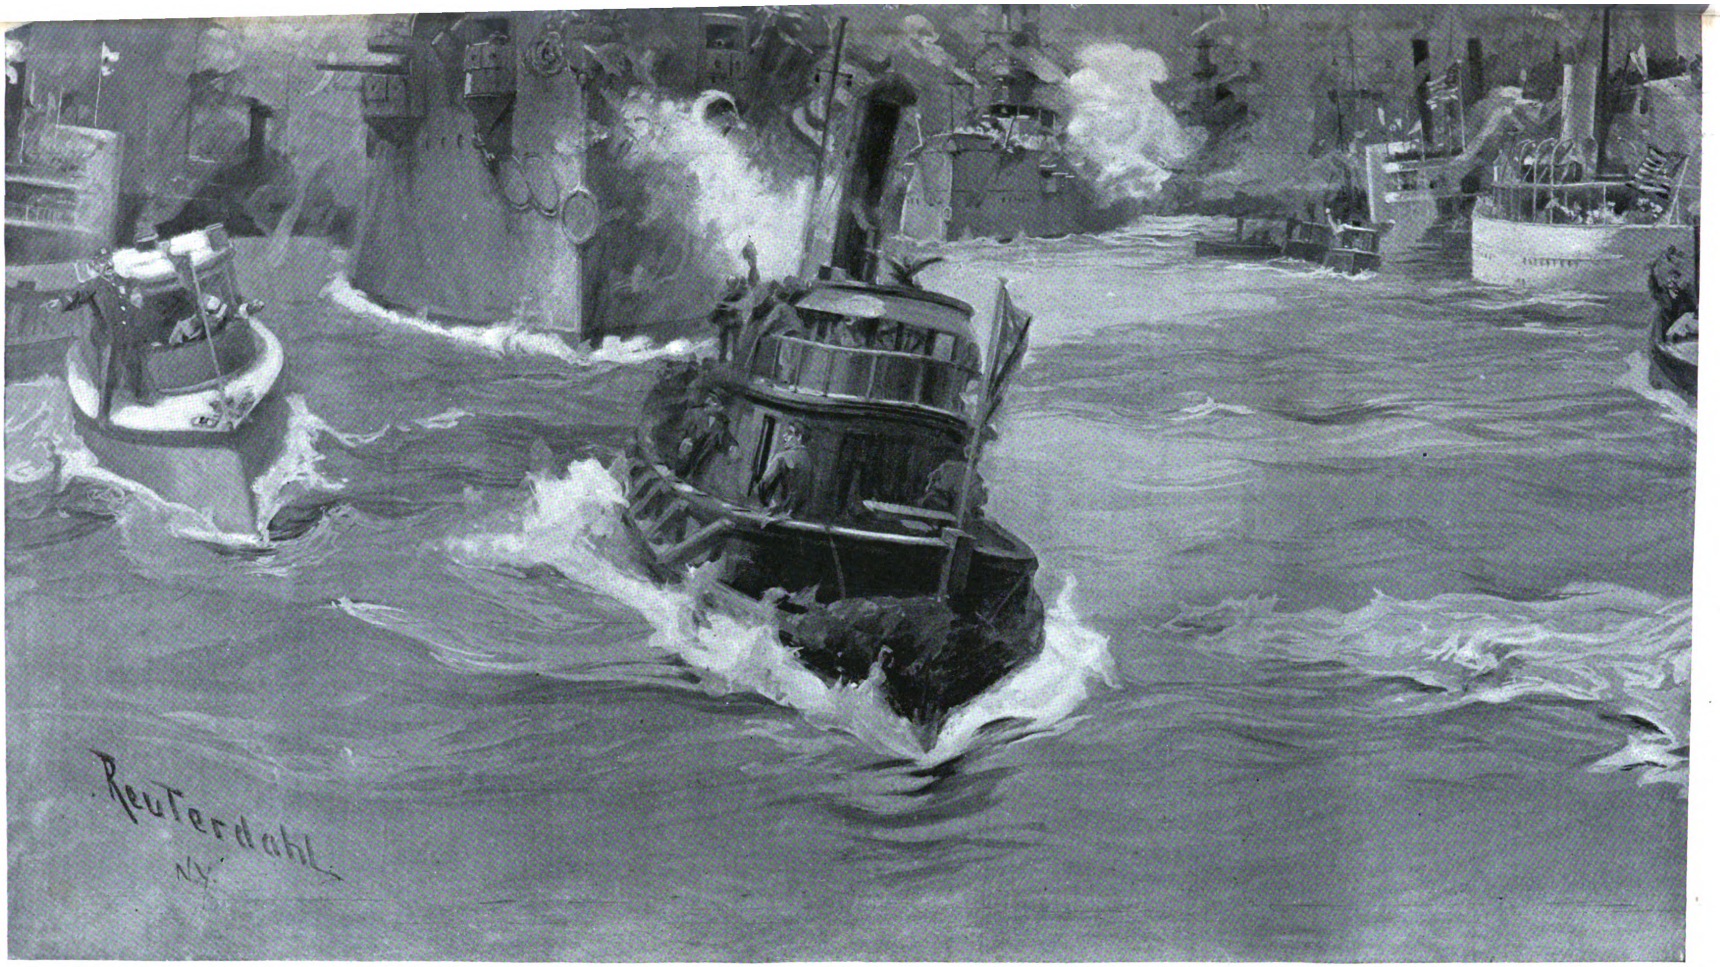
Tax all the saffron clergymen,
Forgetful of their place,
For every word they utter when
They would incite the race.
Tax people like our loved Van Wyck,
And Platt, and Croker too,
For every scheming little strike
Their politics put through.

Tax deals and schemes, tax everything
Which makes our folk appear
To be bound fast within a ring—
You'll find there's plenty here.
Tax everywhere corruption, and
I think you'll shortly see
The people in a chorus grand
Acclaim you splendidly.

JOHN KENDRICK BANGS.

THE NAVAL BATTLE OF SANTIAGO—THE POSITIONS OF THE VESSELS AT SUCCESSIVE STAGES OF THE ENGAGEMENT.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE
Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google



Digitized by Google

Original from
PENN STATE

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Generated for Nicole Fry (Washington University in St. Louis) on 2017-08-24 17:35 GMT / http://hdl.handle.net/2027/pst.000020241148
Public Domain, Google-digitized / http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd-google

Digitized by Google

HONORING THE NAVY.

THE GREAT MARINE PARADE OF AUGUST 20 IN NEW YORK HARBOR—FIVE BATTLE-SHIPS AND TWO ARMORED CRUISERS IN LINE.

Drawn by H. Reuterdahl.

Original from PENN STATE

THE ASSOCIATE HERMITS.*

BY FRANK R. STOCKTON,

Author of "The Great Stone of Sardis," etc.

ILLUSTRATED BY A. B. FROST.

XXI.—THE INDIVIDUALITY OF PETER SADLER.

"MARTIN," said Matlack, sharply, before the young man had reached him, "it seems to me that you think that you have been engaged here as lady's-maid, but there's other things to do besides teaching young women about trees and fishes. If you think," continued Matlack, when the two had reached the woodland kitchen, "that your bein' a hermit is goin' to let you throw all the work on me, you're mistaken. There's a lot of potatoes that's got to be peeled for dinner."

Without a word Martin sat down on the ground with a pan of potatoes in front of him and began to work. Had he been a proud crusader setting forth to fight the Saracens his blood could not have coursed with greater warmth and force, his soul could not have more truly spurned the earth and all the common things upon it. What he had said to Margery had made him feel ennobled. If Raybold had that instant appeared before him with some jeering insult, Martin would have pardoned him with lofty scorn; and yet he peeled potatoes, and did it well. But his thoughts were not upon his work; they were upon the future which, if he proved himself to be the man he thought himself to be, might open before him. When he had finished the potatoes he put the pan upon a table and stood near by, deep in thought.

"Yes," said he to himself, "I should go now. After what I have said to her I cannot stay here and live this life before her. I would wait on her with bended knee at every step, but with love for her in my soul I cannot wash dishes for other people. I have spoken, and now I must act; and the quicker the better. If all goes well I may be here again, but I shall not come back as a guide." Then a thought of Raybold crossed his mind, but he put it aside. Even if he staid here he could not protect her, for she had shown that she did not wish him to do it in the only way he could do it, and he felt sure, too, that any further annoyance would result in an appeal to Mr. Archibald.

"Well," said Matlack, sharply, "what's the matter with you? Don't you intend to move?"

"Yes," said Martin, turning quickly, "I do intend to move. I am going to leave this camp just as soon as I can pack my things."

"And where in the name of thunder are you goin' to?"

"I'm going to Sadler's," said Martin.

"What for?"

"On my own business," was the reply.

Matlack looked at him for a moment suspiciously. "Have you got any complaints to make of me?" he said.

"No," said Martin, promptly, "not one; but I have affairs on hand which will take me off immediately." And he moved toward the tent.

"Before dinner?" asked Matlack.

"Yes," said the other, "before dinner; now."

"Go ahead then," said Matlack, putting some sticks of wood into the stove; "and tell Sadler that if he don't send me somebody before supper-time to help about this camp, he'll see me. I'll be hanged," he said to himself, as he closed the door of the stove, "if this isn't hermitism with a vengeance. I wonder who'll be the next one to cut and run; most likely it will be Mrs. Perkenpine."

Early in the afternoon, warm and dusty, Martin presented himself before Peter Sadler, who was smoking his pipe on the little shaded piazza at the back of the house.

"Oh, ho!" said Peter. "How in the name of commonsense did you happen to turn up at this minute? This is about as queer a thing as I've known of lately. What did you come for? Sit down."

"Mr. Sadler," said Martin, "I have come here on most important business."

"Lake dry?" asked Peter.

"It is a matter," said Martin, "which concerns myself, and if all the lakes in the world were dry, I would not be able to think about them, so full is my soul of one thing."

"By the Lord Harry," said Peter, "let's have it, quick!"

In a straightforward manner, but with an ardent vehemence which he could not repress, Martin stated his business with Peter Sadler. He told him how he loved Margery, what he had said to her, and what she had said to him.

"And now," said the young man, "I have come to ask your permission to address her; but whether you give it or not I shall go to her mother and speak to her. I know her address, and I intend to do everything in an honorable way."

Peter Sadler put down his pipe and looked steadfastly at the young man. "I wish to heaven," said he, "that there was a war goin' on! I'd write a letter to the commander-in-chief and let you take it to him, and I'd tell him you was the bravest man between Hudson Bay and Patagonia. By George! I can't understand it! I can't understand how you could have the cheek, the unutterable brass, to come here and ask me—me, Peter Sadler—to let you court one of the ladies in a campin'-party of mine. And, what's more, I can't understand how I can sit here and hear you tell me that tale without picking up a chair and knocking you down with it."

"Mr. Sadler," said Martin, rising, "I have spoken to you fairly and squarely, and if that's all you've got to say, I will go."

"Sit down!" roared Peter, bringing his hand upon the table as if he would drive its legs through the floor. "Sit down, and listen to what I have to say to you. It's the strangest thing that ever happened to me that I am not more angry with you than I am; but I can't understand it, and I pass it by. Now that you are seated again, I will make some remarks on my side. Do you see that?" said he, picking up a letter on the table. "Do you see who it is addressed to?"

"To me!" exclaimed Martin, in surprise.

"Yes, it's to you," said Peter; "and I wrote it, and I intended to send it by Bill Hammond this afternoon. That's the reason I was surprised when I saw you here. But I'm not goin' to give it to you; I'd rather tell you what's in it, now you are here. Before I knew you were the abject ninnyhammer that you have just told me you are I had a good opinion of you, and thought that you were cut out to make a first-class traveller and explorer—the sort of a fellow who could lead a surveying expedition through the wilderness, or work up new countries and find out what they are made of and what's in them. And only yesterday I heard of a chance that ought to make you jump, and this morning I wrote to you about it. A friend of mine, who 's roughed it with me for many a day, is goin' to take an expedition down into New Mexico in the interests of a railroad and minin' company. They want to know everything about the country—the game, fish, trees, and plants, as well as the minerals—and it struck me that if you are not just the kind of man they want you could make yourself so in a very short time. They'd pay you well enough, and you'd have a chance to dip into natural history, and all that sort of thing, that you had no reason to expect for a dozen years to come, if it ever came. If such a chance had been offered to me at your age I wouldn't have changed lots with a king. All you've got to do is to pack up and be off. The party starts from New York in just three days; and I'll give you a letter to Joe Hendricks, and that 'll be all you want. He knows me well enough to take you without a word. If you haven't got money enough saved to fit yourself out for the trip I'll lend you some, and you can pay me back when they pay you. You can take the train this afternoon, and maybe you can see Hendricks to-night. So pack up what you want and leave what you don't want, and I'll take care of it. I'll write to Hendricks now."

Many times did the face of Martin flush and pale as he listened. A vision of Paradise had been opened before him, but he felt that he must shut his eyes.

"Mr. Sadler," he said, "you are very kind. You offer me a great thing—a thing which two weeks ago I should have accepted in the twinkling of an eye, and would have thanked you for all the rest of my life; but I cannot take it now. With all my heart I love a woman; I have told her so, and I am now going on the path she told me to take. I cannot turn aside from that for any prospects in the world."

Peter Sadler's face grew red, and then it grew black, and then it turned red again, and finally resumed its ordinary brown.

"Martin Sanders," said he, speaking quietly, but with one hand fastened upon the arm of his chair with a grasp which a horse could not have loosened, "if you are cowardly enough and small enough and paltry enough to go to a girl who is living in peace and comfort and ask her to marry you, when you know perfectly well that for years to come you could not give her a decent roof over her head, and that if her family wanted her to live like a Christian they would have to give her the money to do it with; and if you are fool enough not to know that when she sent you first to me and then to her mother she was tryin' to get rid of you without hurtin' your feelin's, why, tryin' to get rid of you without hurtin' your feelin's, why, then, I want you to get out of my sight, and the quicker the better. But if you are not so low down as that, go to your room and pack up your bag. The coach will start for the train at three o'clock, and it is now nearly half-past two; that will just give me time to write to Hendricks. Go!"

Martin rose. Whatever happened afterward, he must go now. It seemed to him as if the whole world had suddenly grown colder; as if he had been floating in a fog and had neared an iceberg. Could it be possible that she had spoken, as she had spoken, simply to get rid of him? He could not believe it. No one with such honest eyes could speak in that way; and yet he did not know what to believe.

In any case, he would go away in the coach. He had spoken to Sadler, and now, whether he spoke to any one else or not, the sooner he left the better.

When he came to take the coach, Peter Sadler, who had rolled himself to the front of the house, handed him the letter he had written.

"I believe you are made of the right kind of stuff," he said, "although you've got a little mouldy by bein' lazy out there in the woods; but you're all right now; and what you've got to do is to go ahead with a will, and, take my word for it, you'll come out on top. Do you want any money? No? Very well, then; good-by. You needn't trouble yourself to write to me, I'll hear about you from Hendricks; and I'd rather know what he thinks about you than what you think about yourself."

"How little you know," thought Martin, as he entered the coach, "what I am or what I think about myself. As if my purpose could be changed by words of yours!" And he smiled a smile which would have done justice to Arthur Raybold. The chill had gone out of him; he was warm again.

On the train he read the letter to Hendricks which Peter Sadler had given to him unsealed. It was a long letter, and he read it twice. Then he sat and gazed out of the window at the flying scenery for nearly half an hour, after which he read the letter again. Then he folded it up and put it into his pocket.

"If she had given me the slightest reason to hope," he said to himself, "how easy it would be to tear this letter into scraps."

Now an idea came into his mind. If he could see her mother quickly, and if she should ignore his honorable intentions and refuse to give him the opportunity to prove that he was worthy of a thought from her and her daughter, then it might not be too late to fall back on Peter Sadler's letter. But he shook his head; that would be dishonorable and unworthy of him.

He shut his eyes; he could not bear to look at the brightness of the world outside the window of the car. Under his closed lids there came to him visions, sometimes of Margery and sometimes of the forests of New Mexico. Sometimes the visions were wavering, uncertain, and transitory, and again they were strong and vivid—so plain to him that he could almost hear the leaves rustle as some wild creature turned a startled look upon him.

That night he delivered his letter to Mr. Hendricks.

XXII.—A TRANQUILLIZING BREEZE AND A HOT WIND.

AFTER Martin had left her, Margery sat on the root of the tree until Mr. Clyde came up and said he had been wondering what had become of her.

"I have been wondering that, myself," she said. "At least, I have been wondering what is going to become of me."

"Don't you intend to be a hermit?" said he.

She shook her head. "I don't think it is possible," she answered. "There is no one who is better satisfied to be alone, and who can make herself happier all by herself, and who, in all sorts of ways, can get along better without other people than I can, and yet other people are continually interfering with me, and I cannot get away from them."

Clyde smiled. "That is a pretty plain hint," he said. "I suppose I might as well take it, and go off to some hermitage of my own."

"Oh, nonsense!" said Margery. "Don't be so awfully quick in coming to conclusions. I do feel worried and troubled and bothered, and I want some one to talk to; not about things which worry me, of course, but about common ordinary things, that will make me forget."

A slight shade came over the face of Mr. Clyde, and he seated himself on the ground near Margery. "It is a shame," said he, "that you should be worried. What is it in this peaceable, beautiful forest troubles you?"

"Did you ever hear of a paradise without snakes?" she asked. "The very beauty of it makes them come there."

"I have never yet known any paradise at all," he replied. "But can't you tell me what it is that troubles you?"

Margery looked at him with her clear, large eyes. "I'll tell you," she said, "if you will promise not to do a single thing without my permission."

"I promise that," said Clyde, eagerly.

"I am troubled by people making love to me."

"People!" exclaimed Clyde, with a puzzled air.

"Yes," said she. "Your cousin is one of them."

"I might have supposed that; but who on earth can be the other one?"

"That is Martin," said Margery.

For a moment Mr. Clyde did not seem to understand; and then he exclaimed, "You don't mean the young man who cuts wood and helps Matlack?"

"Yes, I do," she answered. "And you need not shut your jaw hard and grit your teeth that way. That is exactly what he did when he found out about Mr. Raybold. It is of no use to get angry, for you can't do anything without my permission; and, besides, I tell you that if I were condemned by a court to be made love to, I would much rather have Martin make it than Mr. Raybold. Martin is a good deal more than a guide; he has a good education, and would not be here if it was not for his love of nature. He is going to make nature his object in life, and there is something noble in that; a great deal better than trying to strut about on the stage."

"And those two have really been making love to you?" asked Clyde.

"Yes, really," she answered. "You never saw people more in earnest in all your life. As for Mr. Raybold, he was as earnest as a cat after a bird. He made me furiously angry. Martin was different. He is just as earnest, but he is more of a gentleman; and when I told him what I wanted him to do, he said he would do it. But there is no use in telling your cousin what I want him to do. He is determined to persecute me and make me miserable, and there is no way of stopping it, except by making a quarrel between him and Uncle Archibald. It is a shame!" she went on. "Who could have thought that two people would have turned up to disturb me in this way."

"Margery," said Mr. Clyde, and although he called her by her Christian name she took no notice of it, "you think you have too many lovers; but you are mistaken. You have not enough; you ought to have three."

She looked at him inquiringly.

"Yes," he said, quickly; "and I want to be the third."

"And so make matters three times as bad as they were at first?" she asked.

"Not at all," said he. "When you have chosen one of them, he could easily keep away the two others."

"Do you mean," said Margery, "that if I were to agree to have three, and then, if I were to ask you to do it, you would take one of the others and go away quietly with him and leave me in peace with the third one?"

Mr. Clyde half smiled, but instantly grew serious again, and a flush came on his face. "Margery," said he, "I cannot bear trifling any more about this. No matter what anybody has said to you, whether it is any one in this camp or any one out of it, there is not a man in this world who—"

"Oh, Mr. Clyde," interrupted Margery, "you must not sit there and speak to me in such an excited way. If any one should see us they would think we were quarrelling. Let us go down to the lake; the air from the water is cool and soothing."

Together they walked from under the shade of the tree, and so wended their way that it brought them to a mass of shrubbery which edged the water a little distance down the lake. On the other side of this shrubbery was a pretty bank, which they had seen before.

